In 1992, Cuomo ended up delivering the nominating speech for Bill Clinton at the Democratic convention in New York. He offered a robust, fulsome embrace of the young New Democrat. If Warren stays out of the 2016 race, and if Hillary Clinton runs and wins the nomination, could we see the Massachusetts senator in the role of Mario Cuomo at the next Democratic convention?

New York Times column: Frank Bruni: “Are Two Dynasties Our Destiny?”

By Frank Bruni

January 3, 2015

[Subtitle:] Clinton, Bush and the 2016 Presidential Election

JEB and Hillary. Hillary and Jeb. It’s getting to the point where a mention of one yields a reference to the other, where they’re semantically inseparable, presidentially conjoined. Should we just go the extra step, save ourselves some syllables and keystrokes? The 2016 matchup as envisioned by many: Jebary. Or, more economically still, Heb.

The fascination with this pair as possible rivals for the White House makes perfect sense, because it defies belief. We’re talking about tomorrow while trafficking in yesterday. We’re saying we need to turn the page by going back to a previous chapter.

We’re a country of self-invention (that’s the myth, at least) in thrall to legacies and in the grip of dynasties, riveted by the mightiest surname in modern Democratic politics and its Republican analogue, imagining not just a clash of the titans but a scrum of the successors.

It would be a replay of the 1992 race, but with the wife of the victor against a son of the loser. It would also call to mind the 2000 race, when that victor’s heir apparent, Al Gore, squared off against another of that loser’s sons, George W. Bush. That too was a Clinton-Bush contest, because Bush campaigned against the incumbent president, repeatedly suggesting that his conduct with a White House intern had brought dishonor to the office.

And then, years later, they all somehow got chummy. In an interview with C-Span that aired last January, Barbara Bush revealed that Bill Clinton had developed the habit of dropping by her family’s Kennebunkport, Me., compound every summer for a visit.

This version of Total Mail Converter is not registered.

“I love Bill Clinton,” she said, explaining that he and her husband, the 42nd and 41st presidents, had formed a special bond. “Bill’s father wasn’t around, and I think that he thinks of George a little bit like the father he didn’t have.” If he’s an adopted son of sorts, then Jebary would be incestuous in addition to operatic.

How irresistible.

But how unlikely, despite all the current speculation following Jeb Bush’s maneuvers to prime a candidacy: the release of emails from his years as governor of Florida; the announcement last week that he’d resigned his positions on the boards of corporations and nonprofit organizations.

There’s no doubt that he and Hillary Clinton enjoy enormous structural advantages — in terms of name recognition, fund-raising and ready-made support networks — over other potential aspirants for their parties’ nominations.

But they also have significant external problems and internal flaws, and there are serious open questions about each. Factor those in and it’s a reach, as a sheer matter of probability, that they wind up as the final two.

One of them? Sure. Both? Too much could go wrong.

A successful campaign isn’t just coffers and endorsements, though those matter. It’s narrative and emotion. It’s a speech-by-speech, handshake-by-handshake seduction, and on this score it’s unclear that Clinton and Bush are especially well positioned or masters of the game. They’re formidable candidates, yes. But are they good ones?

What I’ve previously noted about her is true as well of him: They’re not fresh and unfamiliar enough for all that many voters to discover them, the way they did Barack Obama in 2008 and to some extent George W. Bush in 2000, and develop that kind of political crush.

They’re not naturals on the stump. Clinton came into the 2008 campaign with extensive experience in the spotlight; still she struggled to warm up to audiences (and vice versa) and find the looseness and air of intimacy that many voters crave. Her “Hard Choices” book tour last year was rocky, with awkward moments that she created or should have been able to avoid.

And it’s impossible to predict how Bush would fare on the trail, because he hasn’t waged a campaign since his re-election as governor of Florida in 2002. That’s significant, and it’s getting less attention than it should.

His bid for the Republican nomination, if he formalizes it, would be his first. And while his brother succeeded on his maiden voyage, the subsequent two nominees, John McCain and Mitt Romney, were making second tries. Practice helps.

EVEN Bush’s most ardent admirers don’t sell him as a rousing orator. Last April I happened to hear him give an education reform speech, at an event where Chris Christie had been the headliner the previous year, and the contrast was stark. Christie had come across as impassioned, unscripted. He filled and held the room. Bush was a phlegmatic blur. Afterward his supporters talked about and fretted over it.

This version of Total Mail Converter is not registered.

Both he and Hillary Clinton may be too awash in money. More so than other Democrats and Republicans who've signaled interest in the presidency, they've existed for many years now at a financial altitude far, far above that of ordinary Americans.

And reporters digging into their affairs would provide voters with constant reminders of that, revisiting the Clintons' speaking fees and examining Jeb Bush's adventures in private equity, which a Bloomberg Politics story from December described under this headline: "Jeb Bush Has a Mitt Romney Problem."

It's hard to fathom that at this of all junctures, when there's growing concern about income inequality and the attainability of the American dream, voters in both parties would choose nominees of such economically regal bearing.

Clinton would at least hold the promise of history in the making — a first female president — and her candidacy would wring excitement from that. But to seal the deal, she'd probably have to tamp down excessive talk of inevitability, forge a less combative relationship with the news media and find a nimbleness that has often eluded her.

As Peter Beinart observed in a National Journal appraisal last year, "She's terrific at developing and executing a well-defined plan. She's less adept at realizing that a well-defined plan is not working and improvising something new." He was previewing a Clinton presidency, but his assessment is equally germane to a Clinton candidacy.

And Clinton and Bush together have more baggage than the cargo hold of a 747. That's the flip side of all of those family tentacles, all that political history, all those privileged inside glimpses of the process. They make you putty in the hands of the right opposition researcher.

We're nearly two years away from November 2016. So are Clinton and Bush. They remain abstractions.

But they won't get to campaign that way, and we won't know some of the most important stuff about them until they're actually in the arena, showing us their fettle and whether it fits the mood of the moment.

Maybe Jebary really is who we are and where we're headed. I suspect a different destination.

Boulder Daily Camera: "A conversation with Gary Hart: New policies for a new world"

[No Writer Mentioned]

This version of Total Mail Converter is not registered.

January 3, 2015, 6:00 p.m. MST

Correction, update: Former U.S. Sen. Gary Hart sent the following statement to the Camera on Sunday.

"In a long interview printed today with Mr. Dave Krieger, I am quoted as suggesting that the Orange Order might be included in the category of a paramilitary organization in Northern Ireland. That is an incorrect statement. There is an Orange Volunteer organization which has been so characterized. But the Orange Order is not, nor has it been, considered a paramilitary organization. I would appreciate this correction being printed."

The article has been edited to reflect this correction.

Former U.S. Sen. Gary Hart had just returned from Northern Ireland, where he was serving as Secretary of State John Kerry's personal representative, when he sat down for a conversation with Daily Camera editorial page editor Dave Krieger in his Denver law office on Dec. 11.

The one-hour, 40-minute conversation moved from his current assignment to a variety of other topics, including Vladimir Putin, U.S. defense spending, a new book about the stakeout that destroyed Hart's second presidential campaign, the corruption of electoral politics by special interest money and the prospective field of Democratic presidential contenders in 2016. This is the first half of the conversation. Part 2 will be published next week.

Q: Let's start with your current assignment. What is the task in Northern Ireland?

A: Well, you can't understand it without some history, so I'm afraid I'll have to ramble a bit. The Protestant majority/Catholic minority in Northern Ireland began to clash over perceived injustices that the minority were receiving at the hands of the British government. As you know, Ulster, or northeast Ireland, is a province of the United Kingdom, together with England, Scotland and Wales. This had been developing for quite a long time, since the creation of the Irish Republic in 1922 in the so-called Anglo-Irish Agreement. Ulster was carved out. This led to a brief civil war in Ireland. Long history.

In any case, in the '60s, paramilitaries formed on both sides ... . Bombs and bullets flew and 3,000 people died. At the end of the Cold War and the beginning of the Clinton administration, I, among others, I think I was one of the first, urged Bill Clinton to send a personal representative or special envoy or whatever you want to call it, to Northern Ireland, if the parties would agree to it, to try to negotiate a peace agreement. That was '94. In '95, he appointed George Mitchell, a friend and former colleague. In '98, the Good Friday Agreement was signed by the British and Irish governments, but most of all by the parties in Northern Ireland. There are, by the way, two major parties but six political parties overall.

Three of them are so-called unionist parties. They believe in continuing the affiliation with the United Kingdom. And that is the Protestant majority. But that majority, by the way, is declining in population.

The cease-fire occurred under considerably complicated terms. Further negotiations went forward and led to something called the St. Andrews Agreement, named for where the negotiation took place, that created a so-called devolved government. By that was meant that London would transfer authority for self-government to a government that was composed of the two major parties. It was structured with a first minister from the Democratic Unionist Party, the leading unionist party, and a deputy first minister from the Sinn Féin, or the Irish

This version of Total Mail Converter is not registered.

Nationalist or Republican side. That turned out to be a man called Peter Robinson, currently, and, on the other side, a well-known former member of the IRA, Martin McGuinness. So that's all the backdrop.

Time went by, we're now talking between '06 and '14, when progress was made and then there would be periods of stagnation. There were several sets of issues.

The principal issues today, and there have been kind of fits and starts, have to do with the budget. The budget comes from London, the U.K. government, and it's basically one billion pounds sterling per year. It's big. Northern Ireland is the size of Connecticut. It has a million and a quarter to a million and a half people. So it's human scale and yet it costs a lot. And the reason it costs a lot is the economy is not good and it's heavily, heavily subsidized by the British government. So the British government is cutting spending under a Conservative government, (prime minister) David Cameron, and that means across the board, including Northern Ireland. That meant cutting welfare payments. Sinn Féin said no. 'We have too many poor people here, too many people who were victims of the Troubles.' So that's been the principal area of contention.

A second set of issues is very hard to explain. They're called the legacy issues. They combine victims and survivors, and that's never been resolved. Should people be compensated on both sides for what happened to them and their loved ones, death and dismemberment, houses destroyed and so forth. But also, flags and parades. Now, you say flags and parades to Americans and they roll their eyes. Why are they going on at such length about flags and parades?

To which I say, wait a minute. Have you heard of Ferguson, Missouri? Those are parades. Protests. The same thing is going on in Northern Ireland. Flags, I say, do you remember, it was only recently where capitals in South Carolina and other places wanted to fly the confederate flag? These are symbols. So, OK, Americans begin to understand it a little bit better.

The third set of issues has to do with unfulfilled ideas in the Good Friday Agreement. Sinn Féin wanted schools to include the study of the Irish language. That hasn't been resolved. Sinn Féin wants a bill of rights. That hasn't been resolved. So those are also legacy issues.

Then finally, the devolved government in '06 needs to be reformed. Ministries need to be consolidated, members of the legislative assembly have to be reduced.

So here you have four baskets of issues. Nothing was happening in the summer of this year and Secretary of State John Kerry, a friend and former colleague, asked if I would go over in August to see whether there was anything the United States could do to get the sides talking to each other. The theory being, it's still volatile. There are still streets, for example, the famous street called the Ardoyne (in Belfast), where every building would have a unionist flag on one side and every building on the other side would have an Irish flag.

Protestant schools, Catholic schools. And barriers, still barriers from the time of the Troubles, physical barriers between neighborhoods. So stagnation leads to friction. Friction leads to confrontation. Confrontation leads to possible violence.

So I made a trip in August. I went to London to meet with the British government, Dublin to meet with the Irish government, and then Belfast. I reported back to Secretary Kerry, urging him to bring pressure to bear on the

This version of Total Mail Converter is not registered.

British government to start negotiations, discussions. Strangely enough, two weeks later, I think the second or third week in September, we have a consulate in Belfast and the consul general sent a message back saying the British secretary of state for Northern Ireland, a woman called Theresa Villiers, has called on the parties to start talking. Now, who knows how that happened, but it was a 180-degree turnaround from when I was there the last week of August.

So they began to talk, starting with Robinson and McGuinness, but involving the other four parties as well, and tried to work out a formula for dealing with these four baskets of issues. That was September. It went into October. I went back for a week in October and went from party to party and met with community groups and so forth. And then finally, last week I was there for a whole week in more intense negotiations that finally began end of November, early December, two or three days a week, but intense.

Now, today, the prime minister of Great Britain, David Cameron, and the prime minister of Ireland, who bears the Irish title of Taoiseach, Enda Kenny, are both showing up in Belfast and participating in these talks. The hope is they will reach a comprehensive agreement.

As the Secretary of State's representative, I am not called special envoy and I'll give you a little of the history of that. For purposes of title, I am personal representative of the secretary of state. I observe and encourage and support and push. Mr. Robinson particularly was very resistant to an American presence. I don't think it was personal. His argument is, "We were given this government, this devolved government from the St. Andrews Agreement, meant that we should govern ourselves. So why do we need an outside party?" He even pushed back against the Irish foreign minister participating, Charlie Flanagan. So it was more of a sovereignty question than an anti-American question. But they let me hang around. They gave me an office in Stormont House, where the negotiations were taking place, and people came and went, and I went to their office and they would come to my office. It was quite an interesting experience.

The real justification for an American (being there): Northern Ireland has gotten more American interest over the past 40 years or more, than any other place on Earth of comparable size except one, which is Israel. And people might say, why are we so interested in Northern Ireland? Forty million Americans claim Irish heritage. Last week, I heard it was 70 million.

It's demographically impossible. Even the wave of migrants in the mid-19th century from the potato famine did not lead to 40 or 70 million Americans. So there's something romantic, I don't know what, going on. But there is considerable organized interest, particularly from Irish-Americans on the Catholic side, over what happens in Ireland generally but also what happens to Sinn Féin and the Catholic minority in Northern Ireland. That's the political justification for all this American interest. Plus, all the parties over there, some more than others, do credit us, from the Mitchell period onward, with preventing more bloodshed and violence. So we have some moral authority and political authority in that regard.

But George was a politician, as I was. In between were three or four special envoys. Largely during Bush II, I think there were three or four, they were diplomats. They had a State Department hat on and went in a diplomatic capacity. By training and background, George and I are more from a political background. So the hope is that a comprehensive agreement that will enable the Northern Ireland government to function productively and begin to help solve some of these problems, will be reached even under constrained budgets. That's the big problem. The key now, frankly, I think Sinn Féin and D.U.P. (Democratic Unionist Party) have reached a general agreement over welfare payments and the budget. It's up to the British government to meet their demand, is what it amounts to. And that's why Cameron is showing up there.

This version of Total Mail Converter is not registered.

Q: If that agreement were to be reached in the next couple of weeks, do you think that would end your role there?

A: That's never been determined. One of the reasons John Kerry's office came up with 'personal representative' is he and I are very good friends and have worked together. I supported him when he ran for president. He wanted to leave open other assignments. So it's not personal representative for Northern Ireland. The assignment right now is Northern Ireland. Now, what I have said to the parties over there, I wrote an op-ed for the Belfast Telegraph and I issued a press statement when I was over there last week. And I did a kind of truncated press conference of sorts in which I was very candid about, "My role is vague, I'm not George Mitchell, this is not that kind of situation. I'm here to encourage and promote."

But John Kerry and I have not discussed what happens after that. What I am proposing and hope to carry out is a congressional delegation to go to Northern Ireland, either February or April, and an investment business group to go to Northern Ireland, American companies that will explore the markets. What we can help with and they desperately need is employment. That sounds familiar. They're in the same boat we're in, only they've got 12-17 percent unemployment, again, in six counties.

(Editor's note: The parties announced an agreement on Dec. 23. John Kerry issued a statement saying in part: "I applaud the parties and the two governments for securing this agreement and pledge America's full political support for the new arrangements. I'm also particularly grateful to my personal representative, Sen. Gary Hart, and his deputy, Greg Burton, whose deep engagement helped ensure the success of the talks. I know Sen. Hart looks forward to continuing his efforts next year in support of a peaceful and prosperous Northern Ireland, and I am very lucky to have Gary devoting his time to this effort.")

Q: Do you like the role? If this were to be resolved and John Kerry were to call you and say, 'You know what, I'd like you to go to the Middle East for me,' would you have any interest?

A: I couldn't do that. The Middle East would be more intensive. George took a crack at that a couple years ago. You almost have to live there. My wife of 56 years is just not going to tolerate that. I can come and go, but I think the short answer is, intensive negotiations, probably not. I've spent an awful lot of time in Russia and I've discussed with Secretary Kerry a possible role there as someone who might carry messages back and forth and so forth.

"This is an atmosphere that only a Henry Kissinger would appreciate, a student of European diplomacy in the 17th and 18th centuries."-- Gary Hart, on the intrigue in the Middle East

* * *

Q: That's one of the fascinating spots in the world right now.

A: Well, it's not only fascinating. I've advocated for years, going all the way back, that the U.S.-Russian relationship in the 21st century is going to be one of the most important that we have. Not the closest, but the most important. And I think that's proving to be true. We're not managing it well. They're managing it extremely poorly and making it very difficult. It's not all Putin's fault but there's a long history there as well. I would welcome a chance to play a role there, but it wouldn't be ambassador or anything like that.

This version of Total Mail Converter is not registered.

Q: This is an extremely approximate analogy, but the impressions in the U.S. of Stalin right after World War II were sort of similar to the impressions of Putin in the West today. There's a certain romanticism about these guys, and it took the West a long time to figure out who Stalin really was. And I wonder if you think there's any parallel there. Is Putin a danger, a threat?

A: I'd push back against a comparison to Stalin. I mean, Stalin killed 25 or 30 million people. I don't think Putin's going to do that. The world wouldn't stand for it today. We weren't in a similar position in the '30s to prevent him from doing that. There certainly was no United Nations and European Union and things like that.

A danger only in a relatively minor way, which is this Greater Russia theory that he's promoting is a danger not only in the Ukraine, eastern Ukraine, but in the Baltic states as well. So I'd say anywhere on the western and southwestern perimeter, anytime Georgia, for example, or the -stans, the former Soviet Muslim republics, anytime he has a Russian minority population, he's going to try to figure out a way to bring them into the Russian orbit. What he's trying to do is create a smaller version of the former Russian empire.

What happened in August of '91 was the collapse of two empires — the Soviet, but also the traditional Russian empire. And I see him notionally trying to recreate some version of the old Russian empire. I think that's what he's up to. That already is leading to friction. Happily so far, it's being played out on the economic battlefield not the military one.

Q: And it's having a significant effect on the ruble, on the Russian stock market. He doesn't seem to care.

A: "Care" is an internalized word. It has to bother him politically and economically, obviously. Even worse is the drop in oil prices on top of that because that's his overwhelming source of income.

Q: Is that on purpose? Do you think Saudi Arabia is doing that to Russia specifically?

A: Oh, no, no. It's fracking in Colorado.

Q: Well, there is that, but Saudi Arabia could cut production to increase prices and it's not doing that.

A: Sure. But they've done that to us, too. I mean, anytime we try to get an alternative energy industry going, anything like that, oil shale in Colorado, all they've got to do is drop their price. Now, circumstances have changed because of fracking and the huge increase in American production. We're even in the export business now. So they just don't have the same lever they had 20 or 30 years ago, by any means. They could determine American energy policy, I mean, six guys in a room, just by manipulating the price post-OPEC.

I don't see that happening as a lever on Russia. They don't have that big a stake. However, when you begin to look at this complicated Middle East and the competition, for example, between Saudi Arabia and Iran, and the Sunni-Shiite, on top of all that, the rise of the Islamic State, what I see the Saudis doing, and I've been over there several times recently, in the last year or two, is struggling to maintain some of their dominance in the region against a rising Iran. And now, as you know, if you look at the last 12 or 18 months of how sides are sorting themselves out vis-à-vis ISIS, Syria and all the rest of it, it's bewildering. I mean, you've got to have a political map every day to figure out who's on whose side because interests are changing so fast between the Sunnis and the Shiites, who wants to align with the Saudis and what's their future as an oligarchy. They're thinking, "What happens if there's a U.S.-Iranian agreement?" The Israelis are worried about that. It's a nightmare. That one's a nightmare.

This version of Total Mail Converter is not registered.

Q: The theory, I think, is Russia's support of Iran. If the Saudis can damage Russia, maybe they reduce its support of Iran.

A: There may be some of that calculation, but this is an atmosphere that only a Henry Kissinger would appreciate, a student of European diplomacy in the 17th and 18th centuries. That's the way Kissinger sees the world. He understands, or thinks he does, and loves, intricate, behind-the-scenes maneuvering, because he thinks that's the way the world runs anyway. I don't, but he does. And it may be for the time being in the Middle East; that is to say, that the Saudis would play a game against the Russians to satisfy some interest way away from Russia.

Q: Let me bring it back to the United States and our role in the world and our defense budget. With all the talk about the debt, obviously people focus on that $625 billion. It's part of the discretionary side, so you can actually affect it. In your view, is the level of defense spending today too little, too much, about right?

A: You know, I've struggled with that question throughout most of my life, certainly since I went to the Senate and joined the Armed Services Committee in 1975. So how long ago was that? Forty years? Every time I do that calculation my jaw drops. Anyway, I'd love to go back, and should, to what the DOD budget was in 1975, and this was still during the Cold War. Defense spending increased in the Carter years, contrary to what conservatives have said. It began to go down under Bush I because of the end of the Cold War and a belief, not that peace had come to the world but that it was a different arena and we hadn't sorted out what was needed. Now it's going back up again.

I'd answer your question this way. I know the traditional nation-state wars that began after the treaty of Versailles are declining sharply because of globalization. I co-chaired a committee called the U.S. Commission on National Security for the 21st Century from 1998 to 2001. We forecast the terrorist attacks, among other things. We went around the table the first couple of months and said, 'What's the threat?' We had a member early on in that commission, a Republican woman, who said "China, China, China." She couldn't get even Newt Gingrich and James Schlesinger to agree with her, so she quit and left. Her name was Lynne Cheney, Dick Cheney's wife. She told her husband, "These fools don't understand it's us vs. China."

Well, it's ridiculous. The biggest holder of American bonds is China. We're their biggest market. I have a line in speeches where I say the only reason the Chinese would invade us, presuming they could, is to get their money back.

So we're still arming ourselves for nation-state wars — big bomber wings, B-1s and B-2s; nuclear aircraft carrier task groups at sea; and big Army divisions, 10,000-man Army divisions. That's not a force structure and weapons acquisition system designed for the conflict of the 21st century. What's going down is nation-state wars that require all those things. What's going up is irregular, unconventional, tribal, radical fundamentalist conflicts, all over the place. What do you need? Special forces.

Actually, I proposed 10 or more years ago that we have a fifth service called Special Ops or Special Forces. Now, the services don't want to give up their individual special forces so it's probably not going to happen, but it is de facto a fifth service, Special Forces. That's the cutting edge. Instead of aircraft carriers, we're going to need small coastal ships that can operate in waterways and inlets in close. Different kind of aircraft. The F-35 is probably not going to be necessary. You're going to need more something like an A-10, a second- or third-generation A-10 Warhawk.

This version of Total Mail Converter is not registered.

Q: The F-35 is something like an $11 billion budget line item.

A: That's the other problem is cost growth per unit. Every individual weapons system costs more now. What we need are M-1 rifles that work in the sand. It's not so much how much we're spending. It's how it's being spent.

Q: So you would change the focus and then figure out how much that costs to do.

A: Well, yeah, exactly. And I said that when I was in office. We shouldn't debate, as we did in the Armed Services Committee, on the floor of the Senate, in conference committees, what the total number's going to be. What do we need to defend ourselves? And then get out the calculator. That's the way you should do it.

Q: So from a strategic standpoint, there's a new book by Bret Stephens that says America's in retreat. Obama has withdrawn from the world and other actors are filling the vacuum. There is of course a countervailing view that we were way too active on the ground under Bush and that this is an appropriate restraint. We spend more, I think, than the next eight defense budgets in the world put together.

A: More than all the rest of the world combined.

Q: So Obama comes in as the alternative to Bush and ends up doing a lot of the same things. The drone attacks are increasing. Do we have to be the world's policeman because nobody else will take the job or is there another way?

A: Well, we certainly don't have to be the world's policeman. I've written books and articles to the effect that what we need are new security alliances. We're operating in two ways. One, unilaterally. We're going to go kill somebody, or stop people from killing somebody. Or we're going to round up NATO. NATO was created as a bulwark against the Soviet Union. There is no Soviet Union. NATO has survived 25 years without a real rewriting of its mission. Now, we employed it to a degree in Afghanistan because of Article 5 and a threat to one is a threat to all, and because of 9/11 and the dramatic nature of that, they came in — some in a token capacity, others in a real capacity.

But what I've envisioned is a 21st-century NATO or 21st-century international security alliance or a set of regional NATOs. For example, I can see — it's more difficult now because of China's behavior — but I could have seen a Southeast Asian NATO, where we, the Chinese, the Japanese, the Australians and some minor players formed a security alliance and used that as the forum for resolving internal conflicts, anticipating the Spratly Islands and all the friction going on over those little rocks. Frankly, the same is true of northeast Asia. China, Japan and Russia have an interest in what happens in North Korea as much as we do. And we could have had a Northeast Asian security alliance patterned after NATO. And the list goes on.

So, in an ideal world, starting in the Clinton years, really Bush I, but Clinton primarily, we would have restructured the security environment regionally and engaged with people that parties like Lynne Cheney saw as adversaries. My theory of security is if you can get a country inside the tent, you're better off. At least, you're talking. Your generals and admirals are talking. Your security advisors are talking. And you're devising common security interests. You're looking at what you have in common rather than what you have in opposition. So I would have redesigned the world that way in the late 20th century. Didn't happen, unfortunately.

This version of Total Mail Converter is not registered.

So what's our principal security alliance? One that was created in 1947 in a much, much, different world. We're making it up as we go along. That includes Democratic presidents too, by the way. George W. Bush, when he took office, didn't pay any attention to our report and other warnings and eight months later, 3,000 Americans died and that became the building block for particularly Richard Cheney, (Donald) Rumsfeld and others — the neo-cons — to fashion a whole global outlook, war on terrorism. When's the last time you heard that phrase?

Then, in typical American cyclical fashion, we fight two wars, one and a half of which were voluntary, wars of choice, not necessity. The man that follows him then has to wind those down and extract us from those wars that had dragged on for more than a decade and is still doing so, by the way. And that preoccupied him to the extent that he couldn't think more strategically, holistically and begin the process of remaking the world.

But here you're talking to a guy that is fed up with Washington in more ways than one. Particularly the politics and the lobbying, but you now have these elites. This has been true, I suppose, since the age of Jefferson. But really in the post-World War II era, a relatively small number of people, the foreign policy elite, centered around the Council on Foreign Relations and those kind of organizations, have dominated American foreign policy. Are there smart people there? Yes, of course. Do they have interests to promote? Of course.

But it's a closed shop. And the same people are recycled over and over and over again. Obama's foreign policy team is basically Clinton III. What we have now is the fourth Clinton administration in terms of personnel. The problem is they all know each other, the same Rolodexes, but they're promoting the same policies and the world changes. So Obama comes in from Springfield, Illinois, basically, and wins the election and he has to put together an administration. Who does he turn to? Two people: Rahm Emanuel and John Podesta, both Clintonites. Who did they bring back into government? Clinton. Are they capable people? Were they assistant secretaries? Yes. But that was in the 1990s.

Q: So how do you feel about Hillary 2016?

A: Well, I have to give you an anecdote. As a young Denver lawyer, I started working in 1971 for Sen. George McGovern, after the Robert Kennedy assassination. In the spring or summer of 1972, when it looked like McGovern might improbably win the Democratic nomination, we then had to begin to think about a national general election campaign. Much different. And one of the key people in the campaign at that point had been a Rhodes Scholar and he said, "There's a guy at the Yale Law School, he's from Arkansas, we ought to bring him in and send him to a key southern state like Texas."

So he brought him in. It was Bill Clinton. Clinton brought his girlfriend with him and I sent Bill Clinton down to help organize Texas because he had a southern accent and he was a smart guy and very ambitious. And the girlfriend with very thick glasses followed him. That's how long I've known the Clintons.

Are there a lot of people who want a woman president for the first time? Yes. Is she well-known? Yes. Is she experienced? Yes. Do those three things qualify her to be president at a time when new ideas, new people and new thinking are required? I'd just leave it at that.

This version of Total Mail Converter is not registered.

What I would say is that I hope there are others that get into the competition and not just, as the Washington press corps wants, give her the nomination, a coronation. There ought to be a competition and it ought to be to some degree generational. And I say this as someone who ran in '84 against a former vice president who wasn't that much older than I was, but it represented a generation of different thinking about the future of the Democratic party. And that played out all the way to the '84 convention. So I'd like to see competition. And if the rank and file of the Democratic Party, including young people, want Hillary Clinton and believe she'd be a great president, then she should get the nomination.

I'm Oriental in the sense I think your strength is also always your weakness. Her strength is all that experience, but I think it's also her weakness. Same people, same ideas, same agenda. Her Achilles' heel, which showed itself in '08, is still there — caution on contentious issues, wanting to wait and see how the dust settles first in the Democratic Party and then in the greater society. She's made some bland statement about, 'We shouldn't torture.' Well, what was she going to say? We should torture?

Q: Cheney did.

A: Cheney is Cheney. We don't need two Cheneys.

Q: Do you have anybody in mind in terms of the generational challenge?

A: Well, a young guy who celebrated his 21st birthday on my campaign became governor of Maryland, Martin O'Malley. He's pushing himself forward. Fifty years old. Successful governor. There's former Sen. Jim Webb. Very strong on national security and has an ability to appeal to blue-collar working people. Others should jump in as well. I'm trying to think who else has kind of edged forward.

Q: Elizabeth Warren?

A: She would stir things up, and I like her economics, at least on the issue of concentrated wealth, but being president's more than that. It ain't a one-issue office.

Q: Let me ask you about what's happened since you ran for president in terms of the economics of America. Not only the income inequality and the distribution of wealth and the top 1 percent, but, it seems to me, the sort of institutionalization of that. Thanks to Citizens United, big money owns the political process now. How does that get fixed or does it get fixed?

A: I submitted a manuscript for my 21st book in August. It's at the publisher's now and the publication date is 30 June for the Fourth of July weekend. It addresses that issue.

Q: Does it have a title yet?

This version of Total Mail Converter is not registered.

A: The title is, "The Republic of Conscience." It's taken from a poem by the Northern Ireland poet Seamus Heaney who won the Nobel prize for literature, now dead. It seeks to address the issue why, given our wealth and prosperity, Americans are so unhappy with their own government. And my thesis is that instinctively people out on the streets of Denver and everywhere, sense that our country has become something that they were not taught it was. What it was, what its founders created it to be, was a republic.

Now, if you stop 10 Coloradans and say, define a republic, nine of them couldn't do it, but it meant a lot to everybody — Washington, Adams, Hamilton, Jefferson, Madison, all of them — because they were students of ancient Greece and Rome and they knew a republic predated democracy. Jefferson called himself a democratic republican. Why the republic was so important was it was the first citizen self-government, from ancient Greece, Athens, fourth, fifth century B.C.. Democracy came along to say it shouldn't be just the leaders of the community who meet in the square. It should be everybody. So democracy is about access to the republican form of government.

A central thesis of republican government, from Athens forward, was resistance to corruption. And every founder and all of the ancients that they read said that the thing that is most dangerous to a republic is corruption. Now, they didn't mean the quid pro quo, buying votes. They defined it, even in those days, 2,500 years ago, as putting special interests ahead of the common good or common wealth, and the term commonwealth comes from that far back. And it meant, in a republic there are things that everybody owns together. And it is the integrity of the government, it is the public assets, and on and on. And those must be protected against any special interest or narrow interest, however powerful it is.

That was who we were created to be and who we were taught, and I was taught, in eighth-grade civics in Ottawa, Kansas, we were. That is not who we are today. By that definition, given our system of lobbying, campaign contributions, access to power, and the intertwining, with the help of the current Supreme Court, of powerful interests and money and politics, we're massively corrupt. We're a massively corrupt republic. That's what the book is about.

Q: How do you fix that, or does it get fixed? How do you take back control of it?

A: Oh, boy. My study of American history, and I went back to school when I was in my 60s to finish a degree; unprecedented, I think, in American history ...

Q: The one at Oxford?

A: Yeah. The Senate historian told me he had no record of any other senator ever doing that.

Q: Philosophy?

A: No, it was political theory. And I wrote on Jefferson. And the Oxford University Press published the thesis, which they don't always do. But late in life, Jefferson wrote Adams, when they resumed their correspondence, and he said, 'When we put this together, I think we missed' — and of course, he was off in Paris during the Constitutional Convention — 'I think we missed a point, and that is there's no venue for citizen participation. It's all representative democracy.' You vote for people to go to the state capital or Washington to represent you, but republican government requires citizen involvement and participation. And he said in the letters to Adams and others, that's the best corrective to corruption. If citizens are involved, they're not going to let the banker or the real estate developer or the airline or even the nurses or teachers, to dominate the government and get what they want unless it fits into the broader common interest.

This version of Total Mail Converter is not registered.

All the Jefferson books would almost fill this whole building, but there was very little written on that because it occurred in the last five or 10 years of Jefferson's life, after he'd been president. So people just thought he was off on some tangent. He didn't want to amend the constitution, but he wanted to institute what he called ward or elementary republics. He wanted small communities to govern themselves under the federal blanket. So the second half of the thesis is, if we were to do that in the 21st century in America, how would it work?

Oddly enough, I was chairing the U.S. Commission on National Security at the same time, commuting back and forth, and we forecast terrorist attacks. So I said, OK, national security is going to become a local interest and we've got the army to deal with that. That's called the National Guard. Militia is mentioned three times in the constitution because they were supposed to repel foreign dangers until the regular army could appear. That, of course, is the reason for the Second Amendment.

Q: And when Jefferson was governor of Virginia, he completely failed in that.

A: Yeah, of course, yeah.

Q: While we're on the subject of elections, I know you wrote something in strong support of Mark Udall before the election. What's your take on the outcome?

Washington Post: “Local experts predict the sports, music and food D.C. will be buzzing about in 2015” [PARTIAL]

By Sadie Dingfelder

January 5, 2015, 6:18 a.m. EST

Enough with the 2014 memories — we’re now squarely in 2015 and ready to look ahead. What’s awaiting us? We asked those in the know about foodie trends, the 2016 presidential race, D.C.’s interminable transit woes, the big Redskins QB question, and more. Think you know better than the experts? Take our 2015 predictions survey and prove it.

THE PRESIDENTIAL RACE

Who will be the presidential nominees for 2016? Larry Sabato, director of the University of Virginia Center for Politics, edits the Crystal Ball website, which analyzes upcoming elections across the country. Sabato predicts

This version of Total Mail Converter is not registered.

Hillary Rodham Clinton will face off against Jeb Bush in 2016. “Some people say the public is concerned that U.S. politics is turning even more dynastic. But I’ll bet many Americans welcome the trend. Dynasty reduces their workload as citizens; they only have to keep up with two families, the Bushes and the Clintons.” … and in 2024? Following the same school of thought: “The logical match-up will be George P. Bush vs. Chelsea Clinton — both of whom will be in their 40s, well above the age-35 threshold,” Sabato says. S.D.

…

Electablog: Hillary’s rise is inspiring — Jeb’s is everything that’s wrong with America

By LOLGOP
January 4, 2015

Fresh out of college, I watched Al Gore and George W. Bush’s face merge together in the Rage Against the Machine video “Testify,” directed by Michael Moore, and thought, “Exactly, man. What’s the difference?”

George W. spent the next 8 years showing me exactly what the difference was.

He destroyed the fiscal balance of the Clinton era, did everything he could to make climate change worse and launched a massively wasteful war of choice that could not be “won.” And we’ll see it for decades in the two men to the Supreme Court who have ruled more on behalf of corporations than any Justices in our lifetime.

Now, after six years of Barack Obama, I sense hints of the ache I felt in 2000.

A Democratic president inevitably disappoints. This president’s capacious exercise of war powers and unwillingness to use the Justice system to reign in crimes of the last administration or systematic abuses that led to the financial crisis stand out as disappointments.

But the progress Obama led is not be limited to the two fine women he appointed to the Supreme Court.

In his first two years — much like Bill Clinton with his tax increases on the rich, the Brady Bill and the Motor Voter Law — Obama signed laws that will continue to transform this country and possibly even reduce the withering of the middle class. His Stimulus created our clean energy industry from scratch. His appointments reshaped the federal courts and his leadership has led us into the first effort to combat climate change as a nation.

But as we learned over the last decade, this legacy could easily be wrecked by his predecessor. Which leads us to 2016.

With Jeb Bush and Hillary Clinton both likely to run, there’s already a tendency to lump the two together as an example of American legacies run amok.

“Clinton and Bush together have more baggage than the cargo hold of a 747,” The New York Times’ Frank Bruni wrote on Sunday.

There are fair criticisms of Hillary Clinton — but they are rarely made by Republicans or “centrist” members of the press. Her baggage is that of a historic figure blazing paths in front of our face, often with a target on her back.

When her husband asked her to lead his attempt at health care reform in 1993, Governor Mario Cuomo asked

This version of Total Mail Converter is not registered.

Hillary, “What did you do to make your husband so mad at you?”

The right-wing onslaught against Hillarycare — and personal attacks on Hillary — would seem distant and strange now, if we hadn’t just been through six years of the same senseless assault on the even more moderate Obamacare. After the failure of that reform, Mrs. Clinton retreated into a less visible role as she championed policies like State Children’s Health Insurance Program, which greatly reduced our population of uninsured children.

The idea that it’s natural and easy for First Lady to transition directly to electoral politics is completely negated by the fact that it’s never happened before. Clinton’s name was a definite advantage in New York State but it was a name she help built in a political partnership with her husband that has not been seen since Franklin and Eleanor Roosevelt.

As a Senator, she helped lead the fight to support 9/11 first responders. After she made the mistake of voting for the Iraq War, she took on the administration’s failure to adequately support the troops.

When Clinton lost the Democratic primary to Barack Obama, she devoted herself and her husband to Obama’s election then completely subjugated her ego to become his Secretary of State.

Jeb Bush is a fortunate son of man whose father was a banker and a U.S. Senator.

While George H.W. Bush distinguished himself as a war hero then worked his way up the rungs government, Jeb passed go and went straight to his first campaign for governor of Florida, which he lost. He then won twice, along the way helping his brother “win” an election in which the Bush received fewer votes than Al Gore.

Jeb — we’re supposed to believe — is more competent than his brother. His conservative dogma is just as blind and his foreign policy is as shapeless as W.’s was in 2000. But he’ll more than likely share numerous advisers.

If Jeb is a more competent administrator than his brother, that should be even more frightening for the middle class. Conservative policies, when applied effectively, create inequality by driving power and profits into the hands of an increasingly small group of Americans.

We have every reason to be afraid that inherited wealth enabled by conservative governance could completely destroy any semblance of fairness in our economy.

“The big idea of Capital in the Twenty-First Century is that we haven’t just gone back to nineteenth-century levels of income inequality, we’re also on a path back to ‘patrimonial capitalism,’ in which the commanding heights of the economy are controlled not by talented individuals but by family dynasties,” Paul Krugman wrote in his review of economist Thomas Piketty’s latest book, which warns of a “new Gilded Age.”

The Clintons inherited nothing.

You can argue that they are now too close to entrenched power and that the Clinton’s administration’s embrace of the drug war and deregulation helped exacerbate two of the great crises of our time. Democrats would benefit from a contentious primary season that forces all candidates to define and defend their beliefs. That’s how we got three frontrunners all embracing health care reform in 2008.

In a certain way, Republicans almost seem eager to pick a candidate who negates their arguments against Clinton. The right attacks her for being to old or too rich then flirts again with Mitt Romney, who is older and richer. The right wants to say she hasn’t earned her brand then it flirts with a candidate whose name is synonymous with nepotism gone wrong.

And every other candidate Republicans have to offer from Rand Paul — who is literally inheriting his father’s presidential campaign — to Scott Walker to Marco Rubio will be likely offering a platform that gives Clintons a tax break and cuts the safety net to pay for it. None of them have accomplished any more than Clinton — and what they have accomplished has been to the detriment of working people.

This version of Total Mail Converter is not registered.

The rise to become the first female frontrunner for the presidency is unprecedented in American history.

Women have been able to vote in this country for less than a century. And just as a black candidate brought out some of worst of America's instincts on race, at least 50 shades of misogyny will be on full display if Mrs. Clinton decides to run.

Hillary Clinton deserves credit for career and the historic opportunity she may seize. Take on her policies, please. But don't do Republicans the favor of lumping her in with John Ellis Bush AKA Jeb.

New York Post: Page Six: "Hillary Clinton is already seeing big-name support"

By Mara Siegler

January 3, 2015, 9:30 p.m. EST

CEO of DreamWorks Animation Jeffrey Katzenberg and co-founder and CEO of Avenue Capital Group Marc Lasry are already planning on ways to support Hillary Rodham Clinton.

We're told the pair was overheard talking about fundraising for the Democratic presidential hopeful — who has not yet announced her candidacy — at Coba restaurant at the Viceroy in Anguilla on Wednesday.

Katzenberg and Lasry are both longtime supporters of the Clintons.

In October, Katzenberg co-hosted a fund-raiser that Hillary headlined, helping to raise $2.1 million for the Democratic Senatorial Campaign Committee.

A rep for Katzenberg declined to comment.

Wall Street Journal: "Top Iowa Democrats Slow to Rally Around Hillary Clinton"

By Reid J. Epstein and Peter Nicholas

January 4, 2015, 7:35 p.m. EST

This version of Total Mail Converter is not registered.

[Subtitle:] Many Say They Would Prefer a More Liberal Candidate or At Least a Robust Debate

Iowa Democratic leaders say they are troubled by the prospect that Hillary Clinton could win the state's 2016 presidential caucuses without a serious challenge, a view primarily rooted in a desire for a more liberal candidate or at least a robust debate about the party's policies and direction.

Interviews with more than half of Democratic chiefs in Iowa's 99 counties show a state party leadership so far reluctant to coalesce behind Mrs. Clinton. County Democratic officials also voiced qualms about Mrs. Clinton's ability to win a general election and her fundraising ties to Wall Street firms and corporations, which remain a target of liberal ire.

Many county officials said they would like to see senators including Elizabeth Warren of Massachusetts and Bernie Sanders of Vermont enter the race, though they were split over whether any could gain traction and overtake Mrs. Clinton.

"My heart wouldn't be in it for Hillary to the extent that it might be if it was a different candidate," said Jennifer Herrington, chair of the Page County Democrats in southwest Iowa. "I admire Hillary, she'd be a great president, but you know, she isn't my first choice I guess."

Of course, candidates can secure a party nomination without winning Iowa, an idiosyncratic contest that tends to reward candidates with strong local organization and passionate supporters. But as the first-in-the-nation contest, set to take place about a year from now, Iowa draws outsize attention from candidates and the media, and it can set a narrative for a party's entire primary season.

Mrs. Clinton was also the front-runner at the start of the 2008 presidential campaign, but her big polling lead eroded as the Iowa campaign wore on and caucus participants migrated to the insurgent campaign of then-Sen. Barack Obama , who won in Iowa, and former Sen. John Edwards , who finished in second place. Mrs. Clinton bounced back with a win in New Hampshire and won several other states before bowing out of the race in early June after Mr. Obama built an insurmountable delegate lead.

This time, polling in Iowa again shows Mrs. Clinton with a big lead, nearly 50 points, over other possible Democratic candidates. But Iowa Democratic officials, most of whom backed Mr. Obama or Mr. Edwards in 2008, said they fear what several called a Clinton "coronation" that would deprive the party of a discussion about its direction on economic issues. Those qualms reflect the unease of a national party increasingly split between its centrist and liberal wings.

While all the Iowa party chiefs interviewed said they would support Mrs. Clinton in a general election, many described her as their second choice in the Democratic contest.

"The Hillary Clinton inevitability talk is the same thing we heard in 2008, and the caucusgoers in Iowa chose a different route," said Joe Judge, chairman of the Democratic Party in Monroe County. "The field is wide open for that again."

This version of Total Mail Converter is not registered.

A spokesman for Mrs. Clinton declined to comment.

Ms. Warren, a freshman senator, has said she isn't running and has pledged to finish out her term. But liberal activists are trying to lure her into the race. MoveOn.org, a liberal advocacy group, has been interviewing activists and is looking for office space in Des Moines and Cedar Rapids as part of its Draft Warren effort, spokeswoman Victoria Kaplan said.

State Democratic officials also want a contested race because that boosts the party apparatus and fundraising. Mr. Obama's 2008 campaign attracted scores of volunteers who remain active in the party. Various presidential hopefuls, moreover, serve as star attractions for fundraising dinners and barbecue cookouts across the state.

John Stone, party chairman in Cerro Gordo County, throws the annual Wing Ding supper in Clear Lake in August. When Mr. Obama spoke there in 2007, he drew nearly 700 people, with attendees paying $25 a ticket to benefit local candidates in 17 northern Iowa counties. Without a big name, the dinner draws closer to 400 people, Mr. Stone said.

"When we have these candidates out here running for office, we invite them to county dinners and the numbers swell at these events," said Tom Henderson, chairman of Democratic Party in Polk County, which includes Des Moines. "So it is a great, great service for the Democratic Party to have these candidates running for office."

Veterans of the state's Democratic caucuses recall a lean period from 1988 to 2004 and are wary of a repeat, especially with a rollicking Republican contest in the offing. Some Iowa Democrats believed the state party suffered even in 2012, when Mr. Obama was running for re-election.

"I think even though the president won in 2012, the Republicans were on national TV with all the debates and their ideas were promoted over and over and over, and Democratic values were not," said Julie Stewart, the chairwoman of the Dallas County Democrats, who is a Clinton supporter. "Our values were lost, and I think it showed up in 2014 that we had no message."

None of this is to suggest state party leaders wouldn't support Mrs. Clinton should she win the nomination. Many described her in admiring terms, even while pining for a Warren candidacy.

"I think [Mrs. Clinton] has the experience, I think she is intelligent and quite frankly, with her husband and the experience he had, he would be able to give her some advice," said Carol Gordon, the Democratic leader in Grundy County, between Des Moines and Cedar Rapids.

Yet Ms. Gordon said she is so enthralled with Ms. Warren that she purchased a copy of the senator's latest book and donated it to the local public library.

Added Lorraine Williams, chairwoman of the Washington County Democrats: "Elizabeth Warren, I would enjoy going out to lunch with her. Hillary, less."

This version of Total Mail Converter is not registered.

Beyond the personal, some worry Mrs. Clinton might not be best-positioned to defeat the eventual Republican nominee, concerned her candidacy wouldn't be exciting enough to draw in the younger voters who backed Mr. Obama.

Tom Swartz, who heads the Marshall County Democrats, said he wanted to learn more about Ms. Warren, Mr. Sanders and former Sen. Jim Webb of Virginia, who has set up a committee exploring a presidential run. He suggested Mrs. Clinton's best chance may have come and gone.

"There's always the nagging feeling that her ship may have sailed," he said.

Wall Street Journal blog: Washington Wire: "What Iowa's Democratic Leaders Want: 4 Takeaways"

By Peter Nicholas

January 5, 2015, 7:07 a.m. EST

What are Iowa's Democratic leaders thinking one year before the state hosts the first contest of the 2016 presidential campaign season? Wall Street Journal reporters Peter Nicholas and Reid J. Epstein spent last week calling dozens of Iowa Democratic county officials to gauge the mood. Here are four takeaways drawn from interviews with more than half the Democratic chairpeople in Iowa's 99 counties:

1. Iowa's Democratic political leadership leans left.

State Democratic chiefs are worried about income inequality, sluggish wage growth and corporate clout. They want to hear the candidates offer concrete proposals that would roll back what they see as a troubling concentration of wealth by the nation's richest families. There seemed little appetite for centrist positions aiming to boost job growth through business-friendly tax, trade and regulatory policies.

Jason Frerichs, chairman of the Montgomery County Democrats, said he has had to postpone buying a house until he pays off his student-loan debt. "I want to see a true progressive in the White House," he said.

Which brings us to ….

2. Many state Democratic leaders want liberal Sens. Elizabeth Warren and Bernie Sanders to run.

Polls suggest neither Sen. Elizabeth Warren (D., Mass.) nor Sen. Bernie Sanders (I., Vt.) would stand a chance against potential Democratic front-runner Hillary Clinton. That doesn't seem to faze the party leaders. Many said they believed Ms. Warren, in particular, has a devoted following that would make her a serious threat to Mrs. Clinton. They like Ms. Warren's impassioned attacks on the banks involved in the 2008 financial crisis. Fresh in their minds is the Democratic contest of that year, when Mrs. Clinton lost her lead and wound up finishing third.

This version of Total Mail Converter is not registered.

Don Paulson, co-chair of the Muscatine County Democrats, said: "A lot of people are upset about the big banks. Sure, they've paid some fines. But a lot of people would like to see the CEOs put in jail."

That viewpoint reinforces another takeaway ….

3. The leaders aren't sold on Mrs. Clinton as the Democratic nominee.

It isn't that they dislike Mrs. Clinton on a personal level; it's that they have qualms about her candidacy. Some voiced doubts that she could win a general election; others said she seemed out of step with the prevailing liberal winds. They said they were troubled by corporate donations made to her family's charitable foundation, questioning whether such financial ties would give her the independence to act on behalf of a struggling middle class.

Ken Mertes, chairman of Monona County Democrats, said: "I'd like to see Hillary change her position. I think she's too friendly with corporate interests."

Still, even those who want to see someone other than Mrs. Clinton win the nomination are of the view that …

4. Mrs. Clinton would be tough to beat in Iowa.

The list of Mrs. Clinton's advantages is long. She has the backing of the national political establishment. She has a vast network of fundraisers eager to sink millions into her campaign. She knows the state, having competed hard in Iowa in 2008. Then there's the convenient fact that, as far as anyone knows, Ms. Warren has no plans to run. Very few of the Iowa Democratic chairs even mentioned some of the other prospective candidates: Maryland Gov. Martin O'Malley and former Virginia Democratic Sen. Jim Webb. The Democratic bench just isn't that deep.

Kathy Winter, chairwoman of the Osceola County Democrats, said that Mrs. Clinton's front-runner status presents an opportunity. Rather than have a competitive primary in which Democrats beat up on one another, she said, why not rally behind Mrs. Clinton and send her into the general election contest unbruised?

"Let's march toward the end result and not tear one another down," she said. "A lot of what is said about you comes back to haunt you."

This version of Total Mail Converter is not registered.

Real Clear Politics: Video: “Van Susteren: I'm Not Convinced Hillary Is Going To Run; O'Malley ‘The Big Sleeper Candidate’”

[No Writer Mentioned]

January 4, 2014

MARTHA RADDATZ, ABC'S THIS WEEK: Greta, any surprises out there, anybody who will get in or who won't get in?

GRETA VAN SUSTEREN, FOX NEWS: I actually think the big surprise is going to be the Democratic side of the ledger, whether or not former secretary of state Hillary Clinton runs.

I'm actually not convinced -- I'm not convinced she's going to run and I think the big sleeper candidate is actually going to be Governor Martin O'Malley of Maryland. I realize that the governorship was lost and that the Republicans in Maryland this last run that -- last run.

But whoever takes Iowa -- and if you look at 2008, Huckabee took it for the Republicans; 2012, Santorum. It really takes someone who's going to go there and knock on the doors. I think that's what we have to keep our eye on.

And Governor Martin O'Malley, he's been there a number of times. He's a knock-on-the-door type candidate. He's not the -- so I think that he may be a sleeper.

Politico Magazine: Matt Latimer, speechwriter for Pres. George W. Bush: “Why Republicans Are Ready for Hillary”

By Matt Latimer

January 4, 2015

For conservatives, the dawn of a presidential cycle is always the best time of the political season. It’s that glorious springtime when every Republican candidate promises to be the next Ronald Reagan. Of course, over time they slowly dissolve into Gerald Ford.

It’s also the time of year when the dons of the Washington establishment tell the rest of us who the conservative grassroots will select next year to lose politely to the Democrats. It’s always fascinating how many people in DC believe they can project how conservatives across America will vote without ever really talking to them. The only Republicans DC elites know are the ones they bump into at Talbott's or who drive their BMW X-3s to parents' night at St. Albans—not people who go to church instead of watching "Meet the Press" or who'd trudge through snow to vote in a caucus in Iowa. Nonetheless Washingtonians are so certain about next year's outcome that they're already angling to become pals with the people most likely to be in charge of invitations to events at the Clinton White House.

This version of Total Mail Converter is not registered.

Conservatives do have one thing to be thankful for: The fact is that Hillary Clinton learned so many lessons from her surprising 2008 defeat that she's repeating each of them all over again. Once more she is running as the overconfident, inevitable nominee with safe speeches filled with mush and a bloated campaign staff that already is leaking against each other in the press.

Which is probably why so many Republicans, fresh off of their 2014 election triumphs, are excited. They have a chance. It is also why so many prospective GOP candidates—18 or 20 by some estimates—are considering a run. Indeed, the GOP field looks to be so crowded that its first debate may have to be held on an aircraft carrier. The USS Ronald Reagan is available.

Almost all of the oft-mentioned candidates are people of quality and worth, with impressive resumes and realistic shots at the nomination, if circumstance fall a certain way. (This is the point at which your conflict-of-interest plagued columnist should concede that I've worked with some of the potential candidates, even worked for some of their enemies, and in one instance worked for one of their brothers in the White House.)

Of course, as with any presidential election these days, there are bound to be a few "Doing it to Build my Brand" campaigns—with candidates running a skeleton crew of neophytes in order to score a few book deals and up their speaking fees. Think of them as Republican Al Sharptons or, if we want to be even more obscure, Mike Gravels: candidates who would be so shocked if they won even one primary contest that they'd probably ask for a recount.

And what would a presidential season be without the semi-annual Running of the Bull, the never-gonna-happen Donald Trump campaign, his declarations always conveniently timed for new seasons of "The Celebrity Apprentice." Everyone please watch—supposedly Ian Ziering and one of the kids from the Cosby Show have decided to demean themselves before Mr. Trump this year—so "Apprentice" has good ratings and we are spared this spectacle again.

With the GOP field taking shape rather nicely, and so little to make fun of, we are left to train our guffaws on those always vulnerable for good-natured mockery: the D.C. pundit class and their confident delusions and myths about the Republican race.

Myth #1: Mitt Romney will run

There is nothing this town likes more than to get everyone to root for someone only to then slowly take them apart bit by bit: sort of what George RR Martin did to the Starks on "Game of Thrones." This year the DC class is prepping the former Massachusetts governor for that role.

Assuredly, no one has performed a better comeback in terms of public esteem than Mr. Romney. And it's no accident that his image picked up after most of the DC consultants who stocked his failed campaign moved on to bring bad ideas and general doom to other presidential hopefuls across the land. Basking in praise and leading in polls, Romney, or at least a part of him, clearly wants to run for president one more time. But Romney, for all of his talk of being a Reagan in waiting, is basically a cautious and practical man. He didn't make his millions by purchasing lottery tickets and waiting for lightning to strike. In the end, the risks from running will prove far greater than the potential reward. Unfortunately for him, he's had one too many chances. Lose the presidency twice—and you're unfortunate. Lose a third time and you're a national joke. Forever.

This version of Total Mail Converter is not registered.

Myth # 2: This race has a frontrunner

There is no frontrunner in the GOP race. Most D.C. reporters don't believe this, of course. Neither do the top GOP consultants and pundits.

All of whom love to dine together at places like The Palm and tell each other how smart they are. In 1980 these same DC insiders thought anybody but Ronald Reagan would be the GOP nominee—he was too old! too conservative! too dumb! Didn't come to enough Georgetown parties! And guess who won anyway?

This year's line is that Jeb Bush has the GOP nomination for the taking. That's very good news for journalists in town—they already know the Bush people. Great folks, good sources, the kind who quietly laugh about the tea party during rounds of highball at the Club. The DC crowd can't wait to go back to Kennebunkport and ride in speedboats.

Yet to many others outside the DC bubble, there's something vaguely depressing that America might replay Election 1992—Bush v. Clinton. Are these two families really so singularly special that we honestly can't find anybody else? Or are the voters just that lazy? A Bush-Clinton rematch would be like a prolonged version of NPR's "Serial": a long, convoluted journey with twists and turns that only took us back to right where we started, a little more confused and frustrated for the trip.

In any event, history is not on the Bushes' side this time. At least not yet. When I worked in the White House of George W. Bush, the oft-expressed, though usually whispered, sentiment was that Jeb was the smarter brother. On arcane bits of policy, this was probably true, although W. was often surprisingly astute on the minutia when it came to issues in which he had interest. But when it came to politics, the view is even more questionable. Consider that in 1994, Jeb was the odds-on favorite to win the race for governor in Florida—and lost. That same year W. was written off by the D.C. pundit class as a goner in Texas against Ann Richards—whom everyone in Washington loved. He, of course, won.

And even with recent media salivation—I mean, saturation—on Jeb's possible presidential bid, he still hasn't garnered about 25 percent of the vote in GOP polls. (Phantom candidate Mitt Romney beats him.) Which means, that at least three-quarters of the electorate that supposedly can't wait for the Bushes Round 3 currently prefer someone else. That number is likely to get worse. Which brings us to ...

Myth #3: It is the time of the moderates (or the Tea Party is dead)

George W. Bush also was smart enough to know something about the GOP presidential contest that so far seems to elude his younger brother. The Jon Huntsman strategy doesn't work. You don't run to the embrace of the D.C. political class and—horrors—the mainstream media if you want to win the GOP nomination. The minute I saw Huntsman treated to a gushing profile in Vogue back in 2011—"his left eyebrow is pitched slightly lower than the other, and the eye below it has a slight squint. This gives him a perpetual expression of thoughtful engagement, the look of someone listening intently to what others are saying"—I knew he was doomed in Iowa. Even today D.C. politicos don't get this about the Republican base: When you are the toast of the liberal media, you are toast in Des Moines. The sure sign Jeb is about to drop out of the race is when he gets a photo taken by Annie Leibovitz.

This version of Total Mail Converter is not registered.

And yet our political chattering class truly seems to believe that across the plains of Iowa and deep in the hills of New Hampshire are millions of Republican caucus goers and primary voters shaking their heads and whispering, "Please bring us more candidates from the middle of the road." That is simply not how the most committed GOPers think. If anything, they're more fed-up with the moderates in Washington—which is how they think of almost every Republican in the nation's capital—than ever.

Even those making the slightest observation of the GOP should see that the base is far more excited by people they think of as true believers—Ted Cruz and Rand Paul, for example—than they are for, say, Chuck Grassley. This explains why in 2014 almost every GOPer—from Mitch McConnell on down—ran as conservatives, not moderates. Indeed, they posed so far to the right that they made Margaret Thatcher look like a hippie who wanted to set American flags on fire.

But every so often a candidate decides he's going to show us something different. John McCain nearly derailed his 2008 nomination by challenging his party's base on immigration. And that was just one hot-button issue to fight with his own voters over; Jeb Bush has picked not one, but three (immigration, education reform and taxes.) We will soon see what havoc that wreaks for him. Rest assured: The "tea party" label may be badly damaged, but the frustration and disillusionment with Washington that started the movement is as strong as ever.

Myth #4: Chris Christie was permanently damaged by Bridgegate

One candidate who seems unlikely to misunderstand the reality of the GOP nomination process is the ever-savvy Chris Christie. He didn't make himself a presidential contender through his sensible compromises with Democrats in the New Jersey legislature, but his passionate harangues against conservatives' favorite enemies: the media, big unions, government bureaucracy. It was for that reason that so many Republicans pined for him to run in 2012—the great hope of conservatives and the world.

That of course was then. Today D.C. bigwigs speak quite confidently about how Christie's aspirations have been ruined by "Bridgegate." The scandal remains—solely—a Washington fixation. Want to bet how many people in South Carolina or Iowa or the Super Tuesday states can recite the details of that episode? Mention "Bridgegate" to most of them and they'll think you're referring to tires.

If there's one thing candidates can count on, it's the short attention span of the voters. Christie may have other problems should he enter the race, but this won't be one of them. If he decides to run, he'll start on the right and surprise a lot of people who've counted him out. Then of course they'll all be saying they predicted the Christie comeback all along.

Myth #5: This race will go all the way to the convention

This version of Total Mail Converter is not registered.

We haven't heard this one yet, but with so many candidates in the race, it's only a matter of time before the D.C. consensus turns to thoughts of a brokered GOP convention. Such a spectacle hasn't happened to the GOP since 1948—and for good reason. Republicans are an orderly crew. They'll kick the candidates' tires for a couple of primaries or two, but pretty soon settle on the man, or woman, they want as their standard-bearer. At this point, that could be anybody. Which is what is going to make 2016 so fun.

Politico Magazine: Bill Scher, senior writer at the Campaign for America's Future: "The Democrats' Donkey in the Room"

By Bill Scher

January 4, 2015

Democrats are beginning 2015 in an uneasy state, but it's not as bad as it could be. Rather than the bloody circular firing squad that the party resembles all too often, the Democratic agenda looks more like a nerdy scatter plot graph. Public naming and blaming for the midterms has been kept to a minimum, while wonkish blue dots appear to be fleeing from what was a unified straight line of explanation. It feels like every Democrat has his or her theory why they lost and where the party should go from here

Driving the Democratic dispersion is not just the November defeats. Democrats are grappling with the reality that the Obama presidency is nearing its end, and they don't know what to say about it. That question, more than any other, will likely define the Democratic Party debate in 2015 as the next presidential race gets underway.

If President Barack Obama had approval ratings safely above 50 percent, and the middle-class was flush, Democrats would have no hesitation wrapping themselves in the Obama banner. Conversely, if Obama were presiding over an economic collapse, failed war or White House scandal, there would be as many proud Obama Democrats as Hoover Republicans.

Instead, Democrats will face an Obama record that can be interpreted as either a historic advance of liberalism or a colossal disappointment, and on which the public mood appears to be shifting back and forth across the line. Most recently, building on an improving economy and a decisive series of post-election moves like the new opening to Cuba, he has climbed back to dead-even in approval ratings, Gallup reported, after 450 days in negative territory. The choice depends on which data points you emphasize and, more importantly, where you think the trend lines are headed.

Obama enacted an anti-recessionary package unprecedented in size and swiftness that made possible years of steady job creation. But the burst of GDP growth since 2013 has not lifted middle-class wages, as least not yet, leaving many to feel the recovery has passed them by. He's created the most progressive tax code in 35 years, but that has not been enough to reverse the trend of widening income inequality. His legislative legacies of health care reform and Wall Street re-regulation have been implemented slowly, allowing debate to churn over how successful they ultimately will be. His administrative efforts in immigration and climate change are even less far along, leaving open whether they will be transformational or insufficient and ephemeral.

This version of Total Mail Converter is not registered.

It's a classic half-glass problem. Should Democrats marshal all the positive data available to make the case that Obama's record proved activist government worked, bolstering the case for an extra helping of liberalism to solve outstanding problems? Or should Democrats keep Obama at a distance, and treat the past six years as just another chapter in the decadeslong assault on the middle-class, proving that Obama's watered-down compromises were incapable of eradicating the rules rigged for the top 1 percent?

Obama himself is the captain of the Half-Full Squad. In October, he delivered an address that listed his economic successes, declaring, "it is indisputable that our economy is stronger today than when I took office" while also proposing policies to help the "millions [who] don't yet feel enough of the benefits of a growing economy." Last month, following a particularly strong monthly employment report, Obama reduced his hedging to a minimum in a triumphant weekly address: "More jobs. More insured. A growing economy. Shrinking deficits. Bustling industry. Booming energy. Pick any metric you want — America's resurgence is real."

Elizabeth Warren is presently leading Team Half-Empty. In her major speeches, such as her 2012 convention address, her July 2014 Netroots Nation keynote and her most recent Senate floor slam of Citigroup, Warren doesn't cite much of the Obama record outside of the creation of her signature Consumer Financial Protection Bureau. She goes as far as suggesting the problem of Wall Street dominance has gotten worse on Obama's watch, saying things like: "Now the biggest banks are even bigger than they were when they were too big to fail in 2008." Warren's populist ally Sen. Bernie Sanders looks past Obama to rip "the status quo, which includes a 40-year decline of our middle class." Neither excoriates Obama personally, but their rhetoric treats him at best as an impotent bystander to corrosive corporatism and his record as useless to the progressive cause.

Another voice inside the pessimist camp is Sen. Chuck Schumer, who recently made headlines at the National Press Club second-guessing Obama's decision to prioritize health care reform before the economy healed. Schumer also sees the past six years as having done little to impress middle-class voters, but he parts ways with Warren's focus on blaming banks and other moneyed institutions for rigging the rules.

Schumer offered a nod in Warren's direction, saying Democrats "must first prove that the era of big corporate influence over government is over." But he treats that step as more political necessity than policy solution. Schumer assured "those of us who don't consider ourselves populists" that he's only recommending Democrats incorporate "an element of populism" — just enough "to open the door" with skeptical voters so they can be persuaded to accept a "strong government program." Unlike Warren, who regularly fingers Wall Street as the main culprit, Schumer more gently focuses on the faceless forces of "technology and globalization" that "push [the middle-class] around" yet "are not inherently malign." For the most part, Schumer doesn't want to unrig the rules; he wants policies that help the middle-class "adapt" to the inevitable.

As the presidential race shifts into gear in 2015, much rides on how the expected Democratic nominee Hillary Clinton navigates these various poles in the Democratic big tent. Assuming she runs and maintains her wide lead among Democrats, she will have more say than anyone as to how Democrats define their post-Obama future.

The bitter 2008 primary fight has conditioned observers to look for daylight between Clinton and Obama, and surely she will pick her spots. But in an October appearance at The Economic Club of Chicago, she sounded like an Obama surrogate. The American economy "currently is the envy of the world," she insisted, saying "the very hard choices the president and his economic team made early on in the administration laid the groundwork, both to prevent worse economic consequences and to begin the climb out of the deep hole we were in." (Yes, she even turned her “Hard Choices” book title into praise for her former rival.) If she sticks to that message, she will be moving the Democratic Party away from both Warren and Schumer, tying it to a robust defense of the Obama record.

This version of Total Mail Converter is not registered.

Deciding whether or not Obama’s economic performance should be cherished also dictates congressional Democratic strategy in 2015, in one key regard: how much Democrats should be willing to give up in exchange for keeping the government open.

White House economic aide Jeff Zients, at a POLITICO Morning Money Breakfast, defended last month’s “CRomnibus” — despite its provision that chipped away at a part of Wall Street reform — because avoiding government breakdowns over the past year boosted the economy with higher GDP, more jobs and, in the last monthly employment survey, “early signs of some wage growth.” He went on to predict the economy was “teed up … in 2015,” so long as Congress did not create “unnecessary distractions.”

From Obama’s perspective, the economy on his watch is poised to end strong, strong enough for the middle class to feel it. GDP growth can still raise middle-class wages; it’s just taken a long time because economies recover slowly from financial crises and because a Republican House, in addition to its past brinkmanship, didn’t allow for additional stimulus. Therefore, it’s worth trading away minor concessions to prevent any whiff of government shutdowns or debt defaults in his final two years. Future Democrats will then be able to hold up his economic record and argue that patiently sticking with his public investments, regulations and reforms paid off with a middle-class firmly on the road to prosperity.

Those Democrats who believe that there is something fundamentally broken with the economy, preventing GDP growth from sparking middle-class wage growth, don’t see the point in protecting the economy from short-term hiccups at any cost. They’d rather dig in their heels to fight concessions that smack of more rule-rigging. In their worldview, the economy won’t get better until that problem is solved.

Obama got what he wanted in December, but mostly thanks to Republican votes. Whether or not he can convince his Democratic critics to come around to his way of thinking will depend heavily on the forthcoming monthly jobs and wage data.

The Democratic scatter plot still largely points in the same direction. “Democrats must embrace government, not run away from it,” exhorted Schumer. None of the squabbling Democratic factions disagree. The intraparty debate is over how to diagnose our remaining economic problems, and how exactly government should be deployed to fix them.

But the factions that are hesitant to exploit Obama's record in making the case for more government have their own challenges in proposing an alternative strategy. Schumer counsels, “we must illustrate that government can provide solutions by delineating specific concrete programs that if enacted would actually improve lives and incomes” and that people believe are actually “attainable.” But he doesn’t delineate programs that meet his criteria, because that’s the hard part.

As the New York Times’ David Leonhardt wrote in November, the Democrats have lacked a clear “short-term” economic plan, because their inclination is toward reforms that lack immediate bang for the buck. “Some of the policies that Democrats favor, such as broader access to good education, take years to pay off. Others, like reducing medical costs or building new roads, have an indirect, unnoticed effect on middle-class incomes.” The same can be said of any unrigging of rules such as installing new bank regulations or eliminating corporate tax breaks. Leonhardt's recommendation for a lightning strike is a middle-class tax cut. The Washington Post's populist columnist Harold Meyerson proposes it be a payroll tax cut.

This version of Total Mail Converter is not registered.

However a tax cut comes with its own downsides, notes Josh Bivens of the Economic Policy Institute: "Middle-class taxes would have to be cut a lot to move the dial on income growth" requiring politically difficult offsets, be they spending cuts or tax hikes on the rich. Bivens counters that "boosting the bargaining power of workers" is what would really address the root cause of the wage problem. Maybe so. But with the private-sector unionization rate at a dismal 6.7 percent, boosting bargaining power is another yearslong project.

If Democrats continue to struggle to identify an elusive quick fix, that too could lead them back to leaning on Obama's record. What better way to "illustrate that government can provide solutions" than showing how the current Democratic government provided solutions? Instead of selling fast-acting elixirs, or tying themselves in knots explaining why Obama's policies shouldn't be considered a case study in economic liberalism, Democrats could be contending that Obama's presidency proves that progressive policies work, when given enough time to work.

Without unequivocal evidence of middle-class improvement, Obama may have to suffer naysayers within his party for his final two years. Ronald Reagan, the president Obama hoped to emulate in "chang[ing] the trajectory of America," was similarly dogged by dissatisfied conservatives throughout his presidency. But once he was out of the Oval Office, old charges that Reagan had gone soft on communism, sold out on taxes and failed to balance the budget were swept under the rug, along with the left's carping over Reagan's legacy of a widening wealth gap. Forevermore, conservatives will pound into the discourse that Reaganomics grew the economy, slashed inflation, lowered interest rates, created jobs and lowered unemployment. Their mission to this day is to show what Reagan's policies did, not what they didn't do, in hopes of building on that record and shifting the nation's ideological center of gravity.

Democrats may not be prepared to give Obama the Reagan treatment just yet. But Obama's past record and continued activity are too consequential for Democrats to ignore. Democrats will have no choice in 2015 but to begin reconciling where Obama fits in their party's history, a task that will be much easier and foster more party unity if 2015's economic numbers continue to improve.

Calendar:

Sec. Clinton's upcoming appearances as reported online. Not an official schedule.

· January 21 – Saskatchewan, Canada: Sec. Clinton keynotes the Canadian Imperial Bank of Commerce's "Global Perspectives" series (MarketWired)

· January 21 – Winnipeg, Canada: Sec. Clinton keynotes the Global Perspectives series (Winnipeg Free Press)

This version of Total Mail Converter is not registered.

· February 24 – Santa Clara, CA: Sec. Clinton to Keynote Address at Inaugural Watermark Conference for Women (PR Newswire)

· March 19 – Atlantic City, NJ: Sec. Clinton keynotes American Camp Association conference (PR Newswire)

This version of Total Mail Converter is not registered.

From: "Eizenstat, Stuart" <seizenstat@cov.com>
To: Jake.Sullivan@gmail.com ccciorciari@hillaryclinton.com
Date: 7/26/2015 1:17:32 PM
Subject: Re: Iran

Thanks.
Stu

From: Jake Sullivan [mailto:jake.sullivan@gmail.com]
Sent: Sunday, July 26, 2015 05:00 PM
To: Eizenstat, Stuart; Corey Ciorciari <cciorciari@hillaryclinton.com>
Cc: John.Podesta@gmail.com <John.Podesta@gmail.com>; huma@hrcoffice.com <huma@hrcoffice.com>
Subject: Re: Iran

Stu -- I'm copying Corey to find a time for us to talk tomorrow. I have a hunch I know what troubled you.

On Sun, Jul 26, 2015 at 4:52 PM, Eizenstat, Stuart <seizenstat@cov.com > wrote:

> Dear Jake,
>
> At our offices tomorrow, I am hosting the. Geo-Political Group for the Jewish People's Policy Institute (JPPI) of Jerusalem, which Dennis and I co-chair. We will have the heads of ADL, AIPAC, The Conference of Presidents of Major Jewish Organizations, and the leadership of major UJA Federations (e.g. NY and Chicago), along with several of our security experts from Jerusalem (e.g. former general Michael Herzog, Avi Gill, and Einat Wilf).
>
> Secretary Kerry's remark Friday that the international community might blame Israel if Congress blocked the Iran deal and Israel might "wind up being more isolated", is truly outrageous. While Hillary obviously cannot take him on directly, she could stress the following, building on her Iran statement:
>
> 1. While she supports the Iran agreement, she understands and the American people need to understand the depth of feeling across party lines in Israel, and that 70 years after the Holocaust, they believe an Iranian nuclear weapon is a genuine existential threat to Israel.
>
> 2. As she said in her statement, she will give all our allies in the region all the means, including military means, to defend themselves.
>
> 3. The US will be willing to discuss a public pledge with Israel and our Arab allies, in which Iran would be told any attack against them would be seen as an attack against the US, and as with Article 5 of NATO and our commitment to Japan, we would act accordingly with the full force of our resources.
>
> Jake, at his initiative, Secretary of Energy Moniz gave me a 35 minute telephonic briefing on the agreement, and invited me to meet with him personally this week. There is one element of the briefing about which I was deeply troubled. I do not want to put it in writing. Please call (202-549-4454 or 202-549-5776) when you have a minute.
>
> Best wishes,
>
> Stu

This version of Total Mail Converter is not registered.

From: "Tony Podesta" <podesta@podesta.com>
To: "John Podesta" <john.podesta@gmail.com>
Date: 8/16/2015 1:28:58 PM
Subject: Re: Today's Post story on HRC

Yes
Lloyd hand daughter

Sent from my iPhone

On Aug 16, 2015, at 3:38 PM, John Podesta <john.podesta@gmail.com > wrote:

Know her?

---------- Forwarded message ----------
From: <catherinehand5@aol.com >
Date: Sunday, August 16, 2015
Subject: Today's Post story on HRC
To: jsullivan@hillaryclinton.com , john.podesta@gmail.com
Cc: lorraine@xeolux.com

Dear Jake and John:

I'm sending this to you at the suggestion of my friend Lorraine Hariton. By way of introduction, back in 1980 I helped Norman Lear create People For the American Way -- even before Tony Podesta came into the picture. I spent months traveling across the country with Norman meeting with so many people to talk about the rise of something Norman was seeing -- the rise of the Religious Right and its impact on our politics. You know the rest.

Currently, I am one of the producers of a film adaptation of the award wining children's classic, A Wrinkle in Time, that Jennifer Lee (FROZEN) is scripting for Disney. I mention this, because this book has meant a great deal to millions of young people over the past 50 years. Even Sheryl Sandberg was quoted in the New York Times during an interview for her book, Lean In, that A Wrinkle in Time was her favorite childhood book.

Wrinkle was written in 1962 and received the Newberry Award for children's literature in 1963, the year I first read it. As you will read in this note, 1963 was quite a tumultuous year. The year before, in 1962, the Cuban missile crisis threatened the world with the possibility of nuclear war. Against a backdrop of uncertainty, death, and fear, A Wrinkle in Time, came along at a time when young people needed a way to understand the changing world around them. It wasn't necessarily a conscious need, more a longing or yearning for a way to comprehend the evil that existed, and to feel comforted by a story that helped us see that it could be overcome. I think the need for a vision of a loving and empathetic universe is as needed today as it was 50 years ago.

I'm writing a book about my 50 year journey to make Wrinkle into a movie and have been doing research on the past 5 decades which moved me to write this note to Lorraine this morning.

Lorraine-

Just wanted to send along a few thoughts re today's Post story on HRC. First, hope you are enjoying your time in NY. The emails and phone calls about the campaign are very helpful.

Something struck me in reading the Post piece that you may want to consider. When Hillary speaks of the email issue or other issues, her counter is "politics as usual." Those very words are what contribute to the general feeling of her tone deafness. I have no idea what is said in your discussions, but I assume lots of very smart, savvy people are thinking about this problem everyday. Most people do not know what she really means when she says "politics as usual' and it might help her if she were more precise in her reply. What I mean by that is not to use words that mean something to people who follow politics, but use words that mean something to people who don't. And, “politics as usual’ is immediately heard as “politics as usual in Clinton-world.”

This version of Total Mail Converter is not registered.

Take every single opportunity she has to explain in the simplest way over and over again that she represents change to a more conservative way of thinking and rather than talk about the need for inclusivity in all things for all Americans, her opponents only want to instill fear about her as a person and the change she represents.

I've been doing a little research on the big historical events over the past 50 years and it is a real awakening to take in how much change this country has been dealing with ever since 1963.

Hillary's candidacy is an accumulation of a 50-year shift in attitudes and ever since the early 1970s a backlash to this change has taken shape and strengthened. It's not a vast right wing conspiracy - it is real fear of change. When she uses the words ‘politics as usual’ it only helps to strengthen that backlash.

She needs to be seen and heard as someone who can lead us to a more empathetic world where we can learn to actually get along with those who are different than us.

Take a look at what happened in 1963:

George Wallace became Governor of Alabama and proclaimed “segregation now, segregation tomorrow, and segregation forever. “

Betty Friedan’s The Feminine Mystique launched the reawakening of the women’s movement in the United States as women’s organizations and consciousness raising groups spread.

70,000 marchers arrived in London to demonstrate against nuclear weapons.

Martin Luther King, Jr. issued his Letter from Birmingham Jail.

The US Supreme Court ruled that state-mandated Bible reading in public schools was unconstitutional.

Pope Paul VI succeeded Pope John XXIII and continued the Vatican Council II. Priests were now asked to celebrate Mass in the language of the countries in which they lived, face the congregation, and not only to be heard and seen but also to signal to worshippers that they were being included because they were a vital component of the service. No longer was prayer to be seen as a performance, but active participation.

The United States, United Kingdom, and Soviet Union signed a nuclear test ban treaty.

Martin Luther King, Jr delivered his I Have A Dream speech on the steps of the Lincoln Memorial to an audience of 250,000 people participating in the March on Washington for Jobs and Freedoms.

South Vietnamese President Diem was assassinated following a military coup.

“ I Want to Hold Your Hand” and “ I Saw Her Standing There” were released in the U.S., marking the beginning of Beatlemania on an international level.

President John F. Kennedy was assassinated.

And the 1970s became fertile ground for even more divisiveness:

As the protests against the Viet Nam war intensified, the backlash began to take shape. When Richard Nixon won the presidency in 1968 he dismantled programs put in place by President Johnson’s War on Poverty. The anti-war protests increased in frequency and no longer only w ere students protesting, but professors, scientists, and stay at home mothers.

This version of Total Mail Converter is not registered.

In response to protesters, hippies and the new drug culture, President Nixon's 'silent majority,' -- mostly white working and middle class voters, were angry at what they saw as the destruction of a country they had known and loved.

The nation seemed to tear apart at the seams as America watched the live coverage of the Watergate hearings. When President Nixon finally resigned from office in 1974 the seeds of government mistrust were firmly rooted.

The women's rights movement took hold when Congress approved the Equal Rights Amendment (ERA) to the Constitution in 1972. Twenty-two of the necessary 38 states ratified with no difficulty, but the conservative faction in the country saw it as a threat to the traditional role of wife and mother and successfully fought back and defeated it.

The 1980s were a difficult period for Democrats. I remember helping to mount the Democratic convention in 1984 and standing on the podium that last night looking at a sea of waving American flags, excited that the first woman had been nominated for Vice President, inspired by Mario Cuomo's speech about the "two cities on a hill" and all I could think about was my dog. I didn't believe in any of it anymore. Reagan had done a great job of making the word liberal sound like a dirty word. Few Democrats had passion back then- we were so splintered and couldn't get along which lead to the creation of Democratic Leadership Forum and the eventual rise of Bill Clinton in 1992.

Hillary is the embodiment of the changes that have been bubbling up since 1963. She is a woman embracing the need to include everyone at the table. But, she is falling into a trap that started in the 80s -- demonizing her opponent. That happened back in the 80s to raise funds. Direct mail campaigns for Dems, Republicans, and special interests groups had to demonize their opponents to fan the flames of fear to survive.

What Bernie Sanders represents is someone who doesn't seem to be caught in that demonizing cycle. There has to be a way for Hillary to rise above it, too, with humor, compassion and empathy. She needs new tactics, a new strategy and to breakaway fro m how she handled her adversaries in the past. She most likely first developed her deep distrust of conservative operatives in her formative years working as a lawyer during the Watergate hearings. That mistrust of Nixon and his associates left a lasting scar on so many of us. But, we need to move passed it.

Stephen Hawking said something recently that might help ground a new strategy:

"The human failing I would most like to correct is aggression. It may have had survival advantage in caveman days, to get more food, territory or a partner with whom to reproduce, but now it threatens to destroy us all. We need to replace aggression with empathy, which "brings us together in a peaceful loving state."

Hillary needs to be President of the United States to act upon Hawking's insight and her ability to lead must start with a new kind of campaign.

Catherine

This version of Total Mail Converter is not registered.

From: "John M Deutch" <jmd@mit.edu>
To: "John Podesta" <john.podesta@gmail.com>
Date: 8/12/2015 2:31:31 PM
Subject: PV subsides

John,

During our conversation at Aspen I promised to send you something on PV subsidies. I have quite forgotten the subject and scope.

In any case, here are some brief thoughts.

1. The ITC is set to go from 30% to 10% in 2016. Most observers expect this to happen. This will be a big set back for PV and will slow the pace of increase in annual additions.

2. The ITC is an inefficient subsidy. (1) the outlay is related to cost rather than realized output; (2) because it is a tax benefit, much of the value accrues to tax farmers rather than consumers or project owners, thus attenuating the incentive. (3) For complicated reasons the Treasury allows the 30% benefit not just on plant and equipment outlays but on the project value which may include a significant amount of taxable benefit of long term contracts with users. This helps “yieldcos” but again reduces the potential benefit to consumers and project entrpernure.

3. An attractive alternative would be to give solar a cash payment per kWe-hr produced and used. My very rough estimate is that 2.5 cents of this feed-in tariff (for a period of 7...? years) would cost the treasury about the same as the 30% ITC. And it would be more “efficient” because the tax payer is only paying for electricity produced and used.

4. This feed-in-tariff, in principle, should apply to all zero carbon alternatives, i.e. nuclear, and replace not only the ITC, but other federal (and even state) incentives for zero carbon generation.

5. In my judgment this feed-in-tariff approach would be much more efficient than arbitrary RPS numbers that are unrelated to relative cost and value of solar in different locales and applications.

6. I believe new wafer and module manufacturing in the US could compete with Chinese and other East Asian imports and the Chinese overcapacity clears and prices firm.

John

This version of Total Mail Converter is not registered.

****

John Deutch
Department of Chemistry
Room 6-215
MIT
Cambridge MA 02139

e-mail jmd@mit.edu
Tel: 617 253 1479
Fax: 617 258 5700

This version of Total Mail Converter is not registered.

From: "Sara DuBois" <sara@progressiveaccountability.org>
To: "Sara Du Bois" <sara@progressiveaccountability.org>
Date: 7/8/2008 1:44:32 AM
Subject: [big campaign] '08 Daily News Clips - 7/8

08 Election Daily News Clips
July 8th, 2008

Candidate Tracking:

All times in Eastern Standard Time

8am McCain: Appears on CNN's "American Morning," "Fox and Friends" and MSNBC's "Morning Joe"

12pm McCain: Speech to LULAC Convention in Washington, D.C.

5:20pm McCain: Tour Stop in Moon Township, Pennsylvania

News Clips:

MCCAIN ECONOMIC SPEECH NEWS

For McCain, a shift in emphasis from tax cuts to deficits (International Herald-Tribune 7/8/08)
[Same as NYT's "McCain Plan for Budget: Fiscal Hawks vs. Tax Foes"]
By Michael Cooper
As Senator John McCain kicked off a week of economic-themed campaigning here on Monday, it was apparent that some of the underlying tensions between the two schools that guide his economic thinking — the supply-siders who want to cut taxes and the deficit hawks who want to balance the budget — remain unresolved.
http://www.iht.com/articles/2008/07/08/america/07cndecon.php

Skepticism on McCain Plan To Balance Budget by 2013 (NYT 7/8/08)
By ROBERT PEAR
The package of spending and tax cuts proposed by Senator John McCain is unlikely to achieve his goal of balancing the federal budget by 2013, economists and fiscal experts said Monday.
http://www.nytimes.com/2008/07/08/us/politics/08budget.html?ref=politics

McCain, Obama duel on economic fix-it plans (AP 7/7/08)
By CHARLES BABINGTON and LIZ SIDOTI
Barack Obama and John McCain agree on this much: The economy is staggering under the Bush administration, and Americans are hurting. But who's to blame and how best to fix it?
http://www.washingtonpost.com/wp-dyn/content/article/2008/07/07/AR2008070701627.html
Link to transcript of McCain's Prepared Speech for Denver Town Hall Meeting with Question and Answer Session: http://www.washingtonpost.com/wp-dyn/content/article/2008/07/07/AR2008070701672.html?sid=ST2008070702343&pos=list
Link to video: http://www.washingtonpost.com/wp-dyn/content/video/2008/07/07/VI2008070701653.html

McCain, Obama focus on economic recovery plans (LA Times 7/8/08)
By Maeve Reston and Louise Roug
McCain renews a pledge to balance the federal budget. Obama ridicules the Republican's new tax cuts.
http://www.latimes.com/news/politics/la-na-campaign8-2008jul08,0,2360555.story
See WSJ's "Economy Takes Spotlight": http://online.wsj.com/article/SB121543453269332371.html?mod=special_page_campaign2008_topbox
See ABC's "McCain and Obama Campaign on Economic Agenda": http://abcnews.go.com/Politics/story?id=5326069&page=1

McCain talks money (Denver Post 7/8/08)

This version of Total Mail Converter is not registered.

By Karen E. Crummy
As president, Republican John McCain says he would be ready to do "the hard things" to ensure that the U.S. government is held to the same budgetary standard as American families.
http://www.denverpost.com/breakingnews/ci_9812214

McCain promises tax cut for families at Denver campaign stop (Rocky Mountain News 7/7/08)
By Lynn Bartels
Presidential contender John McCain focused on the economy at a rowdy town hall meeting Monday in Denver where he pledged to make government "a catalyst for growth and good jobs."
http://www.rockymountainnews.com/news/2008/jul/07/mccain-pledges-tax-relief-job-growth-during-denver/

McCain Talks Jobs, Stresses Balancing Federal Budget (The Page 7/7/08)
Arizonan unveils retooled jobs plan focused on small businesses in Denver town hall.... "A government that spends wisely and balances its budget is a catalyst for economic growth and the creation of good and secure jobs."
http://thepage.time.com/2008/07/07/mccain-talks-jobs-proposes-plan-to-balance-budget-by-2013/
Link to video: http://thepage.time.com/mccain-speaks-on-the-economy-in-denver/
Link to outline of economic plan: http://thepage.time.com/official-mccain-camp-economic-policy/
Link to McCain memo on economy: http://thepage.time.com/mccain-camp-memo-on-obamas-economic-plan/
Link to Obama response memo: http://thepage.time.com/obama-camp-response-to-mccain-economic-memo/

Protester outside McCain event ticketed (Denver Post 7/7/08)
By Joey Bunch
A 60-year-old librarian received a trespassing ticket today after a liberal group's protest outside a John McCain town hall meeting Monday.
http://www.denverpost.com/breakingnews/ci_9811687
Link to ProgressNowAction press release: http://www.progressnowaction.org/page/community/post/al/Cqyh
Link to video: http://www.youtube.com/watch?v=6lyaMrS0hzk

McCain Renews Balanced Budget Pledge (Washington Post blog 7/7/08)
By Michael D. Shear
Sen. John McCain pledged today to balance the federal budget by 2013, the end of his first term in office, returning to a promise he had strayed from as he sought to emphasize his concern about the plight of the American economy.
http://blog.washingtonpost.com/the-trail/2008/07/07/mccain_renews_balanced_budget.html

McCain, Republican leaders differ on solutions to fix ailing economy (The Hill 7/7/08)
By Jackie Kucinich
The release of Sen. John McCain's (Ariz.) economic plan on Monday highlighted two issues — drug re-importation and earmark reform — that divide the GOP presidential standard-bearer and Republican leaders on Capitol Hill.
http://thehill.com/leading-the-news/mccain-republican-leaders-differ-on-solutions-to-fix-ailing-economy-2008-07-07.html

McCain's Plan To Help Balance Budget: Win War In Iraq (TPM 7/7/08)
By Greg Sargent
The McCain campaign has responded to our request for clarification of its plan to take all the money saved by victory in Iraq and Afghanistan and devote all that booty to balancing the budget.
http://tpmelectioncentral.talkingpointsmemo.com/2008/07/mccains_plan_to_balance_budget.php

What the economists didn't sign (Politico blog 7/7/08)
By Avi Zenilman
This morning, the McCain campaign sent out a press release: OVER 300 ECONOMISTS SIGN STATEMENT IN SUPPORT OF JOHN MCCAIN'S ECONOMIC PLAN. The statement leaves out two big chunks of McCain's economic argument: the gas tax holiday and his promise to balance the budget by the end of his first term -- there's literally nothing in the release that mentions the deficit or national debt.

This version of Total Mail Converter is not registered.

http://www.politico.com/blogs/bensmith/0708/What_the_economists_didnt_sign.html

MCCAIN'S PLAN TO CUT SOCIAL SECURITY AND MEDICARE, OR DRASTICALLY RAISE TAXES (American Prospect blog 7/7/08)
By Ezra Klein
You know the old saying, "misses the forest for the trees?" In political headlines, there should be an analogue: "Misses the policies for the press releases." Take Mike Allen's article entitled "McCain Promises to Balance Budget." Everyone promises to balance the budget. It's like telling your dentist that you floss every night. If that's actually what's in the story, then the article shouldn't have been written.
http://www.prospect.org/csnc/blogs/ezraklein_archive?month=07&year=2008&base_name=mccains_plan_to_cut_social_sec

MCCAIN NEWS

Candidates Diverge on How to Save Social Security (Washington Post 7/8/08)
By Perry Bacon Jr.; A01
Sens. Barack Obama and John McCain are both proposing dramatic changes to Social Security, taking on the financially fragile "third rail of American politics" that Congress and recent presidents have been unable to repair.
http://www.washingtonpost.com/wp-dyn/content/article/2008/07/07/AR2008070702773.html

Internal Politics Heat Up at McCain Campaign (NYT 7/8/08)
By ADAM NAGOURNEY
Senator John McCain's campaigns have long been defined by internal squabbling and power plays, zigzagging lines of command and a penchant by the candidate for consulting with former advisers without alerting current ones, always a recipe for disquiet.
http://www.nytimes.com/2008/07/08/us/politics/08mccain.html?ref=politics

Clinton diehards throw support behind McCain (UK's The Independent 7/8/08)
By Leonard Doyle
Many of Hillary Clinton's most prominent supporters, including a number of her famous "Hillraisers," are either defecting to the Republican John McCain or withholding their support from the Democratic nominee Barack Obama.
http://www.independent.co.uk/news/world/americas/clinton-diehards-throw-support-behind-mccain-862066.html

McCain Balances Dueling Stances on Immigration (WSJ 7/8/08)
By Elizabeth Holmes
Early in the Republican nominating contest, Sen. John McCain bucked his party's base with a moderate stance on immigration, offering illegal immigrants a path to citizenship.
http://online.wsj.com/public/article/SB121548110158934579.html?mod=special_page_campaign2008_leftbox

McCain campaign, Act II (LA Times 7/8/08)
By Maeve Reston
The candidate has a new stage manager. How'd he perform?
http://www.latimes.com/news/politics/la-na-trailmccain8-2008jul08,0,2131841.story

How McCain Is Skirting His Own Spending Caps (Newsweek blog 7/7/08)
By Andrew Romano
Republicans, it seems, are finally showing McCain the money. ... And even though McCain has agreed to an $84.1 spending limit by accepting public funds--a decision he likes to portray as a principled stand against the corrupting influence of money on politics--at least double that sum will be dropped on his behalf before Election Day thanks to loopholes in the law that allow outside groups to effectively skirt such limits with largely unregulated "soft money" contributions.
http://www.blog.newsweek.com/blogs/stumper/archive/2008/07/07/for-mccain-money-talks.aspx
Link to RNC ad: http://www.youtube.com/watch?v=m177GGrwMV0

This version of Total Mail Converter is not registered.

McCain, Obama to Court Latinos Tuesday (The Page 7/8/08)
Both speak to the League of United Latin American Citizens at its 79th annual convention in Washington, D.C. McCain intends to keep focus on jobs, reiterating most of Monday's proposal, including the importance of small businesses and taking indirect swipes at Obama on taxes. "There are two million Latino owned businesses in America, a number that is growing very rapidly. The first consideration we should have when debating tax policy is how we can help those companies grow…"
http://thepage.time.com/2008/07/08/mccain-obama-to-court-latinos-tuesday/
Link to excerpts of McCain's LULAC remarks: http://thepage.time.com/excerpts-from-mccains-remarks-to-lulac/

McCain newly assertive on judicial philosophy (Politico 7/8/08)
By: Avi Zenilman and Ben Adler
Despite his background as a lawyer and law lecturer at the University of Chicago, Barack Obama has said little from the stump about legal issues, particularly what sort of justices he'd want on the Supreme Court, whose makeup is likely to be shaped for decades to come by the next president's nominees.
http://www.politico.com/news/stories/0708/11554.html

Voter advocacy group's board boots McCain (Arizona Republic 7/8/08)
By Dan Nowicki
In April, Project Vote Smart officially dismissed John McCain from its board for failing to complete a candidate questionnaire called the "National Political Courage Test."
http://www.azcentral.com/news/articles/2008/07/08/20080708kimball0708.html

Fight of the Flip-Floppers (TIME 7/7/08)
By Ramesh Ponnuru
John McCain is trying to take the halo off Barack Obama and portray him as a typical flip-flopping politician. "He's a calculating politician," Senator Lindsey Graham, a top McCain ally, says of Obama in a typical remark. Obama is making the Republicans' work easy. He is changing position after position, at the cost of sullying his reputation as a man who wants to change politics as usual. The candidates' strategies dovetail perfectly — which means one of them is making a big mistake.
http://www.time.com/time/politics/article/0,8599,1820727,00.html

McCain adviser steers clear of entitlements (Politico blog 7/7/08)
By Jonathan Martin
Asked on a conference call with reporters just how John McCain would balance the budget by 2013, his top economic adviser offered the usual recipe. "Broad-based efforts at controlling discretionary spending, rapid [economic] growth and reviewing programs for their effectiveness." Of course, with McCain's proposed tax cuts, that still may not get the country to a balanced budget.... McCain, noted his adviser, "has a long history of being able to reach across the aisle" to address policy issues. ... It's the issue that dare not speak its name during a campaign -- what to do about those entitlements that take up a much larger slice of the federal budget than any earmarks McCain wants to cut.
http://www.politico.com/blogs/jonathanmartin/0708/McCain_adviser_steers_clear_of_entitlements.html

Fiorina's Fuzzy Math (TIME blog 7/7/08)
by Jay Newton-Small
This morning at a Christian Science Monitor breakfast Carly Fiorina made the case that Obama's proposed tax hike on those who make more than $250,000 a year would be damaging to small businesses. ...Fiorina was building on a Bush arguement from 2004.
http://www.time-blog.com/swampland/2008/07/fiorinas_fuzzy_math.html

Risky Business (Washington Post 7/8/08)
By Dana Milbank; A03
The waiters were still clearing the breakfast dishes yesterday when John McCain's most prominent adviser raised the subject of erection enhancement. Carly Fiorina... was discussing consumer-driven health insurance at a breakfast with reporters when she proposed "a real, live example which I've been hearing a lot about from women: There are many health insurance plans that will cover Viagra but won't cover birth-control medication.

This version of Total Mail Converter is not registered.

Those women would like a choice." For effect, the woman frequently mentioned as a possible McCain running mate repeated: "Those women would like a choice."
http://www.washingtonpost.com/wp-dyn/content/article/2008/07/07/AR2008070702265.html

Cindy McCain to travel to Rwanda (CNN 7/7/08)
By Emily Sherman
Cindy McCain said Monday she will make a humanitarian trip to Rwanda next week. [She] plans to spend four days on the ground in the war-torn African nation on a trip organized by the non-partisan ONE campaign, as part of a group visiting USAID health clinics, schools, and an orphanage.
http://politicalticker.blogs.cnn.com/2008/07/07/cindy-mccain-to-travel-to-rwanda/

Chocolate Lovers (The Page 7/7/08)
The McCains buy fudge, a peanut butter cup, and cherry truffles during a 10-minute stop at the Rocky Mountain Chocolate Factory in downtown Denver on Monday. John McCain also shakes hands, signs autographs outside the store. Jokes some in the press need "help" that can't come from the chocolate store.
http://thepage.time.com/2008/07/07/chocolate-lovers/
Link to Pool Report of the McCains' Denver Chocolate Store Stop: http://thepage.time.com/pool-report-of-the-mccains-denver-chocolate-store-stop/

McCain operative rocketed to power working for Crist (Palm Beach Post 7/5/08)
By JANE MUSGRAVE
Four years ago, Beth Kigel was living in Broward County and her political activity was pretty much limited to casting a vote on Election Day. Today the 39-year-old single working mother of two is heading up Sen. John McCain's presidential campaign in Palm Beach County, has Gov. Charlie Crist's ear, is second in the county GOP's command and is headed to the Republican National Convention as an alternate delegate. ... Privately, however, some question Kigel's motives and wonder whether her job as a lobbyist conflicts with her role as vice chairman of the county Republican Executive Committee and with McCain's recent announcement that no lobbyists would be allowed to work on his campaign.
http://www.palmbeachpost.com/localnews/content/local_news/epaper/2008/07/05/m1a_kigel_0706.html

OPINIONS AND EDITORIALS

Putting your foot into the current of history (Boston Globe 7/8/08)
By Derrick Z. Jackson
IT MAY have been the only time that John McCain and Barack Obama have criticized President Bush in the same language. McCain has said, "I think after 9/11 that we made a mistake. I think after 9/11, instead of telling Americans to take a trip or go shopping, I think we had an opportunity to serve." Obama has said, "Instead of a call to service, we were asked to go shopping."
http://www.boston.com/bostonglobe/editorial_opinion/oped/articles/2008/07/08/putting_your_foot_into_the_current_of_history/

A flimsy vow on the budget (USA Today blog 7/8/08)
Sen. John McCain earned a reputation for fiscal responsibility by challenging colleagues' pork-barrel spending and opposing the Bush tax cuts in 2001. Then he reversed himself, endorsing the Bush tax cuts and vowing to veto any tax increases. Now, in a plan unveiled Monday, he has returned to the cause of balancing the federal budget, promising to do so by 2013.
http://blogs.usatoday.com/oped/2008/07/a-flimsy-vow-on.html#more

Finding Common Ground With Russia (Washington Post 7/8/08)
By Henry A. Kissinger; A15
President Bush's meeting with Dmitry Medvedev in Hokkaido yesterday provides an opportunity to review American relations with the new Russian leadership. Conventional wisdom treated Medvedev's inauguration as president of the Russian Federation as a continuation of President Vladimir Putin's two terms of Kremlin dominance and assertive foreign policy. But after recently visiting Moscow, where I met with leading political personalities as well as those in business and intellectual circles, I am convinced that this judgment is premature.
http://www.washingtonpost.com/wp-dyn/content/article/2008/07/07/AR2008070702218.html

This version of Total Mail Converter is not registered.

BUSH NEWS

Medvedev: No progress with US after Bush meeting (AP 7/8/08)

By STEVE GUTTERMAN

Russian President Dmitry Medvedev said Tuesday that his meeting with President Bush at a summit of the Group of Eight industrial powers resulted in no progress toward bridging deep disagreements between the former Cold War foes.

http://ap.google.com/article/ALeqM5hCOYweIJt-kh8b4ExcLZyWq4UhWwD91PK6SO0

Bush Pushes Hard Line on Zimbabwe at G-8 (NYT 7/8/08)

By SHERYL GAY STOLBERG

As world leaders convened in this resort town in northern Japan on Monday for three days of talks on issues including climate change and rising food and energy prices, the agenda quickly shifted to the political crisis in Zimbabwe, exposing a split between Western and African leaders.

http://www.nytimes.com/2008/07/08/world/asia/08prexy.html?ref=africa

No consensus on climate after Bush, Merkel talk (AP 7/8/08)

By TOM RAUM

President Bush and German Chancellor Angela Merkel pledged today to keep working together on common problems, but progress appeared slow on reaching a consensus on climate change as the Group of Eight major economies tackled that and other knotty global issues.

http://seattletimes.nwsource.com/html/nationworld/2008038562_g808.html

OTHER TOP NEWS

G-8 Leaders Pledge to Cut Emissions in Half by 2050 (NYT 7/9/08)

By SHERYL GAY STOLBERG and ALAN COWELL

Pledging to "move toward a low-carbon society," leaders of the world's richest nations on Tuesday endorsed the idea of cutting greenhouse gas emissions in half by 2050, but failed to set a short-term goal for reducing the toxic heat-trapping gases that scientists say are warming the planet.

http://www.nytimes.com/2008/07/09/science/earth/09climate.html?_r=1&ref=world&oref=slogin

Fed to Clamp Down on Exotic and Subprime Loans (NYT 7/9/08)

By STEPHEN LABATON

With no end in sight to the turbulence in the housing and financial markets, the chairman of the Federal Reserve said on Tuesday morning that it would issue new lending rules next week to restrict exotic mortgages and high-cost loans for people with weak credit.

http://www.nytimes.com/2008/07/09/business/09housing.html?hp

Maliki Suggests U.S. Troop Timetable (Washington Post 7/8/08)

By Sudarsan Raghavan and Karen DeYoung; A01

Prime Minister Nouri al-Maliki has for the first time suggested establishing a timetable for the withdrawal of U.S. troops from Iraq, a step that the Bush administration has long opposed.

http://www.washingtonpost.com/wp-dyn/content/article/2008/07/07/AR2008070700364.html?hpid=topnews

Afghanistan blames 'foreign intelligence' for embassy blast (AFP 7/8/08)

Afghanistan accused "foreign intelligence" of a role in an attack that killed 41 people at the Indian embassy as the Taliban insisted Tuesday they did not carry out the capital's deadliest suicide blast.

http://afp.google.com/article/ALeqM5hj-Ds2uhzJSXUpjrA599TI0HewpA

Vehicle bombings in Iraq at lowest level in nearly 4 years (USA Today 7/8/08)

By Tom Vanden Brook

Car and truck bomb attacks have fallen to their lowest level in Iraq in almost four years, according to the military command in Baghdad and a private firm that tracks violence there.

http://www.usatoday.com/news/world/iraq/2008-07-07-carbomb_N.htm

GOP seeks Dem supporters on drilling (Politico 7/8/08)

By: Martin Kady II and Patrick O'Connor

Will some moderate Dems consider law balancing energy exploration with conservation?

http://www.politico.com/news/stories/0708/11580.html

This version of Total Mail Converter is not registered.

POLLS

'Old guy' vs 'change:' McCain, Obama images take shape (AP 7/7/08)
By Alan Fram and Trevor Tompson
Now more than ever, it's the old guy against the agent of change. Ask people to blurt out their first words about the two presidential candidates and one in five say "change" or "outsider" for Barack Obama and "old" for John McCain, according to an Associated Press-Yahoo News poll released Monday. Those are not only the top responses for each man but the answers that have grown the most since January, when fewer than one in 10 volunteered those descriptions.
http://www.usatoday.com/news/politics/election2008/2008-07-07-candidates-images_N.htm

Poll: Pet owners favor McCain (AP 7/8/08)
By RANDOLPH E. SCHMID
If the presidential election goes to the dogs, John McCain is looking like best in show.
http://ap.google.com/article/ALeqM5i23gT19o6C2I8dWDUfq6V5lES61QD91PKIUG0

--
Sara DuBois
Deputy Director of Tracking & Media Monitoring Progressive Accountability Office sara@progressiveaccountability.org
202-609-7681 (office)
410-967-7306 (cell)
--~--~---------~--~----~------------~-------~--~----~
You received this message because you are subscribed to the "big campaign" group.

To post to this group, send to bigcampaign@googlegroups.com

To unsubscribe, send email to bigcampaign-unsubscribe@googlegroups.com

E-mail ryan@campaigntodefendamerica.org with questions or concerns

This is a list of individuals. It is not affiliated with any group or organization.
-~----------~----~----~----~------~----~------~--~---

This version of Total Mail Converter is not registered.

From: "Myroslaw Smorodsky" <msmorodsky@uaba.org>
To: "Myroslaw Smorodsky" <msmorodsky@uaba.org>
Date: 12/15/2014 1:36:06 PM
Subject: Open letter to President Barack Obama in support of the Ukraine Freedom Support Act

December 15, 2014

Open letter to President Barack Obama in support of the Ukraine Freedom Support Act,

On December 11, 2014, the Ukraine Freedom Support Act was passed by both houses of Congress in a swift and decisive manner. The expedited passage of this bill in a bipartisan way gives clear evidence that the elected representatives of the people of the United States fully recognize that Russia's unlawful invasion of Ukraine is a direct threat to peace and security in the world and also to the United States itself.

Since the cataclysmic events of World War II, the world's nations have attempted to establish basic principles of international law and behavior to be adhered to by the governments of all nations so as to prevent future conflagrations on a global scale. The UN Charter, the Helsinki Final Act [the charter document of the Organization for Security and Cooperation in Europe] and the various organic documents of the European Union, have had as their linchpin the principle of territorial integrity and security and the inviolability of borders of independent states. This month 20 years ago, Ukraine - at the behest of the United States of America, Great Britain, and Russia -- voluntarily surrendered the world's 3rd largest nuclear arsenal. All it asked for in return was that the signatory parties obligate themselves to respect Ukraine's territorial, political, and economic integrity.

It is self-evident that Vladimir Putin has dug in his heels and has made the economic calculation that he can withstand the financial price of a scolding by the West -- and all international agreements, promises, and pledges Russia had signed in the past don't matter. He has maliciously put the entire world order and international rule of law into extreme jeopardy. If he is not restrained by decisive actions by the West, then our children and grandchildren will be condemned to a probable conflagration on the European continent that will be as great or even greater than the horrors of World War II [recall Putin's recent verbal flexing of his nuclear muscle] .....and from which America will have no escape.

Mr. President, the Ukraine Freedom Support Act is on your desk awaiting your signature. The Ukrainian American Bar Association (UABA) strongly urges that you sign this legislation as soon as possible. As the leader of the free world, you must take strong and decisive action and reaffirm America's world leadership position now! You should not wait for Europe to act. Once signed into law, the Ukraine Freedom Support Act will be a clear message to Vladimir Putin and to the entire world that America is committed to the international rule of law and that it stands by its international obligations. But most importantly, it will show that America's commitment to world peace is bipartisan; supported by both the executive and legislative branches of our government, and represents the moral ideals of the people of our great country.

For further information, please contact
Myroslaw Smorodsky, Esq.
Communications Director of the Ukrainian American Bar Association (UABA)
Tel: 201-507-4500; Email; myroslaw@smorodsky.com ; Website; www.smorodsky.com

This version of Total Mail Converter is not registered.

From: "John Podesta" <john.podesta@gmail.com>
To: "Pam and Rob and Miko and Isaac Vergun" <vergun@alumni.stanford.edu>
Date: 5/7/2015 10:14:40 AM
Subject: Re: Our President's Visit to Our Hometown of Beaverton—and My Children's Request

Did my best to get to the President's team. Good luck

On May 7, 2015 3:29 PM, "Pam and Rob and Miko and Isaac Vergun" <vergun@alumni.stanford.edu > wrote:

Dear Mr. Podesta,

I am contacting you with a somewhat unusual request and the hope that you might be able to convey this wish by my children to an appropriate staff person for President Obama in spite of the short notice.

Thank you. And thank you so much for the work you have been doing. I hope you are able to encourage Hillary Clinton to come out strongly to address dangers from Climate Change.

Sincerely,
Pam Vergun, Ph.D., M.P.A.

Dear Mr. President,

I hear that you are coming to our hometown of Beaverton tomorrow down the street from where my children were in a two-way Spanish immersion public school. I know this is a long shot, but I would like to tell you about the work my children and I are doing to help you stop Climate Change in case you would like to meet them.

Also, months ago, my son, who is also one of your fans, asked me to invite you to his Bar Mitzvah. Although we just learned that you will only be in Beaverton during the morning, I'm sure you would like Isaac's D'Var teaching will be on taking even more serious action on Climate Change.

My son is African-American, my daughter was born in the Marshall Islands, and my husband and I are European-American, and together we are doing all we can to impact policies especially the ones most needed to protect our planet. My son has been talking with the City of Beaverton about his petition to Mayor Doyle regarding fossil fuels and nuclear power. The links below are to the little websites I made for their Mitzvah projects, so Miko and Isaac can speak for themselves. Please glance at them to see if you could use them to inspire or highlight your own work as you have inspired us.
Miko's: https://shalvahalizah.wordpress.com
Isaac: https://yitzchakadin.wordpress.com

Thank you so much.
With Love and Blessings to you and Michelle and your daughters,
Pam Vergun

Sent from my iPhone

Dr. Pamela Bea Wilson Vergun, M.P.A.

Pam and Rob and Miko and Isaac Vergun vergun@alumni.stanford.edu
3545 NW Ashland Place
Beaverton, Oregon 97006
Hm: 503-645-6642
Mo: 503-332-7633

This version of Total Mail Converter is not registered.

Wherever you live, sign Isaac's petition to the City of Beaverton's Mayor Doyle and the City Council:
https://campaigns.gofossilfree.org/petitions/divest-the-city-of-beaverton-from-fossil-fuels-and-nuclear-power
Thanks!
And, for more on Miko and Isaac's work to help protect our planet, please visit their websites:
Miko: https://shalvahalizah.wordpress.com
Isaac: https://yitzchakadin.wordpress.com

This version of Total Mail Converter is not registered.

From: "Sara DuBois" <sara@progressiveaccountability.org>
To: bigcampaign@googlegroups.com
Date: 9/19/2008 2:57:20 AM
Subject: [big campaign] Tracking Update: McCain Speech in Green Bay, WI 09/19/08

Hello All,
Unfortunately we weren't able to send a tracker to this event. But good news: we were able to capture the event via online streaming video. Below are the notes from our effort.

Big Highlights
[McCain highlights]

- Flubs: calls for resignation of "FEC" chair: http://www.youtube.com/watch?v=9s9IERbxFFA
    - goes off-script: says Cox a "good man" but he should resign because we need accountability in Washington
- Says his proposal gives "a lot more than what any hardworking middle class family gets under the Obama plan"
- Proposes 5-pronged approach
    - (1) MFI as early intervention program to keep ppl in their homes and safeguard their savings
    - (2) more financial transparency
    - (3) one regulatory standard
    - (4) reform of corp. governance rules to protect consumers and investors (e.g. against predatory lenders)
    - (5) Fed should get out of business of bailouts and focus on strengthening the dollar
- Continues do-nothing accusations that Obama "did nothing and actually profited from this system of abuse and scandal," was taking their money
    - Says another Freddie CEO, Fred Raines, has been advising Obama on housing policy
- accuses Obama of imposing "mandated health insurance on businesses that would cost up to $12k per employee."

[Palin highlights]

- Emphasized McCain's foresight in broaching the subject 2 years ago

Green Bay, WI: McCain/Palin Econ. Speech 09/19/08
(Disclaimer: The following are notes, not direct quotes. If you'd like a quotable transcript or video of any part below, please email us.)

Speech Highlights (not in remarks)
[Palin highlights]
Nothing could beat last night's event
Talk about important and serious news
Plan to stop corruption on Wall Street
Mayor's gotta implement solutions
Same job on state level as Gov.
Gotta implement solutions to challenges facing us on economy
Talking with citizens
Heard stories of woes at Town hall in MI
- College student can't get healthcare
- Med student can't repay debt
- Citizens worried about earmarks and wasteful spending
- McCain's the one to reform that

It's paramount our leader in next four years gets economy back on track w/o talking about it
That's based on track record

This version of Total Mail Converter is not registered.

Can you believe they will be a maverick that'll buck their party?
That's JM
Americans are facing elements of a perfect storm

- High taxes can result in a perfect storm
- High gas prices
- Dependence on gas prices from foreign sources
- No courage
- Too much greed on Wall Street

John McCain started warning everybody two years ago about Fannie and Freddie or this would happen
He warned he had foresight
He had that foresight about Iraq
Here's McCain
He's got a sound plan
It can be implement
W/o further ado-

[McCain highlights]
Thanks for getting up early [extended applause for McCain]
Great event last night

As you may know, yesterday I called for SEC resig
He good man
there needs to be accountability
One books that Salter and I wrote, which is avalable on amazon, we tell a story: Eisenhower impressive and in charge of Normandy -- Went to his quarters and wrote out two letters (1) a Congratulations letter for staging invasion that won WW2 (2) a Resignation letter -- We need that kind of accountability
Thus, the FEC chairman should resign and be replaced

FULL PREPARED REMARKS
Thank you all very much. It's a great pleasure to be introduced by Governor Sarah Palin -- and I can't wait to introduce her to Washington.

If Governor Palin and I are elected in 46 days, we are not going to waste a moment in changing the way Washington does business. And we're going to start where the need for reform is greatest. In short order, we are going to put an end to the reckless conduct, corruption, and unbridled greed that have caused a crisis on Wall Street.

Here and all across our country, people are wondering what exactly is happening on Wall Street. And with good reason, they want to know how their government will meet the crisis. Clear answers are hard to come by in Washington.

As Senator Obama's leader in Congress memorably put it the other day -- and I quote -- "no one knows what to do." Perhaps given that reaction, it shouldn't surprise us that the Congressional leaders of this do-nothing Congress also said that they weren't going to take action until after the election, claiming that it wasn't their fault. I am hopeful that last night's discussions are a sign they have changed their mind and will take action soon. But any action should be designed to keep people in their homes and safe guard the life savings of all Americans by protecting our financial system.

There are certainly plenty of places to point fingers, and it may be hard to pinpoint the original event that set it all in motion. But let me give you an educated guess. The financial crisis we're living through today started with the corruption and manipulation of our home mortgage system. At the center of the problem were the lobbyists, politicians, and bureaucrats who succeeded in persuading Congress and the administration to ignore the festering problems at Fannie Mae and Freddie Mac.

These quasi-public corporations lead our housing system down a path where quick profit was placed before sound finance. They institutionalized a system that rewarded forcing mortgages on people who couldn't afford them, while turning around and selling those bad mortgages to the banks that are now going bankrupt. Using money and influence, they prevented reforms that would have curbed their power and limited their ability to damage our economy. And now, as ever, the American taxpayers are left to pay the price for Washington's failure.

This version of Total Mail Converter is not registered.

Two years ago, I called for reform of this corruption at Fannie Mae and Freddie Mac. Congress did nothing. The Administration did nothing. Senator Obama did nothing, and actually profited from this system of abuse and scandal. While Fannie and Freddie were working to keep Congress away from their house of cards, Senator Obama was taking their money. He got more, in fact, than any other member of Congress, except for the Democratic chairmen of the committee that oversees them. And while Fannie Mae was betraying the public trust, somehow its former CEO had managed to gain my opponent's trust to the point that Senator Obama actually put him in charge of his vice presidential search.

This CEO, Mr. Johnson, walked off with tens of millions of dollars in salary and bonuses for services rendered to Fannie Mae, even after authorities discovered accounting improprieties that padded his compensation. Another CEO for Fannie Mae, Mr. Raines, has been advising Senator Obama on housing policy. This even after Fannie Mae was found to have committed quote "extensive financial fraud" under his leadership. Like Mr. Johnson, Mr. Raines walked away with tens of millions of dollars.

Senator Obama may be taking their advice and he may be taking their money, but in a McCain-Palin administration, there will be no seat for these people at the policy-making table. They won't even get past the front gate at the White House.

My friends, this is the problem with Washington. People like Senator Obama have been too busy gaming the system and haven't ever done a thing to actually challenge the system.

We've heard a lot of words from Senator Obama over the course of this campaign. But maybe just this once he could spare us the lectures, and admit to his own poor judgment in contributing to these problems. The crisis on Wall Street started in the Washington culture of lobbying and influence peddling, and he was square in the middle of it.

The financial services industry -- and there are many honest and honorable people who work in it -- plays a vital role in our economy. Mutual fund companies help Americans save for retirement. Banks and lending companies provide the mortgages that help us buy our homes. Investment firms supply the seed money that helps entrepreneurs create tomorrow's jobs. Insurance companies protect us against unknown risks.

Yet as the financial crisis continues and bailouts and bankruptcies mount, it's clear financial firms have lost the trust of the American people. That trust cannot be regained unless we adopt some fundamental reforms. Government has a clear responsibility to act and to defend the public interest. That is exactly what I intend to do.

First, to deal with the immediate crisis, I will lead in the creation of the Mortgage and Financial Institutions trust -- the MFI. The underlying principle of the MFI or any approach considered by Congress should be to keep people in their homes and safe guard the life savings of all Americans by protecting our financial system and capital markets. This trust will work with the private sector and regulators to identify institutions that are weak and fix them before they become insolvent. The MFI is an early intervention program to help financial institutions avoid bankruptcy, expensive bailouts and damage to their customers. This will get the Treasury and other financial regulatory authorities in a proactive position instead of reacting in a crisis mode to one situation after another.

The MFI will restore investor and market confidence, build sound financial institutions, assist troubled institutions and protect our financial system while minimizing taxpayer exposure. This is an important step, but it is not enough. I will also take the additional actions needed to make sure a crisis like this is never allowed to build and break over the American people again.

Second, I will propose and sign into law reforms to prevent financial firms from concealing their bad practices. An inexcusable lack of financial transparency allowed Wall Street firms to engage in reckless behavior that padded their profits and fattened executive bonuses when times were good, but now imperil the financial security of millions of Americans when their bets turned sour.

This version of Total Mail Converter is not registered.

So much of the damage to our economy could have been avoided if these practices had been exposed to the light of day. Americans have a right to know when their jobs, pensions, IRAs, investments, and our whole economy are being put at risk by the recklessness of Wall Street. And under my reforms for the financial sector, that fundamental right will be protected.

Third, we need regulatory clarity. The lack of transparency in our financial markets went unnoticed by the regulatory agencies scattered throughout Washington charged with protecting the common good. We've got the SEC, the FDIC, the CFTC, the SIPC, the OCC, the Fed. At best, this confusing assortment of regulators and institutions was egregiously lax in carrying out their responsibilities. At worst, they engaged in the old Washington game of guarding their bureaucratic turf, instead of safeguarding the public interest and protecting investors.

Many in the financial services industry also either forgot or neglected their duty to act ethically and honorably. This shortcoming was aided and abetted by the creation of financial instruments that allowed lenders to escape any responsibility for the risk of their loans. In the past, lenders had to pay a price if they made a bad loan. Today, Fannie Mae and Freddie Mac worked with Wall Street to bundle together all these dicey subprime loans and then pushed them off on investors who didn't have the tools of transparency needed to assess or even understand the risk.

The current system promotes confusion, encourages bureaucratic infighting and creates incentives for financial firms to cut corners. We need to enhance regulatory clarity by holding the same financial activity to one regulatory standard. We don't need a dozen federal agencies doing the job badly -- we need the best federal agencies to do the job right.

Fourth, we must ensure that consumers and investors are protected. Our regulatory system must protect consumers and investors by punishing individuals who engage in fraud, break contracts, or lie to customers -- like the predatory lenders who know you can't afford an adjustable rate mortgage, but mislead you into signing one. These actions are criminal and the people who commit them should be behind bars. And corporate governance rules will be reformed so that shareholders have a clear say in determining the pay of CEOs and other senior executives. On my watch, the consequences for corporate abuse will not be more enrichment, but more likely an indictment.

Fifth, in cases where failing companies seek taxpayer bailouts, the Treasury Department will follow consistent policies in deciding whether to guarantee loans. It must have well developed remedies for a financial crisis. With billions of dollars in public money at stake, it will not do to keep making it up as we go along.

Finally, the Federal Reserve should get back to its core business of responsibly managing our money supply and inflation. It needs to get out of the business of bailouts. The Fed needs to return to protecting the purchasing power of the dollar. A strong dollar will reduce energy and food prices. It will stimulate sustainable economic growth and get this economy moving again.

All of these measures will calm and help us to avoid future panics and disasters in the financial markets. But to get through this tough time for America, and to come out stronger, we need a strategy of economic growth. And the massive new tax burden that my opponent plans for the American economy is exactly the wrong answer. His tax increase -- along with the enormous new federal programs he proposes -- are the surest way to turn a recession into a depression. In every respect, the Obama tax hikes would make things even worse for the working people of this country.

I have proposed, and will sign into law, an economic recovery plan for working Americans that is directed to the middle class. It will grow this economy, create millions of jobs and bring opportunity back to Americans. You will get a tax policy that creates family prosperity and allows you to save for the future. I will not raise your taxes on income or investments. And we will simplify the tax code so people can understand it and do their tax returns themselves.

I will give every family a $5,000 credit to buy their own health insurance policy and let them chose their own doctor. This will make insurance affordable to every American.

This version of Total Mail Converter is not registered.

I will double the child exemption from $3,500 to $7,000 to help families pay for the rising cost of living.

Under my plan, a married couple with two children making $35,000 will get $5,000 to pay for health insurance and additional medical expenses. This family would get another $1,050 from my child exemption. That adds up to over $6,000. That is a lot more than what any hardworking middle class family, gets under the Obama plan.

Business taxes will be cut from the second highest in the world at 35 percent to 25 percent. Tax incentives will spur investment in new plants and equipment. Research and development incentives will keep companies on the cutting edge of their industries. Healthcare costs will diminish. Companies will stop sending jobs overseas to low-cost, low-tax countries and start creating jobs here in America.

I will expand markets for our goods and services. A one in five of all jobs in this country are linked to world trade. In five states alone Pennsylvania, Ohio, Michigan, Wisconsin and Colorado over 5 million jobs depend on trade. My economic recovery plan will create millions of jobs in America instead of driving them overseas.

I will adopt an "all of the above" energy policy which expands our use of oil, natural gas, clean coal and nuclear facilities. We will embark on a national mission to build an alternative energy base, creating millions of new jobs. We will create the most diversified energy economy in the world. And, I will return to the American economy the $700 billion dollars we send overseas every year to buy oil.

My opponent offers a very different economic future. He has continuously shifted his position on taxes. At the beginning of this campaign he promised to raise taxes on your savings and investments. He said he won't raise taxes for most people but he has voted 94 times in his short Senate career for tax increases and against tax cuts. He said he would only tax the rich, but he voted this year to raise taxes on those making just $42,000. Senator Obama has simply not given Americans good reason to trust him with your tax dollars.

My opponent is against lowering taxes on businesses which are the second highest in the world. He will impose mandated health insurance on businesses that would cost up to $12,000 per employee. He opposes free trade. He also wants to take away the fundamental right of workers to have a secret ballot when voting to be part of a union.

Now is not the time for these destructive policies that will cripple business growth, destroy jobs and hurt the middle class. Now is the time to take action to address this crisis and take action to put our economy back on a path of growth.

Even though Democratic leaders say they don't know what to do, I believe the deep problems afflicting our financial system won't be solved by one political party. There is only one candidate in this race who has a record of reaching across the aisle to work out the bipartisan solutions needed to move our country forward in times of crisis -- and I will bring that same spirit of bipartisan cooperation to the White House. It took members of both parties to get America into this mess, and it will take all of us, working together, to lead the way out.

Thank you.

--
Sara DuBois
Tracking / Communications Manager
ProgressiveAccountability.org
sara@progressiveaccountability.org
202-609-7681 (office)
410-967-7306 (cell)

--~--~---------~--~----~------------~-------~--~----~
You received this message because you are subscribed to the "big campaign" group.

This version of Total Mail Converter is not registered.

To post to this group, send to bigcampaign@googlegroups.com

To unsubscribe, send email to bigcampaign-unsubscribe@googlegroups.com

E-mail ryan@campaigntodefendamerica.org with questions or concerns

This is a list of individuals. It is not affiliated with any group or organization.
-~----------~----~----~----~------~----~------~--~---

This version of Total Mail Converter is not registered.

From: "S. Daniel Abraham Center for Middle East Peace" <info@centerpeace.org>
To: podesta@law.georgetown.edu
Date: 11/16/2015 8:23:44 AM
Subject: News Update - November 16

S. DANIEL ABRAHAM
CENTER FOR MIDDLE EAST PEACE

Israel and the Middle East News Update

Monday, November 16

Click here for a printer-friendly version.

Headlines:

- Israelis Say French Should Now Realize There's a War On
- Op-Ed in Official PA Daily: Israel Carried Out Paris Attacks
- Netanyahu: 'Nothing to Justify Terror'
- Ya'alon: Israel Has Deterrence in Golan, Eyes on Islamic State
- Another Israeli Attacked After Being Mistaken for a Terrorist
- Clashes in the West Bank as IDF Demolish Terrorist's Home
- Poll: 75% of British Jews Think Settlements Block Peace
- Russia Says Hezbollah, Hamas Not Terror Groups

Commentary:

- Yedioth Ahronoth: "War of Cultures"
  - By Ben Caspit, Columnist, Al-Monitor's Israel Pulse
- The New York Times: "What Will Come After Paris"
  - By Editorial Staff

Washington Post

Israelis Say French Should Now Realize There's a War On

Israeli leaders expressed condolences to the French over the Paris terrorist attacks but quickly stressed Sunday that Israel and the West face the same foe in radical Islam and that Israel is on the front line. Israeli officials and commentators also suggested that French intelligence agencies had failed the republic and that France needs to pursue a tougher, far more intrusive — more Israeli — response against militants. Prime Minister Benjamin Netanyahu said Israel's spy agencies are actively assisting French authorities.

See also, "Thousands Rally in Tel Aviv's Rabin Square in Solidarity with France" (Algemeiner)

This version of Total Mail Converter is not registered.

Times of Israel

Op-Ed in Official PA Daily: Israel Carried Out Paris Attacks

A Sunday opinion piece in the official Palestinian Authority daily al-Hayat al-Jadida blamed Israel's Mossad intelligence agency for Friday's terror attacks in Paris, suggesting they were orchestrated in order to undermine new European moves promoting a two-state solution and providing for the clear labeling of produce from Israeli West Bank settlements. "It is not a coincidence that human blood was exploded in Paris at the same time that certain European sanctions are beginning to be implemented against settlement products, and while France leads Europe in advising the [UN] Security Council that will implement the two-state solution..." the piece states.

Ynet News

Netanyahu: 'Nothing to Justify Terror'

Israel's security forces have been ordered to aid France in any way possible after a series of simultaneous attacks in Paris killed 129, said Prime Minister Benjamin Netanyahu on Saturday evening. Even as the prime minister spoke to journalists on the unprecedented attack in France, Tel Aviv's municipality was lit up in red, white and blue as hundreds gathered in solidarity and the French Ambassador gave a short speech.

See also, "After Paris, Netanyahu Demands World Also Condemn Attacks Against Israel" (Times of Israel)

Jerusalem Post

Ya'alon: Israel Has Deterrence in Golan, Eyes on Islamic State

Defense Minister Moshe Ya'alon told Israel Radio Monday that Israel is succeeding in deterring Islamic State (IS) from attacking the country from Syria. The former IDF Chief of Staff claimed Israel follows IS activity and support in Gaza and the West Bank, on top of Syria. Ya'alon also stated that Iran had similar aspirations. "The Iranians have tried to open up a front against Israel from Syria, but the initiative failed," he said.

See also, "Israel Not Too Worried By Islamic State, Defense Chief Says" (Times of Israel)

Ynet News

Another Israeli Attacked After Being Mistaken for a Terrorist

A security guard at a police facility in Kiryat Ata was attacked by taxi passengers on Saturday who he claims suspected he was a terrorist. The guard, a Christian originally from Kafr Yasif in northern Israel who served in the IDF's Kfir Brigade, was set upon in the center of Kiryat Ata as he was on his way to work after visiting his girlfriend. "A car was sitting in the middle of the road so I honked my horn and then got out of my car to see what was happening...A taxi driver passing by saw the crucifix in my car and started shouting: 'He's an Arab terrorist.' They then started beating me with everything they had: sticks, chains, and knives," he continued.

This version of Total Mail Converter is not registered.

Ma'ariv

Clashes in the West Bank as IDF Demolish Terrorist's Home

Three Palestinians were killed last night during an IDF operation to demolish the home of a terrorist in the Kalandiya refugee camp. IDF forces came to demolish the home of terrorist Mohammed Abu Shahin who murdered Danny Gonen about four months ago. Palestinians at the site rioted and shot at IDF soldiers. The troops returned fire killing the three Palestinians. No injuries to IDF forces were reported. Palestinian sources also reported clashes with IDF troops in the Deheisha refugee camp in Bethlehem during an operation to arrest suspects. Several were wounded by gunfire.

See also, "Israeli Forces Destroy Homes of 4 Palestinians Accused in Shootings" (The New York Times)

See also, "Two Armed Palestinians Killed in West Bank as Israeli Army Demolishes Terrorist's Home" (Ha'aretz)

Jerusalem Post

Poll: 75% of British Jews Think Settlements Block Peace

A poll released by City University London and funded by the British pro-Israel, pro-peace group Yachad has revealed that 73% of British Jews view Israel's approach to the peace process with Palestinian officials as being damaging "to its standing in the world." The poll was based on a sample of 1,131 British Jews, presents what Yachad director Hannah Weisfeld described as a community that is "shifting" with regard to its attitudes toward Israel. While its show that for the majority of British Jews (93%), Israel plays a "central" or "important" part in their Jewish identity, it makes clear that the peace process is seen as the foremost issue. Fully 62% of respondents put "pursuing peace negotiations with the Palestinians" as what they feel should be Israel's top priority.

See also, "Poll of British Jews Finds Widespread Unease with Israel's Policies" (Guardian)

Times of Israel

Russia Says Hezbollah, Hamas Not Terror Groups

Moscow does not view Lebanese Shiite group Hezbollah as a terrorist organization, Russia's Deputy Foreign Minister Mikhail Bogdanov told the Interfax news agency. The comment came as the Kremlin sought to secure international consensus on which forces in Syrian ought to be branded terror groups as part of political negotiations aimed at ending the conflict. "Some say Hezbollah is a terrorist organization...We maintain contacts and relations with them, because we do not consider them a terrorist organization." The Russian official noted that members of the Shiite group's political wing were legally elected to Lebanese Parliament, and that the organization had never carried out attacks on Russian soil. He added that the group was a "legitimate sociopolitical" force.

Yedioth Ahronoth – November 15, 2015

War of Cultures

By Ben Caspit

Paris turned from the city of lights into the city of corpses in one fleeting moment. The French complacency, the good life, the colorful coffee shops, all those are history. Friday, November 13, is the date that will go down in the history of European atrocities. The Parisians will remember where they were that day until the day they die. Nothing will be the way it was until the rage abates. But the rage is not going to abate easily. There had been all sorts of previews in Europe until now—promos for the real thing. And the real thing happened on Friday.

This version of Total Mail Converter is not registered.

This war had been going on in other, distant regions. As long as the bodies piled up in the ruined cities of Syria and in what had been Iraq, Europe clicked its tongue, condemned, sent a squadron and a half to the ridiculous coalition that is bombing "ISIS objectives" and hoped for the best. There was the attack at Charlie Hebdo, and there was the massacre at the kosher Jewish supermarket, and there was the murderous spree of terror in Toulouse, and another in Brussels, but the complacency continued. Then came the refugees, like a swallow that heralds the coming of winter as the first significant shockwave that burst through the European wall of indifference. And now, this. It is still unclear how it is possible to describe the horror that Paris experienced on Friday. The French realize, as does the rest of the West, that the war is not over the future of Syria nor is it over Iraq's stability nor is it over the territorial wholeness of Afghanistan. This is a war for the home front.

What do we do now? The shock was clearly recognizable yesterday on the defeated face of French President Francois Hollande. What did he mean when he said that France will fight terrorism without mercy? To what was he hinting when he said that they will fight "with all the means at their disposal"? As of now, Europe has no means at its disposal to fight terror of this kind. Europe is a divided, fractious continent with open borders, ridiculous security arrangements, and zero determination. European society has been collapsing upon itself for years by now. This can be observed through a negative birth rate, through reduced populations, and through weak policies. It will have to shake itself, reinvent itself, and fight for its life. Yes, nothing less than that.

Europe will have to establish a joint intelligence arm to fight Islamic terror. It will have to allocate it unlimited means. It will have to forget a large part of the values of individual freedom, human rights, and the right to privacy, and it will have to allow the intelligence agency unrestricted invasive surveillance abilities on everyone. We will all have to understand in the current era of terror that it will be necessary to sacrifice some privacy in order to preserve life. The war on terror begins and ends with intelligence. Europe has no intelligence right now, it has no idea where to begin looking for it, and it has a nonexistent capability of sealing its borders and preventing the murderers from entering because the murderers are already inside. They are its citizens who have received asylum in the name of those same fundamental human values. Many things will change in Europe now with immigration and refugee policy at the fore.

The great victor of the weekend is Basher Assad. The one who was supposed to have already vaporized into the trash can of history has become the great white hope of the old world order. Iran's standing will become more entrenched along with him as it is the only available solution to ISIS. But whoever believes, such as the Americans, that Iran and the air strikes will crush ISIS, is gravely mistaken. It seems to me that it is now quite clear. ISIS suffered several tough defeats over the last few weeks in Syria and in Iraq, where it lost important strongholds to the Kurds. But at the very same time, it had a series of extraordinary successes in terrorism: the Russian airplane, the attack in Dahiya in Beirut, and the peak in Paris.

At the end of the day, with all due respect to Iran and even to the forces that Putin sent to Syria, the keys are in the hands of Barack Obama who still occupies the position of leader of the free world. His policy of "leading from behind" is a decisive failure. He leaves behind him a world bloodier, more dangerous, and more split than the one he received. The Pentagon announced a few days ago that it had succeeded in assassinating "John the Jihadist" with a drone that hit his car and he "was blown to pieces." Secretary of State John Kerry said a few minutes afterwards that "ISIS's days are numbered." And so, Kerry has again taken a punch to the face by reality. It has happened time and time again.

This version of Total Mail Converter is not registered.

And Obama will have to make an important decision in the next few days, perhaps the most important of his presidency: should he use his last year in power to try to fix the damage of the seven years that preceded it? ISIS will not be eradicated without boots on the ground, many boots and many soldiers with America at the lead in an international operation. It seems to me that the French would be happy to participate in such a coalition. They have no choice, in any case. It is an apocalyptic war between a culture that sanctifies death and a culture that sanctifies the good life.

What has happened now is that the people of life understand that they must fight in order to defend themselves. It is not enough to talk, give speeches, support, or assist. They need to roll up their sleeves, take off the white gloves, and stick their hands deep in the mud. It will be long, hard, and ugly. John the jihadist, who was blown up two days before the massacre in Paris after his vehicle was attacked by an American drone, will not live to see how it ends.

Ben Caspit is a columnist for Al-Monitor's Israel Pulse as well as a senior columnist and political analyst for Israeli newspapers.

The New York Times – November 15, 2015

What Will Come After Paris

By Editorial Staff

The terrorist attacks in Paris on Friday, along with twin bombings in Beirut on the day before and the downing of a Russian jetliner over the Sinai Peninsula on Oct. 31, show a new phase in the Islamic State's war against the West, a readiness to strike far beyond areas it controls in Iraq, Syria, and increasingly, Libya.

The challenge for threatened countries is huge. The sort of attacks the Islamic State, or ISIS, has launched are hard to anticipate or prevent, yet in Europe each one intensifies the raucous xenophobia of far-right nationalists ever ready to demonize Muslim citizens, immigrants and refugees, and shut down Europe's open internal borders. The Islamic State must be crushed, but that requires patience, determination and the coordination of strategies and goals that has been sorely lacking among countries involved in the war on ISIS, especially the United States and Russia.

President François Hollande of France defiantly declared the attacks in Paris "an act of war" and vowed a "pitiless" response. On Sunday, French warplanes bombarded Raqqa, the Syrian city that is an ISIS stronghold. Mr. Hollande is expected to offer other proposals when he addresses the French Parliament at a special session in Versailles on Monday. France already has some of Europe's most intensive antiterrorist policing; adopting draconian measures of the sort demanded by far-right nationalists like Marine Le Pen of the National Front can only further alienate France's Muslim population of five million, without offering any assurance against more attacks.

The discovery of a Syrian passport near one of the attackers, which matched one used by an asylum-seeker who had entered Europe through Greece, was bound to intensify anti-refugee sentiments and calls to close Europe's open internal borders. There is no proof that the owner of the passport was one of the gunmen. And even if one of the attackers had entered Europe in the guise of a refugee, the first gunman to be conclusively identified, Omar Ismail Mostefai, was not a refugee, but a French citizen born and raised in a town just south of Paris.

Pouring fuel on the passions swirling around refugees and Muslims in Europe was no doubt a major goal behind the ISIS attack. The choice of the neighborhoods where most attacks occurred, an ethnically diverse area in eastern Paris increasingly populated by young professionals, seemed designed to send the message that tolerance would be no protection against what ISIS described in a communiqué as the coming "storm."

This version of Total Mail Converter is not registered.

France must take measures to protect its citizens, as must the United States, Russia and all the other countries — Western and Middle Eastern — threatened by the Islamic State's murderous dream of a new caliphate. At the same time, it's clear that the prevention of further ISIS attacks will require threatened states to find a way to end the Syrian civil war, which has made it possible for this terrorist group to gain wealth, territory and power. That means closely coordinating action among countries already engaged in the fight — most notably the United States and Russia — and it means persuading more European and Middle Eastern nations to join in the mission.

Until the latest spate of ISIS attacks, America's focus on that terrorist organization as the primary enemy had not been fully shared by Russia, which has used its military actions more to defend its ally, President Bashar al-Assad of Syria. But there have been several promising moves of late toward greater cooperation.

At a meeting in Vienna on Saturday, representatives of more than a dozen countries with an urgent interest in ending the Syrian war, including Secretary of State John Kerry and Foreign Minister Sergey Lavrov of Russia, agreed on a tentative plan for a phased transition to an interim government and elections in Syria. And at the Group of 20 summit meeting underway in Turkey, Syria and ISIS have been a topic of urgent discussion, as they presumably were when President Obama met separately with President Vladimir Putin of Russia.

The attacks in Paris sent a major shockwave around the world, and the Beirut bombings and the downing of the Russian civilian jetliner were every bit as horrific. ISIS has demonstrated that there is no limit to its reach, and no nation is really safe until they all come together to defeat this scourge.

S. Daniel Abraham Center for Middle East Peace
633 Pennsylvania Ave. NW, 5th Floor, Washington, DC 20004
For comments, please contact us at info@centerpeace.org .
www.centerpeace.org

2015 S. Daniel Abraham Center for Middle East Peace, All rights reserved.
YOU ARE RECEIVING THIS EMAIL BECAUSE YOU SIGNED UP FOR OUR NEWS UPDATES.

unsubscribe from this list update subscription preferences

This version of Total Mail Converter is not registered.

From: "Joseph Slovinec" <jslovinec16@hotmail.com>
To: podesta@law.georgetown.edu
Date: 3/4/2016 2:47:55 PM
Subject: Re: For: John Podesta: Sample cover letter, resume: "Digital Coordinator" for Rising Tide Interactive

This if for John Podesta as an example of my cover letter with the longer resume.. It is premature for me to use a cover letter with your name on it unless you say you want to favor my application for a particular job. Please feel free to advise me on applying to organizations that I may not have included earlier.

Joe Slovinec

From: Joseph Slovinec <jslovinec16@hotmail.com>
Sent: Thursday, February 25, 2016 5:54 PM
To: jobs@risingtideinteractive.com
Subject: Re: Cover letter, resume: "Digital Coordinator" for Rising Tide Interactive

REFERENCES: Please note a reference is available on request for my 2011-2012 phone calls for the Obama campaign and Kaine for U.S. Senate campaign in Virginia. Professor Peg Griffin of George Mason at E-mail pgriffin@gmu.edu said during 2012 she is still pleased to serve as a reference for my phone calls for Organizing for America in 2009 and 2010 which are still on my resume.

February 25, 2016

Human Resources
Rising Tide Interactive
1250 H St., N.W.
Washington, D.C. 20005

Dear Director and Staff:

I send greetings. Please consider me for Entry-Level Digital Coordinator for the Rising Tide Interactive office. In your ad, I meet the educational qualifications with my M.A. in History and both undergraduate and graduate work on public policy topics. I am able to fulfill your needs for content concepts with my social media work and monthly calendars. I learned to use Excel and Power Point during a 2006 class at the University of the District of Columbia. My Georgetown Certificate in Project Management prepared me well to work on your reports and special projects. My resume describes my ability to work on written materials for Congress and a newsletter for your duties. My Facebook page for Joseph Slovinec includes federal Presidential and Congressional issues including climate change for President Obama, anticrime issues for the Hillary Clinton campaign, and education with a higher minimum wage.. I learned how to write a curriculum unit at DePaul School of Education with a pro-labor unit on the Pullman Strike. I taught community college. Please count my experience on pro-Obama and Obama campaign phone calls at the Democratic National Committee from 2009 to 2012. It helped me to understand the election and political organizing process well. My education helped me learn how to conduct extensive research and set a policy agenda. Please also consider me for any Entry-Level Project Management jobs or other appropriate jobs with a B.A. if you receive notices of openings sometime in the future. I can do Project Management work on organizing conferences. Your ad indicates a particularly good fit between your entry-level duties and my desire for entry-level work with my Georgetown Certificate in Project Management. . In November 2015 I gave testimony to the U.S. Environmental Protection Agency for the Clean Power Plan and a copy is available on request. In strategies to use my Master's Degree in International Affairs for peace, I recently shifted into new interests in the environment after my involvement in Tommy Wells' campaign and climate change after earlier security interests in NATO and the Middle East. I specialized on data collection during the U.S. Census and I have often used political polls. I know this is a long cover letter yet I believe you need to review it for my many activities in progressive politics.. Please note my Facebook page where I often get postings from President Obama on climate change, a higher minimum wage, and many issues. Please also access my writings under my name as Member of the Peace and Collaborative Development Network about Middle East peace, Obama's Iran nuclear arms deal, and Carter Center mediations: I also did research on the African Union talks on Libya and east Asian security. I have two Master's Degrees on my resume and I can still excel on research, writing, and communications for you including recent social media entries. You can note I had a long job search since many Project Management jobs are in conservative or high-tech companies with 5 or more years of managerial experience. I have worked on campaign research since my opposition research for the Democratic Congressional Campaign Committee on President Reagan's foreign policy record in 1984 including lack of progress on Middle East and Central America peace talks.

This version of Total Mail Converter is not registered.

Please understand I need to include in the rest of this letter a text I usually use for all of my cover letters. It is easier for your reading that I send you a list of candidates for whom I made calls at the Democratic Congressional Campaign Committee in Washington, D.C. in 2014: Alex Sink of Florida. Congresswoman Elizabeth Esty of Connecticut, and ex- Congressmen Bill Enyart and Brad Schneider of Illinois. I will try to contact their current DCCC staff on ideas on listing them for you. Thanks.

Please see my entries on the Peace and Collaborative Development Network where I persuaded a chapter meeting of President Obama's group, Organizing for Action, in March 2013 to include Israeli-Palestinian peace as a main goal and Cuba, a suggestion from another group member. President Obama did not respond directly and his recognition of Cuba accomplished our purposes: on that network, I wrote entries on the Israel-Hamas ceasefire scene in Gaza in 2013-2014. I saw Jimmy Carter at a book signing here July 9 and he seems fine. I lack time to rewrite this entire letter today so please read on for a text I use in most letters after I tell you I have fine teaching at Columbia University from Zbigniew Brzezinski, President Carter's National Security Advisor, and Nissan Oren, advisor to former President and Prime Minister Shimon Peres of Israel shortly after Camp David.

Please again note the requests from President Obama or pro-Obama White House groups to post items on my Joseph Slovinec Facebook page including climate change and Review of the Year 2014. I can multi-task with use of my Georgetown Certificate in Project Management. I am receptive to your leadership coaching and you will find I have excellent research and writing skills on facts in History and Political Science with benefit to your business. Today I note my Obama-Biden transition comments included a note on my Dec. 8, 2008 comment on the Center for Strategic and International Studies site: "Congratulations to Hillary Clinton on her selection as Secretary of State and I hope she and President-elect Obama read materials from and honor my past Columbia professors including Dr. Brzezinski, U.S. Ambassador to the United Nations Zalmay Khalilzad, Professor Nissan Oren, Professor Marshall Shulman on the Soviet Union since we need reduction of tensions with Putin, and Enid Schoettle where I wrote a paper on Spain in NATO." and "the Armitage-Nye combination gave the CSIS Commission on Smart Power fine leadership on alliances.. and public diplomacy including NATO and G-8 goals.".."I hope former President Clinton uses his library and foundation to keep in touch with ..Mikhail Gorbachev on his voluntary role in ending the Cold War as we try to reduce tensions with Putin today." My research on Spain correctly expressed optimism in 1981 on the later admission of Spain to NATO with a new democratic system of King Juan Carlos I in Spain and resulted expected Spanish entry into the EEC or Common Market. When Dr. Brzezinski taught me, I wrote an options paper on deployment of INF nuclear weapons and speeches for human rights including a related Presidential speech to favor freedom in Europe and oppose the 1981 Polish Communist and army repression of the Solidarity labor union and its leader, Lech Walesa, during that crisis. Professor Shulman gave me an A in a class that was mostly on Russian diplomatic history. Professor Oren taught a seminar on Consolidation of Peace with some admiration for the Congress of Vienna in 1815 and stable peace after World War II; Professor Oren was a friend of Israeli President and Prime Minister Shimon Peres and I wrote a paper for him on the Indonesia-Malaysia confrontation of the 1960's when Malaysia was more pro-British and anti-Communist of the two. I explain well my thesis on my resume and also briefly wrote the fair diplomacy of President Theodore Roosevelt to discuss peace with Great Britain, France, Germany, and Russia could serve as a model for the Clinton-Yeltsin era. I visited Warsaw, Poland and Prague, Czech Republic in 1993 during democratic rule after my personal extensive reading on that topic. I also attended Georgetown events on Europe including Madeleine Albright's talk on Prague Winter about her childhood and a talk by Denis Deletant on democratic Romania.

I note you may have an interest in the Obama Presidential campaign of 2012 and I worked on it for 1 1/2 years with supervision from Tiernan Reilly for calls for D.C. volunteers for Virginia. I have the ability to write press releases after working together with journalists as an Assistant Editor of Chapters on Arms Control and Disarmament and Dispute Settlement and Decolonization at the United Nations Association of the U.S.A.. Please see recent writing under my name on the Peace and Collaborative Development Network including a milestone of important events in Ukraine peace talks with Russia since 2014 I sometimes make entries on LinkedIn like I did on the 2012 Obama campaign issues. I got an A- on my History thesis with "Above Average" on the oral exam. Your hiring of me would achieve goals of the federal Workforce Investment Act that gave a grant to Georgetown to pay for tuition for my Georgetown Certificate in Project Management with a goal of ending my unemployment Please read on for my cover letter for all purposes and I lack time to make revisions in the cover letter today. I got $20 per hour for work on the 2010 Census. Please note my conflict mediation expertise for this job with my Certificates from the U.S. Institute of Peace. I did research on transportation regulations on hazardous wastes for Congressman Martin Russo (D-Il.). I believe I meet the qualifications for research and writing with my Master's Degree in International Affairs at Columbia University. Please note I worked for 6 years in Cook County public administration and one year for the Illinois government on Medicaid, a public policy activity. I wrote research on food aid for Africa for Alison Doyle, an assistant to Madeleine Albright, foreign policy advisor for the campaign of Geraldine Ferraro for Vice President in 1984. My resume indicates my earlier work for Mayor Daley in Chicago's 43rd Ward including a list of international organizations. My DePaul thesis included an A- grade with excellent written and verbal communications skills. I am seeking re-entry into research on Congress after original interests in the 1980's including an internship for Congressman Russo, work on federal student aid for Columbia's Vice President for Government Relations, and several substantive research assignments in the 1980's including a critique of President Reagan's foreign policy with strength on NATO and desire for peace in the Middle East and Central America, issues research on education and foreign policy for Shawn Collins for Congress in 1986, and research on South African and antidrug efforts for Senator Dixon's 1986 re-election campaign. In Project Management, we learned about communications project management including meetings with stakeholders for requirements, conferences and events planning, office organizational abilities, time management and schedules, public relations strategies for press releases, and distribution of information about the project. References include U.S. Census Bureau supervisor Evan Goitein at Phone 301-323-8272, Georgetown Professor Larry Joseph who is an expert on project teams at 240-888-1009, and Georgetown Professor of Project Management Charles McClelland at 703-644-1603. Please ask me if you want a reference from Stuart-Hobson Middle School's Assistant Principal. I was a Notre Dame newspaper staff reporter. Please note my earlier Public Relations Writing class at George Washington University included my writing of a publicity package with news releases about the AFL-CIO. I am an Honorary Fellow of the John F. Kennedy Presidential Library and wrote about President Kennedy's cooperation with U.S. Senator Paul Douglas (D-Il.) on economic development programs at DePaul. In summary, you will find project management experience on my resume in work on Senator Douglas' files at the Chicago Historical Society, foreign affairs projects at nonprofits the United Nations Association of the U.S.A. and World Without War Council, Medicaid caseworker duties for the Illinois Department of Human Services, and work for the Vice President for Government Relations and Community Affairs at Columbia University when Barack Obama was an undergrad there. I often did reading on my own on Sierra Club issues during and since the 1990's and Presidential campaign and Congressional issues of the 1980's including toxic wastes. I am more carefully selecting job openings since most Washington, D.C. area Project Management jobs are in high-tech and do not connect well to my previous Project Management-related work at the Illinois Dept. of Human Services, Columbia University, and writing related to the United Nations.

This version of Total Mail Converter is not registered.

Please permit me to send later writing samples if you ask for them.. I hope you're pleased with my writing on Facebook and I welcome your comments. Please contact me. Thank you.

Sincerely yours,

Joseph Slovinec

JOSEPH SLOVINEC
425 2nd St. , N.W.
Washington, D.C. 20001
E-mail:jslovinec16@hotmail.com
Phone messages 202-393-7117 with Jobs Have Priority fax at 202-393-7270

FOR DCCC: Made phone calls for Alex Sink for U.S. House 2014, 2012; Obama campaign reference available on request

RECENT JOBS

United States Census Bureau, Washington, D.C.. 2010. Enumerator for U.S. Census with visits to households to ask them to fill out questionnaires. Also Enumerator in Chicago, Illinois 1990, 2000 and Calumet City, Illinois 1980

Share Group, Washington, D.C.. March 2008-January 2009. In a telephone fundraiser job to raise financial donation pledges for public interest and nonprofit groups with high totals for Bread for the World, Obama for America Presidential campaign, People for the American Way, American Civil Liberties Union, U.S. Holocaust Memorial Museum: and many calls for WTTW-TV Channel 11 in Chicago, WBEZ Chicago Public Radio, WFMT Chicago's Fine Arts Station, WNYC Public Radio in New York, Humane Society, and Democratic National Committee. Volunteer calls: earlier for events attendance for Hillary Clinton for President 2007-2008.

This version of Total Mail Converter is not registered.

National Research, LLC, Washington, D.C. 2006-2007. Phone calls for opinion surveys like November 2006 elections, issues for New Congress like health care, economy, Iraq and Afghanistan wars, Clinton and Bush popularity, retirement planning, and employee benefits.

Contemporary Services Corporation, Upper Marlboro, Maryland, March-May 2006. Events staff includes checking of credentials for areas at concerts, sports events, and special events like the circus. National company uses ticket takers: part-time job.

Mid-Atlantic Regional Council of Carpenters, Forestville, Maryland office, March-December 2006. Work on marches for higher wages and better working conditions at sites only in Washington, D.C.. Activist: Adrian Fenty for Mayor of Washington, D.C., Paid work for precinct canvassing on Election Day, September 2006

VOLUNTEER WORK

Stuart-Hobson Middle School, Washington, D.C.. July 2015 - . Official D.C. Public Schools volunteer work on organizing books and library space.

EDUCATION, MASTER'S DEGREES, AND TRAINING .

Georgetown University School of Continuing Studies, Arlington, Virginia. Certificate in Project Management 2011. Classes include organization of work, office communications, public relations, data collection and questionnaires, risk management, and scheduling.

United States Institute of Peace, Washington, D.C. Feb. 2010. Passed online exams for Certificate in Conflict Analysis and Certificate in Interfaith Conflict Resolution.

University of the District of Columbia-Van Ness Campus, Washington, D.C., School of Business and Public Administration. PATHS Program, Office Assistant 2006. Includes data entry and typing on Microsoft Word, Excel, and Power Point.Projects for Professor Susan Nan who is now at George Mason U.: in Washington, D.C. 2005. Talk in class on Arab League peaceful mediation of 1961 Kuwait-Iraq crisis and voting for women in Kuwait, small group research on Colombia including 2002 peace talks with FARC rebels, also see entries under J. Slovinec's name on Peace and Collaborative Development Network website. George Washington University, Washington, D.C.. Public Relations Writing class, 2003. Backgrounders, script writing for television and radio, project on AFL-CIO and lobbying for economic stimulus. Roosevelt University, Chicago, Il. Hospitality Management and Business classes including Meeting Planning, 2000-2001. Education class, 2003.

DePaul University, Chicago, Il.. M.A. in History 1996 with 3.5 of 4, exams in American History and European History, and thesis on President Theodore Roosevelt's peace mediations in Europe with diplomats in Algeciras, Spain and in Portsmouth, New Hampshire. Chicago Historical Society (now Chicago History Museum) internship 1994: research on role of U.S. Senator Paul Douglas as author of legislation to create today's Economic Development Administration, project management of creation of files on above topic and the related Kennedy Administration Area Redevelopment Administration, Captive Nations Week, and Europe in Paul Douglas Papers collection. Teaching and Learning classes at DePaul U. School of Education, 1996-1997 including social studies curriculum planning.

Columbia University, New York, N.Y.. Master's Degree in International Affairs, 1982. Specialization: International security policy. Diplomacy, peace mediation, arms control

University of Notre Dame, Notre Dame, Indiana. B.A. in Government and International Studies with honors, 1980. One year of study in Rome, Italy, French, Italian languages..

RELATED EMPLOYMENT WITH RESEARCH SKILLS Congress - Intern for Congressman Russo - research on hazardous wastes, Captive Nations Week, and Cyprus. Washington, D.C. 1980. Research Assistant for Vice President for Government Relations at Columbia University, 1981-1982, including international educational exchanges and student aid. Research for Democratic Congressional Campaign Committee for 1984 race on Reagan record with support for more peace talks on arms control, Middle East, and Central America. Issues research: Glenn for President, Geraldine Ferraro for Vice President, Senator Dixon 1986. Research on Job Training Partnership Act program for Thornton Township Trustee Thomas Shepherd in South Holland, Illinois 1985. Paid writing on United Nations: Outer space and non-nuclear arms control, with work as Assistant Editor on arms control and dispute settlement chapters, Issues Before the General Assembly,United Nations Association of the U.S.A., New York, N.Y. 1983, and on United Nations military budget accounting system, World Without War Council, Chicago, Il. 1984.

OTHER EMPLOYMENT

Illinois Dept. of Human Services, Chicago, Il. 1999-2000. Medicaid nursing home casework.

This version of Total Mail Converter is not registered.

Chicago Public Schools, Chicago, Il. Substitute teacher 1998-1999 after estate gift, school

South Suburban College, South Holland, Il. 1988. Adjunct Professor of American National Government for two semesters.

Clerk of Circuit Court, Cook County, Chicago, Il. 1986-1992. Accounting of fees and clerk.

Cook County State's Attorney Richard M. Daley, Chicago, Il. 1985-1986. Clerk in Child Support Enforcement unit.

PUBLISHED ARTICLES AND RESEARCH IN 1990'S Presidential Studies Quarterly: of the Center for the Study of the Presidency, Washington, D.C. and New York, N.Y.. "Second Term Presidents in U.S. History".Introduction to Winter 1997 includes a note about my research on this paper: My research describes several categories of second-term Presidents: coasting-along with less vigor than first term (Washington, Jefferson, Monroe, Jackson, Eisenhower); worsening scandals like Grant, Nixon, and Iran-contra under Reagan; wars; and recessions and I wrote on Clinton and Republican Congress like Cleveland: "In a second term, Clinton could probably coast along like Eisenhower with a stable peace and popularity..with no recessions." POLITICAL - Young Democrats of Cook County including platform work, 1986-1992 and its Recording Secretary, 1990-1991 (also see my Linkedin profile for 43rd Ward involvement in Chicago.)List of international organizations in Chicago, precinct work for Richard M. Daley for Mayor of Chicago, 1989; 1996 memo on campaign budget deficit reduction, 2008 phone calls for Senator Durbin. Phone calls for Kerry for President and answering letters 2004, calls for Cardin for Senate 2006. Research for Lisa Madigan for Attorney General of Illinois on economic development and environmental issues, attendance at events, 2002. Wrote letter of congratulations on website with hopes for peace with security in Kuwait and Iraq, Congressman-elect Patrick Murphy (D-Pennsylvania), 2006. Phone calls for Obama for President in Arlington County, Virginia, to Ohio from 44th Ward office in Chicago, for U.S. Senator Dick Durbin and Congresswoman Debbie Halvorson for Congress, Joliet, Illinois November 2008. Barack Obama was at Columbia U. when I was 1981-1982 student. Phone calls for Congressman Scott Murphy (D-N.Y.) with Organizing for America, 2009, Democratic Congressional candidate Mark Critz of Pennsylvania, Congressman Tom Perriello (D-Virginia) Pennsylvania, Congressional candidate Julie Lassa of Wisconsin, Congressman Joe Donnelly of Indiana, Governor Pat Quinn of Illinois, Alexi Giannoulias for United States Senate in Illinois, and Dan Seals for Congress for Illinois with Organizing for America 2010, work on brochure distribution drive for Lisa Madigan for Attorney General in Illinois in 2010, precinct work for D.C. City Councilman Tommy Wells 2010 and for Tommy Wells for Mayor in 2014 with office phone calls; and calls for Democrat Terry McAuliffe for Governor of Virginia 2009. Paid precinct work for Adrian Fenty for Mayor of Washington, D.C., Election Day 2006.Phone calls for Obama for America to recruit volunteers from Democratic National Committee office, Washington, D.C., 2011-2012 with 2012 visits to Virginia to campaign for President Obama and Tim Kaine for U.S. Senate after phone calls. Phone calls for Democrats, Alex Sink, Congressman Bill Enyart of Illinois, and Congressman Brad Schneider of Illinois for U.S. House at Democratic Congressional Campaign Committee in 2014 and distribution of brochures for Anita Bonds and Elissa Silverman for D.C. City Council 2014. COMMENTS ON OBAMA-BIDEN TRANSITION PROJECT WEBSITE: EXCERPTS AND SUMMARY: Your Seat at Table icon: Joseph Slovinec comments in reverse chronological order: Institute for Policy Studies, Jan. 5, 2009: "The Anderson-Perez-Rocha paper is wise in saying liberals also favor U.S. policies to create Mexican jobs, budget for food, and stable Mexican oil prices. This led William Daley to favor NAFTA in 1993 amid controversy and the Obama-Biden campaign website wisely led to moderation in call for amendments to NAFTA.. to please labor and environmentalist.. Raymond Cohen's book, Negotiating Across Cultures includes Mexican desire for respect in negotiations with U.S..". National Association of Attorneys General, Dec. 19, 2008: "In June 2008 I did research on who had most interest in budget ideas after the 2007 budget crisis in Illinois and I praised websites of Brookings, Urban Institute, and Center on Budget and Policy Priorities." U.S. Conference of Mayors: Immigration Reform, Dec. 15, 2008: "I would like to hear more from mayors ..on ending delays in legislation for climate change, increases in Community Development Block Grants, and increases in community policing funds." A New Map for American-German Relations, Dec. 9, 2008: "ideas..are good..we need more specific advising on history and goals for a summit with President Chavez of Venezuela" Center for Strategic and International Studies, Dec. 8, 2008: "I praise CSIS with great ideas..on NATO and public diplomacy..Congratulations to Hillary Clinton. I hope she and President-elect Obama read materials from and honor my past Columbia professors Dr. Brzezinski, U.S. Ambassador to the United Nations Zalmay Khalilzad, Professor Nissan Oren.. Senator Biden did fine work on obtaining testimony from Dr. Brzezinski who wanted a gradual end to Iraq war., Jan. 30, 2007": asked Clinton Foundation to contact Mr. Gorbachev.ATTENDED PLATFORM MEETINGS: With Shana Wimosher on Democratic platform July 2008 with memo praising Obama trip to Europe and pro-labor views. D.C. for Obama meetings: Advocacy for Health Care and Foreign Policy issues, Jan. 17, 2009, and lobbied U.S. Senators for economic stimulus package, Feb. 2009..> >> >> >> >> >> >> > _____END OF RESUME - LACKED TIME TO DELETE SUBSEQUENT ENTRIES_____ _

This version of Total Mail Converter is not registered.

From:	"Bulletin News Network" <Clinton-Editors@BulletinNews.com>
To:	bulletin@hillaryclinton.com clips@hillaryclinton.com
Date:	2/26/2008 11:32:53 PM
Subject:	Hillary For President News Briefing for Wednesday, February 27, 2008
Attachments:	ClintonNewsBriefing080227.doc

HILLARY FOR PRESIDENT NEWS BRIEFING (Executive Version)
Full version is attached and available online at http://www.bulletinnews.com/clinton

TO: CLINTON CAMPAIGN

DATE: WEDNESDAY, FEBRUARY 27, 2008 6:30 AM EST

TODAY'S TABLE OF CONTENTS

SEN. CLINTON'S CAMPAIGN:
+ Clinton, Obama Debate Trade, Healthcare In Cleveland.
+ Both Democrats Court Youngstown's Blue Collar Voters.
+ Complicated Texas Process Said To Hurt Clinton's Chances.
+ Clinton, Obama Both Said To Have Given Mixed Signals On NAFTA.
+ Clinton Superdelegates Rejecting Calls To Defect.
+ Bill Clinton Takes Lower Profile Role In Wife's Campaign.
+ Obama Downplays Dust-Up Over Photo.
+ McCain Leads Both Obama And Clinton In LATimes/Bloomberg Poll.
+ Dodd Endorses Obama.
+ Obama Speech At Church's National Meeting Draws IRS Scrutiny.

Sen. Clinton's Campaign:

CLINTON, OBAMA DEBATE TRADE, HEALTHCARE IN CLEVELAND. In the twentieth debate of the Democratic primary campaign, Sens. Hillary Clinton and Barack Obama faced off over healthcare and trade at Cleveland State University. Media reports characterized Clinton as the aggressor, attempting to portray Obama as a negative campaigner and questioning his healthcare plan. However, the media consensus is that Clinton's jabs failed to rattle Obama, who is said to have remained calm and collected. According to most analyses, neither candidate gained a significant edge during the forum, and the tie was seen as benefiting Obama.

The New York Times (2/27, Nagourney, 1.18M) reports Clinton "entered the final debate before Tuesday's critical primaries with two imperative goals: Challenge Senator Barack Obama's qualifications to lead the country and raise doubts about his ability to defeat a Republican opponent as experienced as Senator John McCain." For "most of 90 minutes, Mrs. Clinton grabbed at every opportunity to accomplish those goals." But by "the end of the night, there was little evidence that Mrs. Clinton had produced the kind of ground-moving moment she needed that might shift the course of a campaign that polls suggest has been moving inexorably in Mr. Obama's direction for weeks."

In a similar analysis piece, the Los Angeles Times (2/27, Braun, 881K) calls the debate a "nudge match," noting that it was "billed as" Clinton's "last chance to revive her flagging campaign, and she gave it her best shot." With "a week left to go before the critical primary votes in Ohio and Texas, Clinton had to do more than chip away at Obama. To shake up her faltering campaign, she needed to shake him up." Clinton "nudged him about his healthcare coverage. She questioned his judgment on backing unilateral raids on Al Qaeda in Pakistan. She even tried a subtle new tack to spin her controversial vote approving the invasion of Iraq by suggesting that Obama's opposition had come without consequences because he was not in federal public office." Yet "judging from Obama's unruffled composure and measured responses through much of the debate, that moment of truth never came." Obama was "playing out the clock, and while he did not walk away unscathed from the debate, the damage Clinton inflicted was minor."

This version of Total Mail Converter is not registered.

The Washington Times (2/27, Miller, Bellantoni, 87K) reports Obama "weathered some 'glancing blows' as his rival and moderators challenged his experience in last night's debate, but he emerged relatively unscathed." Clinton had "been expected to unload a barrage of attacks on Mr. Obama, and even top Obama advisers conceded that the New York senator landed several blows last night, keeping the new Democratic front-runner on the defensive." However, Clinton "mispronounced the name of Vladimir Putin's presumptive successor as Russian president, smiling and saying 'whatever' after she had trouble with First Deputy Prime Minister Dmitry Medvedev's last name, reminiscent of George W. Bush's bungling foreign leaders' names as a candidate in 2000."

The Hill (2/27, Youngman) reports neither Clinton nor Obama "appeared to score huge political blows, which works to the frontrunner Obama's political advantage." Both candidates "jumped out of the gate criticizing one another for their campaign tactics, with Clinton taking exception to Obama's mailers and phone calls attacking the former first lady's stance on" NAFTA. Obama "responded in kind, saying that Clinton's campaign had long engaged in circulating campaign literature that incorrectly described his healthcare plan."

The Los Angeles Times (2/27, Barabak, Decker, 881K) reports "an aggrieved" Clinton "accused Barack Obama of distorting her record and called into question the fairness of tonight's forum by challenging the order of questioning in their nationally televised debate. Obama responded by defending the accuracy of his criticisms, and some in the audience jeered when Clinton cried foul." The "opening half-hour was dominated by two subjects that have consumed the most attention in the last few days: the candidates' approach to healthcare and their views, past and present, on the North American Free Trade Agreement."

The Washington Post (2/27, A1, Kornblut, 723K) reports in a front page story that Clinton and Obama "traded accusations over campaign tactics and engaged in a detailed dissection of their rival health-care plans in the opening moments of a critical debate." Clinton used "the opening moments of the debate" to "delve into health care, repeating her assertion that Obama's plan would leave 15 million people uncovered. She interrupted Obama and the debate moderators repeatedly to press her points and complained briefly that she had been repeatedly subjected to the toughest questioning in this and previous debates." Though "attention was expected to focus on Clinton as she waged a battle to keep her campaign alive, Obama did not shy away from pushing back -- saying that she had been misrepresenting his health-care plan throughout the race in mailings and ads that he said were 'simply not accurate.'"

The AP (2/27, Espo) reports Clinton and Obama "blamed each other for spreading false information about their respective health care plans Tuesday night in a high stakes debate one week before a quartet of primaries." The tone was "pointed yet polite in the early moments of the 90-minute encounter."

Hurt Says "Presidential" Obama Was Debate Winner. In his New York Post (2/27, 648K) column, Charles Hurt writes, "Devoid of any real fireworks, last night's debate was a victory for Barack Obama," who "was confident, gracious and even presidential. Perhaps more than in any of the other 19 Democratic primary debates that have come before, it was possible to imagine Obama sitting behind the desk in the Oval Office."

Halperin Assigns Obama "B+" For Debate Performance; Clinton Earns "B-." On the website of TIME (2/27, 4.03M), Mark Halperin grades the candidates' performances in last night's debate. Halperin assigns Obama an overall mark of B+, saying, "Avoided lofty rhetoric and focused on presenting himself as cool, deliberative and substantive. Well prepared and focused, he was also clearly bolstered by well-stoked confidence and what he sees as his looming, shiny victory. More than survived - even thrived at times - in what could be his final debate with Hillary Clinton."

Halperin gives Clinton an overall grade of B-, saying, "A performance that would have been adequate were she not struggling to stay in the game. Her conviction that the media is biased against her seemed to throw her off throughout, and she was too distracted by her frustration with Obama and the press to truly shine. Occasionally got caught up in jargon and Washington-speak but still delivered some detailed and decisive moments. Overall, veered between strong and effective, shrill and affronted."

Debate Seen As Ending In Draw. In an analysis published by Newsweek, the AP (2/27, Pickler) reports that the debate "seemed unlikely to alter the political calculus of the race," noting that many of their policy positions were similar, and that despite a series of "sometimes testy exchanges,...Neither one seemed to knock the other off stride." The piece continues to suggest that Clinton's reference to the "Saturday Night Live" skit about the media favoring Obama "might have undercut Clinton's own efforts to portray herself as a strong leader able to take on a range of challenges."

This version of Total Mail Converter is not registered.

In an analysis on the website of Newsweek (2/26, 3.12M), Howard Fineman writes that Obama "fought Sen. Hillary Clinton to a draw. ... Bottom line, on my scorecard: a tie at best, and certainly not enough of a win for Clinton to change the dynamics of the nomination contest, which Obama is poised to lock up."

In a posting on "The Fix" blog on the website of the Washington Post (2/26, 723K), Chris Cillizza related, "Neither candidate scored a knockout or even a knockdown. That's probably good news for Obama, who came into the debate on a roll and simply wanted to make it through the night without breaking that momentum. Clinton dominated much of the debate -- for good or bad."

In a "First Read" report on the website of MSNBC (2/26), political analyst Chuck Todd related, "Overall, it's hard to see this debate as changing the trajectory of this race; Obama was a bit more defensive tonight than last week and had more stumbles tonight than in more recent encounters."

In an analysis headlined "Clinton fails to slow down Obama," columnist Lynn Sweet writes in the Chicago Sun-Times (2/27) that "Clinton, try as she did Tuesday night, could not throw" Obama "off the course he is on to win the Democratic nomination."

In his Philadelphia Daily News (2/27, 107K) column, John Baer says that in last night's debate, Clinton "gave Democratic voters no solid, concrete reason why not to vote for Obama." Calling "Clinton's overall effort was scattered, ill-focused," Baer adds, "And the thing is? I don't think it's her. I don't think she's done much wrong."

BOTH DEMOCRATS COURT YOUNGSTOWN'S BLUE COLLAR VOTERS. The New York Times (2/27, Jacobs, 1.18M) reports the Clinton and Obama campaigns "are aware that winning the affection of Youngstown's lunch-bucket voters and the party faithful can make all the difference in taking Ohio, a swing state whose delegates almost always wind up in the pocket of the candidate who takes the White House." Although they "listen to such speeches with a jaundiced eye - and a good number dismiss such talk as little more than pandering - many Youngstown residents say are excited by pledges that speak to their anxieties. If there is any unanimity among voters here, it is that the Bush administration has fueled Youngstown's downward spiral by somehow encouraging corporate investment overseas." But for "every optimist here there are two or three hard-bitten cynics who dismiss the pledges and resent the politicians for using Youngstown as a showcase for economic distress. They remember the day Bill Clinton rode into town promising a Pentagon payroll processing center with room for 7,000 workers (it went elsewhere) and the time John Kerry set up his dais in front of a boarded-up building so the cameras would show Youngstown's ugly rump even though there was a new state office complex on the other side of the street."

The CBS Evening News (2/26, story 3, 2:45, Greenfield, 7.66M) reported, "For all the heated charges of dirty tricks in the pre-debate runup, when it comes to the number-one issue in Ohio, the contenders sound very much the same." Sen. Sherrod Brown, "who won his seat in 2006 with a strong attack on trade deals like NAFTA." Brown: "I mean, it really is the same old story. Laying off American workers, investment companies coming in from Wall Street, buying the plant, not living up to all their obligations to the workers, moving the plant overseas, shutting the plant down." Greenfield: "Like communities all over Ohio, Tiffin has seen a once- thriving working class devastated by the loss of jobs that have seemingly vanished from the face of the earth, only to reappear on the other side of the earth. And it is that issue more than any other that Ohio Democrats want their candidates for president to address."

Clinton, Obama Increase Criticism Of China. The Wall Street Journal (2/27, A10, Timiraos, 2.06M) reports, "As the debate between the Democratic candidates shifts focus to the economy and trade, China is emerging as their chief foreign bogeyman." Both Clinton and Obama "have heightened their antitrade, populist rhetoric as they fight for blue-collar votes in Ohio ahead of the state's March 4 primary." Both candidates also "have railed against safety lapses that resulted in product recalls of lead paint covered toys and tainted pet food." Obama "has gone one step further, criticizing President Clinton's administration for acceding to lax safety standards when the U.S. conferred permanent normal trade relations on China in 2000."

This version of Total Mail Converter is not registered.

Bill Clinton Says Wife Will Win Ohio. On NBC Nightly News (2/26, story 3, 1:35,, 9.87M) Tim Russert said, "Two weeks ago" Bill Clinton said if Hillary Clinton "doesn't win Ohio and Texas she probably can't be the nominee. Today he raised the bar as high as you can get it. He said she is going to win Ohio. That is a very big mountain and challenge for Hillary Clinton one week out to have the former president say, slam dunk."

COMPLICATED TEXAS PROCESS SAID TO HURT CLINTON'S CHANCES. The Wall Street Journal (2/27, Kronholz, 2.06M) reports on the "irony" that Sen. Hillary Clinton, "the ultimate Democratic Party insider, is struggling in Texas, in large part because the political system is stacked against her." Opinion polls "show her rival, Illinois Sen. Barack Obama, inching up to Sen. Clinton or already passing her in Texas. But it is the complicated delegate nominating system -- the Texas two-step -- more than popular turnout that could stymie a Clinton victory Tuesday and perhaps cost the New York senator the nomination." Of the "2,025 delegates either candidate needs to win the nomination, Texas has 228. The primary, where the candidates are thought to be in a dead heat, will award 126 of those seats. Minutes after the polls close, Texas Democrats then will convene caucuses that will seat an additional 67 delegates, and here Sen. Obama's superior field operation is likely to work to his advantage." The "allegiances of the 35 superdelegates, who aren't bound by the results of the primary or the caucuses, are increasingly uncertain."

Texas Hispanic Voters Seen As Still In Play. The Politico (2/27, Martinez) reports that despite perceptions that Hispanic voters in Texas are strongly supporting Clinton, "telling signs" suggest that they are largely "up for grabs. Some of these signs are more obvious than others, but Barack Obama is gaining traction among Hispanics and focusing resources in San Antonio and westward to the border with Mexico, areas that have been considered Clinton strongholds. The question is whether that will be enough to overcome 35 years of goodwill between Clinton and the Texas Hispanic community - and a deep sense of loyalty that dates back to her work on George McGovern's 1972 presidential campaign." The Politico suggests that Clinton's lead among Hispanics in a CNN/Opinion Research poll released Monday is offset by Obama's strong showing among African Americans.

Black Voters Could Give Obama Edge In Texas. The Houston Chronicle (2/27, Casimir, 524K) reports, "Hispanic voters may be a swing factor in next week's Democratic presidential primary, but an energized black electorate could decide this cliffhanger race. In state after state, exit polls show the Obama wave has wiped out Clinton from getting even close to the black electorate: 87 percent of the black vote in Georgia, for example."

CLINTON, OBAMA BOTH SAID TO HAVE GIVEN MIXED SIGNALS ON NAFTA. The AP (2/27, Woodward) runs a "Fact Check" feature on Sens. Hillary Clinton and Barack Obama's expressed positions on NAFTA, suggesting that both "are paying a price" for equivocating on the issue, leaving them vulnerable to criticism. "The root of their ambivalence is their shared belief in 'free and fair trade,' which, on the surface, almost anyone can subscribe to," but the AP continues to argue that "free" trade and "fair" trade are somewhat incompatible. The piece continues to note that Obama "has been consistently ambivalent" on NAFTA, despite having said, "I don't think NAFTA has been good for Americans, and I never have." Moreover, "Obama is correct that Clinton has praised NAFTA in various ways, but he leaves out the qualifications she's expressed along the way." Meanwhile, Clinton's "implication that NAFTA was simply a spillover from the first President Bush and passively made law under President Clinton ignores the fierce lobbying Bill Clinton engaged in to get the deal ratified by Congress. Hillary Clinton helped him in that effort." This article was published by some 50 papers and websites, including the New York Times, the Washington Examiner, the El Paso Times, and the Houston Chronicle.

CLINTON SUPERDELEGATES REJECTING CALLS TO DEFECT. The Hill (2/27, Bolton) reports House Democrats "supporting Sen. Hillary Rodham Clinton (N.Y.) are rejecting Speaker Nancy Pelosi's (Calif.) plea that lawmakers not overrule voters should they be in a position to decide who will be the Democratic presidential nominee." Many Clinton backers "representing districts that voted for Sen. Barack Obama (D-Ill.) say they are not likely to change their mind should the contest come down to the superdelegates - the 796 Democratic lawmakers, governors and officials who may determine the nominee." Those lawmakers "say they should be able to vote however they want, even if it means giving the nod to the candidate who wins fewer delegates from more than 50 election contests conducted prior to the nominating convention. One member said the only way he wouldn't vote for Clinton is if he died." Such "devotion worries some party officials who say record turnout and excitement over Democratic candidates could fizzle if voters feel their voices do not count."

BILL CLINTON TAKES LOWER PROFILE ROLE IN WIFE'S CAMPAIGN. The New York Times (2/27,

This version of Total Mail Converter is not registered.

Broder, 1.18M) reports Bill Clinton "is dutifully traveling from state to state and small town to small town on behalf of his wife's presidential candidacy. But the growling and snapping Bill Clinton the nation saw before the New Hampshire and South Carolina primaries has been muzzled and leashed. He is being kept as far from the news media as possible to prevent any more of the red-faced, finger-wagging tirades and freelance political commentary that polls say cost Hillary Rodham Clinton a lot of support, particularly among black voters." Audiences in "places like Lancaster, a working-class town of 33,000 about 30 miles southeast of Columbus, are seeing" a "subdued and substantive former president going on at length about Iraq, health care, education, job creation and what he portrays as the multiple sins of the Bush administration. What he lacks in passion he makes up for in sheer volume of words."

OBAMA DOWNPLAYS DUST-UP OVER PHOTO. The New York Daily News (2/26, Saul, 729K) reported on its website that Sen. Barack Obama "dismissed the brouhaha over a photo of him in African garb as a minor dust-up, a day after his campaign manager accused Hillary Clinton's team of leaking the photo in 'the most shameful, offensive fear-mongering' tactic of the 2008 presidential race. ... Asked" at a press conference in Ohio "if he agreed with campaign manager David Plouffe's stinging rebuke of Team Clinton, Obama replied, 'I think that at this stage in the campaign there are going to be dust-ups particularly at the staff level.' 'Certainly, I don't think that that photograph was circulated to enhance my candidacy. I think that's fair to say,' Obama said. 'Do I think that it is reflective of Sen. Clinton's approach to the campaign? Probably not.' 'And, so, you know, at this point, you know, my interest is just moving forward and talking about the issues that are going to be helpful to the people of Ohio,' he concluded."

MCCAIN LEADS BOTH OBAMA AND CLINTON IN LATIMES/BLOOMBERG POLL. The Los Angeles Times (2/27, Wallsten, 881K) reports Sen. John McCain "presents a stiff challenge to either of his potential Democratic opponents in the general election," according to a new Los Angeles Times/Bloomberg poll. McCain leads Sen. Hillary Clinton 46% to 40%; and Sen. Barack Obama 44% to 42%. McCain "also scored higher marks than Clinton or Obama for experience and strength. On the issue of 'honesty and integrity,' he beat Clinton and was tied by Obama. McCain is viewed favorably by 61% of all registered voters, including a plurality of Democrats." The Times also goes on to report that the poll "showed McCain's advantages extend even to some domestic issues. On the economy, a subject that McCain has joked about his own lack of expertise, voters picked him over...Obama as best able to lead by an 8-point margin -- 42% to 34%."

DODD ENDORSES OBAMA. The AP (2/27, Espo) reports Sen. Christopher Dodd "endorsed one-time presidential rival Barack Obama on Tuesday and said it is time for Democrats to join forces to defeat the Republicans in the fall campaign." Dodd "denied he was nudging Sen. Hillary Rodham Clinton to end her candidacy," but he said, "I don't want a campaign that is divisive here, and there's a danger in that." The AP adds the "two men appeared together at a news conference. Dodd is the first of the Democratic campaign dropouts to endorse another candidate."

ABC World News (2/26, story 3, 2:25, Gibson, 8.78M) reported, "Dodd said it's time to bring the party together, though he did not call for Hillary Clinton to drop out of the race." The Hill (2/27, Youngman) reports Dodd's endorsement, "along with his announcement that he plans to campaign for Obama in the key battleground state, delivered another blow to Sen. Hillary Rodham Clinton (D-N.Y.), who needs to win Ohio to salvage her struggling campaign." The CBS Evening News (2/26, story 2, 2:10, Axelrod, 7.66M) reported, "A five-term senator and former party chairman, Dodd warned that the campaign's nasty turn in the last few days must stop."

NBC Nightly News (2/26, lead story, 3:20, Mitchell, 9.87M) reported, "Obama started the day with an added advantage, an endorsement from a former rival." Sen. Christopher Dodd: "A moment of unity in our country a time when we need to come together as a Democratic Party." Mitchell: "In an interview with NBC News, Senator Dodd implicitly warned Clinton against attack politics." Dodd: "They need to make sure they don't engage in this kind of activity if you do you hurt yourselves, you hurt this party and your hurt our chances. The American people are sick of it. They're absolutely sick of it."

OBAMA SPEECH AT CHURCH'S NATIONAL MEETING DRAWS IRS SCRUTINY. The AP (2/27, Zoll) reports the IRS is "investigating the United Church of Christ over a speech Sen. Barack Obama gave at its national meeting last year after he became a candidate for president, the denomination said Tuesday." Obama "belongs to the 1.2 million-member Protestant group through his Chicago congregation. In a letter the denomination received Monday, the IRS said 'reasonable belief exists' that the circumstances surrounding the speech violated restrictions on political activity for tax-exempt organizations. The denomination has denied any wrongdoing."

This version of Total Mail Converter is not registered.

The Wall Street Journal (2/27, Sataline, 2.06M) reports a lawyer for the church "denied that the denomination, or Sen. Obama, who is a UCC member, engaged in any political activity when he and others spoke before an audience of 10,000 at the church's 50th anniversary celebration in Hartford, Conn."

Copyright 2008 by the Bulletin News Network, Inc. Reproduction without permission prohibited. Editorial content is drawn from thousands of newspapers, national magazines, national and local television programs, and radio broadcasts. The Hillary For President News Briefing is published five days a week by BulletinNews, which creates custom news briefings for government and corporate leaders. We can be found on the Web at BulletinNews.com, Clinton-Editors@BulletinNews.com , or called at (703) 749-0040.

This version of Total Mail Converter is not registered.

From:	"Peter Ogden" <pogden@americanprogress.org>
To:	john.podesta@gmail.com
Date:	7/21/2008 9:48:18 AM
Subject:	FW: Clips: July 21, 2008

Hi John – Clips are below. There are no phone messages. Nice picture of you and Cindy McCain on the blog – next time Huckabee? --Pete

From: John Neurohr
Sent: Monday, July 21, 2008 12:20 PM
To: Clips
Subject: Clips: July 21, 2008

Center for American Progress

Date	Headline	Text	Outlet	Contact
Campus Progress
07/20/2008	Campus Progress awards local student	Text	Napa Valley Register
CP award to student Chrissy Elles
07/20/2008	Report College Students Graduating With Less Credit Card Debt	Text	Diverse: Issues In Higher Education
Erica Williams on student credit card debt
Center for American Progress
07/18/2008	Biden criticized Obama on Afghanistan	Text	Baltimore Sun - Online
photo of Biden at CAP event May 20. 2008
07/21/2008	Common good gets boost from Catholic gathering	Text	National Catholic Reporter Online
John Podesta mentioned as speaker at Convention for the Common Good
07/19/2008	Some Court Watchers Envision 'True Liberal'	Text	Washington Post - Online	Robert Barnes and Kevin Merida
John Podesta on balancing of the court
Center for American Progress Action Fund
07/18/2008	Progressives fire back at insurers	Text	Politico, The CAPAF as supporter of Health Care for America Now
Domestic
07/18/2008	McCain's Health Proposals Under the Microscope, Part II	Text	CJR Daily - Columbia Journalism Review
CAPAF cited as source on healthcare
07/21/2008	The Associated Press	Text	Associated Press (AP)
"From Status Quo to Breaking the Mold" event mention
07/21/2008	The Expanding Costs of Health Care	Text	kaisernetwork.org
"Expanding Costs of Healthcare" event coverage
07/21/2008	Toledo Public Schools academy principal to speak at conference Panel to discuss extended learning t	Text	Calibre MacroWorld

This version of Total Mail Converter is not registered.

Cynthia Brown on event, "From Status Quo to Breaking the Mold"

07/21/2008	Toledo Public Schools academy principal to speak at conference Panel to discuss extended learning t	Text	Toledo Blade	Gilbert, Meghan

Cynthia Brown on event, "From Status Quo to Breaking the Mold"

Economics

07/20/2008	401(k) loan policies can't be too stringent	Text	Daily Herald, The	Michelle Singletary

CAP report: 'Robbing Tomorrow to Pay for Today: Economically Squeezed Families are Turning to Their 401(k)s to Make Ends Meet.'

07/20/2008	a Retirement fund you can't dip into? good on paper, not in practice in port today	Text	Virginian-Pilot

CAP report: 'Robbing Tomorrow to Pay for Today: Economically Squeezed Families are Turning to Their 401(k)s to Make Ends Meet.'

07/20/2008	Borrowing in a 401(k) should not be so easy	Text	Columbus Dispatch - Online	By Michelle Singletary

CAP report: 'Robbing Tomorrow to Pay for Today: Economically Squeezed Families are Turning to Their 401(k)s to Make Ends Meet.'

07/19/2008	Breaking retirement piggy bank in tight times	Text	Daily Herald

CAP report: 'Robbing Tomorrow to Pay for Today: Economically Squeezed Families are Turning to Their 401(k)s to Make Ends Meet.'

07/20/2008	Color of Money Raiding the Retirement Stash	Text	Washington Post - Online	Singletary, Michelle

CAP report: 'Robbing Tomorrow to Pay for Today: Economically Squeezed Families are Turning to Their 401(k)s to Make Ends Meet.'

07/20/2008	Dipping into your retirement savings too early can be a costly mistake	Text	Boston Globe - Online

CAP report: 'Robbing Tomorrow to Pay for Today: Economically Squeezed Families are Turning to Their 401(k)s to Make Ends Meet.'

07/19/2008	Don't leverage future for today	Text	Modesto Bee, The

CAP report: 'Robbing Tomorrow to Pay for Today: Economically Squeezed Families are Turning to Their 401(k)s to Make Ends Meet.'

07/18/2008	Don't raid your retirement fund for debt relief	Text	Olympian, The

CAP report: 'Robbing Tomorrow to Pay for Today: Economically Squeezed Families are Turning to Their 401(k)s to Make Ends Meet.'

07/19/2008	Don't tap 401(k) funds early	Text	Sun News, The	Posted on Sat, Jul. 19, 2008

CAP report: 'Robbing Tomorrow to Pay for Today: Economically Squeezed Families are Turning to Their 401(k)s to Make Ends Meet.'

07/20/2008	Employees raid 401(k)s more often	Text	Fresno Bee - Online

CAP report: 'Robbing Tomorrow to Pay for Today: Economically Squeezed Families are Turning to Their 401(k)s to Make Ends Meet.'

07/18/2008	GM's Volt Becomes Centerpiece in Presidential Debate on Energy	Text	Bloomberg News

Bracken Hendricks on Obama's plan for reinvestment in a manufacturing economy

07/21/2008	Many borrow against 401(k)s, often at a steep cost	Text	Houston Chronicle - Online	CANDICE CHOI

Christian Weller on report, "Robbing Tomorrow to Pay for Today"

07/19/2008	Michelle Singletary Limits on 401(k) raiding needed	Text	Omaha World-Herald - Online	MICHELLE SINGLETARY

Christian Weller on report, "Robbing Tomorrow to Pay for Today"

07/20/2008	Michelle Singletary | The Color of Money 401(k)s Look, But Don't Touch	Text	kitsapsun.com

Christian Weller on report, "Robbing Tomorrow to Pay for Today"

07/19/2008	More people raiding 401(k)s for extra cash	Text	Honolulu Advertiser - Online	Michelle Singletary

Christian Weller on report, "Robbing Tomorrow to Pay for Today"

07/19/2008	Of Mutual Interest Tapping retirement accounts too early can prove costly later	Text	Seattle Post-Intelligencer - Online

"Robbing Tomorrow to Pay for Today" report coverage

This version of Total Mail Converter is not registered.

07/20/2008	RUN ON THE BANK	Text	New York Post - Online	GREGORY BRESIGER
Christian Weller on report, "Robbing Tomorrow to Pay for Today"
07/21/2008	Save 10 Miles Per Gallon!!	Text	KFDA-TV
CAP on how much Americans spend on gasoline
07/20/2008	Stealing From Retirement	Text	Michigan Public Radio
"Robbing Tomorrow to Pay for Today" report coverage
07/20/2008	Study paints bleak retirement picture	Text	Post-Star, The	Diane Stafford
Christian Weller on report, "Robbing Tomorrow to Pay for Today"
07/19/2008	Taking from tomorrow to pay for today	Text	Buffalo News
Christian Weller on report, "Robbing Tomorrow to Pay for Today"
07/19/2008	Tapping into retirement account can be costly	Text	Providence Journal - Online	TIM PARADIS
"Robbing Tomorrow to Pay for Today" report coverage
07/21/2008	Tapping retirement accounts dangerous	Text	Worcester Telegram & Gazette
"Robbing Tomorrow to Pay for Today" report coverage
07/20/2008	Tapping retirement funds early can cost you more later	Text	Mail Tribune	TIM PARADIS
"Robbing Tomorrow to Pay for Today" report coverage
07/20/2008	Tapping retirement money too early can be costly	Text	Journal News - Online	Tim Paradis
"Robbing Tomorrow to Pay for Today" report coverage
07/20/2008	Tapping retirement money too early can be costly	Text	nwitimes.com	TIM PARADISAP Business Writer
"Robbing Tomorrow to Pay for Today" report coverage
07/19/2008	The Color of Money Raiding the Retirement Stash	Text	Washington Post - Online	Singletary, Michelle
Christian Weller on report, "Robbing Tomorrow to Pay for Today"
07/20/2008	Workers break retirement piggy bank in tight times	Text	FindLaw: for Corporate Counsel
Christian Weller on report, "Robbing Tomorrow to Pay for Today"
07/21/2008	Workers dipping into 401(k)	Text	Florida Today
Christian Weller on report, "Robbing Tomorrow to Pay for Today"

Energy

07/18/2008	Environmental Groups React To Various Energy Proposals	Text	NASDAQ
Dan Weiss on energy/economic growth
07/18/2008	Environmental Groups React To Various Energy Proposals	Text	Quote.com
Dan Weiss on energy/economic growth
07/18/2008	Environmental Groups React To Various Energy Proposals	Text	RTTNews.com
Dan Weiss on energy/economic growth
07/18/2008	Environmental Groups React To Various Energy Proposals	Text	TradingMarkets.com
Dan Weiss on energy/economic growth
07/19/2008	Pickens, Democrats agree in calling for alternative fuels	Text	Calibre MacroWorld

This version of Total Mail Converter is not registered.

Dan Weiss on the profitability of green energy, and CAPAF mentioned as sponsor of energy summit

07/19/2008	Pickens, Democrats agree in calling for alternative fuels	Text	Dallas Morning News	Michaels, Dave

Dan Weiss on the profitability of green energy, and CAPAF mentioned as sponsor of energy summit

07/19/2008	Pickens, Democrats agree in calling for alternative fuels	Text	Denton Record-Chronicle	DAVE MICHAELS

Dan Weiss on the profitability of green energy, and CAPAF mentioned as sponsor of energy summit

07/19/2008	Pickens, Democrats agree in calling for alternative fuels	Text	Quick	DAVE MICHAELS

Dan Weiss on the profitability of green energy, and CAPAF mentioned as sponsor of energy summit

07/19/2008	Pickens, Democrats agree in calling for alternative fuels	Text	WFAA-TV	DAVE MICHAELS

Dan Weiss on the profitability of green energy, and CAPAF mentioned as sponsor of energy summit

ENOUGH

07/19/2008	Darfur justice at last?	Text	Sunday Herald

John Prendergast on holding Sudan accountable

07/19/2008	ICC justice is useless If it destroys peace	Text	Sudan Tribune	James Okuk

John Prendergast on ICC indictments

07/20/2008	Indictment of Sudan leader ignites violence	Text	Houston Chronicle - Online	COLUM LYNCH

John Prendergast on indictment of al-Bashir

07/20/2008	Indictment of Sudanese Leader Seen as Threat to Peacekeepers	Text	Washington Post - Online	Lynch, Colum

John Prendergast on indictment of al-Bashir

07/20/2008	Milosevic, Taylor cases prove Bashir arrest will help Sudan	Text	Daily Nation	ZACHARY OCHIENG

John Prendergast on "The Merits of Justice" report

07/20/2008	Worsening situation in Somalia pushes aid costs to $641 mln	Text	Sudan Tribune	Daniel Van Oudenaren

ENOUGH on US support of transitional Somalia government

Fellows

07/21/2008	'09 budget stalemate puts local projects in jeopardy	Text	Journal News - Online	Brian Tumulty â?¢ Washington Bureau â?¢ July 21

Scott Lilly on federal budgeting

07/20/2008	Federal funding for local projects in jeopardy	Text	Democrat and Chronicle

Scott Lilly on federal budgeting

07/20/2008	Should You Look Into Your Genes?	Text	Washington Post - Online	Rick Weiss

Rick Weiss Op-Ed on genetic testing

07/20/2008	Stalemate puts EC project in jeopardy	Text	Star-Gazette	Brian Tumulty

Scott Lilly on lack of action taken on spending bills

National Security

07/20/2008	Contrasting goals in Iraq	Text	Boston Globe - South Bureau, The

Larry Korb's "Contrasting goals in Iraq" as op-ed

07/21/2008	Prospect of closing Guantanamo prison camp complicated by what to do with detainees	Text	Calibre MacroWorld

Ken Gude on closing Guantanamo

07/18/2008	Report: Security comes from increased aid	Text	Middle East Times

This version of Total Mail Converter is not registered.

Reuben Brigety in report, "Humanity as a Weapon of War"

07/19/2008	The Political Risks of Obama's Iraq Strategy	Text	CQ Politics

Report, "Strategic Redeployment 2.0," cited as a mirror to Obama's plan

07/19/2008	US missile defence shield to drag Poland into conflicts - leftist leader	Text	BBC International Reports (Europe)

Joseph Cirincione on the possibility of an attack against Iran Think Progress

07/19/2008	Al Gore Surprise Guest At Netroots Nation	Text	AlterNet

'ThinkProgress scooped Pelosi on Gore's surprise appearance' at the Netroots Nation conference

07/18/2008	Bloggers bring blue to a red state	Text	News 8 Austin

Ben Armbruster on Think Progress

07/18/2008	Kaiser Daily Health Policy Report Feature Highlights Recent Blog ...	Text	kaisernetwork.org

Igor Volsky on Bush cuts to Medicare Advantage

07/21/2008	O'Reilly: "Birth control is not a medical condition, it is a choice"	Text	Media Matters for America

Think Progress on O'Reilly's position on insurance coverage of birth control

07/19/2008	Pelosi The end could be in sight	Text	Politico, The	Ryan Grim

Amanda Terkel as live-blogger at Gore event in Austin

07/19/2008	Pelosi Calls For High-level Meeting With Iraqis	Text	CBS News

Amanda Terkel as live-blogger at Gore event in Austin

Return to Top

Campus Progress awards local student

University of California, Santa Barbara student Chrissy Elles of Napa has been named the recipient of the Campus Progress award for Best Student Organizing ...

Return to Top

Report College Students Graduating With Less Credit Card Debt

College students who graduate owing thousands on their credit cards are becoming a thing of the past, according to a new report by Student Monitor, and members of the banking community are looking to cash in on this increasingly debt-less demographic.

Despite a sluggish economy precipitated by lenders who gave home loans to people who couldn't afford them, college students remain a prime target for credit card companies. Experts say college campuses are saturated with credit card offers to lure potential young cardholders.

A 2008 survey by the U.S. Public Interest Research Group found that 80 percent of students said they received direct mail from card companies.

Fourteen states have passed laws that prohibit or restrict on-campus marketing by card issuers. Still many colleges allow credit card solicitors to bombard campuses.

Recently, a subcommittee of the U.S. House Financial Services Committee held a hearing on the marketing tactics companies use to pitch credit cards to college students. In February, Rep. Carolyn Maloney, D-N.Y., chairwoman of the subcommittee, proposed legislation to regulate credit card practices that aid college students in amassing uncontrollable amounts of debt.

Subcommittee Chairwoman Maloney said in a written statement, "Students rely on credit cards to pay for everything from books to tuition. Unfair and deceptive credit card practices hit them especially hard and cause them to rack up late fees, high balances, and delinquencies. We can and should take steps to ensure that card companies aren't unfairly targeting this vulnerable population. Responsible students deserve a fair shake - they shouldn't have to graduate under a mountain of credit card debt." According to a 2004 study by Nellie Mae, 76 percent of undergraduates have credit cards and average undergraduate students have at least $2,200 in credit card debt. That figure jumps to $5,800 for graduate students. Moreover, student credit cards typically have high annual percentage rates, often at higher rates than the rest of the population given their lack of borrowing experience. "Through a series of public forums around the country, we brought together students and experts to discuss the growing problem of credit card debt on college campuses. At each event we heard the same: Banks and lenders are profiting off of young people's financial inexperience, partnerships and relationships with universities and strategic and deliberate targeting," said Erica L. Williams, Policy and Advocacy Manager for Campus Action Progress, part of Center For American Progress. "Companies use a variety of aggressive techniques, from buying lists from schools and entering into exclusive marketing arrangements with schools to marketing directly to students through the mail, over the phone, on bulletin boards and through aggressive on-campus and near-campus tabling, Williams added.

This version of Total Mail Converter is not registered.

One-fourth of the students surveyed in US PIRG's 2008 Campus Credit Card Trap report said that they have paid a late fee, and 15 percent have paid an "over the limit" fee. Credit card companies will often impose a "penalty rate" of 30 percent or more after just one or two late payments.

Opposing preventative legislation, the urged Congress to think carefully about basing policy decisions on anecdotes of debt-stricken students when it comes to how credit cards are used by and marketed to college students.

Testifying before the House Financial Services Committee, ABA Senior Vice President Kenneth J. Clayton noted that despite conventional wisdom, the vast majority of students manage their credit obligations well."Students handle credit as well as, and in some cases better than, the general adult population," said Clayton. "Banks have a vested interest in ensuring that the student's experience is a positive one, as the bank wants to build a productive, lifelong customer relationship that benefits both parties," he said. The report, authored by Student Monitor, a market research firm, reveals that credit card ownership and debt among college students is declining. Their average credit card balance for 35 percent of students is only $452 down $19 percent from $559 last year.

Beyond that, Student Monitor found that the percentage of students with credit cards declined from 56 percent in 1997 to 35 percent in 2008. At the same time, the percent of students with debit cards after rising from 30 percent to about 70 percent in 2006 dropped to about 60 percent this year.

Citing Student Monitor's report, Clayton stated that 65 percent of college students with credit cards pay their bills in full each month, a percentage that is higher than the general adult population, he said. "Today's student population is very diverse," he said. "Restricting access to this form of credit would result in great financial hardship for most college students and their families."Clayton also reminded the committee that credit cards are a valuable tool for students, serving as an entry point into the world of credit, as a means for making everyday purchases and as a vital resource in emergency situations.

With regard to marketing of credit cards to college students, Clayton maintained that most students get credit cards by visiting a bank branch to begin a broader account relationship. Referring to the Student Monitor survey, he said that only 2 percent of students obtained their cards by filling out an application at a display on campus.

As of yet, no legislation has been passed.

Click here to post and read comments

Return to Top

Biden criticized Obama on Afghanistan

6:45 AM Biden waits for an introduction before giving a speech at the Center for American Progress on May 20 in Washington. (Photo by Mark Wilson/) by Katie Fretland

As Sen. Barack Obama prepares for a trip to the Middle East, Republicans have drawn attention this week to contradictions in what one of his potential running mates said about the presumptive Democratic nominee's stance on Afghanistan.

Before Sen. Joe Biden became an oft-mentioned candidate for a spot on the Obama ticket, he campaigned against him for the Democratic nomination for president. During that time, the Delaware Democrat said Obama had a 'Johnny come lately' position on Afghanistan by asking for more brigades last summer.

But this week, Biden wrote in a letter to Sen. Jim DeMint (R-S.C.) that Obama has 'displayed great leadership on this issue,' referring to Afghanistan. Biden wrote in response a request by DeMint for Obama to have a Foreign Relations Committee's Subcommittee on European Affairs meeting following his trip to Afghanistan.

Republicans have criticized Obama for failing to hold any hearings on NATO's mission in Afghanistan during the time Obama has chaired the committee.

Biden's contradiction caused the Republican National Committee to issue this statement Thursday: 'Thank you, Sen. Biden, for proving the point that Barack Obama has no credibility on Afghanistan.' Associated Press writer Nedra Pickler provides a fact check of Obama on Afghanistan with this report:

This version of Total Mail Converter is not registered.

THE FACTS:

In a February debate, Obama acknowledged he hadn't had any oversight hearings because he only became chairman as he launched his presidential bid. He's not been around Capitol Hill much since then -- nor has McCain.

The subcommittee's jurisdiction includes 'all matters, policies and problems concerning the continent of Europe, including the European member states of the North Atlantic Treaty Organization.' Obama may have missed a chance to build his foreign policy credentials by making use of his leadership position. Biden could tell him about that -- he was the leading Democrat on the Europe subcommittee for nearly 20 years and used the position to become one of the Senate's leading foreign policy experts.

But some observers of the committee have said major issues like a war in Afghanistan are typically examined by the full committee -- as Biden argued was more appropriate in his letter to DeMint.

But the RNC pointed out to reporters Thursday that Obama only attended one of the three full committee hearings on Afghanistan that Biden mentioned in his letter. And in Biden's 'Johnny-come-late' statement, he criticized Obama for asking only one question unrelated to Afghanistan at that March 8, 2007 hearing.

But the Democrats aren't the only ones with a mixed-message messenger on the issue. DeMint skipped the one hearing that Obama chaired on the NATO ambassador's nomination, and McCain also has missed multiple Armed Services Committee hearings on the Iraq and Afghanistan wars while campaigning for president.

Return to Top

Common good gets boost from Catholic gathering

Theologian M. Shawn Copeland opened the Convention for the Common Good, a project of Catholics in Alliance for the Common Good.Philadelphia

The concept of the common good, an idea that winds through time from Plato to Aquinas, to the U.S. Founding Fathers and, on the way, through a number of popes, got a boost in Philadelphia July 11-13 when a crowd of more than 800, mostly Catholics, showed up to affirm a political platform based on the idea.

The Convention for the Common Good was a project of Catholics in Alliance for the Common Good, a group that describes itself as a nonpartisan, nonprofit organization formed to promote awareness of Catholic social teaching, and Network, a national Catholic social justice organization, and co-hosted by some 16 other Catholic groups, religious orders and institutions.

"What we're trying to do is expand the debate about what faith can be in the political arena," said John Gehring, senior writer for Catholics in Alliance. "The religious right has had a monopoly on the debate for too long. We're seeing a change now not just in the Catholic world but among evangelicals."

The alliance has worked to expand the notion of pro-life, said Gehring, so that in addition to "protecting innocent life in the womb," it is also about "caring for the poor, about the silent genocide of poverty" and about opposing the death penalty and war.

Through the course of the weekend, participants discussed five areas of a platform that was affirmed on the final day of the gathering and that will be advanced to the two major parties for consideration.

(A more expansive story on the convention and the development of Catholic political groups during the past four years will appear in the Aug 8 edition of NCR.)

Sr. Simone Campbell, national coordinator of the Catholic social justice lobby NETWORK, and Alexia Kelley, principal founder of Catholics in AllianceIn an opening speech to the convention, theologian M. Shawn Copeland of Boston College appeared to pull the conversation from the theoretical to the here and now. The common good, she said, "is human achievement: It is us right here, right now making ourselves who we are and who we might become, first and foremost, as authentic human persons, as people of faith, as citizens of the United States."

Those attending the convention signed cards the final day pledging to take action in a variety of ways to spread the word. A Web site, votethecommongood.com, urges interested parties to send the platform and a link to the Catholic Alliance's main Web site to friends in an "8 in 08" program. The site also contains online training in dealing with the media, writing letters to the editor and a page of news updates.

The convention, at the Sheraton City Center in Philadelphia, opened with the launch of the book, A Nation for All: How the Catholic Vision of the Common Good Can Save America from the Politics of Division.

This version of Total Mail Converter is not registered.

Written by Alexia Kelley, principal founder of Catholics in Alliance, and Chris Korzen, co-founder and executive director of Catholics United, the book is a compendium of Catholic social thought, its history and development, and how it applies to a range of social and political issues that were often overshadowed in the recent past by the culture wars.

Kelley previously worked at the Catholic Campaign for Human Development; Korzen, who holds a master's in theology from Weston Jesuit School of Theology in Cambridge, Mass., directed the Catholic Voting Project in 2004 and 2005.
Washington Post columnist E.J. Dionne moderated panel discussion at the convention.
If the intent of the Philadelphia gathering was nonpartisan, the crowd wasn't. A largely progressive Catholic audience spent the day listening to speakers addressing the various categories of the platform and raising questions from each area for speakers at the end of the day.

The speakers, John Podesta and former U.S. Rep. Charles Dougherty, evidenced the greatest contrast during a panel discussion moderated by Washington Post columnist E.J. Dionne. Podesta, president and chief executive officer of American Progress, was chief of staff to former President Bill Clinton for more than three years. Dougherty, a Republican, served two terms in Congress in the late 1970s and early '80s.

Return to Top

Some Court Watchers Envision 'True Liberal'

Robert Barnes and Kevin Merida
Washington Post - Online

It could be seen as the sincerest form of flattery: Ask some activists on the left the kind of Supreme Court justice they would like to see a President Obama appoint, and the name you hear most is the same justice they most often denounce.

They want their own Antonin Scalia. Or rather, an anti-Scalia, an individual who can easily articulate a liberal interpretation of the Constitution, offer a quick sound bite and be prepared to mix it up with conservative activists beyond the marble and red velvet of the Supreme Court.

Some have even mentioned Sen. Hillary Rodham Clinton for the role, although there is no evidence it would interest her or that Obama would consider his former rival for the Democratic presidential nomination for the court. But as the Supreme Court takes its traditional spot in the background of the presidential campaign, there is a longing on the left for a justice who would energize not only the court's liberal wing, but also the debate over interpreting the Constitution. 'Someone with vision,' said Doug Kendall, who recently helped found a new liberal think tank called the Constitutional Accountability Center. 'Someone who looks hard at the text and history of the Constitution, as Justice Scalia does, and articulates a very clear idea of how that text points to liberal and progressive outcomes.' Liberal legal activists have consistently lagged behind conservatives in convincing their partisans that the court should be a voting issue. The court remains ideologically split, but any openings presented to the next president are almost sure to come from within the court's liberal wing. The two oldest members of the court are Justices John Paul Stevens, 88, and Ruth Bader Ginsburg, 75.

If John McCain were elected, the appointment of a conservative justice could immediately reshape the court. The senator from Arizona might be forced to temper his choice to accommodate confirmation by a solidly Democratic Senate, but his nominee would undoubtedly be far to the right of either Stevens or Ginsburg, potentially solidifying a five-member conservative majority. President Bush's appointments to court, Chief Justice John G. Roberts Jr. and Justice Samuel A. Alito Jr., are both relatively young and are expected to be fixtures for decades.

If Obama had the opportunity to make an appointment, it would be only the fourth nomination from a Democratic president in more than 40 years. And for activists on the left, it could signal the opportunity to create a new dynamic for the court. 'It is a court with no true liberal on it, the most conservative court in 75 years,' said Geoffrey Stone, a law professor at the University of Chicago, where Obama once taught constitutional law. 'What we call liberals on this court are moderates, or moderate liberals, if you want to get refined about it.' Stone notes, as he said Stevens has, that every justice on the current court with the exception of Ginsburg is more conservative than the justice he replaced -- a natural evolution given that seven of the nine were appointed by Republican presidents.

Harvard law professor Lani Guinier hopes to get scholars, as well as judges, to rethink the role of a Supreme Court justice, a role she describes as 'the justice as a teacher in a national seminar, an educator.' 'They're not just making laws and delivering those tablets from Mount Olympus,' Guinier said. 'The project of being a Supreme Court justice is also a project of being an important citizen in a democracy.' While Guinier said she would not necessarily argue that the next president should nominate a politician, she said it was important to 'make the court more democratically accountable.' 'I think Hillary Clinton would bring to the court a range of experiences that the court doesn't presently have access to,' Guinier said, noting that Clinton has run for two political offices and traveled all over the country engaging ordinary people in conversations 'about real challenges that affect their lives.' James Andrew Miller, an assistant to former Senate majority leader Howard H. Baker Jr., wrote an op-ed in The Washington Post in May suggesting Clinton for the court, and said he was 'just blown away' by the response. Massachusetts Gov. Deval Patrick (D), a former Justice Department official and prominent Obama friend, has also been mentioned as a potential court appointee, and such a move would not be unprecedented. There is a substantial list of justices who once held political office. Most famously, President Dwight D. Eisenhower made good on his promise of an appointment to his onetime rival, California governor Earl Warren.

This version of Total Mail Converter is not registered.

But the jobs could hardly be more different -- the somewhat solitary pursuits of a justice versus the glad-handing and collaborative responsibilities of a politician. But someone who has been tested by campaigns for public office might be more comfortable in the public arena, argued Dawn Johnsen, a former Clinton administration official who now teaches law at Indiana University, who said there 'is a desire to have justices talking to the American people beyond their opinions.' Cass R. Sunstein, an informal Obama adviser now at Harvard Law School, last year instigated the debate by lamenting the 'absence of anything like a heroic vision on the court's left' to counteract Scalia and Justice Clarence Thomas.

John Podesta, once President Bill Clinton's chief of staff and now president of the Center for American Progress, recently told the liberal American Constitution Society that the idea of 'balancing' the courts with judges on the extreme left was not a good idea. 'We don't need to play that same game,' he said -- a notion not particularly well-received by those in the audience.

Christopher L. Eisgruber, provost at Princeton University and author of a book about Supreme Court nominations titled 'The Next Justice,' said liberal activists seemed split between 'breaking the mold a little between liberals and conservatives' and putting 'somebody in the opposite corner in the boxing ring with Antonin Scalia.' Obama himself has been opaque and even contradictory about his criteria for a justice. He voted against both Roberts and Alito, and has said he sees Ginsburg and Justices Stephen G. Breyer and David H. Souter as the kinds of 'sensible' justices he would favor.

Yet, as the court's term ended last month, he praised the court's decision in support of an individual right to gun ownership that struck down the District of Columbia's handgun ban, a decision in which Roberts and Alito were in the majority and liberals dissented.

Likewise, he disagreed with the court's decision that the death penalty may not be applied to child rapists, where Ginsburg, Breyer and Souter were in the majority and the conservative justices were in dissent.

Obama has said that justices will be in agreement 95 percent of the time, and in the other cases he looks for a judge 'to bring in his or her own perspectives, his ethics, his or her moral bearings.' Republican critics have mocked that description for not including the word 'Constitution' and contrasted it with McCain's vow to appoint judges 'who have a proven record of strict interpretation of the Constitution of the United States.' Kendall winced at Obama's words. He said they make it sound as if one must look outside the law and the Constitution to get the results political progressives are looking for while they are provided for in guarantees of equal protection and due process. McCain's description will always be more palatable to the public, Kendall said.

Research editor Alice Crites and staff researcher Madonna Lebling contributed to this report.

Return to Top

Progressives fire back at insurers

A day after Politico reported the health insurance industry is launching a health care reform campaign next week, the progressive reformers are firing back.

Health Care for America Now announced Friday that it plans a news conference and a rally next week to counter the insurance industrys Campaign for an American Solution, which launches in Columbus, Ohio, on Tuesday with a roundtable discussion among uninsured locals.

Theyre pretending that the health industry represents the American public, and we need to make it really clear to them and the public that all they represent are their own profits, said Richard Kirsch, national campaign manager for Health Care Now.

The organization, which favors tighter insurance regulations, plans a conference call with reporters on Monday to highlight the state of Ohios health insurance industry. For example, Kirsch said, from 2000 to 2006, family health insurance premiums rose more than eight times faster than Ohioans pay.

Americans are paying more [and] getting less while the insurance companies and the CEOs are making out like bandits, he said.

On Tuesday, the group plans to rally about 300 supporters outside the Columbus YWCA, where Americas Health Insurance Plans will hold its roundtable.

Responding, AHIP spokesman Michael Tuffin shot back: Were not going to engage in attack dog politics, the failed politics of the past that got us into this mess. Were looking forward to having a constructive dialogue with the people of Columbus.

The insurance industrys Tuesday event kicks off a campaign of undisclosed cost that includes a nationwide listening tour, advertising and an intense recruitment effort aimed at signing up Americans who are satisfied with their private insurance coverage. And wherever AHIP goes, Health Care for America Now is sure to follow. They wont be able to go anyplace without us being there, Kirsch said.

This version of Total Mail Converter is not registered.

Health Care Nows tactics are similar to efforts progressive groups successfully used against President Bushs proposal to privatize Social Security, which included counter rallies at Bushs town hall meetings.

In the high-stakes world of national health care reform, Health Care Nows rapid-response to the insurance industrys campaign launch is a striking harbinger of the intensity of the coming debate.

Health Care Now launched earlier this month with big plans and a budget to match. The $40 million it plans to spend by years end will put 100 organizers in 45 states to hold town hall meetings, go door to door, staff phone banks and take action outside insurance offices. Already, the group has aired television spots in an extensive adverting campaign.

The groups July 8 launch, with 53 news conferences in 38 states and Washington, demonstrates its deep support among Americans, Kirsch said, while AHIPs single-city kickoff event illustrates an industry desperately trying to buy its advocates.

Health Care Now is largely funded by 14 organizational members including unions, MoveOn.org, Planned Parenthood and the Center for American Progress Action Fund.

Health Care Now is pushing for standardized, affordable universal coverage, with costs adjusted according to family income. To get there, the group is advocating regulating insurance companies to ban practices such as denying coverage based on pre-existing conditions and raising rates based on age, health or gender. The organization is also pushing to create a public health insurance plan.

Almost 15 years ago, Kirsch said, insurance companies argued that health care didnt need government intervention because the industry would fix its problems. Now, Americans cant trust insurance companies to fix the same mess they created, Kirsch said.

Right now, their business model is trying to avoid paying for care when people need it, he said.

The insurance industry disagrees.

Our companies provide benefits to more than 200 million people and have a very strong track record of being there when people need them, said Tuffin. We know from talking to Americans already that they want good quality, affordable, portable, private coverage and a strong public safety net, and thats the same thing we want. We dont want anyone falling thorough the cracks.'

Return to Top

McCain's Health Proposals Under the Microscope, Part II

McCains Health Proposals Under the Microscope, Part II

Whos making the medical decisions, anyway?

This is the second entry in a series examining John McCains health proposals and how they have been covered in the press.

The sound bite you hear most often from John McCain about his health care proposals is that he wants to put families in charge of medical decision making. In Straight Talk on Health System ReformA Call to Action, a document published on his Web site, McCain says the key to health care reform is to restore control to the patients themselves. At first glance, its hard to argue with that premise, and so the sound bite sounds good. It plays well in Peoria, as Richard Nixons operatives used to say. But whats under the hood here? If putting patients in charge is the cornerstone of McCains health initiatives, shouldnt the media have been evaluating his premise?

The truth is theyve been MIA on this one. Theres been virtually no examination of what McCain means by his lofty sound bite, and how that sound bite squares with reality. He has used it to imply that government bureaucrats should not be in charge of health care, forgetting that managed care organizations now make many decisions about what treatments people get and who gives them. Last April, when he announced his health care plan, stories like the one in USA Todays On Politics blog quoted him saying: My approach to transforming health care is to put families in charge. Since then, the topic has scarcely surfaced, giving more credence to McCains Great Escape from press scrutiny.

One story that did appear comes from the Cybercast News Service (CNSNews.com), an online news service whose parent organization is the Media Research Center, which specializes in media criticism with a right wing point of view. The Centers chairman, L. Brent Bozell, has long been active in conservative Republican politics. The news services Web site says that CNSNews.com is an effort to provide an alternative news source that would cover stories that are subject to the bias of omission and report on other news subject to bias by commission. Its mission is also to fairly present all legitimate sides of a story and debunk popular, albeit incorrect myths about cultural and policy issues.

This version of Total Mail Converter is not registered.

Of course, whats legitimate to the Center may not seem that way to another observer. But a recent news service story, headlined McCain: Health Care Choice for People, gave a pretty fair nuts-and-bolts description of the highlights of McCains proposal, and even included comments from a spokesperson from the liberal Center for American Progress Action Fund. The end of the story featured a familiar McRefrain: families should be in charge of their health care dollars and have more control of care. The kicker amplified the point, noting that McCain would use competition to improve the quality of health insurance and impart greater variety to better match peoples needs.

The storys last few paragraphs provided a perfect opportunity for CNSNews.com to make the connection between family decision-making practices and the consumer health information businessa mushrooming industry searching for keys to the kingdom of health care consumerism. The CNSNews.com story, like all the others that mentioned McCains emphasis on family decision-making, didnt make the link. Too bada very good story lies therein.

If health care competition is to work, shoppers need informationgood information that will help them pick an insurance policy, doctor, hospital, or whatever. Then, there must be an incentive for shoppers to act on this information, instead of just sticking with their default options. Finally, the theory must work in practiceprices go down and quality goes up because people choose the best options for them. But real-world data indicates that buying health care may not be the same as buying an iPod, and that the empty talk about putting families in charge of their health care decisions may be just thatempty talk.

A few weeks ago, amednews.com reported on a poll done late last year by the California Health Care Foundation, a health care philanthropic organization based in Oakland. The poll showed that, although 80 percent of adult Californians use the Internet to find health information, only 22 percent looked at sites that rated physiciansand only 2 percent changed doctors based on the information displayed on those sites. The numbers were similar for online ratings of hospitals and health plans: about 25 percent of those surveyed looked at ratings, with only 1 percent making a change.

The survey didnt try to explain why the numbers are so low. It may be that people are more comfortable making these decisions based on word-of-mouth recommendations; perhaps they are just plain confused by the number of sites and dont know whom to trust. The federal Agency for Health Care Research and Quality (AHRQ) found twelve rating schemes for physicians, twenty-six for medical groups, eighty-one for hospitals, and eighty-six for health plansnumbers daunting for even the savviest consumer. They raise the question whether such data can ever influence family decision making in health care.

A study I did a few years ago, also with the California Health Care Foundation, offers another cautionary tale about McCains focus on competition in health insurance. We rated Medicare HMOs in California and found that one health plan offered a terrific drug benefit. Later reports we did showed that the plan no longer provided its great drug coverage. What it now offered was the same mediocre benefit its competition was selling. Being wise consumers, seniors chose the plan with the best drug coverage, but too many people with high drug needs and costs blew the plans bottom line, so it simply reduced coverage. In insurance jargon, the health plan was selected against, and it adjusted its policies accordingly. Some enterprising journalists need to tell us how McCains call for competition in health insurance will deal with that.

CJR

If you enjoy this kind of press criticism please consider a subscription to our magazine, Columbia Journalism Reviewa deal via the Web site at $19.95.

To subscribe, to give CJR as a gift, to renew, or to check student and CJR in the Classroom rates, click here.

Post a comment

We ask our readers to express opinions in a manner respectful to the readers and writers of CJR. Criticism of ideas is strongly encouraged, but personal, ad hominem attack will result in deletion of posted comments and, after one repeat violation, banning of the individual user. CJR reserves the right to edit or delete, for reasons of content, comments submitted to CJR. We also ask users to please keep posts to the topic at hand; those wandering far afield or appearing to be spam may be deleted. Please read the complete comment policy and full legal disclaimer.

Name: Email Address:

URL: Remember personal info?

Comments: (you may use HTML tags for style)

eturn to Top

The Associated Press

AP WASHINGTON DAYBOOK, Monday, July 21

This version of Total Mail Converter is not registered.

GENERAL

ALL DAY

July 21 - 22. AIRPORTS COUNCIL CONVENTION _ Attendees to consider aviation issues such as completing FAA Reauthorization and addressing environmental issues, funding for the Airport Improvement Program, 100 percent employee screening, DHS Authorization, TSA and CBP staffing, funding for in-line installation of explosive detection equipment, and transition efforts underway at agencies such as DHS, TSA, and FAA.

Highlights:

12 p.m. Keynote Address by Kirk Shaffer, Associate Administrator for Airports Federal Aviation Administration

Location: Mandarin Oriental Hotel, 1330 Maryland Ave. SW.

Contacts: Scott Weaver (sweaver@aci-na.org)

July 21 - 24. WASHINGTON-ISRAEL SUMMIT _ Christians United for Israel's third annual Washington-Israel Summit.

Highlights:

10 a.m. - 11:30 a.m. Opening remarks: Supporting the Jewish State, Now or Never? With Gary Bauer, president, Family Values; and Pastor John Hagee, founder of Christians United for Israel.

1:30 p.m. Panel: Radical Islam, In Their Own Words. With Sen. Rick Santorum; Daniel Pipes, direcotr, Middle East Forum; and Dr. Walid Phares, Director, Foundation for the Defense of Democracies Future of Terrorism Project.

7:30 p.m. - 9:30 p.m. Chairman's Club Donor Banquet. Guest speaker Dennis Prager, radio host; entertainment by Randy Travis.

Location: Washington Convention Center, Mt. Vernon Square.

Contacts: ., 210-477-4714

____

MORNING

UPDATED

HAMDAN _ Tentatively scheduled start of trial for Salim Hamdan, a former driver for Osama bin Laden.

Location: Guantanamo Bay. NOTE: -REVISED LOCATION-

7 a.m. - 1 p.m. ARLINGTON-DAY OF SERVICE _ 12th annual "Renewal & Remembrance project at Arlington National Cemetery and Historic Congressional Cemetery. Hundreds of landscape, lawn care, and tree care specialists from across the nation will bring their crews for mulching, tree cabling, pruning, liming, planting, and aerating.

Location: Arlington National Cemetery

Contacts: Vicki Bendure (cell 202/374-9529), 540-687-3360

NEW

10:30 a.m. ENERGY SPECULATION _ Democratic Senators Byron Dorgan and Amy Klobuchar join energy experts at a press conference on Monday to discuss the stop Excessive Energy Speculation Act to stop "greedy energy traders who artificially inflate oil prices and ensure Americans pay a fair price at the pump." Sen. Byron Dorgan; Sen. Amy Klobuchar; Sherri Cabrera, Petroleum Marketers Association of America; Mark Cooper, consumer Federation of America.

Location: S-120 US Capitol

Contacts: Jim Manley, 202-224-2939

11 a.m. AIDS/HIV TESTING _ Washington-based National Minority AIDS Education and Training Center (NMAETC) ask clinicians across the U.S. to take a few minutes to test themselves for awareness day.

This version of Total Mail Converter is not registered.

Contacts: Steve Clawson, 202-744-3139

NEW

11:15 a.m. OBAMA ISREAL TRIP TELECONFERENCE REAX _ Teleconference by Ira Forman, Exec. Director of the National Jewish Democratic Council (NJDC) on Obama trip to Israel and the latest polls, importance and historical trends concerning the American Jewish Vote.

Contacts: Aaron Keyak, 202-216-9594

Notes: RSP by 10:30 to aaron@njdc.org.

____

AFTERNOON

12:30 p.m. EXPANDING LEARNING TIME _ Center for American Progress forum on "From Status Quo to Breaking the Mold: Schools Expanding Learning Time." With panelists Gretchen Bueter, Grove Patterson Elementary School, Toledo, Ohio; Carmel Martin, Senate Education Committee; Elena Rocha, consultant; Marguerite Roza, Center on Reinventing Public Education.

Location: Center for American Progress, 1333 H St. NW, 10th Floor

Contacts: Marlene Cooper Vasilic, 202-682-1611

NEW

1 p.m. LATINO SMOKING CESSATION CAMPAIGN _ DC Tobacco Free Families press conference unveiling the new Latino campaign "Deja Las Excusas, Deja de Fumar" (Stop the excuses, Stop Smoking) urging the Washington, DC latino community to quit smoking.

Location: Mary's Center for Maternal Childcare, 2355 Ontario Road, NW.

Contacts: Pablo Izquierdo, 202-380-3230

2 p.m. GLOBAL ECONOMY-IMF-STUDY _ IMF Economist Stijn Claessens presents a new study on recessions. Report examines 20 recession episodes in the Organisation for Economic Co-operation and Development (OECD) countries from 1960 to the present.

Location: Wohlstetter Conference Center, 12th floor, AEI, 1150 17th St. NW.

Contacts: n/a, 202-862-4879

Notes: Also participating: Desmond Lachman, AEI; Angel Ubide, Tudor Investment Corporation; and Vincent R. Reinhart, AEI.

2 p.m. PRIVATE BALLOT RIGHTS _ The Senate Republican Conference holds forum on importance of preserving federally surpervise private ballot elections to protect workers from coercion and intimidation. Senators: Jon Kyl; Jim DeMint; Arlen Specer; Arlen Specter; Tom Coburn. WITNESSES: "American Worker" Rhomas Musser, Tri-M Group; James Sherk, Heritage Foundation; John Raudabaugh, Baker & McKenzie.

Location: SD-562

4:30 p.m. ZIMBABWE PROTEST _ TransAfrica Forum & Coalition of Black Trade Unionist hold protest in front of Zimbabwe Embassy. Groups will deliver 'Peoples Indictment to Mugabe government and demonstrate against the failed and corrupted elections in Zimbabwe.

Location: Zimbabwe Embassy, 18th and New Hampshire Ave.

Contacts: Joia Nuri, 240-603-7905

Copyright © 2008 The Associated Press. All rights reserved. This material may not be published, broadcast, rewritten or redistributed.

This version of Total Mail Converter is not registered.

The Expanding Costs of Health Care

Return to Top

This Center for American Progress Action Fund event addresses growing health care costs and strategies for controlling health care spending.

Full version:

Video

Speakers for this session:

Jeanne Lambrew, Ph.D.

Senior Fellow

Karen Tumulty

National Political Correspondent

Toledo Public Schools academy principal to speak at conference Panel to discuss extended learning t

Return to Top

Jul. 21--Schools across the country could learn a thing or two from Toledo's Grove Patterson Academy, according to a Washington-based think tank.

For nearly 10 years, the districtwide elementary school has educated students the equivalent of about 40 days longer than the traditional school year, with two extra hours each day and several additional days. 'It's not just having extended learning time, but what do you do with it and what's the result,' said principal Gretchen Bueter, who has been invited to Washington to speak at 12:30 p.m. today to education and political officials about what her students do with that extra two hours.

For each day's first 90 minutes, Grove Patterson is on 'reading lockdown' for uninterrupted instruction. Later on, 30 minutes of class time is reserved daily for foreign-language study, Ms. Bueter said.

About 400 students are enrolled in the kindergarten through eighth-grade school.

Ms. Bueter is one of several panelists for the 2 1/2-hour discussion called 'From Status Quo to Breaking the Mold: Schools Expanding Learning time' at the Center for American Progress offices.

Reports also will be released today about research of schools and districts with high poverty and minority students who have extended learning time and the financial costs of incorporating it.

Cynthia Brown, director of education policy for the Center for American Progress, said they are 'very impressed' with what Grove Patterson has done and Ms. Bueter will add the perspective of a real practitioner to the conversation.

An education consultant, university research professor, and an adviser to Sen. Ted Kennedy also are on the panel.

About 150 people are expected to attend, Ms. Brown said.

Toledo Public Schools academy principal to speak at conference Panel to discuss extended learning t

Return to Top

Gilbert, Meghan
Toledo Blade

Jul. 21--Schools across the country could learn a thing or two from Toledo's Grove Patterson Academy, according to a Washington-based think tank.

For nearly 10 years, the districtwide elementary school has educated students the equivalent of about 40 days longer than the traditional school year, with two extra hours each day and several additional days.

"It's not just having extended learning time, but what do you do with it and what's the result," said principal Gretchen Bueter, who has been invited to Washington to speak at 12:30 p.m. today to education and political officials about what her students do with that extra two hours.

This version of Total Mail Converter is not registered.

For each day's first 90 minutes, Grove Patterson is on "reading lockdown" for uninterrupted instruction. Later on, 30 minutes of class time is reserved daily for foreign-language study, Ms. Bueter said.

About 400 students are enrolled in the kindergarten through eighth-grade school.

Ms. Bueter is one of several panelists for the 2 1/2-hour discussion called "From Status Quo to Breaking the Mold: Schools Expanding Learning time" at the Center for American Progress offices.

Reports also will be released today about research of schools and districts with high poverty and minority students who have extended learning time and the financial costs of incorporating it.

Cynthia Brown, director of education policy for the Center for American Progress, said they are "very impressed" with what Grove Patterson has done and Ms. Bueter will add the perspective of a real practitioner to the conversation.

An education consultant, university research professor, and an adviser to Sen. Ted Kennedy also are on the panel.

About 150 people are expected to attend, Ms. Brown said.

Ms. Bueter said that since the school opened, she has had researchers and various think tanks contacting her about extended learning time, and that the Center for American Progress' work has been in depth and should give a good overview about how schools across the country have incorporated it.

Copyright © 2008 The Blade, Toledo, Ohio

Return to Top

401(k) loan policies can't be too stringent

Michelle Singletary
Daily Herald, The

Would you still put money in a tax advantaged retirement fund if you couldn't touch it until you retired?

And when I say you couldn't touch it, I mean you couldn't take out loans or withdraw funds under any circumstances.

If Congress were rewriting the rules for 401(k)s and similar retirement plans, that's what the Washington-based Pension Rights Center would recommend. Why this hard stance from a consumer-oriented group that works hard to protect and promote retirement savings?

A new study has found an increasing number of employees are raiding their retirement funds by taking out loans against their 401(k) accounts.

Strangled by debt and rising consumer prices, workers are turning to these plans as the only stash of cash they have.

'The result is that families leverage their future retirement security to ease their present financial insecurity,' wrote Christian Weller and Jeffrey Wenger, who authored 'Robbing Tomorrow to Pay for Today: Economically Squeezed Families are Turning to Their 401(k)s to Make Ends Meet.' The report was issued by the Center for American Progress.

Last week, the U.S. Senate Special Committee on Aging held a hearing to examine this trend and hear solutions on how to reverse it. The CAP report was released at the hearing.

In it, researchers found that over a 15-year period, loans against retirement savings accounts increased almost fivefold in inflation-adjusted terms, to $31 billion in 2004, up from $6 billion in 1989 -- 'an increase of almost 400 percent.' Between 1998 and 2004, an average of 12 percent of families with 401(k) plans borrowed from them.

Although much of this money was paid back, the drain from accounts is significant. Even with a fairly modest loan amount of $5,000 in 2008 dollars, a worker's retirement savings could be substantially reduced. For instance, a 401(k) plan participant who takes out a loan to smooth over a rough patch, then makes only the loan payments, reduces the total retirement savings between 13 percent and 22 percent, the report noted.

The study also found that increasingly, middle-income families are raiding their retirement funds.

'With other venues to borrow money, particularly home equity lines, closed off due to lower house prices, tighter credit standards, and slower income growth, families are turning increasingly to the easily accessible loans from their 401(k) plans,' Weller and Wenger wrote.

This version of Total Mail Converter is not registered.

The increase in 401(k) loans is so high because this money is so easy to borrow. If your plan allows such a loan, you can borrow $50,000 or one-half of the vested balance from your retirement account, whichever is lower. The loan has to be repaid in five years or less, except for loans that have been taken out for the first-time purchase of a home. That loan can be repaid over a period of up to 15 years.

Additionally, the interest rates on 401(k) loans are generally very reasonable. For instance, in 1996, about 70 percent of the 401(k) plans that allowed borrowing charged an interest rate equal or less than the prime rate plus one percentage point, while less than 10 percent charged an interest rate equal to the local bank's lending rate, the report said.

Here's what's wrong with borrowing from your retirement fund, as laid out in the report:

When you take the money out of your retirement account, you lose the possibility of investment earnings.

You may be paying yourself back with interest, but that interest is at a below-market rate of return.

If you fail to pay the loan back, you will have to pay taxes on what you took out in addition to a 10 percent penalty for the early withdrawal.

You pay back the money in after-tax dollars.

In a statement, the Senate committee's chairman, Herb Kohl, D-Wis., said, 'When a participant can use his or her 401(k) to make everyday purchases like buying a cup of coffee, clearly that is a gross distortion of the plan's intended use.'

I've worked with a lot of people in debt and not a single person recklessly robbed their retirement account to pay for a latte. It's not conspicuous consumption that is pushing up the numbers of 401(k) loans.

It's more likely the result of health problems or job losses.

But Kohl and others are right to be concerned.

I agree that there needs to be a stopgap for allowing people to borrow from their retirement funds. We should have a policy that discourages withdrawals for home purchases or to pay for college expenses. This pot should be reserved for retirement.

Loans from a 401(k) plan should only be allowed in dire situations, such as a job loss, disability or major medical illness.

Changes to the loan policies are needed. But it would be hard to persuade people to fund an account they had no access to under any circumstances. That's not realistic, nor is it compassionate.

Return to Top

a Retirement fund you can't dip into? good on paper, not in practice in port today

Would you still put money in a tax advantaged retirement fund if you couldn't touch it until you retired?

And when I say you couldn't touch it, I mean you couldn't take out loans or withdraw funds under any circumstances.

If Congress were rewriting the rules for 401(k)s and similar retirement plans, that's what the Pension Rights Center would recommend. Why this hard stance from a consumer-oriented group?

A new study has found an increasing number of employees are raiding their retirement funds by taking out loans against their 401(k) accounts. Strangled by debt and rising consumer prices, workers are turning to these plans as the only stash of cash they have.

"The result is that families leverage their future retirement security to ease their present financial insecurity," wrote Christian E. Weller and Jeffrey B. Wenger, who authored "Robbing Tomorrow to Pay for Today: Economically Squeezed Families are Turning to Their 401(k)s to Make Ends Meet." The report was issued by the Center for American Progress.

In it, researchers found that over a 15-year period, loans against retirement savings accounts increased almost fivefold in inflation-adjusted terms, to $31 billion in 2004, up from $6 billion in 1989 - "an increase of almost 400 percent." Between 1998 and 2004, an average of 12 percent of families with 401(k) plans borrowed from them.

Although much of this money was paid back, the drain from accounts is significant. Even with a fairly modest loan amount of $5,000 in 2008 dollars, a worker's retirement savings could be substantially reduced. For instance, a 401(k) plan participant who takes out a loan to smooth over a rough patch, then makes only the loan payments, reduces the total retirement savings between 13 and 22 percent, the report noted.

This version of Total Mail Converter is not registered.

"With other venues to borrow money, particularly home equity lines, closed off due to lower house prices, tighter credit standards, and slower income growth, families are turning increasingly to the easily accessible loans from their 401(k) plans," Weller and Wenger wrote.

Here's what's wrong with borrowing from your retirement fund, as laid out in the report:

* When you take the money out of your retirement account, you lose the possibility of investment earnings.

* You may be paying yourself back with interest, but that interest is at a below-market rate of return.

* If you fail to pay the loan back, you will have to pay taxes on what you took out in addition to a 10 percent penalty for the early withdrawal.

* You pay back the money in after-tax dollars

I agree that there needs to be a stopgap for allowing people to borrow from their retirement funds. We should have a policy that discourages withdrawals for home purchases or to pay for college expenses. Loans from a 401(k) plan should be allowed only in dire situations, such as a job loss, disability or major medical illness.

Changes to the loan policies are needed. But it would be hard to persuade people to fund an account they had no access to under any circumstances. That's not realistic, nor is it compassionate. These ships are due in Hampton Roads today, according to the Virginia Maritime Association.
Listed are each vessel's name, flag, local destination and agency.

MSC Zurich, Hong Kong, Portsmouth Marine Terminal, Mediterranean Shipping

Hansa Augustenburg, Liberia, Norfolk International Terminals, Capes Shipping Agencies

MSC China, Antigua and Barbuda, PMT, Mediterranean Shipping

Pacific Breeze, Isle of Man, Dominion Terminal Associates, T. Parker Host

Hato, Bahamas, CEC Terminal, Host

Michelle Singletary writes on finance issues for The Washington Post. E-mail her at singletarym@washpost.com.

Copyright © 2008 The Virginian-Pilot, Inc.

Return to Top

Borrowing in a 401(k) should not be so easy

By Michelle Singletary
Columbus Dispatch - Online

Would you still put money in a tax-advantaged retirement fund if you couldn't touch it until you retired?

And when I say you couldn't touch it, I mean you couldn't take out loans or withdraw funds under any circumstances.

If Congress were rewriting the rules for 401(k)s and similar retirement plans, that's what the Pension Rights Center in Washington would recommend. Why this hard stance from a consumer-oriented group that works hard to protect and promote retirement savings?

A study has found that an increasing number of employees are raiding their retirement funds by taking out loans against their 401(k) accounts. Strangled by debt and rising consumer prices, workers are turning to these plans as the only stash of cash they have. 'The result is that families leverage their future retirement security to ease their present financial insecurity,' wrote Christian E. Weller and Jeffrey B. Wenger in Robbing Tomorrow to Pay for Today: Economically Squeezed Families are Turning to Their 401(k)s to Make Ends Meet.

The report, issued by the Center for American Progress, says that over a 15-year period, loans against retirement savings accounts increased almost fivefold in inflation-adjusted terms, to $31 billion in 2004, up from $6 billion in 1989. Between 1998 and 2004, an average of 12 percent of families with 401(k) plans borrowed from them.

Although much of this money was paid back, the drain from accounts is significant. Even with a fairly modest loan amount of $5,000 in 2008 dollars, a worker's retirement savings could be substantially reduced. A 401(k) participant who takes out a loan to smooth over a rough patch, then makes only the loan payments, reduces the total retirement savings between 13 percent and 22 percent, the report noted. 'With other venues to borrow money, particularly home equity lines, closed off due to lower house prices, tighter credit standards and slower income growth, families are turning increasingly to the easily accessible loans from their 401(k) plans,' Weller and Wenger wrote.

This version of Total Mail Converter is not registered.

Here's what's wrong with borrowing from your retirement fund, as laid out in the report: " When you take the money out of your retirement account, you lose the possibility of investment earnings. " You may be paying yourself back with interest, but that interest is at a below-market rate of return. " If you fail to pay the loan back, you will have to pay taxes on what you took out in addition to a 10 percent penalty for the early withdrawal. " You pay back the money in after-tax dollars

I agree that there needs to be a stopgap for allowing people to borrow from their retirement funds. We should have a policy that discourages withdrawals for home purchases or to pay for college expenses. This pot should be reserved for retirement. Loans from a 401(k) plan should only be allowed in dire situations, such as a job loss, disability or major medical illness.

Changes to the loan policies are needed. But it would be hard to persuade people to fund an account they had no access to under any circumstances. That's not realistic, nor is it compassionate.

Michelle Singletary writes for the Washington Post Writers Group.

Return to Top

Breaking retirement piggy bank in tight times

NEW YORK - Americans are raiding their already-fragile retirement piggy banks to weather financial hardships such as unemployment, medical emergencies and buying a home.

And they're doing it even though borrowing a modest $5,000 can dramatically erode savings over time, according to a study released Wednesday by the Center for American Progress.

The study found workers in 2004 had $31 billion in outstanding 401(k) loans, a fivefold increase from $6 billion in 1989. Between 1998 and 2004, an average of 12 percent of families with 401(k) plans borrowed from them.

'They don't necessarily pay penalties. But the penalty is that they have fewer retirement savings,' said Christian Weller, an author of the study.

As economic conditions grow bleaker, the number of people dipping into retirement money will only rise, he added.

A $5,000 loan, for example, could cut retirement savings by 22 percent even if the loan is repaid without penalty, according to the study. That's assuming the person has a $40,000 salary and is five years into a 35-year career.

One reason people are increasingly using 401(k) plans as a crutch is because they're so easy to access compared to pensions and individual retirement accounts, or IRAs.

'The borrower acts like a bank to himself,' Weller said.

Typically, borrowers can repay loans within five years without penalty. Loans for first-time homes must be repaid within 15 years to avoid penalties.

That doesn't mean people are raiding savings to go on shopping sprees. Middle-class families in particular are turning to retirement money to get through financial crises such as unemployment and medical emergencies, the study found.

When Rachel Hernandez took out a $7,000 loan from her retirement plan, for example, it was after her daughter was killed and she took time off to care for her grandchildren.

'I understood it was going to hurt my retirement, but it was something I had to do,' said Hernandez, 46, of San Antonio, Texas. She was working as a reservation agent for Southwest Airlines at the time and it was the second time she borrowed from her 401(k); the first time was to buy a house.

'Obviously it's going to impact my retirement, but I'm glad I had the option,' she said.

People can typically borrow $50,000 or half the vested balance of their 401(k) accounts with extremely favorable interest rates. Failing to repay loans on time typically incurs a 10- percent excise tax and borrowers must also pay income tax.

Dipping into retirement money wouldn't be a problem if other sources of retirement income - such as Social Security and pensions - weren't drying up, Weller said. More people today are counting on 401(k) accounts to be their primary income source in retirement.

Yet a study by Hewitt Associates this month found four out five workers aren't socking away enough money into their 401(k) accounts to keep up their standard of living after retirement.

This version of Total Mail Converter is not registered.

On average, employees are projected to replace just 85 percent of their income in retirement, compared with the 126 percent they would need when factoring in inflation, longer life spans and medical costs, the study by Hewitt found.

Return to Top

Color of Money Raiding the Retirement Stash

Singletary, Michelle
Washington Post - Online

Would you still put money in a tax-advantaged retirement fund if you couldn't touch it until you retired?

And when I say you couldn't touch it, I mean you couldn't take out loans or withdraw funds under any circumstances.

If Congress were rewriting the rules for 401(k) s and similar retirement plans, that's what the Washington-based Pension Rights Center would recommend. Why this hard stance from a consumer-oriented group that works hard to protect and promote retirement savings?

A new study found that an increasing number of employees are raiding their retirement funds by taking out loans against their 401(k) accounts. Strangled by debt and rising consumer prices, workers are turning to these plans as the only stash of cash they have. 'The result is that families leverage their future retirement security to ease their present financial insecurity,' wrote Christian E. Weller and Jeffrey B. Wenger, authors of 'Robbing Tomorrow to Pay for Today: Economically Squeezed Families are Turning to Their 401(k)s to Make Ends Meet.' The report was issued by the Center for American Progress.

Last week, the Senate Special Committee on Aging held a hearing to examine this trend and hear solutions on how to reverse it. The CAP report was released at the hearing.

The report says that over a 15-year period, loans against retirement savings accounts increased fivefold in inflation-adjusted terms, to $31 billion in 2004, up from $6 billion in 1989 -- an increase of more than 400 percent. Between 1998 and 2004, an average of 12 percent of families with 401(k) plans borrowed from them.

Although much of this money was paid back, the drain from accounts is significant. Even with a fairly modest loan amount of $5,000 in 2008 dollars, a worker's retirement savings could be substantially reduced. For instance, a 401(k) plan participant who takes out a loan to smooth over a rough patch, then makes only the loan payments, reduces the total retirement savings from 13 to 22 percent, the report says.

The study also found that increasingly, middle-income families are raiding their retirement funds. 'With other venues to borrow money, particularly home equity lines, closed off due to lower house prices, tighter credit standards, and slower income growth, families are turning increasingly to the easily accessible loans from their 401(k) plans,' Weller and Wenger wrote.

The increase in 401(k) loans is so high because this money is so easy to borrow. If your plan allows such a loan, you can borrow $50,000 or one-half of the vested balance from your retirement account, whichever is lower. The loan has to be repaid in five years or less, except for loans that have been taken out for the first-time purchase of a home. That loan can be repaid over a period of up to 15 years.

Additionally, the interest rates on 401(k) loans are generally very reasonable. For instance, in 1996, about 70 percent of the 401(k) plans that allowed borrowing charged an interest rate equal to or less than the prime rate plus one percentage point, while less than 10 percent charged an interest rate equal to the local bank's lending rate, the report said.

Here's what's wrong with borrowing from your retirement fund, as laid out in the report:

Return to Top

Dipping into your retirement savings too early can be a costly mistake

Saving for retirement can fall far down on a to-do list for Americans squeezed by rising costs. But even those who do set aside money can in a single move risk much of what they've saved.

Financial experts worried about workers' wallets are warning lawmakers that an increasing number of investors have begun to treat their retirement plans like piggy banks. While making loans or withdrawals from a retirement account is often linked to an emergency like illness, there is fresh evidence that the impact of even briefly sidelining money can be huge by the time retirement arrives.

Senator Herb Kohl, a Wisconsin Democrat, chairman of the Senate's Special Committee on Aging, contends investors are robbing themselves of future earnings.

This version of Total Mail Converter is not registered.

Kohl and Senator Charles Schumer, a New York Democrat, have unveiled a bill that would ban the use of 401(k) debit cards, which they contend make it too easy for investors to remove money from their retirement savings. The bill also seeks to limit the number of loans investors can take from retirement accounts.

Kohl said investors need to be clear on the damage that missteps could cause to their retirement accounts. And he has other concerns. The senator contends that strapped investors are more likely to make mistakes when they respond to marketing pitches from companies trying to land new business from rolled-over retirement accounts. He fears such pitches can gloss over the true costs of shifting money from one account to another.

Financial ads do contain language, however, encouraging investors to review fees. Some ads spell out that while there might not be account fees on an IRA itself, for example, the underlying funds that an investor wades into could carry fees.

And, of course, moves such as rolling over an account can be beneficial as a way to consolidate investments or to move out of plans with inadequate choices.

But it appears more investors are taking risks with their savings. In a new report, the Center for American Progress finds the number of people taking loans from their retirement accounts is increasing, as is the amount of the loans.

The report notes that investors who borrow even small amounts from their 401(k) plans and only repay the loan - without contributing more to make up for lost returns - reduce their overall retirement savings by 13 to 22 percent.

Loans from defined contribution retirement plans like the 401(k) jumped nearly fivefold from 1989 to 2004 when accounting for inflation.

And advertising isn't the only thing that could be influencing investors. John Gannon, a senior vice president with the Financial Industry Regulatory Authority, told the Committee on Aging that FINRA is concerned that some financial advisers are encouraging investors to tap into their retirement accounts too early.

Whatever might help investors make decisions about their savings, spiraling costs and a slumping housing market are only likely to make removing money from retirement accounts more tempting.

Tim Paradis writes for The Associated Press.

Return to Top

Don't leverage future for today

The report was issued by the Center for American Progress. Last week, the US Senate Special Committee on Aging held a hearing to examine this trend and hear ...

Return to Top

Don't raid your retirement fund for debt relief

Would you still put money in a tax advantaged retirement fund if you couldn't touch it until you retired?

And when I say you couldn't touch it, I mean you couldn't take out loans or withdraw funds under any circumstances.

If Congress were rewriting the rules for 401(k) s and similar retirement plans, that's what the Washington, D.C.,-based Pension Rights Center would recommend. Why this hard stance from a consumer-oriented group that works hard to protect and promote retirement savings?

A new study has found an increasing number of employees are raiding their retirement funds by taking out loans against their 401(k) accounts.

Strangled by debt and increasing consumer prices, workers are turning to these plans as the only stash of cash they have.

"The result is that families leverage their future retirement security to ease their present financial insecurity," wrote Christian Weller and Jeffrey Wenger, who authored "Robbing Tomorrow to Pay for Today: Economically Squeezed Families are Turning to Their 401(k)s to Make Ends Meet." The report was issued by the Center for American Progress.

Last week, the U.S. Senate Special Committee on Aging had a hearing to examine this trend and hear solutions on how to reverse it. The CAP report was released at the hearing.

This version of Total Mail Converter is not registered.

In it, researchers found that over a 15-year period, loans against retirement savings accounts increased almost fivefold in inflation-adjusted terms, to $31 billion in 2004, up from $6 billion in 1989 - "an increase of almost 400 percent." Between 1998 and 2004, an average of 12 percent of families with 401(k) plans borrowed from them.

Although much of this money was paid back, the drain from accounts is significant. Even with a fairly modest loan amount of $5,000 in 2008 dollars, a worker's retirement savings could be substantially reduced. For instance, a 401(k) plan participant who takes out a loan to smooth over a rough patch, then makes only the loan payments, reduces the total retirement savings between 13 percent and 22 percent, the report noted.

"With other venues to borrow money, particularly home equity lines, closed off due to lower house prices, tighter credit standards, and slower income growth, families are turning increasingly to the easily accessible loans from their 401(k) plans," Weller and Wenger wrote.

The increase in 401(k) loans is so high because this money is so easy to borrow. If your plan allows such a loan, you can borrow $50,000 or one-half of the vested balance from your retirement account, whichever is lower. The loan has to be repaid in five years or less, except for loans that have been taken out for the first-time purchase of a home. That loan can be repaid during a period of up to 15 years.

Here's what's wrong with borrowing from your retirement fund, as laid out in the report:

* When you take the money out of your retirement account, you lose the possibility of investment earnings.

* You may be paying yourself back with interest, but that interest is at a below-market rate of return.

* If you fail to pay the loan back, you will have to pay taxes on what you took out in addition to a 10 percent penalty for the early withdrawal.

* You pay back the money in after-tax dollars.

I've worked with a lot of people in debt and not a single person recklessly robbed their retirement account to pay for a latte. It's not conspicuous consumption that is pushing up the numbers of 401(k) loans.

I agree that there needs to be a stopgap for allowing people to borrow from their retirement funds. We should have a policy that discourages withdrawals for home purchases or to pay for college expenses. This pot should be reserved for retirement. Loans from a 401(k) plan only should be allowed in dire situations, such as a job loss, disability, or major medical illness.

Changes to the loan policies are needed. But it would be hard to persuade people to fund an account they had no access to under any circumstances. That's not realistic, nor is it compassionate.

Michelle Singletary discusses personal finance every Tuesday on NPR's "Day to Day." Readers can write to her c/o The Washington Post, 1150 15th St., N.W., Washington, D.C. 20081. Her e-mail address is singletarym@washpost.com.

Copyright © 2008 The Olympian, All Rights Reserved.

Return to Top

Don't tap 401(k) funds early

Posted on Sat, Jul. 19, 2008
Sun News, The

NEW YORK --Saving enough for retirement can fall far down on a to-do list for Americans squeezed by rising costs for necessities like food and energy. But even those who do set aside money can in a single move risk much of what they've saved.

Financial experts worried about the thin wallets of some workers are warning lawmakers in Washington that an increasing number of investors have begun to treat their retirement plans like piggy banks. While making loans or withdrawals from a retirement account is often linked to an emergency like illness, there is fresh evidence that the impact of even briefly sidelining money can be huge by the time retirement arrives.

Sen. Herb Kohl, D-Wis., chairman of the Senate's Special Committee on Aging, contends investors are robbing themselves of future earnings if they touch accounts that are supposed to be sacrosanct until retirement. 'We think it's a mistake generally to use the 401(k) for casual, everyday needs, and that's what we're tying to focus on, highlight and hopefully try and do something about,' Kohl said. 'This is not saying that we're insensitive to the tough times people are going through.' Kohl and Sen. Charles Schumer, D-N.Y., have unveiled a bill that would ban the use of 401(k) debit cards, which they contend make it too easy for investors to remove money from their retirement savings. The bill also seeks to place a limit on the number of loans investors can take from their retirement accounts.

This version of Total Mail Converter is not registered.

Kohl said investors need to be clear on the damage that missteps could cause to their retirement accounts. Beyond trying to save investors from themselves, he has other concerns.

The senator contends that strapped investors are more likely to make mistakes when they respond to marketing pitches from financial companies that are trying to land new business from rolled-over retirement accounts. He fears such pitches can gloss over the true costs of shifting money from one retirement account to another.

Financial ads do contain language, however, encouraging investors to review fees. Some ads spell out that while there might not be account fees on an IRA itself, for example, the underlying funds that an investor wades into could carry fees.

And, of course, moves such as rolling over an account can be beneficial as a way for investors to consolidate their investments or to move out of plans with inadequate choices.

But regardless of the degree to which ads might influence investors' decision-making, it appears more investors are taking risks with their retirement money.

In a new report, the Democratic-leaning Center for American Progress finds that the number of people taking loans from their retirement accounts is increasing, as is the amount of the loans.

The report notes that investors who borrow even small amounts from their 401(k) plans and only repay the loan without contributing more to make up for lost returns reduce their overall retirement savings by 13 percent to 22 percent.

Loans from defined contribution retirement plans like the 401(k) jumped nearly fivefold from 1989 to 2004 when accounting for inflation, according to the Center for American Progress report.

And advertising isn't the only thing that could be influencing investors.

John Gannon, a senior vice president with the Financial Industry Regulatory Authority, a nongovernmental overseer, told the Committee on Aging that FINRA is concerned that some financial advisers are encouraging investors to tap into their retirement accounts too early.

Whatever might help investors make decisions about their savings, spiraling food and energy costs as well as a slumping housing market are only likely to make removing money from retirement accounts more tempting.

ONLINE Find more tips to stretch your dollar in the 'Your Money' section at MyrtleBeachOnline.com.

Return to Top

Employees raid 401(k)s more often

Would you still put money in a tax advantaged retirement fund if you couldn't touch it until you retired?

And when I say you couldn't touch it, I mean you couldn't take out loans or withdraw funds under any circumstances.

If Congress were rewriting the rules for 401(k) s and similar retirement plans, that's what the Washington-based Pension Rights Center would recommend. Why this hard stance from a consumer-oriented group that works hard to protect and promote retirement savings?

A new study has found an increasing number of employees are raiding their retirement funds by taking out loans against their 401(k) accounts. Strangled by debt and rising consumer prices, workers are turning to these plans as the only stash of cash they have. 'The result is that families leverage their future retirement security to ease their present financial insecurity,' wrote Christian E. Weller and Jeffrey B. Wenger, who authored 'Robbing Tomorrow to Pay for Today: Economically Squeezed Families are Turning to Their 401(k)s to Make Ends Meet.' The report was issued by the Center for American Progress.

Last week, the U.S. Senate Special Committee on Aging held a hearing to examine this trend and hear solutions on how to reverse it.

The CAP report was released at the hearing.

In it, researchers found that over a 15-year period, loans against retirement savings accounts increased almost fivefold in inflation-adjusted terms, to $31 billion in 2004, up from $6 billion in 1989 -- 'an increase of almost 400%.' Between 1998 and 2004, an average of 12% of families with 401(k) plans borrowed from them.

Although much of this money was paid back, the drain from accounts is significant. Even with a fairly modest loan amount of $5,000 in 2008 dollars, a worker's retirement savings could be substantially reduced. For instance, a 401(k) plan participant who takes out a loan to smooth over a rough patch, then makes only the loan payments, reduces the total retirement savings between 13% and 22%, the report noted.

This version of Total Mail Converter is not registered.

The study also found that increasingly, middle-income families are raiding their retirement funds. 'With other venues to borrow money, particularly home equity lines, closed off due to lower house prices, tighter credit standards, and slower income growth, families are turning increasingly to the easily accessible loans from their 401(k) plans,' Weller and Wenger wrote.

The increase in 401(k) loans is so high because this money is so easy to borrow. If your plan allows such a loan, you can borrow $50,000 or one-half of the vested balance from your retirement account, whichever is lower. The loan has to be repaid in five years or less, except for loans that have been taken out for the first-time purchase of a home. That loan can be repaid over a period of up to 15 years.

Additionally, the interest rates on 401(k) loans are generally very reasonable. For instance, in 1996, about 70% of the 401(k) plans that allowed borrowing charged an interest rate equal or less than the prime rate plus one percentage point, while less than 10% charged an interest rate equal to the local bank's lending rate, the report said.

Here's what's wrong with borrowing from your retirement fund, as laid out in the report:

When you take the money out of your retirement account, you lose the possibility of investment earnings.

You may be paying yourself back with interest, but that interest is at a below-market rate of return.

If you fail to pay the loan back, you will have to pay taxes on what you took out in addition to a 10% penalty for the early withdrawal.

You pay back the money in after-tax dollars

In a statement, the Senate committee's chairman, Herb Kohl, D-Wis., said, 'When a participant can use his or her 401(k) to make everyday purchases like buying a cup of coffee, clearly that is a gross distortion of the plan's intended use.' I've worked with a lot of people in debt and not a single person recklessly robbed their retirement account to pay for a latte. It's not conspicuous consumption that is pushing up the numbers of 401(k) loans. It's more likely the result of health problems or job losses.

But Kohl and others are right to be concerned.

I agree that there needs to be a stopgap for allowing people to borrow from their retirement funds. We should have a policy that discourages withdrawals for home purchases or to pay for college expenses. This pot should be reserved for retirement.

Loans from a 401(k) plan should only be allowed in dire situations, such as a job loss, disability or major medical illness.

Changes to the loan policies are needed. But it would be hard to persuade people to fund an account they had no access to under any circumstances. That's not realistic, nor is it compassionate.

Return to Top

GM's Volt Becomes Centerpiece in Presidential Debate on Energy

... said Bracken Hendricks, an Obama adviser and a senior fellow at the Center for American Progress, a Washington-based policy research institution. ...

Return to Top

Many borrow against 401(k)s, often at a steep cost

CANDICE CHOI
Houston Chronicle - Online

NEW YORK - Americans are raiding their already fragile retirement piggy banks to weather financial hardships such as unemployment, medical emergencies and buying a home.

And they're doing it even though borrowing a modest $5,000 can dramatically erode savings over time, according to a study released last week by the Center for American Progress.

The study found workers in 2004 had $31 billion in outstanding 401(k) loans, a fivefold increase from $6 billion in 1989. Between 1998 and 2004, an average of 12 percent of families with 401(k) plans borrowed from them. 'They don't necessarily pay penalties. But the penalty is that they have fewer retirement savings,' said Christian Weller, an author of the study.

As economic conditions grow bleaker, the number of people dipping into retirement money will only rise, he added.

This version of Total Mail Converter is not registered.

A $5,000 loan, for example, could cut retirement savings by 22 percent even if the loan is repaid without penalty, according to the study. That's assuming the person has a $40,000 salary and is five years into a 35-year career.

One reason people are increasingly using 401(k) plans as a crutch is because they're so easy to access compared to pensions and individual retirement accounts, or IRAs. 'The borrower acts like a bank to himself,' Weller said. Typically, borrowers can repay loans within five years without penalty. Loans for first-time homes must be repaid within 15 years to avoid penalties.

That doesn't mean people are raiding savings to go on shopping sprees. Middle-class families in particular are turning to retirement money to get through financial crises such as unemployment and medical emergencies, the study found.

When Rachel Hernandez took out a $7,000 loan from her retirement plan, for example, it was after her daughter was killed and she took time off to care for her grandchildren. 'I understood it was going to hurt my retirement, but it was something I had to do,' said Hernandez, a 46-year-old resident of San Antonio. She was working as a reservation agent for Southwest Airlines at the time and it was the second time she borrowed from her 401(k); the first time was to buy a house. 'Obviously it's going to impact my retirement, but I'm glad I had the option,' she said. People can typically borrow $50,000 or half the vested balance of their 401(k) accounts with favorable interest rates.

Dipping into retirement money wouldn't be a problem if other sources of retirement income - such as Social Security and pensions - weren't drying up, Weller said.

More people are counting on 401(k) accounts to be their primary retirement income source.

Yet a study by Hewitt Associates this month found four out five workers aren't socking away enough money into their 401(k) accounts to keep up their standard of living after retirement.

On average, employees are projected to replace just 85 percent of their income in retirement, compared with the 126 percent they would need when factoring in inflation, longer life spans and medical costs, the study by Hewitt found.

Return to Top

Michelle Singletary Limits on 401(k) raiding needed

MICHELLE SINGLETARY
Omaha World-Herald - Online

WASHINGTON - Would you still put money in a tax-advantaged retirement fund if you couldn't touch it until you retired? And when I say you couldn't touch it, I mean you couldn't take out loans or withdraw funds under any circumstances. If Congress were rewriting the rules for 401(k)s and similar retirement plans, that's what the Washington-based Pension Rights Center would recommend. Why this hard stance from a consumer-oriented group that works hard to protect and promote retirement savings? A new study has found an increasing number of employees are raiding their retirement funds by taking out loans against their 401(k) accounts. Strangled by debt and rising consumer prices, workers are turning to these plans as the only stash of cash they have. 'The result is that families leverage their future retirement security to ease their present financial insecurity,' wrote Christian E. Weller and Jeffrey B. Wenger, authors of 'Robbing Tomorrow to Pay for Today: Economically Squeezed Families are Turning to Their 401(k)s to Make Ends Meet.' The report was issued by the Center for American Progress. Earlier this month, the U.S. Senate Special Committee on Aging held a hearing to examine this trend and hear solutions on how to reverse it. The CAP report was released at the hearing. In it, researchers found that over a 15-year period, loans against retirement savings accounts increased almost fivefold in inflation-adjusted terms, to $31 billion in 2004, up from $6 billion in 1989 - 'an increase of almost 400 percent.' Between 1998 and 2004, an average of 12 percent of families with 401(k) plans borrowed from them. Although much of this money was paid back, the drain from accounts is significant. Even with a fairly modest loan amount of $5,000 in 2008 dollars, a worker's retirement savings could be substantially reduced. For instance, a 401(k) plan participant who takes out a loan to smooth over a rough patch, then makes only the loan payments, reduces the total retirement savings between 13 percent and 22 percent, the report noted. The study also found that increasingly, middle-income families are raiding their retirement funds. 'With other venues to borrow money, particularly home equity lines, closed off due to lower house prices, tighter credit standards, and slower income growth, families are turning increasingly to the easily accessible loans from their 401(k) plans,' Weller and Wenger wrote. The increase in 401(k) loans is so high because this money is so easy to borrow. If your plan allows such a loan, you can borrow $50,000 or one-half of the vested balance from your retirement account, whichever is lower. The loan has to be repaid in five years or less, except for loans that have been taken out for the first-time purchase of a home. That loan can be repaid over a period of up to 15 years. Additionally, the interest rates on 401(k) loans are generally very reasonable. For instance, in 1996, about 70 percent of the 401(k) plans that allowed borrowing charged an interest rate equal or less than the prime rate plus one percentage point, while less than 10 percent charged an interest rate equal to the local bank's lending rate, the report said. Here's what's wrong with borrowing from your retirement fund, as laid out in the report: " When you take the money out of your retirement account, you lose the possibility of investment earnings. " You may be paying yourself back with interest, but that interest is at a below-market rate of return. " If you fail to pay the loan back, you will have to pay taxes on what you took out in addition to a 10 percent penalty for the early withdrawal. " You pay back the money in after-tax dollars. In a statement, the

This version of Total Mail Converter is not registered.

Senate committee's chairman, Herb Kohl, D-Wis., said, 'When a participant can use his or her 401(k) to make everyday purchases like buying a cup of coffee, clearly that is a gross distortion of the plan's intended use.' I've worked with a lot of people in debt, and not a single person recklessly robbed their retirement account to pay for a latte. But Kohl and others are right to be concerned. I agree that there needs to be a stopgap for allowing people to borrow from their retirement funds. Loans from a 401(k) plan should be allowed only in dire situations, such as a job loss, disability or major medical illness. Changes to the loan policies are needed. But it would be hard to persuade people to fund an account they had no access to under any circumstances. That's not realistic, nor is it compassionate.

Return to Top

Michelle Singletary | The Color of Money 401(k)s Look, But Don't Touch

More Your Money

SHARE THIS STORY

Would you still put money in a tax advantaged retirement fund if you couldn't touch it until you retired?

And when I say you couldn't touch it, I mean you couldn't take out loans or withdraw funds under any circumstances.

If Congress were rewriting the rules for 401(k)s and similar retirement plans, that's what the Washington-based Pension Rights Center would recommend. Why this hard stance from a consumer-oriented group that works hard to protect and promote retirement savings?

A new study has found an increasing number of employees are raiding their retirement funds by taking out loans against their 401(k) accounts. Strangled by debt and rising consumer prices, workers are turning to these plans as the only stash of cash they have.

'The result is that families leverage their future retirement security to ease their present financial insecurity,' wrote Christian E. Weller and Jeffrey B. Wenger, who wrote 'Robbing Tomorrow to Pay for Today: Economically Squeezed Families are Turning to Their 401(k)s to Make Ends Meet.' The report was issued by the Center for American Progress.

Recently, the U.S. Senate Special Committee on Aging held a hearing to examine this trend and hear solutions on how to reverse it. The CAP report was released at the hearing.

In it, researchers found that over a 15-year period, loans against retirement savings accounts increased almost fivefold in inflation-adjusted terms, to $31 billion in 2004, up from $6 billion in 1989 'an increase of almost 400 percent.' Between 1998 and 2004, an average of 12 percent of families with 401(k) plans borrowed from them.

Although much of this money was paid back, the drain from accounts is significant. Even with a fairly modest loan amount of $5,000 in 2008 dollars, a worker's retirement savings could be substantially reduced. For instance, a 401(k) plan participant who takes out a loan to smooth over a rough patch, then makes only the loan payments, reduces the total retirement savings between 13 percent and 22 percent, the report noted.

The study also found that increasingly, middle-income families are raiding their retirement funds.

'With other venues to borrow money, particularly home equity lines, closed off due to lower house prices, tighter credit standards, and slower income growth, families are turning increasingly to the easily accessible loans from their 401(k) plans,' Weller and Wenger wrote.

The increase in 401(k) loans is so high because this money is so easy to borrow. If your plan allows such a loan, you can borrow $50,000 or one-half of the vested balance from your retirement account, whichever is lower. The loan has to be repaid in five years or less, except for loans that have been taken out for the first-time purchase of a home. That loan can be repaid over a period of up to 15 years.

Additionally, the interest rates on 401(k) loans are generally very reasonable. For instance, in 1996, about 70 percent of the 401(k) plans that allowed borrowing charged an interest rate equal or less than the prime rate plus one percentage point, while less than 10 percent charged an interest rate equal to the local bank's lending rate, the report said.

Here's what's wrong with borrowing from your retirement fund, as laid out in the report:

When you take the money out of your retirement account, you lose the possibility of investment earnings.

You may be paying yourself back with interest, but that interest is at a below-market rate of return.

If you fail to pay the loan back, you will have to pay taxes on what you took out in addition to a 10 percent penalty for the early withdrawal.

This version of Total Mail Converter is not registered.

You pay back the money in after-tax dollars.

In a statement, the Senate committee's chairman, Herb Kohl, D-Wis., said, 'When a participant can use his or her 401(k) to make everyday purchases like buying a cup of coffee, clearly that is a gross distortion of the plan's intended use.'

I've worked with a lot of people in debt and not a single person recklessly robbed their retirement account to pay for a latte. It's not conspicuous consumption that is pushing up the numbers of 401(k) loans. It's more likely the result of health problems or job losses.

But Kohl and others are right to be concerned.

I agree that there needs to be a stopgap for allowing people to borrow from their retirement funds. We should have a policy that discourages withdrawals for home purchases or to pay for college expenses. This pot should be reserved for retirement.

Loans from a 401(k) plan should only be allowed in dire situations, such as a job loss, disability, or major medical illness.

Changes to the loan policies are needed. But it would be hard to persuade people to fund an account they had no access to under any circumstances. That's not realistic, nor is it compassionate.

Michelle Singletary can be e-mailed at singletarym@washpost.com. Comments and questions are welcome, but because of the volume of mail, personal responses are not always possible. Please note that comments or questions may be used in a future column, with the writer's name, unless a specific request to do otherwise is indicated.

Post your comment

(Requires free registration.)

We're happy to offer a home for your discussions, but please be respectful and follow the house rules:

Stay on topic - Life's too short to waste.

Be nice - If you want your comment gems to survive, you won't defame, threaten or be abusive to other readers or the subjects of our stories. Victims have feelings too. Out of concern for them, we may not allow comments on certain stories.

Keep it clean - This is a public forum, open to civil adults and children who do not appreciate your vulgarities or obscenities.

Be responsible - Comments are the sole responsibility of those who post them. You'll have no one else to blame if you don't preview your comment carefully and think it through before clicking 'submit.'

You are deputized - Police these comment threads. If you see a comment that violates the rules, click 'Suggest removal' to flag that comment for further review by our staff.

There are consequences - Rules violators may be banned from commenting.

Ask questions, share your knowledge, and help us get the story right - If you are aware of a factual error in a story, want to share facts or background information you know about the story, or think there are issues we should follow up on, e-mail our local news desk.

Click here for our full user agreement.

Return to Top

More people raiding 401(k)s for extra cash

Michelle Singletary
Honolulu Advertiser - Online

Would you still put money in a tax-advantaged retirement fund if you couldn't touch it until you retired?

And when I say you couldn't touch it, I mean you couldn't take out loans or withdraw funds under any circumstances.

If Congress were rewriting the rules for 401(k)s and similar retirement plans, that's what the Washington-based Pension Rights Center would recommend. Why this harsh stance from a consumer-oriented group that works hard to protect and promote retirement savings?

A new study has found an increasing number of employees are raiding their retirement funds by taking out loans against their

This version of Total Mail Converter is not registered.

401(k) accounts. Strangled by debt and rising consumer prices, workers are turning to these plans as the only stash of cash they have. 'The result is that families leverage their future retirement security to ease their present financial insecurity,' wrote Christian E. Weller and Jeffrey B. Wenger, who authored 'Robbing Tomorrow to Pay for Today: Economically Squeezed Families are Turning to Their 401(k)s to Make Ends Meet.' The report was issued by the Center for American Progress.

Last week, the U.S. Senate Special Committee on Aging held a hearing to examine this trend and hear solutions on how to reverse it. The CAP report was released at the hearing.

In it, researchers found that over a 15-year period, loans against retirement savings accounts increased almost fivefold in inflation-adjusted terms, to $31 billion in 2004, up from $6 billion in 1989 - 'an increase of almost 400 percent.' Between 1998 and 2004, an average of 12 percent of families with 401(k) plans borrowed from them.

Although much of this money was paid back, the drain from accounts is significant. Even with a fairly modest loan amount of $5,000 in 2008 dollars, a worker's retirement savings could be substantially reduced.

For instance, a 401(k) plan participant who takes out a loan to smooth over a rough patch, then makes only the loan payments, reduces the total retirement savings between 13 percent and 22 percent, the report noted.

The study also found that increasingly, middle-income families are raiding their retirement funds. 'With other venues to borrow money, particularly home equity lines, closed off due to lower house prices, tighter credit standards and slower income growth, families are turning increasingly to the easily accessible loans from their 401(k) plans,' Weller and Wenger wrote.

The increase in 401(k) loans is so high because this money is so easy to borrow. If your plan allows such a loan, you can borrow $50,000 or one-half of the vested balance from your retirement account, whichever is lower. The loan has to be repaid in five years or less, except for loans that have been taken out for the first-time purchase of a home. That loan can be repaid over a period of up to 15 years.

Additionally, the interest rates on 401(k) loans are generally very reasonable. For instance, in 1996, about 70 percent of the 401(k) plans that allowed borrowing charged an interest rate equal or less than the prime rate plus one percentage point, while less than 10 percent charged an interest rate equal to the local bank's lending rate, the report said.

Here's what's wrong with borrowing from your retirement fund, as laid out in the report:

In a statement, the Senate committee's chairman, Herb Kohl, D-Wis., said, 'When a participant can use his or her 401(k) to make everyday purchases like buying a cup of coffee, clearly that is a gross distortion of the plan's intended use.' I've worked with a lot of people in debt and not a single person recklessly robbed their retirement account to pay for a latte. It's not conspicuous consumption that is pushing up the numbers of 401(k) loans. It's more likely the result of health problems or job losses.

But Kohl and others are right to be concerned.

I agree that there needs to be a stopgap for allowing people to borrow from their retirement funds. We should have a policy that discourages withdrawals for home purchases or to pay for college expenses. This pot should be reserved for retirement.

Loans from a 401(k) plan should only be allowed in dire situations, such as a job loss, disability or major medical illness.

Changes to the loan policies are needed. But it would be hard to persuade people to fund an account they had no access to under any circumstances. That's not realistic, nor is it compassionate.

Reach Michelle Singletary at singletarym@washpost.com.

Return to Top

Of Mutual Interest Tapping retirement accounts too early can prove costly later

NEW YORK -- Saving enough for retirement can fall far down on a to-do list for Americans squeezed by rising costs for necessities such as food and energy. But even those who do set aside money can, in a single move, risk much of what they've saved.

Financial experts worried about the thin wallets of some workers are warning lawmakers in Washington that an increasing number of investors have begun to treat their retirement plans like piggy banks.

While making loans or withdrawals from a retirement account is often linked to an emergency such as illness, there is fresh evidence that the impact of even briefly sidelining money can be huge by the time retirement arrives.

Sen. Herb Kohl, D-Wis., chairman of the Senate's Special Committee on Aging, says investors are robbing themselves of future earnings if they touch accounts that are supposed to be sacrosanct until retirement. 'We think it's a mistake generally to use the 401(k) for casual, everyday needs and that's what we're tying to focus on, highlight and hopefully try and do something about,' Kohl said. 'This is not saying that we're insensitive to the tough times people are going through.' Kohl and Sen. Charles Schumer, D-N.Y., have unveiled a bill that would ban the use of 401(k) debit cards, which, they contend, make it too easy for investors to remove money from their retirement savings. The bill also seeks to place a limit on the number of loans investors can take from their retirement accounts.

This version of Total Mail Converter is not registered.

Kohl said investors need to be clear on the damage that missteps could cause to their retirement accounts. Beyond trying to save investors from themselves, he has other concerns.

The senator contends that strapped investors are more likely to make mistakes when they respond to marketing pitches from financial companies that are trying to land new business from rolled-over retirement accounts. He fears such pitches can gloss over the true costs of shifting money from one retirement account to another.

Financial ads do contain language, however, encouraging investors to review fees. Some ads spell out that while there might not be account fees on an IRA itself, for example, the underlying funds that an investor wades into could carry fees.

And, of course, moves such as rolling over an account can be beneficial as a way for investors to consolidate their investments or to move out of plans with inadequate choices.

But regardless of the degree to which ads might influence investors' decision-making, it appears more investors are taking risks with their retirement money.

In a new report, the Democratic-leaning Center for American Progress finds that the number of people taking loans from their retirement accounts is increasing, as is the amount of the loans.

The report notes that investors who borrow even small amounts from their 401(k) plans and only repay the loan -- without contributing more to make up for lost returns -- reduce their overall retirement savings by 13 percent to 22 percent.

And advertising isn't the only thing that could be influencing investors.

John Gannon, a senior vice president with the Financial Industry Regulatory Authority, a nongovernmental overseer, told the Committee on Aging that the authority is concerned that some financial advisers are encouraging investors to tap into their retirement accounts too early.

Return to Top

RUN ON THE BANK

GREGORY BRESIGER
New York Post - Online

The number of Americans filing for bankruptcy is rising sharply, proving that recent legal reforms are not working, according to a recent report. 'The bankruptcy rates are back on the wrong track despite a conscious legislative effort,' according to the report, from the Washington, DC-based Center for American Progress. 'The reform has been a failure,' said Christian E. Weller, one of the authors of the report that examines the effects of the Bankruptcy Abuse and Consumer Protection Act of 2005. 'The law has made the bankruptcy process more punitive and hurt people. And it has not stopped people from filing for bankruptcy.' The study compared the number of filings in the fourth quarter of 2007 with the first quarter of 2006, which was just after the reform went into effect. The bankruptcy rate is now 2.7 filings per 100,000, compared with 1.5 per 100,000 people in the first three months of 2006. 'The severe financial squeeze faced by America's families is evident in stagnant income growth amid mounting job losses and the spiraling costs of gas, energy, food and healthcare amid record family debt levels,' the report states.

Passed with the support of the banking industry, bankruptcy reform was designed to reduce credit-card abuse by making it more difficult to wipe out a debtor's bills. The act requires someone seeking bankruptcy protection to pay back a higher percentage of their debt than under the previous law.

A spokesman for the American Bankers Association, which was one of the groups backing the law, disputes the study. 'We never said the filings would necessarily go down,' said the ABA's Peter Garuccio. 'We merely wanted to stop abuses of the system.' Garuccio argues that it is too soon to say if the reform is a success, but he believes abuses have been curbed.

Weller said he found no evidence of abuse - medical emergencies and unemployment are why people generally seek bankruptcy protection, he said.

Although critics and proponents of the reform debate the issue, most observers agree the bankruptcy rate will head north. 'The numbers are clearly going up,' said Sam Giordano, of the American Bankruptcy Institute, whose organization is neutral in the bankruptcy reform debate. He says 'general economic conditions' are the most important factor in predicting bankruptcy filings.

This version of Total Mail Converter is not registered.

Save 10 Miles Per Gallon!!

Return to Top

Four percent of the average American family's income is spent on gasoline, according to the Center for American Progress. That is the highest price american ...

Stealing From Retirement

Return to Top

A new study finds people are using their 401(k) retirement plans to cover financial hardships such as a job loss or medical emergencies.

The Center for American Progress says that between 1998 and 2004, 12 percent of families dipped into the funds. The center has also found that the annual borrowing went from 6 billion dollars in 1989 to 31 billion dollars in 2004.

The study's author says even though most of the loans are repaid without penalty, pulling those funds out of the retirement accounts lessens the amount a person will have when he or she does retire.

Another study by Hewitt Associates finds that four out five workers are not putting enough into their 401(k) accounts. It says employees are saving enough to replace 85 percent of their income in retirement, but when inflation, longer life spans and medical costs are factored in, they'll need to replace 126 percent.

Copyright 2008, Associated Press

Study paints bleak retirement picture

Return to Top

Diane Stafford
Post-Star, The

KANSAS CITY, Mo. -- Thinking about retirement?Think hard.A new study warns that about 75 percent of 'near retirees' -- those ages 58-65 -- will outlive their savings unless they reduce their pre-retirement standard of living by more than one-third.For many -- though certainly not all -- Americans, that may mean downsizing their home, selling one of their cars, not eating out as often and giving up planned vacations.The latest alert about prospects for retirement comes from a new study by the Ernst & Young accounting firm undertaken for Americans for Secure Retirement, a coalition of interest groups concerned about retirement affordability.Recent retirees are in only slightly better financial shape. About 60 percent of middle-class 'new retirees' are likely to outlive their assets, the study said.To reduce their likelihood of retirement 'failure' to only 5 percent, recent retirees need to reduce their standards of living by about one-fourth.'It's very, very scary,' said Sara Rix, AARP's strategic policy adviser. 'Middle-aged and older Americans tell us they're already having trouble making ends meet.'The study comes amid a wave of sobering economic indicators that forecast a leaner lifestyle for many Americans.Wage earners overall are feeling the pinch. Real average weekly earnings have fallen by 2.4 percent over the last 12 months when inflation, as measured by growth in the consumer price index, is factored in.Overall inflation in June -- fueled largely by soaring energy prices -- posted its second-biggest monthly jump since 1982, the Department of Labor reported Wednesday. Year-over-year consumer inflation of 5 percent is at its highest level since 1991.The tightening financial pinch was noted Wednesday by Federal Reserve Chairman Ben Bernanke in testimony on Capitol Hill.Bernanke is simultaneously grappling with slower economic growth, hotter inflation and wobbly financial markets fretting about the stability of mortgage giants Fannie Mae and Freddie Mac. But he noted that those big issues are also felt at the household level.'Whether it's a technical recession or not is not all that relevant,' Bernanke said. 'It's clearly the case that for a variety of reasons, families are facing hardship.'In his semiannual monetary policy testimony before Congress, Bernanke cited 'numerous difficulties' facing the economy: 'ongoing strains in financial markets; declining house prices; a softening labor market; and rising prices of oil, food, and some other commodities.'Also in Washington on Wednesday, the Senate Special Committee on Aging heard predictions that the dangers of retirement insecurity were increasing.Christian Weller, a senior fellow at the Center for American Progress, testified that Americans who had retirement savings increasingly were dipping into their 401(k) accounts to pay bills.Both the amounts taken out and the percentage of participants taking out loans from their 401(k)s are going up, Weller's research indicated.The Ernst & Young report reinforced a commonly accepted fact -- that Social Security provides, on average, only 40 percent of retirement income.An example from the report that shows why savings beyond Social Security are necessary:'While married couples with guaranteed retirement income beyond Social Security making $75,000 at retirement have a 31 percent chance of outliving their assets if they retain their pre-retirement standard of living, those with Social Security as their only guaranteed income have a 90 percent chance of outliving their assets during retirement.'The Employee Benefit Research Institute recently reported that 72 percent of American workers said they were saving for retirement. But 49 percent said their personal retirement savings, excluding the value of their homes and any defined benefit plans, amounted to less than $50,000. Worse, about a quarter of workers and retirees said they had no savings of any kind.'Unless workers aged 55 to 59 increase their saving substantially or work beyond age 65, they will be unable to maintain their current standard of living and will have to reduce their standard of living significantly more than today's retirees to minimize the risk of exhausting their financial assets,' the Ernst & Young study concluded.More workers 45 and older are reporting in AARP surveys that they intend to work beyond traditional retirement age. But, AARP's Rix noted, illness, disability and other factors beyond individuals' control often prevent that from happening.Still, she said, the percentage of workers 65-69 has mushroomed in recent years, primarily because of economic concerns.The labor force participation rate for that age group in 1985 was 18.4 percent. In 2007 it was 29.7 percent -- a more than 50 percent increase.'The Ernst & Young findings are troubling,' Rix said. 'We know that about half of the work force has private pensions. But those are giving way to defined contribution savings plans. And we know what the market recently has done to those.'I know I'm nervous when I open my quarterly statements.'

This version of Total Mail Converter is not registered.

Return to Top

Taking from tomorrow to pay for today

Yvette Thornton is caught in an unusual debt crunch.

The former Delphi worker, now retired, needs to make a $1,154 loan payment by September.

What's unusual is the identity of the lender -- herself. Thornton's own 401(k) retirement fund is the source of $30,000 she borrowed to help her ailing mother in 2004.

Even though she owes the money to herself, she'll be in trouble if she doesn't pay. Because she's younger than retirement age, the Lockport woman faces thousands of dollars in back taxes and penalties if she fails to scrape the payment together.

"I'll do my best to pay it back," the 52-year-old said. "I don't want the IRS to come to my door and audit me."

Borrowing from your retirement fund has been an easy way to underwrite big bills like home repairs, weddings and college tuition. But now the perils of borrowing from yourself are becoming apparent as the economy weakens, financial advisers say.

"This is a silent crisis that's out there," said John Lunghino, president of Spectrum Wealth Management, a financial consulting firm in Amherst. Thornton was one of hundreds of area residents he has counseled who face problems paying back loans from their retirement funds, he said.

People who borrowed from their 401(k) funds and then lost their jobs or took early retirement, like Thornton, face a double whammy: a depleted retirement nest egg, plus the specter of a 10 percent federal penalty on the unpaid portion of the loan.

"Younger families have taken the money out to pay for houses or cars," Lunghino said.

A 401(k) plan, named for a section of the tax code, is an employer-sponsored fund that allows savings to build up tax-free until retirement. About 40 percent of working-age families have access to a 401(k), and nearly three-quarters of the plans allow participants to borrow some of their savings before they retire.

The IRS said it doesn't have statistics on loan defaults, but the practice of borrowing 401(k) funds is booming. Borrowing rose to $30.8 billion by 2004, five times more than the amount taken out in 1989, according to a recent report from the Center for American Progress in Washington, D.C. The average loan was nearly $8,000.

The report, "Robbing Tomorrow to Pay for Today," concludes that retirement accounts are being raided to pay for rising medical bills, fuel and other costs. Eighteen percent of 401(k) participants have borrowed from their savings.

"For some people this means less leisurely living [in retirement], travel and so forth," said study author Christian E. Weller, a senior fellow at the center. "But for others it will mean not being able to pay for their prescription drugs."

The cost of borrowing is steep because of lost savings while the loan is repaid. Weller estimated that a $5,000 loan would reduce typical 401(k) savings by 13 to 22 percent.

So why are the loans popular? A big reason is that 401(k) savings are an easy source of cash -- especially as alternatives like home equity loans dry up. If their employer's plan permits borrowing, savers can take out half of their vested nest egg, to a maximum of $50,000. Rates are low, and, unlike bank loans, there's no credit approval process.

Some loans even come with a debit card so that you can tap retirement savings at the ATM -- a practice that came under fire this week. A measure to ban the debit cards was introduced after a hearing by the Senate Special Committee on Aging on Wednesday.

"After retreating over the last few years, companies looking to raid Americans' 401(k) accounts are making a comeback," said a statement from Sen. Charles E. Schumer, D-N.Y., a co-sponsor of the measure.

Amounts withdrawn before age 591/2 generally face a 10 percent federal penalty, in addition to deferred income taxes, although exceptions exist for people over age 55. The bite for someone like Thornton, if she can't avoid default, amounts to about 43 percent of the unpaid loan, Lunghino estimated. That would be more than $7,500, based on the remaining loan balance of $18,000.

This version of Total Mail Converter is not registered.

The penalty is designed to encourage people to preserve their savings until their later years. But Thornton said necessity caused her to take the money out early. When her mother became ill, Thornton took time off from work to care for her and helped pay her expenses, including a car loan. Then Thornton retired early from Delphi in 2006 because the company had filed bankruptcy, raising fears that its plant might close. When an early retirement offer came around, the time seemed right.

"Every single day while we were at work, people were freaking out," she said.

In Western New York, financial planners say they counsel against 401(k) borrowing, putting the brakes on the practice. Still, it affects many.

More than half of Joseph Curatolo's clients let their 401(k) loans default if they still owe payments when they hit retirement, he said. They usually take advantage of an exemption that waives the 10 percent penalty for people over 55 who are out of a job.

"Rather than have to keep making payments in retirement, they'll default," said Curatolo, president of Georgetown Capital Group in Williamsville. However, they still have to pay the deferred taxes on the amount withdrawn earlier, leaving less cash for their retirement.

Others trying to avoid default may work out installment payments that provide more time to make good on the loan, financial advisers said. Borrowers from some plans can make a payment once every 90 days to avert default, rather than once a month.

At L&M Financial Services in Amherst, President Gregg Lipsitz is seeing a similar push from people to tap savings from their Individual Retirement Accounts. Like 401(k) plans, IRAs allow savings to accumulate tax-free until retirement. Lipsitz said he's helping more and more clients set up early withdrawals from their IRAs as they retire early. If you're no longer working, the complex "72T" distribution process avoids the 10 percent penalty for amounts withdrawn before age 59 1/2.

"It's a very last resort," Lipsitz said. "But times are tough -- people are looking to pay their bills."

e-mail: fwilliams@buffnews.com

Copyright © 2008 The Buffalo News

Return to Top

Tapping into retirement account can be costly

TIM PARADIS
Providence Journal - Online

NEW YORK Saving enough for retirement can fall far down on a to-do list for people squeezed by rising costs for necessities such as food and energy. But even those who do set aside money can in a single move risk much of what theyve saved. Financial experts worried about the thin wallets of some workers are warning lawmakers in Washington that an increasing number of investors have begun to treat their retirement plans like piggy banks. While making loans or withdrawals from a retirement account is often linked to an emergency such as illness, there is fresh evidence that the impact of even briefly sidelining money can be huge by the time retirement arrives.

Sen. Herb Kohl, D-Wis., chairman of the Senates Special Committee on Aging, contends that investors are robbing themselves of future earnings if they touch accounts that are supposed to be sacrosanct until retirement. We think its a mistake generally to use the 401(k) for casual, everyday needs and thats what were tying to focus on, highlight and hopefully try and do something about, Kohl said. This is not saying that were insensitive to the tough times people are going through. Kohl and Sen. Charles Schumer, D-N.Y., have unveiled a bill that would ban the use of 401(k) debit cards, which they contend make it too easy for investors to remove money from their retirement savings. The bill also seeks to place a limit on the number of loans investors can take from their retirement accounts.

Kohl said investors need to be clear on the damage that missteps could cause to their retirement accounts. Beyond trying to save investors from themselves, he has other concerns.

The senator contends that strapped investors are more likely to make mistakes when they respond to marketing pitches from financial companies that are trying to land new business from rolled-over retirement accounts. He says such pitches can gloss over the true costs of shifting money from one retirement account to another.

Financial ads do contain language, however, encouraging investors to review fees. Some ads spell out that while there might not be account fees on an IRA itself, for example, the underlying funds that an investor wades into could carry fees.

This version of Total Mail Converter is not registered.

And, of course, moves such as rolling over an account can be beneficial as a way for investors to consolidate their investments or to move out of plans with inadequate choices.

But regardless of the degree to which ads might influence investors decision-making, more investors are taking risks with their retirement money.

In a new report, the Democratic-leaning Center for American Progress finds that the number of people taking loans from their retirement accounts is increasing, as is the amount of the loans.

The report notes that investors who borrow even small amounts from their 401(k) plans and only repay the loan without contributing more to make up for lost returns reduce their overall retirement savings by 13 percent to 22 percent.

Return to Top

Tapping retirement accounts dangerous

NEW YORK Saving enough for retirement can fall far down on a to-do list for Americans squeezed by rising costs for necessities like food and energy. But even those who do set aside money can in a single move risk much of what theyve saved.

Financial experts worried about the thin wallets of some workers are warning lawmakers in Washington that an increasing number of investors have begun to treat their retirement plans like piggy banks. While making loans or withdrawals from a retirement account is often linked to an emergency like illness, there is fresh evidence that the impact of even briefly sidelining money can be huge by the time retirement arrives.

Sen. Herb Kohl, D-Wis., chairman of the Senates Special Committee on Aging, contends investors are robbing themselves of future earnings if they touch accounts that are supposed to be sacrosanct until retirement.

We think its a mistake generally to use the 401(k) for casual, everyday needs and thats what were tying to focus on, highlight and hopefully try and do something about, Kohl said. This is not saying that were insensitive to the tough times people are going through.

Kohl and Sen. Charles E. Schumer, D-N.Y., have unveiled a bill that would ban the use of 401(k) debit cards, which they contend make it too easy for investors to remove money from their retirement savings. The bill also seeks to place a limit on the number of loans investors can take from their retirement accounts.

Kohl said investors need to be clear on the damage that missteps could cause to their retirement accounts. Beyond trying to save investors from themselves, he has other concerns.

The senator contends that strapped investors are more likely to make mistakes when they respond to marketing pitches from financial companies that are trying to land new business from rolled-over retirement accounts. He fears such pitches can gloss over the true costs of shifting money from one retirement account to another.

Financial ads do contain language, however, encouraging investors to review fees. Some ads spell out that while there might not be account fees on an IRA itself, for example, the underlying funds that an investor wades into could carry fees.

And, of course, moves such as rolling over an account can be beneficial as a way for investors to consolidate their investments or to move out of plans with inadequate choices.

But regardless of the degree to which ads might influence investors decision-making, it appears more investors are taking risks with their retirement money.

In a new report, the Democratic-leaning Center for American Progress finds that the number of people taking loans from their retirement accounts is increasing, as is the amount of the loans.

The report notes that investors who borrow even small amounts from their 401(k) plans and only repay the loan without contributing more to make up for lost returns reduce their overall retirement savings by 13 percent to 22 percent.

Loans from defined contribution retirement plans like the 401(k) jumped nearly fivefold from 1989 to 2004 when accounting for inflation, according to the Center for American Progress report.

Return to Top

Tapping retirement funds early can cost you more later

This version of Total Mail Converter is not registered.

TIM PARADIS
Mail Tribune

Saving enough for retirement can fall far down on a to-do list for Americans squeezed by rising costs for necessities like food and energy. But even those who do set aside money can in a single move risk much of what they've saved.

Financial experts worried about the thin wallets of some workers are warning lawmakers in Washington that an increasing number of investors have begun to treat their retirement plans like piggy banks. While making loans or withdrawals from a retirement account is often linked to an emergency like illness, there is fresh evidence that the impact of even briefly sidelining money can be huge by the time retirement arrives.

Sen. Herb Kohl, D-Wis., chairman of the Senate's Special Committee on Aging, contends investors are robbing themselves of future earnings if they touch accounts that are supposed to be sacrosanct until retirement. 'We think it's a mistake generally to use the 401(k) for casual, everyday needs and that's what we're tying to focus on, highlight and hopefully try and do something about,' Kohl said. 'This is not saying that we're insensitive to the tough times people are going through.' Kohl and Sen. Charles Schumer, D-N.Y., have unveiled a bill that would ban the use of 401(k) debit cards, which they contend make it too easy for investors to remove money from their retirement savings. The bill also seeks to place a limit on the number of loans investors can take from their retirement accounts.

Kohl said investors need to be clear on the damage that missteps could cause to their retirement accounts. Beyond trying to save investors from themselves, he has other concerns.

The senator contends that strapped investors are more likely to make mistakes when they respond to marketing pitches from financial companies that are trying to land new business from rolled-over retirement accounts. He fears such pitches can gloss over the true costs of shifting money from one retirement account to another.

Financial ads do contain language, however, encouraging investors to review fees. Some ads spell out that while there might not be account fees on an IRA itself, for example, the underlying funds that an investor wades into could carry fees.

And, of course, moves such as rolling over an account can be beneficial as a way for investors to consolidate their investments or to move out of plans with inadequate choices.

But regardless of the degree to which ads might influence investors' decision-making, it appears more investors are taking risks with their retirement money.

In a new report, the Democratic-leaning Center for American Progress finds that the number of people taking loans from their retirement accounts is increasing, as is the amount of the loans.

The report notes that investors who borrow even small amounts from their 401(k) plans and only repay the loan without contributing more to make up for lost returns reduce their overall retirement savings by 13 percent to 22 percent.

Loans from defined contribution retirement plans like the 401(k) jumped nearly fivefold from 1989 to 2004 when accounting for inflation, according to the Center for American Progress report.

And advertising isn't the only thing that could be influencing investors.

John Gannon, a senior vice president with the Financial Industry Regulatory Authority, a non-governmental overseer, told the Committee on Aging that FINRA is concerned that some financial advisers are encouraging investors to tap into their retirement accounts too early.

Whatever might help investors make decisions about their savings, spiraling food and energy costs as well as a slumping housing market are only likely to make removing money from retirement accounts more tempting.

Return to Top

Tapping retirement money too early can be costly

Tim Paradis
Journal News - Online

NEW YORK - Saving enough for retirement can fall far down on a to-do list for Americans squeezed by rising costs for necessities like food and energy. But even those who do set aside money, can, in a single move, risk much of what they've saved.

Financial experts worried about the thin wallets of some workers are warning lawmakers in Washington that an increasing number of investors have begun to treat their retirement plans like piggy banks. While making loans or withdrawals from a retirement account is often linked to an emergency like illness, there is fresh evidence that the impact of even briefly sidelining money can be huge by the time retirement arrives.

This version of Total Mail Converter is not registered.

Sen. Herb Kohl, D-Wis., chairman of the Senate's Special Committee on Aging, contends investors are robbing themselves of future earnings if they touch accounts that are supposed to be sacrosanct until retirement. 'We think it's a mistake generally to use the 401(k) for casual, everyday needs, and that's what we're tying to focus on, highlight and hopefully try and do something about,' Kohl said. 'This is not saying that we're insensitive to the tough times people are going through.' Kohl and Sen. Charles Schumer, D-N.Y., have unveiled a bill that would ban the use of 401(k) debit cards, which they contend make it too easy for investors to remove money from their retirement savings. The bill also seeks to place a limit on the number of loans investors can take from their retirement accounts.

Kohl said investors need to be clear on the damage that missteps could cause to their retirement accounts. Beyond trying to save investors from themselves, he has other concerns.

The senator contends that strapped investors are more likely to make mistakes when they respond to marketing pitches from financial companies that are trying to land new business from rolled-over retirement accounts. He fears such pitches can gloss over the true costs of shifting money from one retirement account to another.

Financial ads do contain language, however, encouraging investors to review fees. Some ads spell out that while there might not be account fees on an IRA itself, for example, the underlying funds that an investor wades into could carry fees.

And, of course, moves such as rolling over an account can be beneficial as a way for investors to consolidate their investments or to move out of plans with inadequate choices.

But regardless of the degree to which ads might influence investors' decision-making, it appears more investors are taking risks with their retirement money.

In a new report, the Democratic-leaning Center for American Progress finds that the number of people taking loans from their retirement accounts is increasing, as is the amount of the loans.

The report notes that investors who borrow even small amounts from their 401(k) plans and only repay the loan - without contributing more to make up for lost returns - reduce their overall retirement savings by 13 percent to 22 percent.

Loans from defined contribution retirement plans like the 401(k) jumped nearly fivefold from 1989 to 2004 when accounting for inflation, according to the Center for American Progress report.

And advertising isn't the only thing that could be influencing investors.

John Gannon, a senior vice president with the Financial Industry Regulatory Authority, a nongovernmental overseer, told the Committee on Aging that FINRA is concerned that some financial advisers are encouraging investors to tap into their retirement accounts too early.

Whatever might help investors make decisions about their savings, spiraling food and energy costs as well as a slumping housing market are only likely to make removing money from retirement accounts more tempting.

Return to Top

Tapping retirement money too early can be costly

TIM PARADISAP Business Writer
nwitimes.com

Saving enough for retirement can fall far down on a to-do list for Americans squeezed by rising costs for necessities like food and energy. But even those who do set aside money can in a single move risk much of what they've saved.Financial experts worried about the thin wallets of some workers are warning lawmakers in Washington that an increasing number of investors have begun to treat their retirement plans like piggy banks. While making loans or withdrawals from a retirement account is often linked to an emergency like illness, there is fresh evidence that the impact of even briefly sidelining money can be huge by the time retirement arrives.Sen. Herb Kohl, D-Wis., chairman of the Senate's Special Committee on Aging, contends investors are robbing themselves of future earnings if they touch accounts that are supposed to be sacrosanct until retirement.'We think it's a mistake generally to use the 401(k) for casual, everyday needs and that's what we're tying to focus on, highlight and hopefully try and do something about,' Kohl said. 'This is not saying that we're insensitive to the tough times people are going through.'Kohl and Sen. Charles Schumer, D-N.Y., have unveiled a bill that would ban the use of 401(k) debit cards, which they contend make it too easy for investors to remove money from their retirement savings. The bill also seeks to place a limit on the number of loans investors can take from their retirement accounts.Kohl said investors need to be clear on the damage that missteps could cause to their retirement accounts. Beyond trying to save investors from themselves, he has other concerns.The senator contends that strapped investors are more likely to make mistakes when they respond to marketing pitches from financial companies that are trying to land new business from rolled-over retirement accounts. He fears such pitches can gloss over the true costs of shifting money from one retirement account to another.Financial ads do contain language, however, encouraging investors to review fees. Some ads spell out that while there might not be account fees on an IRA itself, for example, the underlying funds that an investor wades into could carry fees.And, of course, moves such as rolling over an account can be beneficial as a way for investors to consolidate their investments or to move out of plans with inadequate choices.But regardless of the degree to which ads might influence investors' decision-making, it appears more investors are taking risks with their retirement money.In a new report, the Democratic-leaning Center for American Progress finds that the number of people taking loans from their retirement accounts is increasing, as is the amount of the loans.The report notes that investors who borrow even small amounts from their 401(k) plans and only repay the loan -- without contributing more to make up for lost returns -- reduce their overall retirement savings by 13 percent to 22 percent.Loans from defined contribution retirement plans like the 401(k) jumped nearly fivefold from 1989 to 2004 when accounting for inflation, according to the Center for American Progress report.And advertising isn't the only thing that could be influencing investors.John Gannon, a senior vice president with the Financial Industry Regulatory Authority, a non-governmental overseer, told the Committee on Aging that FINRA is concerned that some financial advisers are encouraging investors to tap into their retirement accounts too early.Whatever might help investors make decisions about their savings, spiraling food and energy costs as well as a slumping housing market are only likely to make removing money from retirement accounts more tempting.

This version of Total Mail Converter is not registered.

Return to Top

The Color of Money Raiding the Retirement Stash

Singletary, Michelle
Washington Post - Online

Would you still put money in a tax-advantaged retirement fund if you couldn't touch it until you retired?

And when I say you couldn't touch it, I mean you couldn't take out loans or withdraw funds under any circumstances.

If Congress were rewriting the rules for 401(k) s and similar retirement plans, that's what the Washington-based Pension Rights Center would recommend. Why this hard stance from a consumer-oriented group that works hard to protect and promote retirement savings?

A new study found that an increasing number of employees are raiding their retirement funds by taking out loans against their 401(k) accounts. Strangled by debt and rising consumer prices, workers are turning to these plans as the only stash of cash they have. 'The result is that families leverage their future retirement security to ease their present financial insecurity,' wrote Christian E. Weller and Jeffrey B. Wenger, authors of 'Robbing Tomorrow to Pay for Today: Economically Squeezed Families are Turning to Their 401(k)s to Make Ends Meet.' The report was issued by the Center for American Progress.

Last week, the Senate Special Committee on Aging held a hearing to examine this trend and hear solutions on how to reverse it. The CAP report was released at the hearing.

The report says that over a 15-year period, loans against retirement savings accounts increased fivefold in inflation-adjusted terms, to $31 billion in 2004, up from $6 billion in 1989 -- an increase of more than 400 percent. Between 1998 and 2004, an average of 12 percent of families with 401(k) plans borrowed from them.

Although much of this money was paid back, the drain from accounts is significant. Even with a fairly modest loan amount of $5,000 in 2008 dollars, a worker's retirement savings could be substantially reduced. For instance, a 401(k) plan participant who takes out a loan to smooth over a rough patch, then makes only the loan payments, reduces the total retirement savings from 13 to 22 percent, the report says.

The study also found that increasingly, middle-income families are raiding their retirement funds. 'With other venues to borrow money, particularly home equity lines, closed off due to lower house prices, tighter credit standards, and slower income growth, families are turning increasingly to the easily accessible loans from their 401(k) plans,' Weller and Wenger wrote.

The increase in 401(k) loans is so high because this money is so easy to borrow. If your plan allows such a loan, you can borrow $50,000 or one-half of the vested balance from your retirement account, whichever is lower. The loan has to be repaid in five years or less, except for loans that have been taken out for the first-time purchase of a home. That loan can be repaid over a period of up to 15 years.

Additionally, the interest rates on 401(k) loans are generally very reasonable. For instance, in 1996, about 70 percent of the 401(k) plans that allowed borrowing charged an interest rate equal to or less than the prime rate plus one percentage point, while less than 10 percent charged an interest rate equal to the local bank's lending rate, the report said.

Here's what's wrong with borrowing from your retirement fund, as laid out in the report:

When you take the money out of your retirement account, you lose the possibility of investment earnings.

This version of Total Mail Converter is not registered.

You may be paying yourself back with interest, but that interest is at a below-market rate of return.

If you fail to pay back the loan, you will have to pay taxes on what you took out in addition to a 10 percent penalty for the early withdrawal.

You pay back the money in after-tax dollars. 'When a participant can use his or her 401(k) to make everyday purchases like buying a cup of coffee, clearly that is a gross distortion of the plan's intended use,' Herb Kohl (D-Wis.), chairman of the Senate committee, said in a statement.

I've worked with a lot of people in debt, and not a single person recklessly robbed his or her retirement account to pay for a latte. It's not conspicuous consumption that is pushing up the numbers of 401(k) loans. It's more likely the result of health problems or job losses.

But Kohl and others are right to be concerned.

I agree that there needs to be a stopgap for allowing people to borrow from their retirement funds. We should have a policy that discourages withdrawals for home purchases or to pay for college expenses. This pot should be reserved for retirement.

Loans from a 401(k) plan should be allowed only in dire situations, such as a job loss, disability or major illness.

Changes to the loan policies are needed. But it would be hard to persuade people to fund an account they had no access to under any circumstances. That's not realistic, nor is it compassionate.

On the air: Michelle Singletary discusses personal finance Tuesdays on NPR's 'Day to Day' program and athttp://www.npr.org.

By mail: Readers can write to her at The Washington Post, 1150 15th St. NW, Washington, D.C. 20071.

By e-mail:singletarym@washpost.com.

Comments and questions are welcome, but because of the volume of mail, personal responses are not always possible. Please note that comments or questions may be used in a future column, with the writer's name, unless a specific request to do otherwise is indicated.

Return to Top

Workers break retirement piggy bank in tight times

Workers break retirement piggy bank in tight times

By CANDICE CHOI AP Business Writer

NEW YORK (AP) - Americans are raiding their already fragile retirement piggy banks to weather financial hardships such as unemployment, medical emergencies and buying a home.

And they're doing it even though borrowing a modest $5,000 can dramatically erode savings over time, according to a study released Wednesday by the Center for American Progress. The study found workers in 2004 had $31 billion in outstanding 401(k) loans, a fivefold increase from $6 billion in 1989. Between 1998 and 2004, an average of 12 percent of families with 401(k) plans borrowed from them.

"They don't necessarily pay penalties. But the penalty is that they have fewer retirement savings," said Christian Weller, an author of the study.

As economic conditions grow bleaker, the number of people dipping into retirement money will only rise, he added.

A $5,000 loan, for example, could cut retirement savings by 22 percent even if the loan is repaid without penalty, according to the study. That's assuming the person has a $40,000 salary and is five years into a 35-year career.

One reason people are increasingly using 401(k) plans as a crutch is because they're so easy to access compared to pensions and individual retirement accounts, or IRAs.

"The borrower acts like a bank to himself," Weller said.

Typically, borrowers can repay loans within five years without penalty. Loans for first-time homes must be repaid within 15 years to avoid penalties.

That doesn't mean people are raiding savings to go on shopping sprees. Middle-class families in particular are turning to retirement money to get through financial crises such as unemployment and medical emergencies, the study found.

This version of Total Mail Converter is not registered.

When Rachel Hernandez took out a $7,000 loan from her retirement plan, for example, it was after her daughter was killed and she took time off to care for her grandchildren.

"I understood it was going to hurt my retirement, but it was something I had to do," said Hernandez, a 46-year-old resident of San Antonio, Texas. She was working as a reservation agent for Southwest Airlines at the time and it was the second time she borrowed from her the first time was to buy a house.

"Obviously it's going to impact my retirement, but I'm glad I had the option," she said.

People can typically borrow $50,000 or half the vested balance of their 401(k) accounts with extremely favorable interest rates. Failing to repay loans on time typically incurs a 10 percent excise tax and borrowers must also pay income tax.

Dipping into retirement money wouldn't be a problem if other sources of retirement income - such as Social Security and pensions - weren't drying up, Weller said. More people today are counting on 401(k) accounts to be their primary income source in retirement.

Yet a study by Hewitt Associates this month found four out five workers aren't socking away enough money into their 401(k) accounts to keep up their standard of living after retirement.

On average, employees are projected to replace just 85 percent of their income in retirement, compared with the 126 percent they would need when factoring in inflation, longer life spans and medical costs, the study by Hewitt found.

2008-07-16 15:01:00 GMT

Copyright 2008. The Associated Press All Rights Reserved

The information contained in the AP News report may not be published, broadcast, rewritten or redistributed without the prior written authority of The Associated Press. Related Related Law Firm Related Law Firm Articles Related Law Firm Copyright , FindLaw and

Return to Top

Workers dipping into 401(k)

Americans are raiding their already fragile retirement piggy banks to weather financial hardships such as unemployment, medical emergencies and buying a home.

And they're doing it even though borrowing a modest $5,000 can dramatically erode savings over time, according to a recent study by the Center for American Progress.

The study found workers in 2004 had $31 billion in outstanding 401(k) loans, a fivefold increase from $6 billion in 1989. Between 1998 and 2004, an average of 12 percent of families with 401(k) plans borrowed from them.

"They don't necessarily pay penalties. But the penalty is that they have fewer retirement savings," said Christian Weller, an author of the study.

As economic conditions grow bleaker, the number of people dipping into retirement money will only rise, he added.

A $5,000 loan, for example, could cut retirement savings by 22 percent even if the loan is repaid without penalty, according to the study. That's assuming the person has a $40,000 salary and is five years into a 35-year career.

One reason people are increasingly using 401(k) plans as a crutch is because they're so easy to access compared to pensions and individual retirement accounts, or IRAs.

That doesn't mean people are raiding savings to go on shopping sprees. Middle-class families in particular are turning to retirement money to get through financial crises .

People can typically borrow $50,000 or half the vested balance of their 401(k) accounts with extremely favorable interest rates. Failing to repay loans on time typically incurs a 10 percent excise tax.

Dipping into retirement money wouldn't be a problem if other sources of retirement income -- such as Social Security and pensions -- weren't drying up, Weller said. More people today are counting on 401(k) accounts to be their primary income source in retirement.

This version of Total Mail Converter is not registered.

Yet a study by Hewitt Associates this month found four out five workers aren't socking away enough money into their 401(k) accounts to keep up their standard of living after retirement.

On average, employees are projected to replace just 85 percent of their income in retirement, compared with the 126 percent they would need when factoring in inflation, longer life spans and medical costs.

Environmental Groups React To Various Energy Proposals

Return to Top

Wildly varying visions of America's energy future drew mixed reactions from environmental groups this week. As the Bush Administration and congressional Republicans called for expanding all of America's domestic energy supplies, former Vice President and Nobel Laureate Al Gore challenged the country to shift all of our electrical generation to renewable sources.

Gernot Wagner, an economist with the environmental defense fund told RTT News that the focus for the future needs to be increasing efficiency so that America's gross domestic product has a lower environmental cost. 'The challenge is removing carbon from the fuel cycle while GDP is expected to grow at 3 percent or so per year,' Wagner said, arguing that environmentalists shouldn't rule out energy sources such as coal and nuclear power. 'We can't exclude or we shouldn't exclude any of them,' he said. 'What we should do is basically set the price for carbon and get out of the way and let the market work on its own.' Wagner added that existing and largely already proven technology already exists to increase the carbon dioxide productivity of the economy tenfold by 2050, but he argued that governments and analysts shouldn't place bets on any particular power source or technology. 'What we should do is put a price on emissions, put a price on carbon and then let the utilities, energy suppliers and entrepreneurs figure it out by themselves,' he said. But that approach lacks the urgency other environmental groups believe is necessary.

Daniel Weiss, director of climate strategy for the Center for American Progress, said the Republican mantra of using every form of energy available isn't necessary to sustain economic growth. 'With efficiency measures alone, which more than pay for themselves, we could meet 75 percent of the expected growth in electricity demand between now and 2030,' he said, calling the use everything approach 'a recipe for energy and climate disaster.' Just looking to California, which if taken separately from the rest of the United States would rank as one of the world's largest economies, Weiss said it's clear that conservation is an economical and effective tool. 'They use the same amount of electricity per capita as they did 30 years ago,' he said. And nuclear energy is a particularly bad choice, said Jim Riccio, a nuclear policy analyst for Greenpeace. 'Why in God's name would you spend $24 billion on new nuclear plants that will not come online for a decade,' he said, adding that the urgency of action on global warming makes that prospect 'a day late and more than a dollar short.' Riccio also pointed out that some of the country's smartest investors who have looked at energy policy have rejected nuclear power as an option. T. Boone Pickens recently proposed an energy plan focused heavily on solar, wind and natural gas - without mentioning nuclear, Riccio noted. And a subsidiary of Warren Buffett's Berkshire Hathaway Inc. recently backed away from a proposal to build a new nuclear plant, he added. 'When they did their due diligence they said it did not make sense,' Riccio said. 'If the world's greatest investor thinks nuclear is an economic dog, why is the government wasting my money on it' with subsidies. Citing several studies that call for urgent action and dramatic action to avoid the worst effects of global warming, Riccio said it makes far more sense to invest in the 'low hanging fruit.' 'Given the time frame, we have to do things that are fast and efficient,' he said, looking to solar and wind power along with increased efficiency, and avoid expensive or unproven options like nuclear and clean coal. 'We don't feel that [those] are viable options if you're going to address climate change in a meaningful time frame,' he said.

Environmental Groups React To Various Energy Proposals

Return to Top

(RTTNews) - Wildly varying visions of America's energy future drew mixed reactions from environmental groups this week. As the Bush Administration and congressional Republicans called for expanding all of America's domestic energy supplies, former Vice President and Nobel Laureate Al Gore challenged the country to shift all of our electrical generation to renewable sources.

Gernot Wagner, an economist with the environmental defense fund told RTT News that the focus for the future needs to be increasing efficiency so that America's gross domestic product has a lower environmental cost.

'The challenge is removing carbon from the fuel cycle while GDP is expected to grow at 3 percent or so per year,' Wagner said, arguing that environmentalists shouldn't rule out energy sources such as coal and nuclear power.

'We can't exclude or we shouldn't exclude any of them,' he said. 'What we should do is basically set the price for carbon and get out of the way and let the market work on its own.'

Wagner added that existing and largely already proven technology already exists to increase the carbon dioxide productivity of the economy tenfold by 2050, but he argued that governments and analysts shouldn't place bets on any particular power source or technology.

This version of Total Mail Converter is not registered.

'What we should do is put a price on emissions, put a price on carbon and then let the utilities, energy suppliers and entrepreneurs figure it out by themselves,' he said.

But that approach lacks the urgency other environmental groups believe is necessary.

Daniel Weiss, director of climate strategy for the Center for American Progress, said the Republican mantra of using every form of energy available isn't necessary to sustain economic growth.

'With efficiency measures alone, which more than pay for themselves, we could meet 75 percent of the expected growth in electricity demand between now and 2030,' he said, calling the use everything approach 'a recipe for energy and climate disaster.'

Just looking to California, which if taken separately from the rest of the United States would rank as one of the world's largest economies, Weiss said it's clear that conservation is an economical and effective tool.

'They use the same amount of electricity per capita as they did 30 years ago,' he said.

And nuclear energy is a particularly bad choice, said Jim Riccio, a nuclear policy analyst for Greenpeace.

'Why in God's name would you spend $24 billion on new nuclear plants that will not come online for a decade,' he said, adding that the urgency of action on global warming makes that prospect 'a day late and more than a dollar short.'

Riccio also pointed out that some of the country's smartest investors who have looked at energy policy have rejected nuclear power as an option. T. Boone Pickens recently proposed an energy plan focused heavily on solar, wind and natural gas - without mentioning nuclear, Riccio noted. And a subsidiary of Warren Buffett's Berkshire Hathaway Inc. recently backed away from a proposal to build a new nuclear plant, he added.

Environmental Groups React To Various Energy Proposals

Return to Top

(RTTNews) - Wildly varying visions of America's energy future drew mixed reactions from environmental groups this week. As the Bush Administration and congressional Republicans called for expanding all of America's domestic energy supplies, former Vice President and Nobel Laureate Al Gore challenged the country to shift all of our electrical generation to renewable sources.

Gernot Wagner, an economist with the environmental defense fund told RTT News that the focus for the future needs to be increasing efficiency so that America's gross domestic product has a lower environmental cost.

'The challenge is removing carbon from the fuel cycle while GDP is expected to grow at 3 percent or so per year,' Wagner said, arguing that environmentalists shouldn't rule out energy sources such as coal and nuclear power.

'We can't exclude or we shouldn't exclude any of them,' he said. 'What we should do is basically set the price for carbon and get out of the way and let the market work on its own.'

Wagner added that existing and largely already proven technology already exists to increase the carbon dioxide productivity of the economy tenfold by 2050, but he argued that governments and analysts shouldn't place bets on any particular power source or technology.

'What we should do is put a price on emissions, put a price on carbon and then let the utilities, energy suppliers and entrepreneurs figure it out by themselves,' he said.

But that approach lacks the urgency other environmental groups believe is necessary.

Daniel Weiss, director of climate strategy for the Center for American Progress, said the Republican mantra of using every form of energy available isn't necessary to sustain economic growth.

'With efficiency measures alone, which more than pay for themselves, we could meet 75 percent of the expected growth in electricity demand between now and 2030,' he said, calling the use everything approach 'a recipe for energy and climate disaster.'

Environmental Groups React To Various Energy Proposals

Return to Top

(RTTNews) - Wildly varying visions of America's energy future drew mixed reactions from environmental groups this week. As the Bush Administration and congressional Republicans called for expanding all of America's domestic energy supplies, former Vice President and Nobel Laureate Al Gore challenged the country to shift all of our electrical generation to renewable sources.

This version of Total Mail Converter is not registered.

Gernot Wagner, an economist with the environmental defense fund told RTT News that the focus for the future needs to be increasing efficiency so that America's gross domestic product has a lower environmental cost. 'The challenge is removing carbon from the fuel cycle while GDP is expected to grow at 3 percent or so per year,' Wagner said, arguing that environmentalists shouldn't rule out energy sources such as coal and nuclear power. 'We can't exclude or we shouldn't exclude any of them,' he said. 'What we should do is basically set the price for carbon and get out of the way and let the market work on its own.' Wagner added that existing and largely already proven technology already exists to increase the carbon dioxide productivity of the economy tenfold by 2050, but he argued that governments and analysts shouldn't place bets on any particular power source or technology. 'What we should do is put a price on emissions, put a price on carbon and then let the utilities, energy suppliers and entrepreneurs figure it out by themselves,' he said. But that approach lacks the urgency other environmental groups believe is necessary.

Daniel Weiss, director of climate strategy for the Center for American Progress, said the Republican mantra of using every form of energy available isn't necessary to sustain economic growth. 'With efficiency measures alone, which more than pay for themselves, we could meet 75 percent of the expected growth in electricity demand between now and 2030,' he said, calling the use everything approach 'a recipe for energy and climate disaster.' Just looking to California, which if taken separately from the rest of the United States would rank as one of the world's largest economies, Weiss said it's clear that conservation is an economical and effective tool. 'They use the same amount of electricity per capita as they did 30 years ago,' he said. And nuclear energy is a particularly bad choice, said Jim Riccio, a nuclear policy analyst for Greenpeace. 'Why in God's name would you spend $24 billion on new nuclear plants that will not come online for a decade,' he said, adding that the urgency of action on global warming makes that prospect 'a day late and more than a dollar short.' Riccio also pointed out that some of the country's smartest investors who have looked at energy policy have rejected nuclear power as an option. T. Boone Pickens recently proposed an energy plan focused heavily on solar, wind and natural gas - without mentioning nuclear, Riccio noted. And a subsidiary of Warren Buffett's Berkshire Hathaway Inc. recently backed away from a proposal to build a new nuclear plant, he added. 'When they did their due diligence they said it did not make sense,' Riccio said. 'If the world's greatest investor thinks nuclear is an economic dog, why is the government wasting my money on it' with subsidies. Citing several studies that call for urgent action and dramatic action to avoid the worst effects of global warming, Riccio said it makes far more sense to invest in the 'low hanging fruit.' 'Given the time frame, we have to do things that are fast and efficient,' he said, looking to solar and wind power along with increased efficiency, and avoid expensive or unproven options like nuclear and clean coal. 'We don't feel that [those] are viable options if you're going to address climate change in a meaningful time frame,' he said.

Return to Top

Pickens, Democrats agree in calling for alternative fuels

Jul. 19--WASHINGTON -- T. Boone Pickens says he's ready to give up partisan politics if it means weaning the country off foreign oil.

Mr. Pickens once gave millions to a group that undermined U.S. Sen. John Kerry's Vietnam War service and offered $1 million to anyone who could prove that the Swift Boat group's charges against the presidential candidate were false.

Now he's stopped donating to such groups as he preaches a clean-energy gospel that's won over Democrats such as Senate Majority Leader Harry Reid.

Mr. Pickens, 80, will meet Tuesday with House Speaker Nancy Pelosi and other top Democrats about his plan to replace oil with wind power and natural gas.

As Democrats struggle to address high gasoline prices without opening more wilderness and coastlines to oil companies, Mr. Pickens offers a valuable partnership: a certified oil industry icon who says the country can't drill its way out of the energy crisis. 'I can be most effective as a nonpartisan, and I think the Democrats know me to be an honorable person,' Mr. Pickens said Friday, adding that he's talked to Al Gore and the two agreed on '95 percent of what we talked about.' Mr. Pickens is financing a $50 million advertising campaign aimed at reducing oil imports by building massive wind farms and using natural gas to fuel cars.

The ideas align perfectly with his business ventures, which appears to make Democrats enthusiastic -- not cynical -- about his pitch. 'If Pickens can show it's very profitable, that's a very important point,' said Daniel J. Weiss, director of climate strategy for the Center for American Progress, a liberal think tank. 'That will help steer investors toward those kinds of investments.' In addition to cooperating with Democrats, Mr. Pickens is offering other surprises.

He suggests that the country 'probably needs' a national electricity grid to take advantage of all the wind power that would come from the middle of the country, including West Texas. The idea is radical for Texas, whose independent grid gives it freedom from federal regulation. 'What Pickens wants to do is go beyond that, and make sure the grid not only goes from the Panhandle to Dallas or Houston but to Albuquerque or Los Angeles,' Mr. Weiss said. 'It's a way to expand the market for clean electricity.' Mr. Pickens is already the country's most famous advocate of wind power.

This version of Total Mail Converter is not registered.

His company, Mesa Power LLP, announced in May that it would spend $2 billion on enormous turbines to harness the wind of West Texas.

The state boosted his plan this week by authorizing an almost $5 billion plan to build transmission lines to carry the electricity to Texas cities.

Count Mr. Reid, the Senate majority leader, as one of his newest fans.

The Nevada Democrat said Thursday that although Mr. Pickens was once 'my mortal enemy,' he is 'putting his money where his mouth is' when it comes to clean energy.

Mr. Pickens will appear next month in Las Vegas with several famous Democrats, including former President Clinton and former Treasury Secretary Robert Rubin, at an energy summit hosted by Mr. Reid and the Center for American Progress Action Fund.

But how Mr. Pickens' big ideas translate in Washington is uncertain.

Energy politics have become thorny as Democrats resist President Bush's call to allow exploration on the Outer Continental Shelf, or OCS.

If there's no immediate compromise on new drilling, Mr. Pickens' emphasis on natural gas could have appeal.

Rep. Rahm Emanuel, a leading House Democrat, announced legislation this week to force automakers to make 10 percent of their cars run on natural gas by 2018.

The bill would provide $2.6 billion in bonding authority for low-interest loans for natural-gas fueling stations.

Mr. Emanuel has been working on the proposal for a year and spoke to Mr. Pickens about it, an aide said.

Mr. Pickens said he didn't think he influenced the bill but said the two had 'a good conversation' about it. But Mr. Pickens doesn't agree with all the Democrats' energy priorities.

Bills to limit speculation on energy prices are 'wasting time' and ignore the cause of high prices -- not enough oil, he said. 'Go ahead and drill on the OCS,' said Mr. Pickens, who also plans to meet with House Republican leaders next week. 'I'm not against anything except for foreign oil.' The United States imports about 65 percent of its oil, costing the country about $700 billion a year, Mr. Pickens says.

By comparison, most of its natural gas comes from North American sources.

Rep. Gene Green, a Houston Democrat who supports new domestic drilling, said Mr. Pickens' plan is 'a great idea' but could be ensnared in partisan politics.

Hundreds of House Republicans and energy-state Democrats would probably insist that legislation such as Mr. Emanuel's include authorization for new domestic drilling. 'Natural gas is at historically high [price] levels, and if we're going to create another big user of it, we're going to have to have more production,' Mr. Green said. Mr. Pickens supports new exploration but says Mr. Green has it wrong.

Wind power could replace natural gas for power plants.

The country has been woefully slow to adopt natural gas as a fuel for vehicles, even though the idea is gaining ground overseas, he noted.

The world has 8 million vehicles running on natural gas, but only 142,000 in the United States, he said. 'We have ample natural gas to do this,' he said. 'So how did we get ourselves in this spot? 'We got ourselves here because the oil was cheap. And they kept feeding us rope, and we hung ourselves.' Even former Green Party presidential candidate Ralph Nader, who's running a low-profile independent campaign this year, thinks Mr. Pickens' platform could make a difference in the energy debate. 'I'm very alert to the way things move in Washington, and very often they move in unconventional manners,' Mr. Nader said. 'They don't move because the president moves or because the Congress moves. They move because some one person or persons take a dramatic detour. 'It's like [Ross] Perot.' Staff writer Elizabeth Souder contributed to this report.

To see more of The Dallas Morning News, or to subscribe to the newspaper, go to http://www.dallasnews.com. Copyright (c) 2008, The Dallas Morning News Distributed by McClatchy-Tribune Information Services. For reprints, email tmsreprints@permissionsgroup.com, call 800-374-7985 or 847-635-6550, send a fax to 847-635-6968, or write to The Permissions Group Inc., 1247 Milwaukee Ave., Suite 303, Glenview, IL 60025, USA.

This version of Total Mail Converter is not registered.

Return to Top

Pickens, Democrats agree in calling for alternative fuels

Michaels, Dave
Dallas Morning News

Jul. 19--WASHINGTON -- T. Boone Pickens says he's ready to give up partisan politics if it means weaning the country off foreign oil.

Mr. Pickens once gave millions to a group that undermined U.S. Sen. John Kerry's Vietnam War service and offered $1 million to anyone who could prove that the Swift Boat group's charges against the presidential candidate were false.

Now he's stopped donating to such groups as he preaches a clean-energy gospel that's won over Democrats such as Senate Majority Leader Harry Reid.

Mr. Pickens, 80, will meet Tuesday with House Speaker Nancy Pelosi and other top Democrats about his plan to replace oil with wind power and natural gas.

As Democrats struggle to address high gasoline prices without opening more wilderness and coastlines to oil companies, Mr. Pickens offers a valuable partnership: a certified oil industry icon who says the country can't drill its way out of the energy crisis.

"I can be most effective as a nonpartisan, and I think the Democrats know me to be an honorable person," Mr. Pickens said Friday, adding that he's talked to Al Gore and the two agreed on "95 percent of what we talked about."

Mr. Pickens is financing a $50 million advertising campaign aimed at reducing oil imports by building massive wind farms and using natural gas to fuel cars.

The ideas align perfectly with his business ventures, which appears to make Democrats enthusiastic -- not cynical -- about his pitch.

"If Pickens can show it's very profitable, that's a very important point," said Daniel J. Weiss, director of climate strategy for the Center for American Progress, a liberal think tank.

"That will help steer investors toward those kinds of investments."

In addition to cooperating with Democrats, Mr. Pickens is offering other surprises.

He suggests that the country "probably needs" a national electricity grid to take advantage of all the wind power that would come from the middle of the country, including West Texas. The idea is radical for Texas, whose independent grid gives it freedom from federal regulation.

"What Pickens wants to do is go beyond that, and make sure the grid not only goes from the Panhandle to Dallas or Houston but to Albuquerque or Los Angeles," Mr. Weiss said.

"It's a way to expand the market for clean electricity."

Mr. Pickens is already the country's most famous advocate of wind power.

His company, Mesa Power LLP, announced in May that it would spend $2 billion on enormous turbines to harness the wind of West Texas.

The state boosted his plan this week by authorizing an almost $5 billion plan to build transmission lines to carry the electricity to Texas cities.

Count Mr. Reid, the Senate majority leader, as one of his newest fans.

The Nevada Democrat said Thursday that although Mr. Pickens was once "my mortal enemy," he is "putting his money where his mouth is" when it comes to clean energy.

Mr. Pickens will appear next month in Las Vegas with several famous Democrats, including former President Clinton and former Treasury Secretary Robert Rubin, at an energy summit hosted by Mr. Reid and the Center for American Progress Action Fund.

But how Mr. Pickens' big ideas translate in Washington is uncertain.

Energy politics have become thorny as Democrats resist President Bush's call to allow exploration on the Outer Continental

This version of Total Mail Converter is not registered.

Shelf, or OCS.

If there's no immediate compromise on new drilling, Mr. Pickens' emphasis on natural gas could have appeal.

Rep. Rahm Emanuel, a leading House Democrat, announced legislation this week to force automakers to make 10 percent of their cars run on natural gas by 2018.

The bill would provide $2.6 billion in bonding authority for low-interest loans for natural-gas fueling stations.

Mr. Emanuel has been working on the proposal for a year and spoke to Mr. Pickens about it, an aide said.

Mr. Pickens said he didn't think he influenced the bill but said the two had "a good conversation" about it.

But Mr. Pickens doesn't agree with all the Democrats' energy priorities.

Bills to limit speculation on energy prices are "wasting time" and ignore the cause of high prices -- not enough oil, he said.

"Go ahead and drill on the OCS," said Mr. Pickens, who also plans to meet with House Republican leaders next week.

"I'm not against anything except for foreign oil."

The United States imports about 65 percent of its oil, costing the country about $700 billion a year, Mr. Pickens says.

By comparison, most of its natural gas comes from North American sources.

Rep. Gene Green, a Houston Democrat who supports new domestic drilling, said Mr. Pickens' plan is "a great idea" but could be ensnared in partisan politics.

Hundreds of House Republicans and energy-state Democrats would probably insist that legislation such as Mr. Emanuel's include authorization for new domestic drilling.

"Natural gas is at historically high [price] levels, and if we're going to create another big user of it, we're going to have to have more production," Mr. Green said.

Mr. Pickens supports new exploration but says Mr. Green has it wrong.

Wind power could replace natural gas for power plants.

The country has been woefully slow to adopt natural gas as a fuel for vehicles, even though the idea is gaining ground overseas, he noted.

The world has 8 million vehicles running on natural gas, but only 142,000 in the United States, he said.

"We have ample natural gas to do this," he said. "So how did we get ourselves in this spot?

"We got ourselves here because the oil was cheap. And they kept feeding us rope, and we hung ourselves."

Even former Green Party presidential candidate Ralph Nader, who's running a low-profile independent campaign this year, thinks Mr. Pickens' platform could make a difference in the energy debate.

"I'm very alert to the way things move in Washington, and very often they move in unconventional manners," Mr. Nader said.

"They don't move because the president moves or because the Congress moves. They move because some one person or persons take a dramatic detour.

"It's like [Ross] Perot."

Staff writer Elizabeth Souder contributed to this report.

Copyright © 2008 The Dallas Morning News

Return to Top

Pickens, Democrats agree in calling for alternative fuels

DAVE MICHAELS
Denton Record-Chronicle

This version of Total Mail Converter is not registered.

WASHINGTON T. Boone Pickens says he's ready to give up partisan politics if it means weaning the country off foreign oil.

Mr. Pickens once gave millions to a group that undermined U.S. Sen. John Kerry's Vietnam War service and offered $1 million to anyone who could prove that the Swift Boat group's charges against the presidential candidate were false.

Now he's stopped donating to such groups as he preaches a clean-energy gospel that's won over Democrats such as Senate Majority Leader Harry Reid.

Mr. Pickens, 80, will meet Tuesday with House Speaker Nancy Pelosi and other top Democrats about his plan to replace oil with wind power and natural gas.

As Democrats struggle to address high gasoline prices without opening more wilderness and coastlines to oil companies, Mr. Pickens offers a valuable partnership: a certified oil industry icon who says the country can't drill its way out of the energy crisis. 'I can be most effective as a nonpartisan, and I think the Democrats know me to be an honorable person,' Mr. Pickens said Friday, adding that he's talked to Al Gore and the two agreed on '95 percent of what we talked about.' Mr. Pickens is financing a $50 million advertising campaign aimed at reducing oil imports by building massive wind farms and using natural gas to fuel cars.

The ideas align perfectly with his business ventures, which appears to make Democrats enthusiastic not cynical about his pitch. 'If Pickens can show it's very profitable, that's a very important point,' said Daniel J. Weiss, director of climate strategy for the Center for American Progress, a liberal think tank. 'That will help steer investors toward those kinds of investments.' In addition to cooperating with Democrats, Mr. Pickens is offering other surprises.

He suggests that the country 'probably needs' a national electricity grid to take advantage of all the wind power that would come from the middle of the country, including West Texas. The idea is radical for Texas, whose independent grid gives it freedom from federal regulation. 'What Pickens wants to do is go beyond that, and make sure the grid not only goes from the Panhandle to Dallas or Houston but to Albuquerque or Los Angeles,' Mr. Weiss said. 'It's a way to expand the market for clean electricity.' Mr. Pickens is already the country's most famous advocate of wind power.

His company, Mesa Power LLP, announced in May that it would spend $2 billion on enormous turbines to harness the wind of West Texas.

The state boosted his plan this week by authorizing an almost $5 billion plan to build transmission lines to carry the electricity to Texas cities.

Count Mr. Reid, the Senate majority leader, as one of his newest fans.

The Nevada Democrat said Thursday that although Mr. Pickens was once 'my mortal enemy,' he is 'putting his money where his mouth is' when it comes to clean energy.

Mr. Pickens will appear next month in Las Vegas with several famous Democrats, including former President Clinton and former Treasury Secretary Robert Rubin, at an energy summit hosted by Mr. Reid and the Center for American Progress Action Fund.

But how Mr. Pickens' big ideas translate in Washington is uncertain.

Energy politics have become thorny as Democrats resist President Bush's call to allow exploration on the Outer Continental Shelf, or OCS.

If there's no immediate compromise on new drilling, Mr. Pickens' emphasis on natural gas could have appeal.

Rep. Rahm Emanuel, a leading House Democrat, announced legislation this week to force automakers to make 10 percent of their cars run on natural gas by 2018.

The bill would provide $2.6 billion in bonding authority for low-interest loans for natural-gas fueling stations.

Mr. Emanuel has been working on the proposal for a year and spoke to Mr. Pickens about it, an aide said.

Mr. Pickens said he didn't think he influenced the bill but said the two had 'a good conversation' about it. But Mr. Pickens doesn't agree with all the Democrats' energy priorities.

Bills to limit speculation on energy prices are 'wasting time' and ignore the cause of high prices not enough oil, he said. 'Go ahead and drill on the OCS,' said Mr. Pickens, who also plans to meet with House Republican leaders next week. 'I'm not against anything except for foreign oil.' The United States imports about 65 percent of its oil, costing the country about $700 billion a year, Mr. Pickens says.

This version of Total Mail Converter is not registered.

By comparison, most of its natural gas comes from North American sources.

Rep. Gene Green, a Houston Democrat who supports new domestic drilling, said Mr. Pickens' plan is 'a great idea' but could be ensnared in partisan politics.

Hundreds of House Republicans and energy-state Democrats would probably insist that legislation such as Mr. Emanuel's include authorization for new domestic drilling. 'Natural gas is at historically high [price] levels, and if we're going to create another big user of it, we're going to have to have more production,' Mr. Green said. Mr. Pickens supports new exploration but says Mr. Green has it wrong.

Wind power could replace natural gas for power plants.

The country has been woefully slow to adopt natural gas as a fuel for vehicles, even though the idea is gaining ground overseas, he noted.

The world has 8 million vehicles running on natural gas, but only 142,000 in the United States, he said. 'We have ample natural gas to do this,' he said. 'So how did we get ourselves in this spot? 'We got ourselves here because the oil was cheap. And they kept feeding us rope, and we hung ourselves.' Even former Green Party presidential candidate Ralph Nader, who's running a low-profile independent campaign this year, thinks Mr. Pickens' platform could make a difference in the energy debate. 'I'm very alert to the way things move in Washington, and very often they move in unconventional manners,' Mr. Nader said. 'They don't move because the president moves or because the Congress moves. They move because some one person or persons take a dramatic detour. 'It's like [Ross] Perot.' Staff writer Elizabeth Souder contributed to this report.

Return to Top

Pickens, Democrats agree in calling for alternative fuels

DAVE MICHAELS
WFAA-TV

WASHINGTON T. Boone Pickens says he's ready to give up partisan politics if it means weaning the country off foreign oil.

Mr. Pickens once gave millions to a group that undermined U.S. Sen. John Kerry's Vietnam War service and offered $1 million to anyone who could prove that the Swift Boat group's charges against the presidential candidate were false.

Now he's stopped donating to such groups as he preaches a clean-energy gospel that's won over Democrats such as Senate Majority Leader Harry Reid.

Mr. Pickens, 80, will meet Tuesday with House Speaker Nancy Pelosi and other top Democrats about his plan to replace oil with wind power and natural gas.

As Democrats struggle to address high gasoline prices without opening more wilderness and coastlines to oil companies, Mr. Pickens offers a valuable partnership: a certified oil industry icon who says the country can't drill its way out of the energy crisis.

'I can be most effective as a nonpartisan, and I think the Democrats know me to be an honorable person,' Mr. Pickens said Friday, adding that he's talked to Al Gore and the two agreed on '95 percent of what we talked about.'

Mr. Pickens is financing a $50 million advertising campaign aimed at reducing oil imports by building massive wind farms and using natural gas to fuel cars.

The ideas align perfectly with his business ventures, which appears to make Democrats enthusiastic not cynical about his pitch.

'If Pickens can show it's very profitable, that's a very important point,' said Daniel J. Weiss, director of climate strategy for the Center for American Progress, a liberal think tank.

'That will help steer investors toward those kinds of investments.'

In addition to cooperating with Democrats, Mr. Pickens is offering other surprises.

He suggests that the country 'probably needs' a national electricity grid to take advantage of all the wind power that would come from the middle of the country, including West Texas. The idea is radical for Texas, whose independent grid gives it freedom from federal regulation.

'What Pickens wants to do is go beyond that, and make sure the grid not only goes from the Panhandle to Dallas or Houston but to Albuquerque or Los Angeles,' Mr. Weiss said.

This version of Total Mail Converter is not registered.

'It's a way to expand the market for clean electricity.'

Mr. Pickens is already the country's most famous advocate of wind power.

His company, Mesa Power LLP, announced in May that it would spend $2 billion on enormous turbines to harness the wind of West Texas.

The state boosted his plan this week by authorizing an almost $5 billion plan to build transmission lines to carry the electricity to Texas cities.

Count Mr. Reid, the Senate majority leader, as one of his newest fans.

The Nevada Democrat said Thursday that although Mr. Pickens was once 'my mortal enemy,' he is 'putting his money where his mouth is' when it comes to clean energy.

Mr. Pickens will appear next month in Las Vegas with several famous Democrats, including former President Clinton and former Treasury Secretary Robert Rubin, at an energy summit hosted by Mr. Reid and the Center for American Progress Action Fund.

But how Mr. Pickens' big ideas translate in Washington is uncertain.

Energy politics have become thorny as Democrats resist President Bush's call to allow exploration on the Outer Continental Shelf, or OCS.

If there's no immediate compromise on new drilling, Mr. Pickens' emphasis on natural gas could have appeal.

Rep. Rahm Emanuel, a leading House Democrat, announced legislation this week to force automakers to make 10 percent of their cars run on natural gas by 2018.

The bill would provide $2.6 billion in bonding authority for low-interest loans for natural-gas fueling stations.

Mr. Emanuel has been working on the proposal for a year and spoke to Mr. Pickens about it, an aide said.

Mr. Pickens said he didn't think he influenced the bill but said the two had 'a good conversation' about it.

But Mr. Pickens doesn't agree with all the Democrats' energy priorities.

Bills to limit speculation on energy prices are 'wasting time' and ignore the cause of high prices not enough oil, he said.

'Go ahead and drill on the OCS,' said Mr. Pickens, who also plans to meet with House Republican leaders next week.

'I'm not against anything except for foreign oil.'

The United States imports about 65 percent of its oil, costing the country about $700 billion a year, Mr. Pickens says.

By comparison, most of its natural gas comes from North American sources.

Rep. Gene Green, a Houston Democrat who supports new domestic drilling, said Mr. Pickens' plan is 'a great idea' but could be ensnared in partisan politics.

Hundreds of House Republicans and energy-state Democrats would probably insist that legislation such as Mr. Emanuel's include authorization for new domestic drilling.

'Natural gas is at historically high [price] levels, and if we're going to create another big user of it, we're going to have to have more production,' Mr. Green said.

Mr. Pickens supports new exploration but says Mr. Green has it wrong.

Wind power could replace natural gas for power plants.

The country has been woefully slow to adopt natural gas as a fuel for vehicles, even though the idea is gaining ground overseas, he noted.

The world has 8 million vehicles running on natural gas, but only 142,000 in the United States, he said.

'We have ample natural gas to do this,' he said. 'So how did we get ourselves in this spot?

This version of Total Mail Converter is not registered.

'We got ourselves here because the oil was cheap. And they kept feeding us rope, and we hung ourselves.'

Even former Green Party presidential candidate Ralph Nader, who's running a low-profile independent campaign this year, thinks Mr. Pickens' platform could make a difference in the energy debate.

'I'm very alert to the way things move in Washington, and very often they move in unconventional manners,' Mr. Nader said.

'They don't move because the president moves or because the Congress moves. They move because some one person or persons take a dramatic detour.

'It's like [Ross] Perot.'

Staff writer Elizabeth Souder contributed to this report.

Return to Top

Pickens, Democrats agree in calling for alternative fuels

DAVE MICHAELS
Quick

WASHINGTON T. Boone Pickens says he's ready to give up partisan politics if it means weaning the country off foreign oil.

Mr. Pickens once gave millions to a group that undermined U.S. Sen. John Kerry's Vietnam War service and offered $1 million to anyone who could prove that the Swift Boat group's charges against the presidential candidate were false.

Now he's stopped donating to such groups as he preaches a clean-energy gospel that's won over Democrats such as Senate Majority Leader Harry Reid.

Mr. Pickens, 80, will meet Tuesday with House Speaker Nancy Pelosi and other top Democrats about his plan to replace oil with wind power and natural gas.

As Democrats struggle to address high gasoline prices without opening more wilderness and coastlines to oil companies, Mr. Pickens offers a valuable partnership: a certified oil industry icon who says the country can't drill its way out of the energy crisis. 'I can be most effective as a nonpartisan, and I think the Democrats know me to be an honorable person,' Mr. Pickens said Friday, adding that he's talked to Al Gore and the two agreed on '95 percent of what we talked about.' Mr. Pickens is financing a $50 million advertising campaign aimed at reducing oil imports by building massive wind farms and using natural gas to fuel cars.

The ideas align perfectly with his business ventures, which appears to make Democrats enthusiastic not cynical about his pitch. 'If Pickens can show it's very profitable, that's a very important point,' said Daniel J. Weiss, director of climate strategy for the Center for American Progress, a liberal think tank. 'That will help steer investors toward those kinds of investments.' In addition to cooperating with Democrats, Mr. Pickens is offering other surprises.

He suggests that the country 'probably needs' a national electricity grid to take advantage of all the wind power that would come from the middle of the country, including West Texas. The idea is radical for Texas, whose independent grid gives it freedom from federal regulation. 'What Pickens wants to do is go beyond that, and make sure the grid not only goes from the Panhandle to Dallas or Houston but to Albuquerque or Los Angeles,' Mr. Weiss said. 'It's a way to expand the market for clean electricity.' Mr. Pickens is already the country's most famous advocate of wind power.

His company, Mesa Power LLP, announced in May that it would spend $2 billion on enormous turbines to harness the wind of West Texas.

The state boosted his plan this week by authorizing an almost $5 billion plan to build transmission lines to carry the electricity to Texas cities.

Count Mr. Reid, the Senate majority leader, as one of his newest fans.

The Nevada Democrat said Thursday that although Mr. Pickens was once 'my mortal enemy,' he is 'putting his money where his mouth is' when it comes to clean energy.

Mr. Pickens will appear next month in Las Vegas with several famous Democrats, including former President Clinton and former Treasury Secretary Robert Rubin, at an energy summit hosted by Mr. Reid and the Center for American Progress Action Fund.

This version of Total Mail Converter is not registered.

But how Mr. Pickens' big ideas translate in Washington is uncertain.

Energy politics have become thorny as Democrats resist President Bush's call to allow exploration on the Outer Continental Shelf, or OCS.

If there's no immediate compromise on new drilling, Mr. Pickens' emphasis on natural gas could have appeal.

Rep. Rahm Emanuel, a leading House Democrat, announced legislation this week to force automakers to make 10 percent of their cars run on natural gas by 2018.

The bill would provide $2.6 billion in bonding authority for low-interest loans for natural-gas fueling stations.

Mr. Emanuel has been working on the proposal for a year and spoke to Mr. Pickens about it, an aide said.

Mr. Pickens said he didn't think he influenced the bill but said the two had 'a good conversation' about it. But Mr. Pickens doesn't agree with all the Democrats' energy priorities.

Bills to limit speculation on energy prices are 'wasting time' and ignore the cause of high prices not enough oil, he said. 'Go ahead and drill on the OCS,' said Mr. Pickens, who also plans to meet with House Republican leaders next week. 'I'm not against anything except for foreign oil.' The United States imports about 65 percent of its oil, costing the country about $700 billion a year, Mr. Pickens says.

By comparison, most of its natural gas comes from North American sources.

Rep. Gene Green, a Houston Democrat who supports new domestic drilling, said Mr. Pickens' plan is 'a great idea' but could be ensnared in partisan politics.

Hundreds of House Republicans and energy-state Democrats would probably insist that legislation such as Mr. Emanuel's include authorization for new domestic drilling. 'Natural gas is at historically high [price] levels, and if we're going to create another big user of it, we're going to have to have more production,' Mr. Green said. Mr. Pickens supports new exploration but says Mr. Green has it wrong.

Wind power could replace natural gas for power plants.

The country has been woefully slow to adopt natural gas as a fuel for vehicles, even though the idea is gaining ground overseas, he noted.

The world has 8 million vehicles running on natural gas, but only 142,000 in the United States, he said. 'We have ample natural gas to do this,' he said. 'So how did we get ourselves in this spot? 'We got ourselves here because the oil was cheap. And they kept feeding us rope, and we hung ourselves.' Even former Green Party presidential candidate Ralph Nader, who's running a low-profile independent campaign this year, thinks Mr. Pickens' platform could make a difference in the energy debate. 'I'm very alert to the way things move in Washington, and very often they move in unconventional manners,' Mr. Nader said. 'They don't move because the president moves or because the Congress moves. They move because some one person or persons take a dramatic detour. 'It's like [Ross] Perot.' Staff writer Elizabeth Souder contributed to this report.

Return to Top

Darfur justice at last?

'I can no longer tolerate denial,' said Moreno-Ocampo, a former Argentinian human rights lawyer, speaking to reporters last week at the headquarters of the International Criminal Court (ICC) in The Hague. 'His al-Bashir's motives were largely political. His alibi was a counterinsurgency'. His intent was genocide.' If al-Bashir now sets foot in any one of the 106 states that have ratified the 1998 Treaty of Rome which established the ICC - the world's first permanent war crimes court, established by a United Nations Security Council resolution - it will be legally obliged to arrest and transport him to cells in the Dutch capital to be formally charged and tried.

The chief prosecutor's bold move, however, offers no quick relief to the well-documented pain and torment of the black African tribes of Darfur at the hands of the Sudan army and al-Bashir's Arab janjaweed Arabic for 'evil spirits on horseback' militias. The ICC's wheels move at snail's pace.

Most immediately, the indictment has triggered an international diplomatic firestorm which, like the Zimbabwe crisis, is escalating into an almighty row in the UN Security Council.

China, al-Bashir's weapons supplier and most important economic partner, and Russia have already begun manoeuvring in the Security Council to prevent the prosecution.

In an emergency closed session in New York on Wednesday, the council began discussing the charges of genocide, crimes against humanity, and war crimes laid against al-Bashir.

This version of Total Mail Converter is not registered.

Russian and Chinese delegates said they feared the prosecutor's request could jeopardise efforts to bring peace to Darfur, where an estimated 400,000 people in a population of 6.5 million have died in a five-year conflict and three million have become refugees, fleeing to camps within Darfur itself or across Sudan's western border into Chad.

Russian ambassador Vitaly Churkin and his Chinese counterpart, Wang Guangya, have apparently not been listening to General Martin Luther Agwai, the Nigerian Force Commander of the joint United Nations-African Union peacekeeping mission (Unamid) in Darfur. 'I ask myself: where is the peace for us to keep?' he asked on Friday after seven of his men, from Rwanda, Ghana and Uganda, had been killed and 22 seriously wounded in a highly organised assault by 200 janjaweed gunmen on horseback and in 40 vehicles equipped with rifles, machine guns and an arsenal of heavy-calibre weaponry.

An angry Agwai added: 'The unpalatable truth is that there is no peace in Darfur. This is a conflict that has now lasted as long as the second world war, with the prospects of a lasting settlement looking less likely than ever before.' The fragile Darfur Peace Agreement was in a coma almost from the moment it was signed on May 5, 2006. Tragically, violence against civilians intensified once all sides had put their signatures to the deal. For a few of the following months many voices across the world were raised in campaigns to 'Save Darfur', which became a fashionable First World catchphrase before ennui set in while the Darfur killings and rapes continued.

Agwai's predicament mirrors the situation that confronted General Romo Dallaire, the Canadian Force Commander of the UN Assistance Mission for Rwanda (Unamir), in 1994. Anticipating Rwanda's Hutu government was about to embark upon mass killings of Tutsis and moderate Hutus, he appealed for international troop enforcements.

Both United States president Bill Clinton and Kofi Annan, then head of UN Peacekeeping Operations and later UN secretary-general, vetoed Dallaire's request.

In the following 100 days 800,000 unprotected Tutsis and moderate Hutus were slaughtered, along with some of Dallaire's handful of soldier peacekeepers from Ghana, Senegal, Uruguay and Belgium.

Agwai protested that so far he had been given only 7000 of the 26,000 soldiers and policemen he was promised. The force commander also said he has 'none of the promised tactical helicopters that might have prevented the slaughter of our men. We remain desperately under-manned and poorly equipped'. He added: 'Our long shopping list of missing equipment makes shameful reading. It should not take the loss of innocent lives to understand what is at stake here. We need to be reinforced urgently and given the proper equipment to enable us to complete our mission.' Moreno-Ocampo's move has been precipitated by the failure of the Darfur peace process, as spelled out by Agwai; by the world's impotent cries that 'something must be done'; and by al-Bashir's refusal to hand over two men indicted by ICC 16 months ago in connection with atrocities in Darfur - janjaweed supreme commander Ali Kushyb and Sudan's deputy interior minister Ahmed Harun.

Al-Bashir responded by swearing 'before Allah three times' that he would never extradite a Sudanese citizen to any foreign court, and then by promoting Harun to humanitarian affairs minister with special responsibility for humanitarian assistance to the people of Darfur.

A Security Council resolution in January this year, calling on al-Bashir to comply with the ICC by handing over Harun and Kushyb, had to be scrapped because of opposition from China and Russia, who both wield vetoes.

At the time, Moreno-Ocampo gave one example to Security Council ambassadors of a combined Sudan Army-janjaweed attack on October 8, 2007, on the small Darfur town of Muhajiriya in which 48 black African civilians praying in a mosque were rounded up and slaughtered.

Britain's UN ambassador, John Sawyers, blamed China for the blocking of that resolution, while Bushara Suleiman, justice spokesman of one of Darfur's rebel groups, the Justice and Equality Movement, said the only thing that would stop the genocide would be the imposition of oil sanctions on Sudan. 'But China will never allow this,' said Suleiman. 'The Chinese have their veto and also have oil interests in Sudan.' In fact, China buys most of the 500,000 barrels of oil that Sudan produces each day and is al-Bashir's largest supplier of arms. Thousands of Chinese labourers have built three weapons factories near the Sudan capital, Khartoum, an oil refinery and a 950-mile pipeline that carries oil from the fields of central Sudan to a Red Sea terminal, where Chinese tankers queue to load the black gold.

The oil deal with China is worth nearly 5 billion a year to al-Bashir's government. China has also richly rewarded al-Bashir's armed forces with tanks, helicopters, fighter and bomber aircraft, howitzers, anti-personnel mines, machine-guns and rocket-propelled grenades.

Holding people accountable for war crimes is not only the right thing to do morally, but it directly promotes peace and makes such future possible abuses less likely, argued John Prendergast, former senior adviser to the International Crisis Group but who now works for the Enough Project, which describes its mission as to 'prevent genocide and mass atrocities by promoting peace, providing protection, and punishing the perpetrators'. Prendergast noted that Moreno-Ocampo's move against al-Bashir had set off 'a chorus of hand-wringing among certain diplomats, academics and pundits who are now arguing that holding perpetrators of crimes against humanity accountable for their actions is unhelpful'. 'It is baffling why anyone would think that acceding to the demands of war criminals is a sensible path to securing peace,' said Prendergast. 'But part of the reason Darfur has remained locked in crisis for years is that the international community has been slow to acknowledge what has always been painfully obvious: the janjaweed militias that have terrorised and decimated Darfur have been directed by the Sudanese government.' Elsewhere, especially in Khartoum, people argue that the indictment of al-Bashir will worsen the situation in Darfur, pull the rug from under the feet of Agwai's Unamid mission and endanger the lives of international humanitarian aid workers in Darfur.

This version of Total Mail Converter is not registered.

Khartoum is making no secret of the fact it will put up the fight of its life. The counter-offensive will begin on the African Union and Arab League fronts - both of which scheduled emergency high-level meetings on the crisis at Sudan's request. Both are likely to back al-Bashir.

The 22-nation Arab League meeting began this weekend in Cairo. The league as a whole is loathe to see what it regards as the humiliation by the ICC of an Arab leader, although Saudi Arabia and Egypt, who are both fed up with al-Bashir for a host of reasons, have yet to make any firm commitment to support him following Moreno-Ocampo's announcement.

Many also question the ability of the fractious league to help al-Bashir in his confrontation with the ICC, especially since only three member countries are signatories to the court's founding treaty - Jordan, Djibouti and Comoros. 'All they can do is issue a statement of condemnation to console the Sudanese president,' wrote Abdel-Rahman al-Rashid, a leading columnist for the Saudi newspaper Asharq Al-Awsat. 'We must remember the Arab League did not care about the extermination of 300,000 Darfuris. It even refused to stand for a moment's silence concerning the killings, displacements and burning.'

Return to Top

ICC justice is useless If it destroys peace

James Okuk
Sudan Tribune

International Law must be delivered with the right procedures and indubitable evidences if it has to be credited as objective justice. This Law of Nations must not be biased with politics of selfish competition in the international and global interests. This Law must always be the servant of security, stability, order and peace and not vice versa. This Law must not be put as a Blockage Cart before the Horse of Peace and Political Progress in the Sudan. It must not be used as a tool of Political Pressure on Sudan Government by the non-signatory to it like USA Government or by the signatory to it like the Governments of France and UK, among others. It must not also be abused by the Civil Society Lobby Groups like Save Darfur Coalition and Human Rights Watch who are good at nothing except exaggerating the statistics of the dead and displaced Darfurians and wishing them ever lasting suffering for the benefit of expatriates.

Yes, it is true that Justice delayed is Justice denied but it is even truer that Peace disturbed is Peace destroyed. Peace is a greater good than Justice and that is why the United Nations got founded on it rather than on Justice. Justice can wait because Peace is a priority to it. The current President of African Union, Jakaya Kikwete of Tanzania, understands the value of peace in Africa very well when he warned the ICC Western agents to avoid creating chaos in the continent by trying to indict the sitting President of the Sudan and lock him behind the Criminal Bars in The Hague. The Arab League Secretary-General, Amr Musa, said 'the situation is very serious and very dangerousthe search for justice should not jeopardize the other priorities in Sudan.' African Union Peace and Security Commissioner, Ramtane Lamamra, said ICC targeting of African High Officials is unacceptable Why have the ICCs first four cases targeted African conflicts only? Is this an attempt to prove that Africa knows nothing best about government except to murder its citizens in a genocider manner?

Liberias Charles Taylor in 2006 and Yugoslavias Slobodan Milosevic in 1993 were the only Heads of States tried in the International Courts but that was done when they were out of power. Can Ocampo wait until Sudan ratify the Rome Statute and until Al Bashir becomes a former Head of State, and perhaps until Sudan become a Failed State without effective judiciary for him to make his case relevance?

Arrogant and rigid enforcement of International Law is an abrogation of justice especially when it is done hastily with political motives rather than legal intentions. For example, upon hearing the news of Ocampo ill-motives on the President of the Sudan, George Bush run to the media and said were trying to work with Al Bashir to make sure he understands that there will be continued sanctions if he doesnt move forward by facilitating the deployment of peacekeepers and flow of aid in DarfurWere not a member of the ICC, but well see how that plays out with Al Bashir. You can understand here how USA is against the ICC but happy to use it as a Tool of Pressure on Sudan. You can also detect sarcastic Neo-colonial mentality from Bush when he thinks the President of the Sudan is a man who lacks understanding. I remember Hugo Chaves, the President of Venezuela telling Bush in the face that he is the worst devilish President the world ever had.

Also the French Foreign Ministry spokesman Eric Chevallier run to the media and said Ocampo move 'would constitute an element of positive appreciation by the International Community. Again the French envoy at the United Nations, Jean-Maurice Ripert hinted that his Government may freeze contacts with the Sudanese President Omar Hassan Al-Bashir if the judges of the ICC decided to issue an Arrest Warrant for himthe EU rules are very clear. We have no dialogue and no cooperation with anyone indicted by the ICC. My country will oppose any attempts to invoke article 16 of the ICC rules that empowers the UN Security Council to suspend prosecutions by the world tribunal. It is not too late for the Sudanese authorities to cooperate with the ICC by arresting and handing them Ahmed Haroun, the State Minister for Humanitarian Affairs, and the Janjaweed leader, Ali Mohamed Ali Abdel-Rahman known as Ali Kushayb for quick international trial. But is France neutral on the internal problems of the Sudan? Where is the rebel Abdel Wahid, the Leader of Sudan Liberation Army/Movement enjoying his life and making free international telephone calls? Does the Neo-colonialist like France care about the fate of the Sudan and the whole African continent?

This version of Total Mail Converter is not registered.

How many black people were burnt dead in Paris without bringing the perpetrators to the Book? Arent the French Companies hungry for the Oil of the Sudan? Dont they know that the former Cuba President, Fidel Castro, stayed in his country and did many good things to his people and to Africans without bothering about American sanctions and external trips? If the World denied H.E. Al Bashir traveling abroad, it will be even good for him to focus on the internal Affairs of the Sudan and travel to all its corners to see to it that good things are being done to the locals. Those who need him from other countries will have no option but to come to Sudan and beg him for oil.

Richard Dicker, the Director of Human Rights Watchs International Justice Program also run to the media and said charging President Al Bashir for the hideous crimes in Darfur shows that no one is above the law. It is the prosecutors job to follow the evidence wherever it leads, regardless of official position. Also Dr. James Smith, the Chief Executive of the Aegis Trust said the ICC move is an historic moment for International Justice; the first time a serving Head of State has been accused of genocide. Further, John Prendergast Co-Chair of the ENOUGH PROJECT and former Official of Clintons Administration said that the ICC indictments can be a step forward in the path to secure peace in Darfuruntil there is a consequence for the commission of genocide, it will continue. This action introduces a cost, finally, into the equation Some Human Rights Groups said the indictment may help move Darfur closer to peace. Excuse me please! What peace are you talking about when you are sending wrong signals to the rivaling parties? You better say your Lobby Groups will move closer to getting good money from Darfurianss sufferings.

But why should the Sudan be an experimenting ground for the ICC effectiveness? Is the Sudanese President a laboratory for testing the effectiveness of International Justice System? Has Ocampo proved that Sudan Judicial System is not genuine to try the criminal cased about Darfur region before the alleged accusation could be handled by the ICC? This should have been the first step of the treacherous ICC Prosecutor before he listed his accusations against Sudan Sovereignty.

Amnesty International urged Khartoum to refrain from using the Prosecutors announcement as an excuse to block the U.N. peacekeeping mission from protecting civilians in Darfur or delivering humanitarian assistance. Of course Khartoum can express its disappointment by any means that can make the ICC defer its proceedings against the President of the Sudan. Khartoum knows that If UN and Humanitarian Organizations are blocked in Darfur, this will make them unhappy because it will means blocking their big salaries and other privileges they enjoy in the name of the suffering people of Darfur. Sudans Permanent Representative to the United Nations, Abdel Mmahmood Abdel Haleem, said the President Al Bashir likely will visit the U.N. General Assembly in September 2008 and that Sudan would consider any attempt to arrest him on foreign soil the gravest of matters punishable by open options including military response. He said Sudan would consider any attempt of arrest as an invitation for the act of war. Unless USA is able to take all the Islamists to ICC and lock them behind bars, taking Al-Bashir there alone will not be a solution to their defeat by the most intelligent terrorist of the World, Osama Bin Laden.

The International Center for Transitional Justice (ICTJ) said silence in the face of atrocities does not prevent further crimes. But why are they silent about the crimes being committed by the American, the British and the French Governments in the Middle East, the Gulf and Asia? Is the ICC becoming a Pressure Tool to Sudan alone when it is supposed to look at international problems of injustice with independence, impartiality, fairness and effectiveness, and without ulterior motives? It is known that the ICC is based on a treaty, joined by 106 countries only. It will not act if a case can be investigated or prosecuted by a national judicial system unless the national proceedings are proven to be incompetent. The ICC is supposed to be a court of last resort when international peace is at threat. Is Al Bashir a threat to International Peace? It is also known that Sudan has not ratified the Rome Statute for it to qualify for ICC legal investigations and trials. Isnt Ocampo trying to popularize his international legal proceedings on a wrong Country?

China Foreign Ministry spokesman Liu Jianchao expressed serious concern and worry about the request by Occampo to the ICC judges to issue an Arrest Warrant against Al Bashir. He called on parties concerned to take a prudent attitude, and properly settle divergences through consultation. He said the ICCs move should help the stability of Sudan and the proper settlement of the Darfur issue, instead of the other way round. He said further that China will consult with other members of the U.N. Security Council to block the ICC from issuing the requested Arrest Warrant. Yes, China must move quickly and give Ocampo more money than he gets from the USA. Ban Ki-Moon said ICC would have very serious consequences for peacekeeping operations including the political process Im very worried but nobody can evade justice. In principal I believe that peace and justice should go hand in hand. Justice can be part of a peace process but peace without justice cannot be sustainable. This suggests that Ki-Moon only care about the comfort of his employees in Sudan but not about the Sudanese plight.

On 14th July 2008, Ocampo filed 10 charges against the sitting President of the Sudan without respect to the sovereignty vested upon him by the Interim Constitution of the Sudan (ICS), which was born as a result of the Comprehensive Peace Agreement (CPA) between the Sudan Peoples Liberation Movement (SPLM) and the National Congress (NC) who is the majority ruling party in the Sudan. The lazy Arm-chair Prosecutor of the ICC said three of these charges count for genocide, five counts for crimes against humanity, and two counts for murder. He accused Mr. Al Bashir of running a campaign of genocide that has killed 35,000 people outright, at least another 100,000 through a slow death and forced 2.5 million to flee their homes in Sudans Western Region using the military, political and diplomatic apparatus of the State. Ocampo categorized his evidence Sources for justifying his investigation as the follows:

This version of Total Mail Converter is not registered.

1) Some Eye Witnesses and Victims of the alleged crimes in Darfur;

2) Recorded interviews from some Sudan Government Officials;

3) Statements from some Experts on the activities of High Officials of the Sudan Government and leaders of Darfur Militia known as the Janjaweed;

4) Documents and other information provided by the Government of the Sudan upon request of the Prosecution;

5) The Report and other materials on Darfur from the UN Commission of Inquiry;

6) The Report and other materials provided by the Sudanese National Commission of Inquiry;

7) Documents and other materials obtained from open sources.

According to Ocampos idle Investigation Report, the wiped and the driven away people in Darfur were the Fur, Masalit and Zaghawa ethnic groups who challenged Al Bashirs Regime about the economic and political marginalization of their region. According the biased negative news he got from the CCN, BBC and Monte Carlo, these non-Arab groups rebelled against the Arab government and used arms to pursue their cause. These African tribes did not commit crimes in the process of their struggle and their hands are not soaked in any blood of the innocent Sudanese. They did not destroy government assets and should be encouraged to overthrow Al Bashirs Government with the help of the ICCs pressure.

With this background, the speedy and impatient Ocampo recommend to the ICC judges of Pre-Trial Chamber I to issue an International Warrant of Arrest to the accused President of the Sovereign Republic of the Sudan who is against the practice of neo-colonialism by the former colonialists. Mr. Ocampo has earned a lot of money from this work and is looking forward to earn more out of his dirty investigations as he did it some years back in his own country Argentine. Go and ask the Argentineans and they will tell you how they hate Ocampo because he is an agent of Americans and Europeans interests. These Neo-colonialists took him from Argentine to the ICC Headquarters in Netherlands. They did this because they found him to be a judge who is insensitive to the value of independence and national dignity of the Less Developed Countries because he enjoys being the servant of the so-called Super Masters of the so-called First World. Ocampo is even happy about the history of the massive genocide of Indigenous Red Indians of Americas. His country, Argentine is known of having eliminated the Black African and the Red Indians because of their Colour. Instead of plotting against the progress of the Sudan in peace-building and sustainable development, Ocampo should go and investigate the gravest historical human crimes that were committed in Argentina when it was invaded by his grandfathers who went from Europe to South America.

The Sudans Vice President, Sudans Vice President Ali Osman Mohamed Taha called the ICC move 'irresponsible, illegal and unprofessional.' The Sudan oppositions parties and the SPLM said that a political solution to crisis in Darfur is the key to preventing the negative impact of the possible Arrest Warrant that may be issued by the ICC against Sudan President. Yassir Arman called on the government to create a roadmap on Darfur within a week in consultation with other political parties and NGOs. Some SPLM leaders said they are ready to utilize their contacts to help diffuse the crisis through consultation with the International Community and Legal Cooperation with the ICC. The Umma Party said the ICC move can bring a constitutional collapse to Sudan after the good distance that has been covered. The Umma Party leader, Al-Sadiq Al-Mahdi said there should be a balance between justice and interests of peace targeting any person in this country, especially its leader, is targeting Sudan, its people, stability, peace and security. Dr. Hassan Al-Turabi, the leader of the Popular Congress Party (PCP) and former ally of Al-Bashir said South African model for Truth and Reconciliation is the way forward but he said he cannot make a ruling in the ICC prosecutors charges because it is something the court has to examine. Suleiman Sandal, the Deputy Chief of Staff of the Justice and Equality Movement (JEM) said they will put all their forces to the service of the ICC to help bring Al Bashir to justice. The ICC decision puts Al Bashir in a corner and will help us now to overtake his regime.' But using the ICC as a tool for achieving Regime Change defeats the purpose of Justice of the International Law.

The patriotic Sudanese must excuse the rebels and the run-away nationals who live abroad and who support foreign interests against the sovereignty of the Sudan. The President of the Sudan is not a less President than any President of any Country (like USA, France and UK). Real and patriotic Sudanese do not encourage any move that can cause undemocratic Regime Change in their country. They cannot accept to be fooled and used by Western countries who do not wish Sudan any good thing except continuous crisis and humanitarian interventions? What has the previous Regime Changes brought to Sudan apart from more chaos and suffering of the innocent people? Why do we advocate for Regime Change when its consequences are undesirable to the citizens of the Sudan who decided to endure and live inside the Sudan dignifully without running abroad to sell their birth rights in search of food and shelter?

The President Omer Hassan al-Bashir ratified on 14th July the Electoral Law which lays the basis for running free and fair elections in the first quarter of 2009. This law contains mixed electoral system. 60% of the 450 MPs will be chosen through the majority elect in their geographical constituencies. It also guarantees 25% of the parliamentary seats to women who will be elected through the proportional representation with other 15% of the MPs. The new law organizes the holding of general elections in the country at three levels, including presidential election and elections for the federal parliament and regional legislative chambers, while voters in Southern Sudan have also to elect the President of the Government there. The bill sets 4 percent minimum vote needed for any party to enter parliament through the proportional representation and requires for candidates at presidential elections to get at least 200 endorsements from 18 of Sudans 25 states. Why dont we appreciate Al Bashir for this achievement?

This version of Total Mail Converter is not registered.

Thank to H.E. Salva Kiir for accepting to head the Crisis Committee and be a Joshua to Al Bashirs case with the ICC. This is a Patriotic stand because even if Southerners differ with the Arabs in the Sudan, still they are Sudanese citizens and possible good neighbors with the forthcoming State of South Sudan. Kiir job description is to ensure that the Crisis Committee undertakes diplomatic and legal actions to counteract Ocampos charges against the sovereignty of the Sudan where Kiir has a share. According to the presidential decree, the panel has to coordinate its efforts with the African Union, the Arab League and Movement of Non-Aligned Countries. In addition, the Committee has to study the legal aspects of charges leveled by the ICC Prosecutor against the Sudanese president and to find a compromise with the International Community to avoid negative effects on the signed peace accords. The game against the ICC has started and the spectators are taking their seats to clap for the winners or the losers.

I am supporting my team from the Sudan and urge them to warm up with the following ideas from a philosopher who was against the current status quo of the international community and the Foreign Policy of American Government, especially the Hiroshima disaster and Vietnam War. He was a good liberal American philosopher and I love him very much. His name is John Rawls. To challenge the partiality of the International Law and its injustices on the Less Developed and Less Powerful Countries, Rawls came up with an alternative. He called it the Law of the Peoples. He presented its basic principles as follows:

1) Peoples are free and independent, and their freedom and independence are to be respected by other peoples;

2) Peoples are to observe international treatise and undertakings without using double standards;

3) Peoples are equal and are parties to the agreements that bind them according to reasonable consensus;

4) Peoples are to observe a duty of non-intervention into others internal affairs without their request;

5) Peoples have the right of self-defence but no right to instigate war for reasons other than self-defence;

6) Peoples are to honour the fundamental human rights without rigidity;

7) Peoples are to observe certain specified restrictions in the conduct of war as a last resort for urgent needed solution; and

8) Peoples have a duty to assist other peoples living under unfavourable conditions because of lack of just or decent political, social, and economic structures in their communities.

Based on these points, you can see how USA and UK are failing in Iraq and Afghanistan. They have provoked terrorism in the World and are unable to control it. Their Technology of Intelligence and Hard Ware of War has been defeated by the cleverest Osama Bin Laden. The unjust Iraq during the time of Saddam Husseins Regime is far better and peaceful than the invaded Iraq under Bushs control now. They eliminated Hussein into the land of the dead in the name of double standard justice, and spoiled the peace of Iraqis by setting Iraq to fire of chaos. What has the Anglo-American definition of dream of liberty and justice brought to Iraq? God forbids this situation in the Sudan!

* The Author is a PhD Student in the University of Nairobi, Kenya

Return to Top

Indictment of Sudan leader ignites violence

COLUM LYNCH
Houston Chronicle - Online

UNITED NATIONS Six days before Sudanese President Omar Hassan al-Bashir was charged with genocide, a group of 200 fighters on horseback, supported by more than 40 vehicles mounted with machine guns, carried out the bloodiest and most sophisticated ambush yet on a fledgling U.N. and African peacekeeping mission.

The July 8 attack, which killed seven peacekeepers and wounded 22, bore similarities to Sudanese-backed raids by Janjaweed horsemen that have led to the deaths of more than 300,000 civilians and forced nearly 3 million people from their homes in Darfur over the past five years, according to the U.N.

Some U.N. officials suspect the operation was intended to serve as a warning to U.N. peacekeepers and humanitarian workers of Sudan's intent to use deadly force if the prosecutor of the International Criminal Court targeted the country's leader.

This version of Total Mail Converter is not registered.

Last week, those fears were heightened after a Nigerian company commander was killed by unidentified assailants in West Darfur. 'We are very worried there could be a gradual increase in violence, which could make the mission quite vulnerable,' Jean-Marie Guehenno, the U.N. undersecretary-general for peacekeeping, said in an interview. But it 'will be very hard to pin down responsibility' for the attacks, he said.

The Sudanese government has strenuously denied involvement in the attack, accusing a rebel faction, the SLA-Unity, of responsibility.

U.N. peacekeeping officials said that Sudanese authorities actually improved cooperation in the days following the announcement of the charges against Bashir. The U.N. case, said Sudan's U.N. envoy, Abdalmahmood Abdalhaleem Mohamad, 'doesn't hold water.' 'Serious shortfalls' The episode has exposed the vulnerability of an international mission that has been held up by the United States and other governments as offering the best chance of protecting Darfur's people.

The force of more than 9,000 peacekeepers is plagued by 'serious shortfalls in communications, logistics, medical evacuation and treatment and air support,' Guehenno told the U.N. Security Council in a confidential briefing on Friday.

U.N. officials vowed to continue to protect civilians in Darfur and ensure they received lifesaving humanitarian assistance. Last week, 172 Chinese engineers arrived to reinforce the mission, which has deployed about 9,000 of the 26,000 peacekeepers required for the operation. More troops are scheduled to arrive in the coming weeks.

Proxy military units It is the second time the U.N. mission in Darfur has come under attack this year. In January Sudanese forces opened fire on a clearly marked supply convoy of 20 trucks and armored personnel vehicles. Sudan's U.N. envoy blamed the attack on rebels, but the Sudanese commander admitted that his troops had fired on the peacekeepers, by accident.

Critics of the government say Sudan has long used proxy military forces to carry out strikes while denying government involvement. 'I think this is the first shot across the bow in response to the ICC action,' said John Prendergast, co-chairman of the Darfur advocacy group the Enough Project. 'There will be more of these kinds of proxy attacks.' But others maintain the evidence is not strong enough to prove government involvement. 'We don't have enough evidence to say it was the government,' a senior U.S. official said. 'We've got lots of strands of evidence, but we really don't know.' Guehenno said that an investigation is under way to establish responsibility for the July 8 attacks. In the meantime, he has ordered the relocation of about 200 civilian U.N. staff from Darfur and concentrated his peacekeepers in safer locations. In the Friday confidential briefing to the council, he suggested Sudanese complicity.

In a written account of the briefing, obtained by the Washington Post, Guehenno said the operation was conducted in a government-controlled area and that the assailants used powerful weapons not used previously by Darfurian rebels.

Concealed in a wooded shelter, and using prepositioned weapons, the assailants opened fire on the smaller contingent of 65 U.N. peacekeepers, crippling the lead vehicle carrying the convoy's communications gear. The peacekeepers 'reported the appearance, armament and equipment of most of the attackers as being similar to that of the 'Janjaweed.' They also indicated that some assailants were dressed in clothing more akin to a uniform,' Guehenno said. 'The employment of an anti-tank recoilless rifle, a weapon not normally used by irregular militias, is also a new element of grave concern.'

Return to Top

Indictment of Sudanese Leader Seen as Threat to Peacekeepers

Lynch, Colum
Washington Post - Online

UNITED NATIONS -- Six days before Sudanese President Omar Hassan al-Bashir was charged with genocide, a group of 200 fighters on horseback, supported by more than 40 vehicles mounted with machine guns, carried out the bloodiest and most sophisticated ambush yet on a fledgling U.N. and African peacekeeping mission.

The July 8 attack -- which killed seven peacekeepers and wounded 22 -- bore similarities to Sudanese-backed raids by Janjaweed horsemen that have led to the deaths of more than 300,000 civilians and forced nearly 3 million people from their homes in Darfur over the past five years, according to internal U.N. accounts.

Some U.N. officials suspect the operation was intended to serve as a warning to U.N. peacekeepers and humanitarian workers of Sudan's intent to use deadly force if the prosecutor of the International Criminal Court targeted the country's leader. On Wednesday, those fears were heightened after a Nigerian company commander was killed by unidentified assailants in the town of Forobaranga in West Darfur. 'We are very worried there could be a gradual increase in violence, which could make the mission quite vulnerable,' Jean-Marie Guhenno, the U.N. undersecretary general for peacekeeping, said in an interview. But it 'will be very hard to pin down responsibility' for the attacks, he predicted.

The Sudanese government has strenuously denied involvement in the attack, accusing a rebel faction, the SLA-Unity, of responsibility. U.N. peacekeeping officials said that Sudanese authorities actually improved cooperation in the days following the announcement of the charges against Bashir. The U.N. case, said Sudan's U.N. envoy, Abdalmahmood Abdalhaleem Mohamad, 'doesn't hold water.' The episode has exposed the vulnerability of an international mission that has been held up by the United States and other governments as offering the best chance of protecting Darfur's people. The force of more than 9,000 peacekeepers is plagued by 'serious shortfalls in communications, logistics, medical evacuation and treatment and air support,' Guhenno told the U.N. Security Council in a confidential briefing on Friday. A more than two-year effort to secure attack and transport helicopters has stalled, leaving the peacekeepers unable to defend themselves from superior ground attacks. Guhenno warned the council that the force 'will continue to be extremely vulnerable in the months ahead.' U.N. officials vowed to continue to protect civilians in Darfur and ensure they received lifesaving humanitarian assistance. On Wednesday, a unit of 172 Chinese engineers arrived to reinforce the mission, which has deployed about 9,000 of the 26,000 peacekeepers required for the operation. More troops from Ethiopia and Egypt are scheduled to arrive in the coming weeks.

This version of Total Mail Converter is not registered.

It is the second time the U.N. mission in Darfur has come under attack this year. In January -- just two weeks after the U.N.-backed mission replaced a beleaguered African Union mission of 7,000 African troops -- Sudanese forces opened fire on a clearly marked supply convoy of 20 trucks and armored personnel vehicles. Sudan's U.N. envoy blamed the attack on rebels, but the Sudanese commander admitted that his troops had fired on the peacekeepers, by accident.

Critics of the government say Sudan has long used proxy military forces to carry out strikes while denying government involvement. 'I think this is the first shot across the bow in response to the ICC action,' said John Prendergast, co-chair of the Darfur advocacy group the Enough Project. 'There will be more of these kinds of proxy attacks.' But others maintain the evidence is not strong enough to prove government involvement. 'We don't have enough evidence to say it was the government,' a senior U.S. official said. 'We've got lots of strands of evidence, but we really don't know.' Guhenno said in the interview that an investigation is underway to establish responsibility for the July 8 attacks. In the meantime, he has ordered the relocation of about 200 civilian U.N. staff from Darfur and concentrated his peacekeepers in safer locations. In the Friday confidential briefing to the council, he suggested Sudanese complicity.

In a written account of the briefing, obtained by The Washington Post, Guhenno said that the operation was conducted in a government-controlled area and that the assailants used powerful weapons not used previously be Darfurian rebels. 'There is some very disquieting circumstantial evidence,' said Britain's U.N. ambassador, John Sawers, who attended the briefing.

Concealed in a wooded shelter, and using pre-positioned weapons, the assailants opened fire on the smaller contingent of 65 U.N. peacekeepers, crippling the lead vehicle carrying the convoy's communications gear. 'The patrol lost communication with the sector headquarters almost immediately following the destruction of its high frequency radio set,' according to the briefing notes. The peacekeepers 'reported the appearance, armament and equipment of most of the attackers as being similar to that of the 'Janjaweed,' they also indicated that some assailants were dressed in clothing more akin to a uniform,' Guhenno told the council. 'The employment of an anti-tank recoilless rifle,' he added, 'a weapon not normally used by irregular militias, is also a new element of grave concern.' Guhenno said that U.N. peacekeepers returned fire but that the attackers quickly regrouped and launched a second and more violent attack. The dead included peacekeepers from Rwanda, Ghana and Uganda. The 'deliberate, large-scale, and sustained attack on a relatively strong [peacekeeper] patrol constitutes a significant escalation in the risks to the mission,' Guhenno said. He added that the joint U.N.-A.U. mission will need 'many more months' to build the force up to its full strength.

U.N. Secretary General Ban Ki-moon raised concerns about possible Sudanese government involvement in a telephone conversation with Bashir last weekend, according to Mohamad, the Sudanese U.N. envoy. But Mohamad blamed the rebels for the attack. 'The national army doesn't have the equipment' used in the attack, he said. 'It's very sophisticated.' Mohamad sharply criticized Guhenno, who will retire this summer, saying he has always taken a 'negative' and 'confrontational' approach to Sudan. 'We are happy that he's leaving,' he said.

Return to Top

Milosevic, Taylor cases prove Bashir arrest will help Sudan

ZACHARY OCHIENG
Daily Nation

By ZACHARY OCHIENG Last week's request for a warrant of arrest for Sudanese President Omar al-Bashir by the prosecutor of the International Criminal Court (ICC) Luis Moreno-Ocampo, continues to draw mixed reactions. However, a report by the think tank ENOUGH Project argues that the call to arrest al-Bashir is not only based on sound evidence, but that it can be a step forward in the path to secure peace in Darfur. The report cites the cases of Slobodan Milosevic and Charles Taylor, as past indictments of war criminals that brought the desired results. "The status quo in Sudan is one of the deadliest in the world. Until there is a consequence for the commission of genocide, it will continue. This action introduces a cost, finally, into the equation," says John Mr Prendergast, the co-chair of Enough. In the report, The Merits of Justice, the authors of the report argue that, "If the hand-wringing all feels a bit familiar, it is because we have been through this more than once before. In 1999, during the Kosovo conflict, Milosevic was indicted in the middle of not only a Nato bombing campaign to reverse the ethnic cleaning in Kosovo, but of high-level peace talks between the United States, Russia, and Finland to end the war." In the case of Taylor, in June 2003, Liberia was on the brink. Rebel forces had advanced within 10 miles of the capital in the first of a series of offensives that Liberians would dub "World Wars" for their ferocity. The ICC warrant was nevertheless executed, and sanity was restored in Liberia. In the latest move, the ICC wants al-Bashir indicted on charges of genocide, crimes against humanity, and war crimes in Darfur. The report says however, "Sadly, but somewhat unsurprisingly, the step has set off a chorus of hand-wringing among certain diplomats, academics and pundits who are now arguing that holding perpetrators of crimes against humanity accountable for their actions is unhelpful. A veteran academic expressed his worry that almost all African senior officials could be made vulnerable to similar charges by this precedent," the report states. But the report argues, "Let's be clear. Holding people accountable for war crimes is not only the right thing to do from a moral perspective - it directly promotes peace and makes future such abuses less likely. Part of the reason Darfur has remained locked in crisis for years is that the international community has been slow to acknowledge what has always been painfully obvious: The janjaweed militias that have terrorised and decimated Darfur have been directed by the Sudanese government. The militias were financed by the government, and received direct battlefield support from the Sudanese military. The ICC is doing no more than acknowledging the plain, painful truth of Sudan's tragedy. The prosecutor should be congratulated for recognising that turning a blind eye to war crimes is not helpful." According to the report, very few commentators took exception with the notion that Milosevic had been intimately involved in directing ethnic cleansing, genocide, and sundry other war crimes in Bosnia and Kosovo. But Russian envoy Viktor Chernomyrdin said the indictment "pulled out the rug from under the negotiating process," as both Russia and China decried what they called a "political" indictment that was designed to scuttle peace talks. Others suggested the indictment would push Milosevic to stay in power permanently or lead his forces to adopt an even more brutal approach on the ground in Kosovo. Yet, in retrospect, the work of the Yugoslav tribunal and the indictment of Milosevic led to none of the doomsday scenarios envisioned by the skeptics. While the Russians postponed a single diplomatic trip to Belgrade for one week to express their dissatisfaction with the indictment, the peace talks resumed quickly and Milosevic accepted the demands that were placed upon him: Kosovar refugees were allowed to return home; Serb forces withdrew from the province and a Nato-led force entered to provide security. Milosevic's hold on power did not last long after the 1999 war and his indictment. The reports says that the lesson learnt from Milosevic's case is that indictments don't necessarily derail peace talks and, indeed, they seem to be most helpful in clarifying the minds of dictators that their very existence is at stake. In the Taylor case, he was indicted shortly after he promised to step down by the end of 2003 at a peace meeting in Accra, Ghana, when the special court for Sierra Leone unveiled an indictment against Taylor for war crimes and crimes against humanity perpetrated during that country's brutal war. Some diplomats engaged in the negotiations denounced the indictment as an impediment to peace, and the presidents of South Africa, Nigeria, and Ghana complained that they had been "sandbagged" by the timing of the indictments as they tried to persuade Taylor to resign. Pessimists were quick to critique the court's prosecutor for interjecting the concept of justice into the rarefied realpolitik of peace negotiations. Yet, Taylor's indictment, combined with unprecedented levels of international pressure (including a US warship on the horizon) helped to build the leverage necessary to convince him to move into a negotiated exile in Nigeria. The terms of this deal were clear: As long as he stayed out of Liberian politics, Nigeria would keep him out of the hands of the court, despite an Interpol warrant for his arrest. Nevertheless, he was arrested following a dramatic and nearly successful escape attempt to cross from Nigeria into Cameroon. He was turned over to the special court and is currently facing trial on 11 counts of war crimes and crimes against humanity. "Today, self-professed realists argue that Taylor's handover to justice sent the wrong message to dictators such as al-Bashir and Zimbabwe's Robert Mugabe, maintaining that it undermines the credibility of amnesty offers to dictators who are all the more likely to hold on to power at any cost. This facile misreading of history misses the real lessons from the Taylor case," the report says.

This version of Total Mail Converter is not registered.

Return to Top

Worsening situation in Somalia pushes aid costs to $641 mln

Daniel Van Oudenaren
Sudan Tribune

(WASHINGTON) Aid operations in Somalia will cost $641 million this year, according to a mid-year review issued on Wednesday July 16 by the UN Office for the Coordination of Humanitarian Affairs (OCHA). The UN is appealing for $435 million in new funding pledges to meet the cost.

'Nutritional surveillance has indicated widespread and worsening high levels of malnutrition, exceeding the WHO emergency threshold (15%), and worsening food security in various regions of South Central Somalia,' said the OCHA report.

Market data released on July 8 by monitors at the Food Security Analysis Unit - Somalia (FSAU) shows that the price of maize rose to 15,000-18,500 Somali shillings per kilogram in four markets in the Shabelle Valley, from around 3,000 shillings at the same time last year.

Other market indicators point to danger for Somalias significant pastoral populations. The terms of trade for goats have fallen in all regions of Somalia, with particularly dramatic changes in the Juba Valley, the Shabelle Valley, and the southern Sorghum beltwhere a goats price relative to cereal dropped about 75% since July of last year.

Civil insecurity is a key immediate cause of humanitarian emergency in the Somali regions of Lower Shabelle, Banadir, Middle Shabelle, Hiiran, Bakool, Gedo, Galgadud, and Mudug, according to FSAU, which is funded by USAID and the European Community.

Environmental degradation and poor rains are also contributing to food insecurity. South and central Somalia received below-average rains during the gu (main) rainy season, which ends in June. Last year south and central Somalia faced the lowest gu harvest in 13 years.

This version of Total Mail Converter is not registered.

Over the past week aid workers have faced a spate of fatal attacks. A spokesman for an armed Islamist group, identifying himself only as Sheikh Mohamed, told Garowe Online that his organization blamed aid workers for supplying the enemy.

The UN World Food Program says that it is trying to assist 2.6 million Somalis in need - a number that is expected to reach 3.5 million by the end of the year.

The United States is the largest donor of humanitarian assistance in Somalia, granting $85 million so far this year. In the fiscal year 2009, Congress will also provide $11.6 million in security assistance to the UN Peacekeeping Operations.

But the Bush administration faces criticism for its involvement in the Somali conflict.

The Enough Project, a research and advocacy group, questioned U.S. support for Somalias Transitional Federal Government in an April strategy paper. Further in an opinion piece this week for the Washington Post, Frankie Martin, a fellow at American University in Washington, D.C., says that 'the United States must immediately change a failed policy. Instead of effectively fighting those individuals who wish America harm, it has taken on the Somali people.'

Return to Top

'09 budget stalemate puts local projects in jeopardy

Brian Tumulty â?¢ Washington Bureau â?¢ July 21
Journal News - Online

WASHINGTON - 'Forget about it' could be the phrase that best summarizes the outlook for federal spending on local projects and new programs for the fiscal year that begins Oct. 1.

Budget experts are predicting that most - if not all - of the 2009 federal budget will be left to the next president and a new Congress to act on early next year.

Rep. Nita Lowey, chairwoman of the House Appropriations Subcommittee that funds foreign aid, and the State Department, said Friday that it's possible Congress may enact a stopgap funding measure that keeps the government operating at current levels through February or March.

'It's a possibility there would be no budget,' said Lowey, D-Harrison, adding that she's hopeful a couple of the least controversial spending bills - covering the Department of Defense or military construction - might be passed before the start of the fiscal year.

Sen. Charles E. Schumer, D-N.Y., agreed it's a possibility that projects for which he has fought for funding could be jeopardized. 'Even if there has to be a continuing resolution, we are going to try to get as many New York projects as possible funded,' Schumer said in a press statement.

At the national level, it could mean an issue that's left for either President John McCain or President Barack Obama to address. The next administration would decide whether to accept budget changes enacted by the new Congress. July is ordinarily consumed by long hours of floor debate in the House and Senate over numerous amendments to spending bills covering a dozen pieces of the government ranging from agriculture to the Department of Defense, energy and water projects, health and human services, homeland security and legislative branch operations.

This year, neither the Senate nor the House has voted on any of the bills. And a monthlong August recess - capped off by the Democratic and Republican conventions - looms.

'At this point, the Democrats seem more interested in waiting until Barack Obama becomes president on Jan. 20, as they believe he will, and have him sign the bills,' said Brian Riedl, a federal budget analyst for the Heritage Foundation, a conservative think tank.

'The Democrats in Congress don't want President Bush to have the opportunity to block their spending initiatives,' Riedl said. 'President Bush not only proposed a budget that would increase spending at a slower rate than the Democrats in Congress, he also pledged to dramatically decrease pork projects. Democrats are trying to protect pork and their additional spending.'

Democrats, who have majority control of the House and Senate, fault Bush as the stalemate.

'The problem is that virtually every bill is above the amount requested by the president, and they made a blanket threat that he would veto any bill that is above his request level,' said Scott Lilly, a senior fellow at the Center for American Progress, a liberal think tank. 'And so everybody expects that no matter how hard they work or no matter what they get done, it will be vetoed.'

Lilly, a former staff director of the House Appropriations Committee, said Democrats and Republicans ordinarily work out comprises on spending bills, but Bush has shown no sign of wanting to work out a deal.

This version of Total Mail Converter is not registered.

'We have this administration that has broken the mold in a whole lot of areas,' Lilly said.

Contact Brian Tumulty at btumulty@gns.gannett.com

Federal funding for local projects in jeopardy

Return to Top

... he would veto any bill that is above his request level," said Scott Lilly, a senior fellow at the Center for American Progress, a liberal think tank. ...

Should You Look Into Your Genes?

Return to Top

Rick Weiss
Washington Post - Online

Jeffrey Gulcher had no reason to think much about prostate cancer. He was just 48, and the disease typically strikes later in life. Even the most cautious medical groups agree that most men need not begin annual prostate screenings until age 50.

But Gulcher happens to be the chief scientific officer of deCODE Genetics -- one of several companies that, amid some controversy, have begun offering direct-to-consumer DNA tests that can help people predict which diseases they are likely to get. So in April, he spat into a test tube and, without giving the matter much thought, sent the sample in for analysis by his own company.

He was in for a shock. The test indicated that he carries a genetic variant that nearly doubles his lifetime risk of getting prostate cancer: While the average man has a 15 percent change of being stricken, Gulcher had a 30 percent shot. That spurred his physician to order a standard blood test for prostate cancer. The result was toward the high end of the range considered normal, which, together with the DNA test, worried the doctor. He referred Gulcher to a urologist, who performed an exploratory biopsy -- and found that Gulcher's prostate gland was riddled with cancer, and a fairly aggressive version of it at that.

Gulcher is going in for surgery tomorrow, and not a moment too soon. Tests suggest that the disease has not yet spread to other parts of his body, a milestone that often portends death and that may well have been passed had he waited until he turned 50 to get a standard prostate-specific antigen (PSA) test.

Did genetic testing save Gulch er's life? I think it may have. His dramatic story seems to illustrate perfectly the claims, made by his company and others, that an open market of DNA tests is the 21st century's ticket to a healthier nation. But a closer look suggests that this fast-growing industry, with its snazzy Web-based come-ons, could benefit from some temperance and independent oversight.

The technology is undeniably impressive. For as little as $1,000, anybody who can drool into a mailing tube can now find out his or her genetic odds of getting any of 20 or more potentially debilitating diseases, including cancer, heart disease and diabetes. Most of these tests will not lead to a frank diagnosis, as happened with Gulcher. But discovering an inherited propensity toward a particular illness can motivate consumers -- or, as they used to be known, patients -- to get more frequent checkups, take preventive medicines or make lifestyle changes to try to ward off the specter of disease. At last, we seem to be on the cusp of the long-promised personalized-medicine revolution in which gene tests allow physicians to craft far more individualized and effective ways of keeping us well.

But tests that look into the fog of people's medical futures are freighted with tricky medical, economic and bioethical implications. For one thing, most genes are not determinative, so these tests can convey only odds, not destinies. Even with the doubled lifetime risk for cancer that's associated with Gulcher's prostate gene variant, two out of three men who receive a 'positive' test for that gene will never get the disease. And many of those who do will get it so late in life and in such a benign form that no treatment would be justified. So that's at least two new members of the 'worried well' who could be losing sleep and spending money on unnecessary follow-up tests for every person who would arguably be appropriately forewarned.

Moreover, the tests are still new and easily misinterpreted, even by professionals. Online results may be subject to security and privacy breaches. And some companies are using people's gene profiles to conduct independent research. That suggests to many ethicists and lawyers that these firms' paying clients ought to be informed that they are subjects in experiments, with full disclosure of potential risks and rights.

Most worrisome of all, at least a few companies seem to be peddling DNA-based versions of snake oil. Some firms claim to be able to identify inherited nutritional deficiencies that -- guess what? -- are treatable with pricey supplements that they just happen to sell. Some even promise to discern from your genes what kind of person you should marry to ensure a blissful sex life and healthier babies. Welcome to the Wild West of personalized genomics.

This version of Total Mail Converter is not registered.

These problems are not insurmountable. But there is precious little oversight of this burgeoning new industry, in part because genetic analysis does not fit cleanly into any existing category of medical practice. And if the first wave of DNA-screening companies to hit the market gets its way, there won't be any more adult supervision in the foreseeable future. In a blatant effort to stave off regulation, top officials from all the major competing gene-test companies met early this month and quietly agreed to spend this summer hammering out a 'best practices' document that they would promise to follow. This is a great idea, but it's not enough.

No state or federal agency can today assure consumers that the DNA tests they order will give accurate results -- or that the results, even if technically accurate, will have any practical value. The Food and Drug Administration says it has the authority to regulate all gene tests but has decided, at least for now, to ignore the vast majority of those developed so far. The Federal Trade Commission (FTC), which is supposed to protect consumers from fraudulent claims, has never taken an enforcement action against even the most transparently deceptive gene-test companies. And the Centers for Medicare and Medicaid Services, the division within the Department of Health and Human Services that oversees clinical laboratories, has so far opted to steer clear of the genetic-testing world, despite pleas from federal advisers to ensure a minimal standard of gene-test proficiency.

The companies say that what they do is different enough that they should not be shoehorned into the conventional medical-testing rules. 'For the first year and a half of our existence, all we did was try to figure out how to fit into the regulatory environment,' said Dietrich Stephan, co-founder of Navigenics, a leading California-based gene-test company, adding that the effort cost an estimated $10 million.

That's real money. Yet even with all that preparation, Navigenics and a dozen other testing companies recently received warnings from individual states accusing them of violating state rules for labs. Situations such as this cry out for the guiding hand of the federal government -- not necessarily through cumbersome regulations, which can be too rigid to keep up with quickly changing science, but through formal guidelines, at least, promulgated by HHS. These could set clear expectations about how accurate gene tests should be -- and what it means to be 'accurate' in the brave new world of predictive health -- and what level of informed consent should be obtained from clients. The promulgation of such standards will take real effort from HHS Secretary Mike Leavitt, who has championed personalized medicine but who has thus far been largely AWOL on the gene-test issue and has little incentive to push hard in the final months of the Bush administration. The FTC also needs to show that it has teeth and can bite.

Genetic-testing companies need to ante up, too. The responsible ones could buy a lot of good will by offering the public easily accessible scientific details (online and elsewhere) about the specific genes or genetic markers they are testing for; citations for the published studies they use to justify their claims that those genes have real medical relevance; the privacy and security systems they have in place; and the protocols for any experiments that clients' specimens may be used in. The firms should also disclose any approvals they have sought, obtained or denied from independent scientific and ethical review boards.

I took heart that such a future is possible when, at an HHS meeting two weeks ago, I saw chiefs from the five major competing gene-test companies sitting next to one another, speaking cooperatively to federal advisers. If these executives move aggressively to do the right thing, and if federal officials help them with some smart but tough guidance, perhaps those corporate heads can avoid a future in which they are called upon to appear side by side again -- this time before Congress, looking more like those famously photographed tobacco CEOs, being asked tough questions about what exactly they have been selling, and at what cost to American health.

rweiss@americanprogress.org

Rick Weiss, a former science reporter for The Post, is a senior fellow at the Center for American Progress.

Return to Top

Stalemate puts EC project in jeopardy

Brian Tumulty
Star-Gazette

WASHINGTON -- 'Forget about it' could be the phrase that best summarizes the outlook for federal spending on local projects and new programs for the fiscal year that begins Oct. 1.

Budget experts are predicting that most -- if not all -- of the 2009 federal budget will be left to the next president and a new Congress to act on early next year.

Rep. Nita Lowey, chairwoman of the House Appropriations subcommittee that funds foreign aid and the State Department, said Friday that it's possible Congress may enact a stopgap funding measure that keeps the government operating at current levels through February or March. 'It's a possibility there would be no budget,' said Lowey, D-Harrison, adding that she's hopeful a couple of the least controversial spending bills -- covering the Defense Department or military construction -- might be passed before the start of the fiscal year.

This version of Total Mail Converter is not registered.

Democratic Sen. Chuck Schumer, New York's senior senator, agreed it's a possibility that projects for which he has fought for funding could be jeopardized. 'Even if there has to be a continuing resolution, we are going to try to get as many New York projects as possible funded,' Schumer said in a press statement.

In danger is $450,000 for Elmira College projects, including upgraded technology, sponsored by Congressman John R. Kuhl Jr., R-Hammondsport.

At the national level, it could mean an issue that's left for the next president to address.

The next administration would decide whether to accept budget changes enacted by the new Congress.

July is ordinarily consumed by long hours of floor debate in the House and Senate over numerous amendments to spending bills covering a dozen pieces of the government ranging from agriculture to the Defense Department, energy and water projects, health and human services, homeland security and legislative branch operations.

This year, neither the Senate nor the House has voted on any of the bills.

And a monthlong August recess -- capped off by the Democratic and Republican conventions -- looms on the horizon. 'At this point, the Democrats seem more interested in waiting until Barack Obama becomes president on Jan. 20, as they believe he will, and have him sign the bills,' said Brian Riedl, a federal budget analyst for the Heritage Foundation, a conservative think tank. 'The Democrats in Congress don't want President Bush to have the opportunity to block their spending initiatives. President Bush not only proposed a budget that would increase spending at a slower rate than the Democrats in Congress, he also pledged to dramatically decrease pork projects,' Riedl said. 'Democrats are trying to protect pork and their additional spending.' Democrats, who have majority control of the House and Senate, fault Bush with the stalemate. 'The problem is that virtually every bill is above the amount requested by the president, and they made a blanket threat that he would veto any bill that is above his request level,' said Scott Lilly, a senior fellow at the Center for American Progress, a liberal think tank. 'And so everybody expects that no matter how hard they work or no matter what they get done, it will be vetoed.' Lilly, a former staff director of the House Appropriations Committee, said Democrats and Republicans ordinarily work out compromises on spending bills, but Bush has shown no sign of wanting to work out a deal.

Return to Top

Contrasting goals in Iraq

Lawrence J. Korb, assistant secretary of defense in the Reagan administration, is a senior fellow at the Center for American Progress and a senior adviser ...

Return to Top

Prospect of closing Guantanamo prison camp complicated by what to do with detainees

WASHINGTON, For years now, the U.S.-run prison camp at Guantanamo Bay, Cuba has, for many, served as an indelible image of the overreach, even the abuse, of American power. Human-rights groups have excoriated it. Scores of lawyers have fought to free its inmates. Both John McCain and Barack Obama have vowed to close the prison if elected.

But there may be sound policy reasons for keeping the facility open deep into the term of the next president.

While an apparent consensus has built that Guantanamo must go, that was the easier question to answer. The far tougher one is what to do with the detainees held there, those who should be released and those whom the Pentagon believes must be kept imprisoned, perhaps indefinitely. 'There's not going to be a one-size-fits-all approach to this population,' said Matthew Waxman, a former deputy assistant secretary for detainee affairs at the Defense Department. 'I'd like to see Gitmo closed and closed quickly, but I also want to see it done right.' The Supreme Court last month gave the 265 remaining detainees at the jail the chance to have their detentions reviewed by a federal court. This month, judges on the U.S. District Court in Washington began the formidable task of coordinating those cases and warned the government that they want to make the determinations quickly, by the end of the year, in some cases.

Then there is the looming presidential election. The current regime at the Pentagon won't have the authority to decide the detainees' fate, and there may be some incentive to move many of them off the base in the coming months. The presidential transition will also slow the process.

Both situations will push the Bush administration to do something sooner rather than later, but it may be hamstrung by the lack of options for disposing of the detainees.

There are few places where the detainees can be sent. And even fewer that want them.

This version of Total Mail Converter is not registered.

There are three distinct groups at the Guantanamo jail, located on a U.S. Navy base. The first are the 20 who are charged with war crimes and will be tried by the military commissions. They include alleged Sept. 11 plotters such as Khalid Sheikh Mohammed, who was before a commission two weeks ago for pre-trial motions. But because commission procedures drafted by the Pentagon were ruled unconstitutional by the Supreme Court, the process has been agonizingly slow. A full trial has yet to be completed.

The Pentagon says it expects to charge as many as 60 more detainees. Last year, Defense Department officials told a congressional panel that it would need three years to try all the detainees and urged Congress to allow Guantanamo to stay open because of the courtroom built there for the purpose.

The second group is the 54 detainees already cleared for release by the Pentagon. They remain in Guantanamo because their home countries won't accept their return. As one human-rights lawyer said, 'They're tainted.' The government also wants to ensure that these detainees won't be imprisoned or tortured after being returned.

(EDITORS: BEGIN OPTIONAL TRIM)

Diplomatic efforts are under way to convince other nations to accept some detainees, but little progress has been made. Detainee advocates say the United States could lead by example, taking in detainees such as Chinese Muslims known as Uighurs whom China won't allow to return. 'If [the government] really wanted that to happen, they would make it happen,' said Emi MacLean, a lawyer for some of the detainees at Guantanamo.

(END OPTIONAL TRIM)

The remaining group of detainees may present the largest challenge for the next president. Some will be cleared for release, others may be charged, but there will remain a core amount, no one can say how large, that the Pentagon will want to keep indefinitely as enemy combatants because of its belief that they would take up arms against America upon release.

But the government may not have enough evidence to formally charge them, or even justify their detentions to a federal judge. And some of that evidence might have been obtained illegally, through extreme interrogation tactics or other means.

One solution may be to move as many of them as possible to friendly nations that would detain them on America's behalf. Groups such as Amnesty International and Human Rights Watch are attempting to track the transfers of detainees to see if that's happening. They point to the recent disappearance of two prisoners who were returned to Algeria. They also are nervous about a prison the U.S. is building in northern Afghanistan to replace the one at Bagram Air Force Base.

But moving the prisoners could be viewed as an end-around to the Supreme Court's habeas corpus decision last month. Transporting prisoners from Guantanamo to somewhere other than U.S territory could, arguably, extinguish their legal rights but risk the wrath of federal judges already out of patience with the Pentagon.

The Supreme Court's decision, said Bradford Berenson, a former White House lawyer who helped design the military commission process, makes it more difficult to empty the prison. 'It has made the moving of Gitmo detainees less feasible, less attractive than it once was,' he said. Regardless, there are going to be scores of detainees, those convicted by the military commissions, those facing trial, and those who are being held without charge, who will need to be imprisoned somewhere else.

The options include transporting the detainees to a military prison in the United States, either at Fort Leavenworth, Kan., or the Navy brigs in Norfolk, Va., and Charleston, S.C., or imprisoning them in the 'Supermax' civilian prison in Colorado that currently holds convicted terrorist Zacarias Moussaoui.

(EDITORS: BEGIN OPTIONAL TRIM)

That has prompted some not-in-my-backyard rhetoric. Sens. Sam Brownback and Pat Roberts of Kansas recently declared their opposition to using Leavenworth, saying security there is insufficient and voicing concerns about escaping detainees. 'Who wants an obvious terrorist in their state?' Berenson asked. Colorado Sens. Wayne Allard and Ken Salazar have taken no position on the use of the Supermax prison, although Allard's office says security there isn't a concern.

(END OPTIONAL TRIM)

Considerable logistical issues will present themselves, including how to keep the detainees segregated from the rest of the prison population and employing military and civilian staff to monitor them, as well as to provide security against attack. At present, 2,000 members of the military work at the Guantanamo prison.

There could be significant legal hurdles in keeping military prisoners in civilian jails or transferring some of them to the federal justice system for trial, as Obama has said he wants to do. (McCain prefers the military commission system.)

That likely would mean the involvement of Congress to devise a comprehensive detention plan to replace Guantanamo, one that might allow for the extended detention of enemy combatants and for the use of military and civilian justice systems. And since Congress isn't known for doing anything quickly, that may be yet another reason why those remaining detainees in Cuba won't be going anywhere for a long, long while.

This version of Total Mail Converter is not registered.

(EDITORS: STORY CAN END HERE)

Still, to those who see Guantanamo as an international eyesore, all of the obstacles standing in the way of its closure shouldn't work to keep that from happening. 'The problem at Gitmo,' says Ken Gude a policy analyst at the Center for American Progress, a liberal think tank, who has called for an 18-month timetable for closure of the jail, 'is beyond redemption.'

(c) 2008, Chicago Tribune.

Visit the Chicago Tribune on the Internet at http://www.chicagotribune.com/

Distributed by McClatchy-Tribune Information Services.

ARCHIVE PHOTOS on MCT Direct (from MCT Photo Service, 202-383-6099): Guantanamo prison

For reprints, email tmsreprints@permissionsgroup.com, call 800-374-7985 or 847-635-6550, send a fax to 847-635-6968, or write to The Permissions Group Inc., 1247 Milwaukee Ave., Suite 303, Glenview, IL 60025, USA.

Return to Top

Report: Security comes from increased aid

WASHINGTON, July 18 (UPI) -- U.S. security requires a less militarized foreign policy and a more robust humanitarian mission, according to a report by the Center for American Progress.

The report by the non-partisan research and educational institute says radicalization of groups around the world suffering from poverty, environmental degradation and poor governance could threaten the national security of the United States.

Authored by Reuben Brigety, Center for American Progress Sustainable Security Program director, the report suggests a new approach to U.S. foreign policy, one that moves away from an increasingly militarized mission to one that emphasizes humanitarian causes. Brigety argues that increases in humanitarian aid can make strides in protecting the United States, the Center for American Progress reported.

The report, titled "Humanity as a Weapon of War: Sustainable Security and the Role of the U.S. Military," says while the U.S. military is vitally important for enhancing American strategic objectives, it should not replace efforts to fight global poverty.

"To keep our country safe, it is no longer enough for America to destroy its enemies," Brigety writes. "We must also care for our friends, whether they be powerful states or impoverished people."

Brigety is calling on leaders in the U.S. Congress and the executive branch to "balance the military's assistance activities with robust civilian efforts."

© 2008 United Press International. All Rights Reserved.
This material may not be reproduced, redistributed, or manipulated in any form.

Return to Top

The Political Risks of Obama's Iraq Strategy

It may be Barack Obama s consistency on Iraq policy, not the charge of flip-flopping, that puts him in the greatest political peril.

Obama was blasted for appearing to change positions twice on the same day after a pair of July 3 press conferences in which he seemed to leave the door open to extending his 16-month timeline for a withdrawal of most U.S. combat troops from Iraq then clarified that the end date would remain fixed.

Even if he did waver momentarily and he and his aides dispute that he did Obama has not abandoned his basic framework of a 16-month phased withdrawal, the retention of a residual force to fight terrorists, protect vital U.S. interests in Iraq and train Iraqi troops, and a proscription against the establishment of permanent U.S. bases in Iraq. (He reiterated those views in a July 14 New York Times opinion piece in advance of his first trip to Iraq in more than two years.)

It is a strategy that mirrors the Iraq withdrawal provisions passed by the House in March 2007 even more than Obamas own plan from January of that year and shares its central element with the 2006 exit strategy put forward by the liberal think tank Center for American Progress. Then-Rep. Martin Meehan unveiled a similar idea in early 2005.

This version of Total Mail Converter is not registered.

Obamas national security critics, including many Republicans, some editorialists and even a handful of Democrats, say Obamas strategy, one initially forged years ago, ignores changing circumstances in Iraq to the possible detriment of the nations interests and his own ambitions. Their arguments hinge on the notion that the surge has worked and that it has cleared a path to a stable, secure Iraq that allies itself with the United States.

The Washington Post decried Obamas rigidity as foolish consistency in a Wednesday editorial entitled The Iron Timetable.

After hinting earlier this month that he might refine his Iraq strategy after visiting the country and listening to commanders, Mr. Obama appears to have decided that sticking to his arbitrary, 16-month timetable is more important than adjusting to the dramatic changes in Iraq, the Post wrote.

Michael OHanlon, an Iraq war supporter and defense expert at the liberal-leaning Brookings Institution, told the Post that to say youre going to get out on a certain schedule regardless of what the Iraqis do, regardless of what our enemies do, regardless of what is happening on the ground is the height of absurdity.

The response from Republican supporters of presumed nominee John McCain has been even harsher particularly since they know that McCains best chances for victory rest on national security and foreign policy questions.

National security and the Iraq war are issues where Obama shows his greatest vulnerability to McCain in polling. Despite leading overall in all recent national polling and by wide margins on most domestic issues, Obama trailed McCain badly in a recent Post poll on the questions of whether each candidate would be a good commander in chief of the military (72 percent said McCain would, while only 48 percent said Obama would) and whether each candidate knows enough about world affairs to be an effective president (72 percent for McCain and 56 percent for Obama).

When narrowed to Iraq, the issue can be a double-edged sword. The Post poll found Americans about evenly divided on whether there should be a timetable or not for troop withdrawal. However, reflecting other polls, it also said that they believe by a 63 percent to 36 percent margin that Iraq was a war not worth fighting.

A New York Times/CBS News poll this week said voters believe by 78 percent to 17 percent that McCain will continue the Iraq policies of President Bush, a perception that could be troublesome for him. As in the Post poll, voters said by 59 percent to 36 percent that the U.S. should have stayed out of Iraq. Those who believe that things are going somewhat or very badly know outnumber those who think things are going well by a more modest 51 percent to 45 percent.

On Thursday, McCains camp released a video documentary of Obama taking seemingly contrary positions on a series of Iraq-related issues, including the success of the surge and funding for the war. (Obama voted consistently for funding in his first two-plus years in the Senate, then voted against a supplemental during the Democratic primary before supporting the most recent burst of money).

Return to Top

US missile defence shield to drag Poland into conflicts - leftist leader

Text of report by Polish leading privately-owned centre-left newspaper Gazeta Wyborcza website, on 16 July

[Commentary by Marek Borowski, chairman of the Social Democratic Party of Poland (SdPL) and former Sejm speaker: "Marek Borowski: Do Not Play With the Shield"]

US missile defence shield to "drag Poland into conflicts" - leftist leader

I am putting forward the thesis that there are only two reasons why Bush (and not the United States) is making such desperate efforts to install a missile defence shield. Despite assurances to the contrary, the shield is the first in a series of shields aimed against Russia (perhaps also China), or it is providing cover for a military attack against Iran. I consider the latter scenario to be more likely.

In both cases, the government's consent to the shield will drag Poland into conflicts and make it a hostage to the ineffective and extremely expensive foreign policy promoted by Bush and other US hawks. Moreover, it will (yet again) complicate our relations with Europe, which are just starting to improve.

Strange Arguments

Other arguments and reasons that are presented in public fail to withstand criticism. One argument holds that the shield will serve the purpose of US security. The question arises of who poses a threat to this country. People talk about the so-called rogue states, like Iran or North Korea. Iraq, which allegedly had missiles and was even suspected of having chemical and biological weapons, used to be included in this group, too. These reports have not been confirmed, and we have all embroiled ourselves in an endless conflict.

This version of Total Mail Converter is not registered.

When it comes to North Korea, one need only take the globe and look where these two countries are located. Such absurd arguments make a mockery of the Poles' intelligence. The very fact that they have appeared in the discussion disqualifies this project, confirming that it is - to put it charitably - unclear.

Iran may have Shahab missiles with a range of 2,000 kilometres at its disposal, but in order to attack US territory, regardless of the point of such an attack, it needs ballistic missiles, something it will not have for a long time. Before it can have such missiles at its disposal, it will have to carry out tests, which will be impossible to hide and there will be time to respond to them.

Even if we assumed that the Iranians will get ballistic missiles in 10 years, they would have to collectively develop suicidal mania and shoot them towards the United States, exposing themselves to horrible retaliation. Iranian President Ahmadinezhad's threats are upsetting and raise objections, but neither he, nor the ayatollahs are suicidal. Iran may in fact pose a threat to Israel and to the US troops in Iraq, but a shield in Poland will not defend those places, so the argument that this is about US security is impossible to defend.

The second argument holds that the shield should also serve the purpose of removing the threats that are posed to Europe by Iran and various terrorist groups, which in view of technological advancement may have long-range missiles at their disposal. It is not entirely clear where such attacks would come from. There are mentions of the area close to the border between Pakistan and Afghanistan, but it is difficult to imagine that a terrorist group will use domestic industry to build a missile that will reach Poland or Germany.

So the only thing left is Iran. Even though Ahmadinezhad and those Iranian ayatollahs who have fundamentalist views indeed feel considerable hatred towards the United States, threatening Europe is not justified. Iran is not making such threats against Europe. It has no reason to do so. This means that the second argument is also far-fetched scaremongering.

What Is the Harm?

Well, then - some might say - perhaps the reasons why the United States wants the shield are not very clear, perhaps this is simply done on a whim. Even so, if the installation of this shield in Poland brings major benefits to us, what is the harm?

First, it is claimed that the shield may boost our security. There are two concepts: naively utopian (Law and Justice [PiS]) and commercially pragmatic (Civic Platform [PO]). According to the PiS, if Poland has 100 US soldiers and several missiles in its territory, this will be enough for the United States to defend us like it would defend its own territory.

This idea is naive, but it has serious consequences, because it lets the Poles know that NATO with its famous Article 5 - "one for all, all for one" - is a fiction and the Polish elite deceived the public by assuring it that we would be safe thanks to our NATO membership.

Unfortunately, the PiS politicians have an anti-European obsession. The keep arguing in favour of special relations and a strategic partnership between Poland and the United States. Meanwhile, the Americans can maintain strategic partnerships with the countries in which they have strategic interests, namely Turkey, Israel, Saudi Arabia, and Pakistan. In our case, this is typical wishful thinking.

The thing is that the Kaczynski brothers, like the conservative Bush, who favours violent solutions, dislike libertine Europe, which respects diversity and prefers consensus. This is the philosophy behind the policy that the PiS pursued in Poland when it was in power. However, what is good for the Kaczynski brothers and for the PiS does not have to be - and usually is not - good for Poland.

The second option, represented by the PO, is more sophisticated and cynical. The PO admits that the shield, as such, increases threats, which means that it reduces Poland's security, but if we managed to obtain the relevant material guarantees (Patriot missiles) and also political guarantees, security could even be boosted and the shield installation would be profitable.

The PO represents a purely commercial approach. During a Sejm debate on foreign policy in May, [Foreign] Minister Sikorski addressed the issue of the shield in the following way: "Therefore, accepting the US arguments on the missile defence issue with goodwill, we also expect that the United States will play a more active role in the modernization of the Polish Armed Forces in line with the pledge made by President George Bush after his meeting with Prime Minister Donald Tusk on 10 March."

Let us translate this into a more comprehensible language: "We do not believe in your arguments at all, but if we pretend that we do, you will have to pay us well."

Of course, such commerce may be pursued, but on one condition: that we do not have anything to do with something bad. Unfortunately, we apparently do.

Real Danger

This version of Total Mail Converter is not registered.

If the arguments about a missile attack on the United States that may be carried out by Iran or by unspecified terrorists from an unspecified location are implausible, then what are Bush's real motives? Of course, pressure from the US military concerns - which earn a lot of money on such initiatives and whose support Bush utilized during the presidential race - is one important reason.

But this is far from being over. Unfortunately, the real danger is that we are in fact faced with a threat related to Iran, but this threat is different from the one that is being discussed. The US security doctrine that has been developed and put into practice by Bush is based on a militarized foreign policy and military attacks on the countries that, according to the United States, may cause threats.

This is what happened in Afghanistan. But the thing is that this intervention had wide international support resulting from widespread indignation at the attack on the World Trade Centre in New York. The intervention in Iraq, in turn, did not have such support. On the contrary, it divided the democratic world. Poland decided to stand by the Americans' side in order to demonstrate that it is a reliable ally. However, before we make another leap, we have to check if there is water in the pool.

Today, intervention plans are being prepared against Iran. Such information is constantly coming from the United States. Over a year ago, Joseph Cirincione, an expert with the Centre for American Progress, said in an interview for Rzeczpospolita: "Attack plans prepared by the General Staff are already in the White House. They include two scenarios: a 10-day air attack on 1,500 military targets and a five-day bombing raid on 750 targets."

Dates are even mentioned. Then denials are issued. Nonetheless, Bush's military doctrine not only allows such an operation, but is even preparing it.

As was the case with Iraq, we are simply witnessing a propagandist cannonade about growing threats posed by Iran. If such an attack was mounted, it could not be ruled out, or rather it would be very likely, that the Iran might fire missiles in retaliation.

This means that the shield is not so much about protecting Europe and the United States against Iraqi attacks as about covering the United States' potential military intervention in Iran. The shield makes it easier or even possible.

In essence, this is now the only reasonable explanation why the Americans need a missile defence shield in Europe. If Poland agrees to the shield, regardless of what it receives in exchange, it will become part of a harmful and ineffective philosophy of building global security (or rather insecurity). It will become co-responsible for this. The Poles do not want another "war over peace." A cabinet that does not see this threat does harm to Poland's interests.

Stopping Iran for Free

The last issue that comes to the fore is a serious approach to Iran's militaristic ambitions, because these are beyond any doubt. We are afraid of Iran's nuclear experiments, and we are not ignoring threats to Israel. To make a long story short, we have to answer the question of how we should cope with such an unpredictable country as Iran.

Iran is not a power that may function independently and in defiance of the whole world. In today's world, it is impossible to remove all threats with military resources. Above all, it is necessary to seek consensus and build wide counterterror coalitions, forcing the countries that pose threats to change their policies. The coalition between the United States, China, and Russia forced the North Korean regime to pull back from suspicious plans and activities.

Instead of holding hectic missile defence negotiations, Poland should therefore press the Americans to present an honest offer in public to Russia: the United States will give up the shield in exchange for Russia's agreement to pursue joint activities on the Iranian issue.

This is the only reasonable way to convince Russia and the public that the shield is not aimed against this country. Russia's refusal to take part in such a coalition would dismiss its arguments and put the shield issue in a different light. The lack of such an offer, in turn, raises suspicions about the credibility of the assurances that the shield is not anti-Russian, all the more so because there are signals that this is not the last shield.

So, on one hand, Russia's fears are said to be unfounded, because an installation with 10 missiles will be unable to stop a potential massive attack. On the other hand, there are plans to upgrade this system. This is not something I made up. Stanislaw Koziej [former deputy defence minister] wrote in one of his articles: "It is a known thing that the system will be upgraded, that there will be more bases and their capabilities will grow." And this is not a man who has encountered this subject for the first time. So we cannot really blame Russia.

The question arises of whether a coalition between the United States, Europe, and Russia would be equally effective as was the case with Korea. It certainly would be more effective and less expensive than "shielding."

Iran is not a gloomy dictatorship. This country has the opposition. Recent intelligence reports, also from the United States, show that Ahmadinezhad's confrontational policy, which causes various sanctions to be imposed on Iran, is meeting increasing resistance at home. Living conditions in Iran are worsening, which means that a coordinated pressure programme, including Russia's participation (but without the shield), will yield effects virtually for free - without spending tens of billions of dollars and without risking a military conflict.

This version of Total Mail Converter is not registered.

Solutions may vary. The best one would be an agreement between America and Iran. As part of this agreement, the Iranians would renounce nuclear ambitions and support for Hizballah in exchange for other benefits, especially economic ones. This is difficult, but not improbable. If Obama wins in the United States, he will stand a chance of starting such talks. Bush shoots first and talks later. Unfortunately, after such a direct attack, the patient is barely talkative and the costs of treatment are huge.

If this proves impossible, the most reasonable thing will be to impose more severe sanctions on Iran (a large alliance of states must be formed for this purpose), on one hand, and to constantly offer cooperation to this country, on the other. With such a strategy, Ahmadinezhad's troublemaking policy will be increasingly expensive for Iranian society and will give more middle-of-the-road politicians considerable chances to come to power.

Of course, such a policy requires the ability to envision the future, vision, and patience in building new international relations. Bush did not know how or want to pursue such a policy. His era is over. Tusk will make a huge mistake if he signs anything with this administration. These negotiations must be frozen until a new host appears in the White House, and if he wants to resume them, they must be treated in a more comprehensive manner.

I am also appealing to the prime minister to stop competing with the PiS over who will get more for the shield and who cares more about our country's security. We cannot light a fire in the middle of a room and try to convince our roommates that there is no risk because we have received modern fire extinguishers. Only those who are naive will believe such assurances. There is a better way to ensure security at home: do not play with fire.

Source: Gazeta Wyborcza website, Warsaw, in Polish 16 Jul 08

BBC Mon EU1 EuroPol 190708 nn/osc

Copyright © 2008 BBC Monitoring Service

Return to Top

Al Gore Surprise Guest At Netroots Nation

Al Gore surprised and delighted the crowd at the Netroots Nation conference in Austin, Texas today, appearing on the heels of a speech by Speaker of the House Nancy Pelosi.

According to the various Twitter feeds from the event it's being attended by approximately 2,000 progressive/liberal bloggers and reporters, all armed with laptops, blackberries and cellphones the crowd went wild at Gore's unannounced appearance, with an 'extended ovation' for him as he took the stage. 'Nancy, we ought to take this show on the road,' said Gore, according to the Twitter feed of the Washingtonian's Garrett Graff, who has been extensively Twittering the conference. Responded Pelosi: 'We are on the road.' The road is one that led to Netroots Nation this year from two such conferences in the past, though then they were called 'Yearly Kos,' so named for Daily Kos, founded by Markos Moulitsas. Moulitsas and Kos (as both he and the site are now known) have become standard-bearers for the activist left and the progressive online movement, so much so that this year's conference was renamed to reflect the fact that the progressive left was no longer just a niche movement. That has been made abundantly clear by the presence of people like Gore, Pelosi, Harold Ford, Howard Dean, and other significant figures in politics and media.

Gore demurred on whether he'd join an Obama administration, saying he was 'honored by [the] suggestion,' according to Graff, but that it would not optimize what he could contribute. The Nation's Ari Melber, also reporting from the event, reported that Gore said he felt 'the highest and best use of whatever talents and experiences I've gained in my life' would be best applied to 'trying to enlarge the political space within which elected officials and cabinet members address this climate crisis.' Here are some Tweets (as individual Twitter entries are called) from the event (note that there is a 140-character word limit on such entries): 'Essential we have safeguards, checks and balances. More important we have an informed citizenry. Netroots is key to future.' (Graff) Compares offshore drilling to 'hair of the dog': 'When you're in a hole, stop digging.' Applause. (Graff) 'Gore: When you begin looking at environmental crisis, you see it connected to economic and national security problems too.' (Graff) 'Gore says NN08 is the 'beginning of a movement to take back our democracy.' Making it the 4,578th such beginning.' (Jason Linkins via HuffPo Twitter) 'Gore would rather be an organizer than a bureaucrat on climate change. No thanks (for now) to joining an Obama administration. (Leighton Woodhouse via HuffPo Twitter) 'Gore, unlike Pelosi, throwing red meat into hungry #NN08 crowd. Big Texas-sized chunks of red meat. Feeding frenzy follows.' (Graff) 'Pelosi speaking as if she can't do anything about any problems she's citing. Isn't she Speaker of the House?' (Graff) And, in what seems to be a new media metaphor: 'ThinkProgress scooped Pelosi on Gore's surprise appearance.' (Ari Melber via HuffPo Twitter) Ongoing coverage of Netroots Nation may be found here, and further links are below.

Melber: Al Gore Makes Surprise Visit to Netroots Nation [The Nation]

HuffPolitics Twitter Feed [HuffPo]

This version of Total Mail Converter is not registered.

Garrett Graff Twitter Feed [Twitter]

Bloggers bring blue to a red state

Return to Top

One such outlet bloggers choose is Thinkprogress.org. With nearly 2 million hits on its Web site per month and 80000 e-newsletter subscribers, ...

Kaiser Daily Health Policy Report Feature Highlights Recent Blog ...

Return to Top

While mainstream news coverage is still a primary source of information for the latest in policy debates and the health care marketplace, online blogs have become a significant part of the media landscape, often presenting new perspectives on policy issues and drawing attention to under-reported topics. To provide complete coverage of health policy issues, the Kaiser Daily Health Policy Report offers readers a window into the world of blogs in a roundup of health policy-related blog posts. "Blog Watch," published on Tuesdays and Fridays, tracks a wide range of blogs, providing a brief description and relevant links for highlighted posts.

Igor Volsky from the Center For American Progress Action Fund's Wonk Room blog disagrees with President Bush's claim that cuts to Medicare Advantage plans would disproportionately affect low-income seniors, noting that a larger share of low-income seniors receive supplemental coverage from Medicaid than MA. Volsky also says that while 49% of MA beneficiaries are low-income, 51% of traditional fee-for-service beneficiaries are, too.

Congressional Budget Office Director Peter Orszag lists key points from his testimony on Thursday to the Senate Finance Committee on the "overuse, underuse and misuse of health care."

The Health Access WebLog's Anthony Wright discusses problems with California's high-risk pool, the Major Risk Medical Insurance Program, in response to a New York Times article about presumptive Republican presidential nominee Sen. John McCain's (Ariz.) plan to expand federal funding for such pools. Wright concludes that "the real solution is to reduce the number of people denied by insurance companies in the first place." A kaisernetwork.org "Ask the Experts" webcast discussing high-risk pools, which includes the executive director of California's pool, is available online.

HHS Secretary Mike Leavitt discusses Congress' vote to override Bush's veto of the Medicare bill, saying "what is at stake is whether our country lives under a system focused on one-size-fits-all coverage and price fixing, or whether it embraces free-market incentives, competitive bidding and consumer choice." Managed Care Matters' Joe Paduda discusses health insurers' opposition to the legislation, saying that "by digging in their heels, health plans likely lost their last best chance to play a dominant role in future health care reform negotiations."

Niko Karvounis and Maggie Mahar from the Century Foundation's Health Beat Blog discuss challenges facing health insurers and offer a short history of HMOs in the U.S.

The Health Care Blog's Brian Klepper discusses ways lobbyists and business interests prevent health reform and suggests two solutions: the formation of a "national business coalition" that focuses on public policy and the public's best short- and long-term interests, and a "new" Congress that rejects lobbying efforts.

Health Populi's Jane Sarasohn-Kahn discusses a call by former President Bill Clinton at a National Governor's Association meeting for states to be laboratories for democracy and asks, "How much health-democracy can each governor afford when balancing their budget in the face of declining revenues?" Sarasohn-Kahn also notes that Medicaid accounts for 22% of total state spending.

Don McCanne from Physicians for a National Health Program Blog posts his response to Jonathan Cohn's article in The New Republic, in which Cohn discusses PNHP's recent criticism of Health Care for America Now, a national campaign that calls for access to comprehensive, affordable health care in the U.S. Richard Kirsch, HCAN's national campaign manager, posts a response to questions the campaign has received for not endorsing single-payer health care.

Alicia Mundy from the Wall Street Journal's Health Blog reports on a meeting between Pharmaceutical Research and Manufacturers of America lawyers and House Energy and Commerce Committee's investigations panel staffers about direct-to-consumer advertising.

O'Reilly: "Birth control is not a medical condition, it is a choice"

Return to Top

As the blog Think Progress noted, on the July 17 edition of Fox News' The O'Reilly Factor, while discussing the issue of whether health insurance plans that cover Viagra should also cover birth control, host Bill O'Reilly asserted: "Viagra is used to help a medical condition -- that's why it's covered. Birth control is not a medical condition, it is a choice. Why should I or anybody else have to pay for other people's choices?" But O'Reilly's assertion is contradicted by professional medical associations that have stated that pregnancy is a medical condition and that "[c]ontraception is medically necessary" for women.

This version of Total Mail Converter is not registered.

O'Reilly made his comment after airing a Planned Parenthood Action Fund ad that included a clip of Sen. John McCain being asked: "It's unfair how the insurance companies cover Viagra but not birth control. Do you have an opinion on that?" McCain responded: "I don't know enough about it to give you an informed answer." During the segment, O'Reilly also said: "Do I have to buy you dinner before you use the birth control? Give me and every other taxpayer a break, Planned Parenthood."

Dr. Luella Klein, former president of the American College of Obstetricians and Gynecologists (ACOG) and then-director of ACOG's women's health issues, was quoted in a May 12, 1998, USA Today article as saying: "Pregnancy is a medical condition, just like impotence. And the cost benefit of preventing pregnancy is much greater than treating impotence." In addition, ACOG's "Contraceptive Equity Toolkit" states that "[m]ost women can become pregnant from the time they are teenagers until they are in their late forties" and that "[c]ontraception is medically necessary to a woman for more than 30 years of her life." The Toolkit added: "To ignore the health benefits of contraception is to say that the alternative of 12 to 15 pregnancies during a woman's lifetime is medically acceptable."

Further, in a May 8, 2007, press release, ACOG stated that "contraception is basic, preventive health care and should be readily available and treated the same as prophylactic therapies for other medical conditions."

Additionally, according to the American Medical Association (AMA) Statement on Family and Medical Leave: "AMA supports policies that provide employees with reasonable job security and continued availability of health plan benefits in the event leave by an employee becomes necessary due to documented medical conditions. Such policies should provide for reasonable periods of paid or unpaid: (1) medical leave for the employee, including pregnancy" [emphases added].

Further, Think Progress quoted from a statement by the National Women's Law Center (NWLC), which states that "[a]ccess to contraception is critical to preventing unintended pregnancies and to enabling women to control the timing and spacing of their pregnancies, which in turn reduces the incidence of maternal death, low birth weight babies, and infant mortality." The NWLC added that the "exclusion of prescription contraceptives from health insurance coverage unfairly disadvantages women by singling out for unfavorable treatment a health insurance need that only they have."

From the July 17 edition of Fox News' The O'Reilly Factor:

O'REILLY: On a similar subject, the Planned Parenthood fanatics want you and me to pay for everybody's birth control, so they use John McCain to make that point.

[begin video clip]

ANNOUNCER: Ever use birth control? Then you'll want to hear this.

UNIDENTIFIED FEMALE: It's unfair how the insurance companies cover Viagra but not birth control. Do you have an opinion on that?

McCAIN: I don't know enough about it to give you a informed answer.

ANNOUNCER: Planned Parenthood Action Fund is responsible for the content of this advertising, because women deserve quality, affordable health care.

[end video clip]

O'REILLY: OK, listen up. Viagra is used to help a medical condition -- that's why it's covered. Birth control is not a medical condition, it is a choice. Why should I or anybody else have to pay for other people's choices? Do I have to buy you dinner before you use the birth control? Give me and every other taxpayer a break, Planned Parenthood.

Return to Top

Pelosi The end could be in sight

Ryan Grim
Politico, The Categories: Iraq

Pelosi calls for high-level meeting with Iraqis

Democratic presidential candidate Barack Obama in his push for a timetable for the withdrawal of U.S. troops from Iraq. Iraqi

This version of Total Mail Converter is not registered.

Prime Minister Nouri al-Maliki tells a German outlet that he'd like to see troops leave 'as soon as possible, as far as we are concerned.' He then added: 'U.S. presidential candidate Barack Obama is right when he talks about 16 months.' Amanda Terkel with Think Progress is down in Austin to the lefty blogosphere. House Speaker Nancy Pelosi (D-Calif.) introduced Gore and also took questions, one of which was about Maliki's declaration. 'So with the prime minister saying its time for you to go,' she told the crowd, 'I think its time for our country to sit down with the Iraqis and work that plan out. [We need to be] respectful of what the prime minister says, and respectful of the will of the American people, who have been against this war for a long time...[We should] have a high-level meeting with the Iraqis to work out the terms of our deployment out of Iraq...So, the end could be in sight.' UPDATE: Former interim Iraqi Prime Minister Ayad Allawi will testify before Congress on Wednesday when a subcommittee of the House foreign affairs panel looks into extending the U.N. mandate that authorization the U.S. occupation of Iraq. Subcommittee chairman William Delahunt (D-Mass.) his view of the timetable for withdrawal.

Return to Top

Pelosi Calls For High-level Meeting With Iraqis

Amanda Terkel with Think Progress is down in Austin live-blogging former Vice President Al Gore's address to the lefty blogosphere. ...

This version of Total Mail Converter is not registered.

From: "John Anzalone" <john@algpolling.com>
To: "Oren Shur" <oshur@hillaryclinton.com>
Date: 1/23/2016 4:23:06 PM
Subject: Re: BREAKING: DMR: Endorsement: Hillary Clinton has needed knowledge, experience

I would let that part go. I think it is more insulting than helpful for our message contrast.

John Anzalone
Anzalone Liszt Grove Research
334-387-3121. Office
@AnzaloneLiszt

On Jan 23, 2016, at 5:14 PM, Oren Shur <oshur@hillaryclinton.com > wrote:

> This is great, half of it reads like one of our ads.
> Jim and I just discussed and we should deff cut a script from this.
> Dixon Davis, are you guys available to take first crack?
> My only question - whether we lean into "the presidency is not an entry level position" - and push off from it, or just let that part go.
>
> Sent from my iPhone
>
> Begin forwarded message:
>
> From: Zachary Petkanas <zpetkanas@hillaryclinton.com >
> Date: January 23, 2016 at 6:00:48 PM EST
> To: Clips <clips@hillaryclinton.com >
> Subject: BREAKING: DMR: Endorsement: Hillary Clinton has needed knowledge, experience
>
> # DMR : Endorsement: Hillary Clinton has needed knowledge, experience
>
> If there's one thing Democrats and Republicans agree on this year, it's the fact that the next president will face enormous challenges.
>
> Domestically, this president must work with Congress in confronting the issues of immigration, health care, increased threats to national security, the disappearing middle class, the growing deficit, Social Security solvency, gun control, renewable energy, sentencing reform and more.
>
> On the world stage, this president will have to work with foreign leaders in dealing with ISIS and other terrorists, climate change, the containment of nuclear threats posed in North Korea and Iran, the Russian incursions in Ukraine and foreign trade.
>
> The presidency is not an entry-level position. Whoever is sworn into office next January must demonstrate not only a deep understanding of the issues facing America, but also possess the diplomatic skills that enable presidents to forge alliances to get things done.
>
> By that measure, Democrats have one outstanding candidate deserving of their support: Hillary Clinton. No other candidate can match the depth or breadth of her knowledge and experience.
>
> As first lady, she worked tirelessly on health care reform and, with bipartisan support, created the Children's

This version of Total Mail Converter is not registered.

Health Insurance Program that provides coverage for 8 million children.

As a senator, she reached across party lines and joined forces with conservatives, including Sen. Lindsey Graham and former House Speaker Newt Gingrich, to fight for job creation and universal health care.

ENDORSEMENT: Marco Rubio can chart new direction for GOP

NASH: Register faced tough decision in endorsements

RELATED:A history of Register caucus endorsements

As secretary of state, she helped secure international sanctions against Iran and redefined her job by expanding America's diplomatic agenda to include poverty, women's rights, the environment and other issues.

She is not a perfect candidate, as evidenced the way she has handled the furor over her private email server. In our endorsement of her 2008 campaign for president, we wrote that "when she makes a mistake, she should just say so." That appears to be a lesson she has yet to fully embrace.

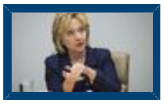
Her changing stance on gay marriage, immigration and other issues has invited accusations that she is guided less by personal conviction than by political calculations. She refutes that, and argues persuasively that a willingness to change one's thinking on specific issues, while remaining true to what she calls "the same values and principles," is a virtue, one lacking in most politicians.

Over the course of two meetings, Clinton spent more than three hours with the editorial board, answering questions in a direct and forthright manner. She exhibited an impressive command of the issues, though we'd have liked to hear more from her on the debt and the future of Social Security. She was somewhat prickly and defensive when discussing her emails, but overall she was gracious, engaging and personable.

Her chief opponent for the nomination, Sen. Bernie Sanders of Vermont, has proven to be an honorable and formidable campaigner, and it's very likely that without him in the race, candidates in both parties wouldn't be discussing America's growing inequality in wealth and income.

Sanders has tapped into the public's anger and frustration with Washington, without demonizing government and resorting to the cheap demagoguery favored by Donald Trump and others. He has shown himself to be a man of courage and principle who has the ability to rally others to his cause.

This version of Total Mail Converter is not registered.



Buy Photo

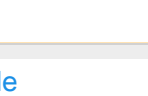
Democratic presidential candidate Hillary Clinton meets with the Des Moines Register editorial board Monday Jan 11, 2015, in Des Moines, Iowa. Rodney White/The Register

Buy Photo

Fullscreen

This version of Total Mail Converter is not registered.

-
-
-
-
-
-
-
-
-
-
-
-
-
-
-
-
-
-
-



This version of Total Mail Converter is not registered.

-
-
-
-
-
-
-
-
-
-
-
-
-
-
-
-
-
-
-

This version of Total Mail Converter is not registered.

-
-
-
-
-
-
-
-
-
-
-
-
-
-
-
-
-
-
-
-

This version of Total Mail Converter is not registered.

-
-
-
-
-
-
-
-
-
-
-

Next Slide

But Sanders admits that virtually all of his plans for reform have no chance of being approved by a Congress that bears any resemblance to the current crop of federal lawmakers. This is why, he says, voters can't simply elect him president, but must instead spark a "political revolution."

Easier said than done. Congress has the largest Republican majority since the 71st Congress of 1929-31.

A successful Sanders presidency would hinge on his ability to remake Washington in his own image. It's almost inconceivable that such a transformation could take place, even with Democrats controlling both chambers of Congress.

As for Martin O'Malley, the data-driven, wonkish former Maryland governor who has gained little traction in the campaign so far, he seems better suited to a Cabinet-level job in a Clinton White House.

In the final analysis, Iowa Democrats will have to choose between the lofty idealism of Bernie Sanders and the down-to-earth pragmatism of Hillary Clinton. For some, this will be a choice of whether to vote with their hearts or their heads.

Clinton has demonstrated that she is a thoughtful, hardworking public servant who has earned the respect of leaders at home and abroad. She stands ready to take on the most demanding job in the world.

This endorsement is the opinion of The Des Moines Register's editorial board:

David Chivers, president and publisher

Amalie Nash*, executive editor and vice president for news and engagement*

Lynn Hicks, opinion editor

This version of Total Mail Converter is not registered.

Clark Kauffman, editorial writer

Andie Dominick, editorial writer

Brian Smith, engagement editor

This version of Total Mail Converter is not registered.

From:	"Tara McGuinness" <tara@iraqcampaign.org>
To:	tom@zzranch.com "Lindsay Shulman" <Lindsay.Shulman@one.org> "Natalie S. Ondiak" <nondiak@americanprogress.org> "Bryan Fisher" <BFisher@gqrr.com> "Wallace, Laurelie" <lwallace@hatcreekent.com> "Susan McCue" <susan@one.org> "Stan Greenberg" <sgreenberg@gqrr.com> JohnPodesta <john.podesta@gmail.com> "Begala, Paul" <pbegala@hatcreekent.com> "Zach Schwartz" <zschwartz@shangrila.us>
Date:	11/28/2007 4:10:45 PM
Subject:	Tracking Highlights and a Hit on McCain

Hey All,

Following up on our meeting yesterday, I thought I would send along some tracking highlights from the week and recent IA and NH polls (see below). Also, I wanted to share one test of our tracking/system that took place yesterday that models how we can push candidates on different themes:

Testing the Tracking/Rapid Response System

McCain Says Iraq Making Political Progress

On Sunday, McCain told ABC's "This Week" that in Iraq, "There is progress politically. There is a process of reconciliation." Iraq campaign hits McCain with a press release on how he is "out of touch with Iraq reality."

McCain-backer Senator Graham Questions Iraqi Political Progress

Lindsay Graham, a McCain supporter, returned from the same Iraq trip with a more reality-based perspective. "I do expect them to deliver," Graham said in a phone interview upon returning from a Thanksgiving trip he and McCain made to Iraq. "What would happen for me if there's no progress on reconciliation after the first of the year, I would be looking at ways to invest our money into groups that can deliver." [Associated Press , 11/27/07]. Graham also sent out an email in support of McCain's campaign on Monday and went and hit the trail with him in South Carolina.

Campaign Pushes Reporters To Question McCain/Graham

Senator Graham's email and a release were moved to SC reporters by Hildebrand Tewes. A local reporter asked McCain about his Iraq disagreements with Graham and campaign trackers catch question on tape:

http://www.youtube.com/watch?v=Q6_jbcG45ys

Tracking Video on Iraq Progress Waffling Sent to Press

The tracking video was put up on youtube and circulated to reporters following McCain.

Candidate Highlights

Mitt Romney

This version of Total Mail Converter is not registered.

- Romney spent time in Iowa and New Hampshire this past week.

"I know it's very popular to, in some places, to be critical of the president but let's not forget that the president has kept America safe these last six years, that has not been easy." (Washington, IA 11/21)

"The president did a superb job in knocking down Saddam Hussein and replacing his military. Now the question is what do we do now? And the key for me is making sure we do not have Iraq develop into a safe-haven of the nature Afghanistan was under the Taliban. And if we were to do what Barack Obama had suggested, which is just pullout, now that Al Qaeda is there, Al Qaeda would have had a dominant role potentially among the Sunnis in particular. And that would have made, that would have made Afghanistan look like child's play as a place to launch attacks against us.

"I am adamantly pro-life and that every speck of human life is a child of God and therefore as part of being a civilized society we should protect the sanctity of human life and I recognize that I need to get a lot of people to agree with me, so I'll do my best to change the hearts and minds as mine has been." (Cedar Rapids, IA 11/20)

Rudy Giuliani

- Giuliani spent time in New Hampshire this past week.

"What's the worst outcome in Iraq? The worst outcome in Iraq is if it were to become a haven–if it became a state sponsor of terrorism like Iran is. If it became an ally of Iran; that would be worst possible situation for us considering Iran wants to become a nuclear power. So that's the best and that's the worst." (Laconia, NH 11/24)

"The Democrats do not say the word, 'Islamic Terrorism' cause they believe they are offending people by saying it, I imagine that's why, because I can't imagine why you wouldn't identify your enemy if you're running for President of the United States. It would be like running in the 30's and not saying Nazi or running in the 50's, 60's and 70's running and not saying Communist. They are our enemy and that's the way they organize themselves, we're not naming them something that they're not, that's the way they organize. But when I say Islamic Terrorism, I'm not insulting anyone. Anyone who is getting insulted is getting insulted for no reason, except Islamic Terrorists." (Bedford, NH 11/26)

John McCain

- McCain spent time in New Hampshire and South Carolina this past week.

- All of McCain's events in New Hampshire were very well attended, packed house in most cases, despite bad weather. Further, he received standing ovations at a couple of those events.

McCain at press conference 11/26 in Lexington, SC

This version of Total Mail Converter is not registered.

"We are winning in Iraq and that's a fact."

"My friends we have succeeded; and we have a long way to go; and we probably have more sacrifice. And I'm sorry. I'm sorry that we do."

"I'm grateful that we Republicans have stood fast. I'm grateful this president has stood fast."

Fred Thompson

- Thompson spent time in Iowa, New Hampshire and South Carolina this past week.

- In Ames, Iowa on 11/21, Thompson said he would build a "one million person army."

Mike Huckabee

- Huckabee spent time in South Carolina this past week. Not much substance in any of his appearances this week. He spoke mostly about football and religion.

POLL QUESTION: Romney is in a near heat with Huckabee in most IA polls, some have Romney clearly ahead. Rudy is running a distance third. In NH, Romney is in the lead with McCain or Guiliani in second place. See some recent polls below:

Republican Polls

Rasmussen Reports
11/27/2007
Iowa
w/o Newt Gingrich
Margin of Error = 3.0% [?]

Mike Huckabee	28%
Mitt Romney	25%
Rudy Giuliani	12%
Fred Thompson	11%
Ron Paul	5%
John McCain	4%
Tom Tancredo	4%
Duncan Hunter	1%
Unsure	10%
Source

Strategic Vision
11/24/2007
Iowa
w/o Newt Gingrich

This version of Total Mail Converter is not registered.

Margin of Error = 3.5% [?]

Mitt Romney	26%
Mike Huckabee	24%
Rudy Giuliani	14%
Fred Thompson	10%
John McCain	7%
Ron Paul	5%
Tom Tancredo	3%
Duncan Hunter	1%
Unsure	10%
Source

ABC News/Washington Post Poll
11/16/2007
Iowa
w/o Newt Gingrich
Margin of Error = 4.4% [?]

Mitt Romney	28%
Mike Huckabee	24%
Fred Thompson	15%
Rudy Giuliani	13%
John McCain	6%
Ron Paul	6%
Tom Tancredo	2%
Duncan Hunter	1%
Unsure	4%
None of these	1%
Source

Research 2000 for KCCI TV and KCRG TV
11/13/2007
Iowa
w/o Newt Gingrich
Margin of Error = 4.4% [?]

This version of Total Mail Converter is not registered.

Mitt Romney	27%
Mike Huckabee	18%
Rudy Giuliani	16%
Fred Thompson	10%
John McCain	6%
Ron Paul	5%
Tom Tancredo	2%
Duncan Hunter	1%
Unsure	15%
Source

American Research Group
11/12/2007
Iowa
w/o Newt Gingrich
Margin of Error = 3.5% [?]

Mitt Romney	26%
Mike Huckabee	24%
Rudy Giuliani	11%
Fred Thompson	11%
John McCain	10%
Ron Paul	3%
Tom Tancredo	1%
Duncan Hunter	1%
Unsure	13%
Source

Rasmussen Reports
11/12/2007
Iowa
w/o Newt Gingrich
Margin of Error = 3.1% [?]

Mitt Romney	29%
Mike Huckabee	16%
Rudy Giuliani	15%
Fred Thompson	14%
John McCain	6%
Ron Paul	4%
Tom Tancredo	4%
Duncan Hunter	2%
Unsure	9%
Source

This version of Total Mail Converter is not registered.

Strategic Vision
11/11/2007
Iowa
w/o Newt Gingrich
Margin of Error = 3.7% [?]

Mitt Romney	30%
Mike Huckabee	19%
Rudy Giuliani	12%
Fred Thompson	11%
John McCain	7%
Ron Paul	5%
Tom Tancredo	2%
Duncan Hunter	1%
Unsure	13%
Source

Zogby International poll
11/7/2007
Iowa
w/o Newt Gingrich
Margin of Error = 4.5% [?]

Mitt Romney	31%
Mike Huckabee	15%
Rudy Giuliani	11%
Fred Thompson	10%
John McCain	8%
Ron Paul	4%
Tom Tancredo	3%
Duncan Hunter	1%
Unsure	16%
Other	1%
Source

CBS News/New York Times Poll
11/7/2007
Iowa
w/o Newt Gingrich
Margin of Error = 4.0% [?]

This version of Total Mail Converter is not registered.

Mitt Romney	27%
Mike Huckabee	21%
Rudy Giuliani	15%
Fred Thompson	9%
John McCain	4%
Ron Paul	4%
Tom Tancredo	3%
Duncan Hunter	2%
Unsure	14%
Other	1%
Source

Republican Polls

CNN/WMUR/University of New Hampshire Granite State Poll
11/16/2007
New Hampshire
w/o Newt Gingrich
Margin of Error = 4.6% [?]

Mitt Romney	33%
John McCain	18%
Rudy Giuliani	16%
Ron Paul	8%
Mike Huckabee	5%
Fred Thompson	4%
Tom Tancredo	1%
Unsure	14%
Other	1%
Source

CBS News/New York Times Poll
11/11/2007
New Hampshire
w/o Newt Gingrich
Margin of Error = 5.3% [?]

This version of Total Mail Converter is not registered.

Mitt Romney	34%
Rudy Giuliani	16%
John McCain	16%
Ron Paul	8%
Mike Huckabee	6%
Fred Thompson	5%
Unsure	14%
Other	1%
Source

Rasmussen Reports
11/8/2007
New Hampshire
w/o Newt Gingrich
Margin of Error = 3.6% [?]

Mitt Romney	32%
Rudy Giuliani	17%
John McCain	16%
Mike Huckabee	10%
red Thompson	7%
Ron Paul	4%
Tom Tancredo	3%
Duncan Hunter	2%
Unsure	10%
Source

Boston Globe poll conducted by the University of New Hampshire
11/5/2007
New Hampshire
w/o Newt Gingrich
Margin of Error = 4.5% [?]

Mitt Romney	32%
Rudy Giuliani	20%
John McCain	17%
Ron Paul	7%
Mike Huckabee	5%
Fred Thompson	3%
Unsure	16%
Source

Marist College Poll
11/4/2007

This version of Total Mail Converter is not registered.

New Hampshire
w/o Newt Gingrich
Margin of Error = 4.8% [?]

Mitt Romney	33%
Rudy Giuliani	22%
John McCain	13%
Mike Huckabee	7%
Ron Paul	7%
Fred Thompson	5%
Tom Tancredo	1%
Unsure	12%
Source

This version of Total Mail Converter is not registered.

From: "Dan Schwerin" <dschwerin@hillaryclinton.com>
To: H <hdr29@hrcoffice.com>
Date: 1/20/2016 3:03:07 PM
Subject: Speech for tomorrow

Madam Secretary, following up on the outline from yesterday, here is a full draft. (Also sent to Connolly for printing.) The core argument remains that you have the experience to get results while Sanders' ideas are a recipe for gridlock, and Americans can't afford to wait. As much as possible, I've drawn from language that you've used either on the stump or in speeches like the Wing Ding or in debate prep, especially lines that got good applause in the past. This also reflects the conversation I had with your husband yesterday and what he said in NH today. Nick also shared a little of what you said at your event this evening and I will get that transcript shortly.

This draft is still something of a work in progress and the rest of the team is reviewing as well, but I know time is short and I wanted to get to you as soon as possible. So will be standing by for your thoughts and also continuing to edit back here.
Thanks
Dan

HILLARY RODHAM CLINTON

"WE CAN'T WAIT"

INDIANOLA, IOWA

THURSDAY, JANUARY 21, 2015

- Hello, Indianola! I'm so excited to be with you today. We're energized, we're organized, and we're ready to go win a caucus! I want to thank [name], our terrific organizer here. She's doing a great job.
- And I want to thank all the precinct captains, union members, and volunteers who are here. Raise your hand if you've made a phone call or knocked on a door for this campaign… You are our heart and soul -- and you're why we're going to win on February 1st.
- I am so grateful to all of you who've already decided to support me in the caucus. If you haven't yet, I hope you'll fill out one of our blue commitment cards. If you're still deciding who to support, I'm glad you're here and I hope I can earn your vote.
- Democrats have an important choice to make. You have to decide who will make a real difference in your lives and keep our country moving forward.
- Now, I have a lot of respect for Senator Sanders and Governor O'Malley and we certainly share many of the same goals. Our differences pale compared to what we see on the other side. You saw this if you watched the debates last week. One party is becoming defined by paranoia, prejudice, and greed. The other is focused on creating good-paying jobs and holding Wall Street accountable. That's why I'm proud to be a Democrat.
- Republicans want Americans to suffer from collective amnesia. Well, we're going to remind people of the facts – that the economy does a whole lot better when there's a Democrat in the White House.
- But as much as we respect each other and agree on a lot of things, Senator Sanders and I do have some important differences. We have different records and different ideas about how to drive progress.
- For me, it's all about what's going to deliver results that actually make life better for families. That's what I've done my whole life, whether it was working with Republicans and Democrats in Congress to create the Children's Health Insurance Program that now covers 8 million kids, or securing a treaty with Russia that reduces the threat we face from nuclear weapons. I'm not interested in ideas that sound good on paper but will never make it in the real world – what I care about is making a difference in your life.
- As I've traveled across Iowa, people have shared their hopes and their heartaches. I've heard the problems that keep you up at night and the dreams that get you up in the morning.

This version of Total Mail Converter is not registered.

- I met a gentleman the other day in Cedar Rapids who told me that his prescription drug costs had tripled. I met a mom at that same event who said that her son has diabetes and even insulin is getting much more expensive – insulin's not some fancy new drug, it's been around forever. The only reason is greed.
- Last month in Waterloo, a worried husband named Larry told me his wife Brenda spends hundreds of dollars each month on medicine for arthritis and osteoporosis. When they see hedge fund tycoons buying drug companies and raising prices by 4000 percent overnight, they just want to scream.
- Something is wrong when your paycheck has barely grown in years, but corporate profits and CEO pay are at near-record highs. Something is wrong when you can do everything right, but still not get ahead. Like Brandi from Des Moines, who was laid off six years ago. She went back to school, worked hard, got her degree. Now she's a supervisor in a restaurant, but still only makes $9.50 an hour. That's not enough, especially with kids.
- Brandi needs a raise. Larry and Brenda need lower drug prices. People across Iowa need more good jobs, help with their student debt, a more secure retirement. These are the problems I'm focused on. I get up every day thinking about how we're going to make a difference for people and families who really need it.
- I have nothing but admiration for Senator Sanders, but he does see the world a little differently.
- Take health care, for example. I want us to defend and build on the progress we've made under President Obama, especially the Affordable Care Act.
- Remember what it was like before Obamacare? The insurance companies were in charge and free to discriminate against people with pre-existing conditions. They charged women more for the same coverage. And 44 million Americans didn't have any coverage at all.
- I don't think President Obama gets the credit he deserves for taking on this fight and getting the job done. Today, more than 18 million Americans have been covered and the uninsured rate has dropped below 10 percent. I want to build on that progress. Keep expanding coverage to more people. Lower your out-of-pocket costs with a new tax credit. Cap what you have to pay each month for prescription drugs. Finally let Medicare negotiate better prices.
- We can get this done without another divisive debate on our entire health care system or giving Republicans an opening to come in and tear down everything we've achieved. We can make real progress right now for people and families who need it.
- Senator Sanders has a different idea. He wants to start over with a whole new system. And in theory, there's a lot to like about that. But "in theory" isn't enough. A President has to deliver in reality.
- Senator Sanders has been in Congress for 25 years and he's introduced his health care plan again and again. But he never got even a single vote in the House or a single Senate co-sponsor. Not one.
- I believe we can't wait for a whole new system to be built before we start solving the problems families are facing every day.
- The people I've met in Iowa can't wait. The grandmother who has to choose between paying for medicine and paying the rent can't wait. The single mom who desperately needs a raise can't wait. The student with a mountain of debt can't wait. You can't wait and neither can our country. We need to roll up our sleeves and start making progress right now.
- My opponent's ideas are a recipe for gridlock in Washington, not action. That won't help anyone. Except maybe the Republicans who are looking for any opportunity to take us backwards. We just can't take that risk.
- We have to defend the progress we've made under President Obama and go even further. My economic plan will raise incomes and create good-paying jobs right away.
- I'll fight for more fairness in our economy. Let's make those at the top pay their fair share. Because multi-millionaires and companies that ship jobs overseas shouldn't get tax breaks – you should.
- Let's stop the abuse on Wall Street and make sure that if you break the law, it doesn't matter who you are, you're going to jail. Let's enforce our trade rules and stop letting countries like China take advantage of American workers and businesses.
- Let's raise the minimum wage, expand Social Security for those who need it most, and finally guarantee equal pay for women. Because in America, if you work hard, you deserve to see the rewards.

This version of Total Mail Converter is not registered.

- And we can't stop there. More fairness is essential, but it's not enough. We also need more growth in our economy.
- We have to invest in advanced manufacturing so we're making and building things here, not somewhere else. Make it easier to start and grow small businesses. Create the clean energy jobs of the future—because it's going to be China or Germany or us, and I want it to be us. Iowa already gets a third of its energy from renewables, mostly wind. If you can do it, so can America.
- We can do this. We can make our economy stronger and our country fairer. But we have to do it together.
- The truth is, too many people today feel left out and left behind. That's not the America we want to be.
- Instead of demonizing hard-working immigrant families, we should be giving them a real path to citizenship. Instead of a school-to-prison pipeline that keeps communities of color down, we need a cradle-to-college pipeline that lifts people up.
- We have to end discrimination against LGBT Americans wherever it exists. And I'll always defend Planned Parenthood. Republicans may say I'm playing the gender card. Well, if fighting for women's health and women's rights is playing the gender card – then deal me in.
- We also can't turn our backs on working-class families in struggling rural communities and crumbling Appalachian towns… in Coal Country and Farm Country… families who for generations worked their fingers to the bone keeping our lights on and our factories running and our crops growing.
- So many are hurting right now. In a lot of places, people are dying younger than their parents. The substance abuse I hear about everywhere I go in Iowa and across our country is a big part of it. But you know what my husband said to me the other day? He said folks feel the American Dream slipping away -- and they're dying of a broken heart.
- I think Bill's right. I hear it in the voices of parents who don't know how they're going to give their kids the opportunities they deserve. I see it in the eyes of people who don't expect anything to come easy but wonder why it has to be quite so hard.
- We're going to give the American Dream back to them. We're going to make this economy work for everyone – the struggling, the striving, and the successful. That will be my mission as President, from the first day to the last.
- But you know, we're not just picking a President, we're also choosing a Commander-in-Chief. I'm the only candidate on either side with the experience and judgment to keep us safe at home and strong in the world.
- Now, the Republican candidates keep asking about my accomplishments. So I sent them all a copy of my book, "Hard Choices." I figured there were so many of them, they could start a book club.
- They could read about how I got Russia and China to agree to tough new sanctions on Iran. Or how I brokered a cease-fire between Hamas and Israel that stopped terrorist rockets from falling on Israeli homes. Maybe they'd be interested in how you push for a global agreement on climate change… oh who are we kidding, they don't care about that at all!
- Well, it's all in the book. But I didn't get a single thank you note. And based on what they're saying on the campaign trail, it doesn't seem like they learned very much.
- Shallow slogans don't add up to a strategy. Promising to carpet bomb until the desert glows doesn't make you sound strong – it makes you sound like you're in over your head. Bluster and bigotry are not credentials for becoming Commander-in-Chief. And it would be a huge mistake to send U.S. combat troops into another costly ground war in the Middle East.
- Now, Senator Sanders doesn't talk very much about foreign policy. But when he does, it raises concerns, because sometimes it sounds like he's hasn't really thought it through. For example, he suggested we invite Iranian troops into Syria. That's just a bad idea. It's like asking the arsonist to be the firefighter. As terrible as things are in Syria, more Iranian troops are only going to make things worse.
- The world a President has to grapple with is beyond complicated. That's why this is the hardest job in the world. I've seen it up close and personal. And I know what it takes.
- I know how to find common ground and how to stand my ground. I teamed up with Republicans like Tom

This version of Total Mail Converter is not registered.

Delay to improve our foster care system. I worked with Lindsey Graham to extend health benefits for our National Guard and Reserves. We had deep disagreements. But we found a sliver of common ground. And that made life better for a whole lot of people.

- I'll also stand my ground so you can gain ground. That's why I'm taking on the gun lobby in this campaign. We're losing an average of 90 Americans every day to gun violence. It's wrong, it has to stop, and I won't back down no matter what they throw at me.
- But I can't do any of this alone. On February 1st, it's up to you. You have to decide who you trust to make a real difference in your lives.
- I know how to get things done. How to build on the progress we've made. My opponent's ideas are a recipe for gridlock, not action. The American people can't afford that. You shouldn't have to wait for results. You shouldn't have to wait for lower drug prices. You shouldn't have to wait for higher wages or help with college loans. You shouldn't have to wait to start that small business or to enjoy a secure retirement.
- You brought our country back from the worst economic crisis in our lifetimes. Now it's your time to get ahead. And, you know what? America succeeds when you succeed.
- It comes down to this: I need you. I need you knocking on doors and making phone calls. I need you caucusing on February 1st. And I need you standing with me every day as President, working to build that better America.
- So please join me. You can text JOIN to 4-7-2-4-6 right now. And then visit hillaryclinton.com . Talk to your friends and family. Talk to your neighbors. Make sure they're all going to caucus on February 1st.
- The pundits might be surprised that this race is close, but I'm not. I never doubted that I'd have to work for every vote. I never doubted that I'd face tough attacks.
- I don't care how hard Karl Rove or the Koch Brothers hit us. I've spent my life working for children, families, and our country… from the kitchen table to the peace table… working to even the odds for people who have the odds stacked against them. And I'm just getting warmed up.
- So, I want to thank you and all the people of Iowa. You've taught me so much. You've made me a better candidate. And I believe thanks to you I will be a better President.
- Iowa, I'm listening to you, I'm fighting for you, and, with your help, as President I'm going to deliver.

###

This version of Total Mail Converter is not registered.

From:	"Ilan Goldenberg" <igoldenberg@nsnetwork.org>
To:	bigcampaign@googlegroups.com
Date:	9/22/2008 5:07:43 AM
Subject:	[big campaign] NSN Factcheck: 10 Claims John McCain Will Make at the National Security Debate
Attachments:	10 Things John McCain Will Say.docx

FYI. We are releasing this broadly tomorrow but are starting to share with our friends.

National Security Network

WHAT TO WATCH FOR AT THE NATIONAL SECURITY DEBATE

10 CLAIMS JOHN MCCAIN WILL LIKELY MAKE

EXECUTIVE SUMMARY

Claim 1: McCain will say his foreign policy is different from that of George W. Bush.
Reality: On the critical issues, ranging from advocating the invasion of Iraq only days after 9/11 to declaring premature victory in Afghanistan, to saber rattling on Iran and refusing to use tough diplomacy, John McCain's policies are in lock step with those of George W. Bush.

Claim 2: John McCain will tout his judgment, saying he hates war.
Reality: John McCain has taken a dangerously aggressive approach to foreign policy advocating attacking six different countries in the last eight years. Moreover, McCain retains many of the same Neocon advisors who pushed for the war in Iraq in the first place.

Claim 3: McCain will say he has long been a critic of the war in Iraq.
Reality: McCain was an early supporter of the Iraq War, linking Saddam Hussein, al Qaeda and weapons of mass destruction. He supported the Rumsfeld strategy of going with a minimal number of troops and said the war would be "easy." He continued to argue for staying the course until 2006.

Claim 4: McCain will take credit for the "surge" and argue that the troop increase is responsible for the entire decline in violence and that as a result we have succeeded.
Reality: Military leaders have acknowledged that there were numerous reasons for the reduction in violence including the Anbar Awakening and political engagement with Muqtada al-Sadr. In fact, McCain confused the sequence of events in Iraq arguing that the troop increase caused the Anbar Awakening, even though the Anbar Awakening came first. Moreover, General Petraeus has warned that it is too early to declare victory as John McCain and his allies are doing.

Claim 5: McCain will say he wants to send more troops to Afghanistan and Pakistan.
Reality: McCain has continued to make Iraq the number one priority and has not explained how he will keep large troop levels in Iraq while meeting the requirements in Afghanistan and elsewhere laid out by military commander and the Chairman of the Joint Chiefs. He has shown little interest in Afghanistan saying we can just "muddle through" in 2003 and declaring victory in 2005. In fact, McCain had no policy on Afghanistan until July 15, 2008 and Afghanistan did not come up once in all of the major speeches during the Republican National Convention. Meanwhile, Barack Obama and progressives have been sounding the alarm for years.

Claim 6: McCain will say he will get Osama Bin Laden and go after Al Qaeda.
Reality: John McCain was a strong early supporter of the Iraq war – a war that resulted in assets and focus being pulled away from the hunt for Bin Laden and Afghanistan. While Obama has supported going after high-value targets in al Qaeda's safe haven in Pakistan, McCain has criticized Obama for a position that has now become official U.S. policy.

Claim 7: McCain will cite his response to the crisis in Georgia as evidence of good judgment.
Reality: McCain recklessly issued bellicose statements without waiting for all the facts, while Barack Obama, other world leaders, and even President Bush took a more measured approach. McCain then went on to claim that "we are all Georgians." In fact, McCain has had a dangerous policy towards Russia for some time, proposing to kick them out of the G8 – a policy that would preclude any cooperation on critical issues such as nonproliferation.

This version of Total Mail Converter is not registered.

Claim 8: McCain will say that talking to Iran is weak and naive.
Reality: There is a bipartisan consensus on the need to talk to Iran. Five secretaries of state including Henry Kissinger and Jim Baker all agreed recently that we have to talk to them directly. Obama's plan calls for tough direct diplomacy in combination with sanctions and other pressures. McCain's plan of refusing to talk is the same policy that George Bush pursued until very recently – a policy that has failed and that if continued will one day force the U.S. to make a no-win decision between attacking Iran or allowing it to attain a nuclear weapons capability.

Claim 9: McCain will say he can work effectively with our allies.
Reality: John McCain has a long history of belligerence and heated rhetoric towards our allies. In the run up to the Iraq War he called France and Germany "vacuous and posturing" and referred to them as our "adversaries." Recently he said he might not meet with Spain's Prime Minister and on top of that he is quite unpopular internationally.

Claim 10: McCain will say he will cut wasteful defense spending.
Reality: McCain has been all over the map on defense spending. His plan to add about 200,000 ground troops to the military would cost $25 billion a year. Meanwhile, in his budget plan released in July he promised to cut $160 billion from the budget by opposing the Future Combat System, yet he now criticizes Obama's promise to cut spending on that same program.

This version of Total Mail Converter is not registered.

Claim 1: McCain will say his foreign policy is different from that of George W. Bush.
Reality: On the critical issues from advocating the invasion of Iraq only days after 9/11 to declaring premature victory in Afghanistan to saber rattling on Iran and refusing to use tough diplomacy John McCain's policies are in lock step with those of George W. Bush.

After 9/11, John McCain advocated attacking Iraq, Iran, or Syria instead of staying focused on the real threat in Afghanistan. "That's where the tough part of this whole scenario is going to begin. And that is that, after the Taliban are overthrown -- which I believe they will be -- I have very little doubt in my mind -- after bin Laden is either taken prisoner or killed and his network is destroyed, then what's next? Obviously, Iraq is still bent on -- Saddam Hussein is still bent on developing weapons of mass destruction. Obviously, the Iranians are still supporting terrorist organizations, as are the Syrians. That's where the tough choices and decisions are going to be made." [MSNBC, Hardball, 10/3/01]

Like George Bush McCain completely misjudged the difficulties of invading Iraq, saying that the war would be "easy." McCain said, "I believe that the success [in Iraq] will be fairly easy." McCain also said, "I believe that the United States military capabilities are such that we can win a victory in a relatively short time… I believe that we can win an overwhelming victory in a very short period of time." In January 2003, McCain again predicted the same about invading Iraq, saying, "we will win this conflict. We will win it easily." In March 2003, McCain repeatedly said that US troops would be welcomed as liberators. Chris Matthews asked McCain, "Do you believe that the people of Iraq or at least a large number of them will treat us as liberators?" McCain answered: "Absolutely. Absolutely." Two weeks later, McCain said: "There's no doubt in my mind that once these people [loyalists to Saddam] are gone that we will be welcomed as liberators," McCain said. [MSNBC, Hardball, 3/12/03; 3/24/03; CNN, "Larry King Live," 9/24/2002; CNN, 9/29/02; CNN.com, 1/22/2003]

McCain has consistently failed to accurately assess the situation in Afghanistan, calling the war in 2005 a "remarkable success" and said that "nobody in Afghanistan threatens the United States of America." On CNN McCain said, "[C]ould I add, it was in Afghanistan, as well, there were many people who predicted that Afghanistan would not be a success. So far, it's a remarkable success." On Fox, McCain said, "Think we should have had a larger peacekeeping force. But nobody in Afghanistan threatens the United States of America and nobody is running terrorist training camps to orchestrate attacks on the United States of America." [CNN, 3/2/05. Fox News, "Hannity & Colmes," 4/10/03]

Claim 2: John McCain will tout his judgment saying he hates war.
Reality: John McCain has taken a dangerously aggressive approach to foreign policy advocating attacking six different countries in the last eight years. Moreover, McCain retains many of the same Neocon advisors who pushed for the war in Iraq in the first place.

In 2000 McCain called for overthrowing the regimes of Iraq, North Korea and Libya - In 2000 Republican primary campaign McCain argued that the United States should overthrow Iraq, North Korea and Libya. "McCain called Tuesday for the overthrow of Iraq, Libya and North Korea if they continue to develop weapons of mass destruction. "I'd institute a policy that I call 'rogue state rollback.'" [Agence France Presse, 2/16/2000]

Less than a month after the 9/11 attacks McCain advocated going after Syria and Iran. "After bin Laden is either taken prisoner or killed and his network is destroyed, then what's next? Obviously, Iraq is still bent on -- Saddam Hussein is still bent on developing weapons of mass destruction. Obviously, the Iranians are still supporting terrorist organizations, as are the Syrians. That's where the tough choices and decisions are going to be made." [MSNBC, Hardball, 10/3/01]

After 9/11, McCain supported invading a number of countries. During an appearance on CNN's "Newsnight with Aaron Brown," John McCain said, "once we take care of the problem in Afghanistan and eradicate al Qaeda, and either kill or capture bin Laden, then we have to move to the next country." [CNN, "Newsnight with Aaron Brown," 11/23/01]

McCain's extreme foreign policy views have made him the Neocons' candidate the past decade. In the 2000 campaign, McCain argued that the United States should overthrow Iraq, North Korea and Libya in a policy he called "rogue state rollback." Neoconservatives have had a prominent role in the McCain campaign. "Mr. McCain and his aides were consulting regularly with the circle of hawkish foreign policy thinkers sometimes referred to as neoconservatives — including Mr. Kristol, Robert Kagan and Randy Scheunemann, a former aide to Mr. Dole who became a McCain campaign adviser — to develop the senator's foreign policy ideas and instincts into the broad themes of a presidential campaign." Robert Kagan, one of the most prominent neoconservatives, also wrote McCain's speech at the Los Angeles World Affairs Council. [Agence France Presse, 2/16/2000. NY Times, 8/16/08 . WSJ, 3/6/08. Wonk Room, 3/17/08 . NY Times, 4/10/08]

This version of Total Mail Converter is not registered.

Claim 3: McCain will say he has long been a critic of the war in Iraq.
Reality: McCain was an early supporter of the Iraq War linking Saddam Hussein, al Qaeda and weapons of mass destruction. He supported the Rumsfeld strategy of going with a minimal number of troops and said the war would be "easy." He continued to argue for staying the course until 2006.

McCain fully endorsed the Bush-Rumsfeld plan for invading Iraq with few troops. On Face the Nation in 2002 McCain said, "I think we could go in with much smaller numbers than we had to do in the past... I don't believe it's going to be nearly the size and scope that it was in 1991." McCain, like Rumsfeld, thought air power would make up for fewer troops and like Rumsfeld, he never thought about the aftermath. McCain said on Larry King in 2002, "Our technology, particularly air-to-ground technology is vastly improved. I don't think you're going to have to see the scale of numbers of troops that we saw, nor the length of the buildup, obviously, that we had back in 1991." He said later on Hardball, "I believe that the kind of technology and the kind of military that we have today doesn't require massive numbers of troops. You might have noticed the conflict in Afghanistan, we had a few soldiers on the ground and used very incredibly accurate air power." McCain later predicted in late 2002 McCain said that "We're not going get into house-to-house fighting in Baghdad." [CBS, Face the Nation, 9/15/02. CNN, Larry King Live, 12/09/02. MSNBC, Hardball, 10/16/02. CNN, Late Edition, 9/29/02]

McCain was one of the most fervent war supporters and supported the President's approach throughout the course of the war. McCain was a cheerleader for invading Iraq, said "I believe that we can win an overwhelming victory in a very short period of time." He hyped the threat of Iraq saying Saddam Hussein is a "threat to civilization." He also said that failing to remove Saddam from power would "make the violent century just passed seem an era of remarkable tranquility in comparison." In the midst of looting following the invasion McCain praised Rumsfeld, saying "I'm a great admirer of Rumsfeld." He added "I think the president is blessed to have two extremely talented people (Powell and Rumsfeld), experienced people, working for him, and others, but particularly those two." [CNN Late Edition, 9/29/02. Washington Times, 2/14/03. MSNBC Hardball, 4/23/03]

McCain said Bin Laden and Saddam connected because they share "common cause." "But what I think it's ample evidence of is that bin Laden will do anything he could to harm the United States of America, and he has common cause with Saddam Hussein who will do anything he can to harm the United States of America. And the two of them together can make a very potent recipe." [NBC Today Show, 2/13/03]

McCain said mistakes were made but favored continuing the President's failed strategy saying that we need to "stay the course" with the President's Iraq strategy in 2003, 2004, 2005, and 2006. McCain was a forceful advocate of continuing the President's approach in Iraq. Throughout 2004, 2005, and 2006 McCain consistently said we should "stay the course" in Iraq. In 2005 on ABC McCain said "some serious mistakes were made, but…I think we've got to stay the course here." In 2006 McCain said on CBS Bush had "laid out recently a pretty cogent argument why we must, quote - I hate to use the phrase - stay the course'[in Iraq.]" [NPR, 4/28/04. ABC News, 10/24/04. Fox, 8/14/05; ABC News, 9/25/05; CBS News, 6/29/05; The Hill, 12/8/05. MSNBC, 6/8/06. CBS News, 9/24/06]

Claim 4: McCain will take credit for the "surge" and argue that the troop increase is responsible for the entire decline in violence and that as a result we have succeeded.
Reality: Military leaders have acknowledged that there were numerous reasons for the reduction in violence including a willingness to talk to our enemies though the Anbar Awakening and the ceasefire with Muqtada al-Sadr. In fact, McCain confused the sequence of events in Iraq arguing that the troop increase caused the Anbar Awakening, even though the Anbar Awakening came first. Moreover, General Petraeus has warned that it is too early to declare victory as John McCain and his allies are doing and that political progress is still slow in coming.

A number of factors caused the reduced levels of violence in Iraq, including a willingness to talk to our enemies in the Sunni insurgency, and the Shi'a cleric Muqtada Al Sadr. Levels of violence in Iraq have fallen because of four factors: 1) the increased American military presence and new counterinsurgency tactics; 2) an alliance among a number of Sunni tribal groups against Al Qaeda in Iraq; 3) the segregation of the population along sectarian lines, thanks to massive ethnic cleansing; and 4) a cease fire by Shia cleric Muqtada al-Sadr's Mahdi Army. [Washington Post, 9/8/08]

McCain confused the history of the surge. McCain misstated the history of the surge in an interview with Katie Couric. McCain said, "Colonel McFarlane [phonetic] was contacted by one of the major Sunni sheiks. Because of the surge we were able to go out and protect that sheik and others. And it began the Anbar awakening. I mean, that's just a matter of history." In reality, the Anbar Awakening preceded the surge. [CBS, 7/22/08]

The Anbar Awakening, which began well before the President's announcement of the "surge" in January 2007, was crucial to the decline in violence. The Obama campaign was quick to note that the Anbar Awakening began in the fall of 2006, several months before President Bush even announced the troop escalation strategy, which became known as the surge. (No less an authority than Gen. David H. Petraeus, the top commander in Iraq, testified before Congress this spring that the Awakening "started before the surge, but then was very much enabled by the surge.") Furthermore, progressives noted that the sheik who helped form the Awakening, Abdul Sattar Buzaigh al-Rishawi, was assassinated in September 2007, after the troop escalation began. [NY Times, 7/24/08]

This version of Total Mail Converter is not registered.

General Petraeus himself has pointed out that the situation is more complicated than how John McCain and his allies portray it. "This is not the sort of struggle where you take a hill, plant the flag and go home to a victory parade... it's not war with a simple slogan." [BBC News, 9/11/08]

AFGHANISTAN / PAKISTAN

Claim 5:* McCain will say he wants to send more troops to Afghanistan and Pakistan.
Reality: McCain has continued to make Iraq the number one priority and has not explained how he will keep large troop levels in Iraq while meeting the requirements in Afghanistan and elsewhere laid out by military commander and the Chairman of the Joint Chiefs. He has shown little interest in Afghanistan saying we can just "muddle through" in 2003 and declaring victory in 2005. In fact, McCain had no policy on Afghanistan until July 15, 2008 and Afghanistan did not come up once in all of the major speeches during the Republican National Convention. Meanwhile, Barack Obama and progressives have been sounding the alarm for years.

McCain has not said where these troops will come from and his focus continues to be on Iraq. Chairman of the Joint Chiefs, Admiral Mullen, noted that more U.S. troops are needed in Afghanistan to help control an increasingly active insurgency but, due to the war in Iraq, insufficient forces are available for such action. "I don't have troops I can reach for, brigades I can reach to send into Afghanistan until I have a reduced requirement in Iraq," Mullen said. "Afghanistan remains an economy of force campaign, which by definition means we need more forces there. We have the ability in almost every single case to win from the combat standpoint, but we don't have enough troops there to hold. That is key to the future of being able to succeed in Afghanistan." Despite this, McCain has called for a long-term commitment to Iraq that would not allow us to have the necessary troops for Afghanistan. [Washington Post 7/2/08 . NY Times, 7/02/08]

McCain has shown little interest in Afghanistan compared to Iraq, believing we can "muddle" through in Afghanistan. After a speech to the Council on Foreign Relations in Washington D.C., McCain was asked about the deteriorating scenario in Afghanistan. He said, "There has been a rise in al Qaeda activity along the border. There has been some increase in U.S. casualties. I am concerned about it, but I'm not as concerned as I am about Iraq today, obviously, or I'd be talking about Afghanistan. But I believe that if Karzai can make the progress that he is making, that -- in the long term, we may muddle through in Afghanistan." [McCain Speech to the Council on Foreign Relations, 11/5/03]

Afghanistan was completely ignored at the Republican National Convention, despite gravely deteriorating situation. Retired Gen. Barry McCaffrey, in a harrowing assessment for West Point, said that Afghanistan "is in misery," yet John McCain and his fellow conservative Republicans offered nothing to address this spiraling crisis. Afghanistan went unmentioned in all the major Republican convention addresses, a glaring absence that echoes the Bush Administration's neglectful policies toward the country, and the broader region. [General Barry McCaffrey, 7/30/08 . President George W. Bush, 9/02/08 . Senator Fred Thompson, 9/02/08 . Senator Joseph Lieberman, 9/02/08 . Mitt Romney, 9/03/08 . Mike Huckabee, 9/03/08 . Rudy Giuliani, 9/03/08 . Governor Sarah Palin, 9/03/08]

Until July 15th 2008, McCain had no strategy for Afghanistan included in his national security policy platform. Until July 15, 2008, John McCain's website contained no articulated strategy for Afghanistan. There is still scant mention of a strategy, in either his national security policy section or his Iraq policy section. [John McCain.com, 7/15/08]

Progressives have called for more troops and a greater focus on Afghanistan for years. After years of neglect, deteriorating conditions in Afghanistan are raising questions for President Bush and John McCain. Democrats have been there all along – and since 2002 have been making the case that Iraq is distracting us from the main fight against Al Qaeda. Senator Kerry made this argument a central part of his campaign in 2004 and Barack Obama has been very clear about the importance of Afghanistan since early in the primary campaign. [NSN, 7/15/08 . Senator Barack Obama, 10/2/02 . Senator Barack Obama, 8/01/07 . Senator Biden, NY Times, 3/2/08], NY Times, 10/1/03 . John Kerry, U.S. Presidential Debates, 9/30/04 . Senator Reid, 7/12/07 . Speaker Nancy Pelosi, Larry King Live, 4/24/2008 . Senator Jack Reed, 3/15/07 . Senator Carl Levin, 3/4/2008]

Claim 6:* McCain will say he will get Osama Bin Laden and go after Al Qaeda.
Reality: John McCain was a strong early supporter of the Iraq war – a war that resulted in assets and focus being pulled away from the hunt for Bin Laden and Afghanistan. While Obama has supported going after high-value targets in al Qaeda's safe haven in Pakistan, McCain has criticized Obama for a position that has now become official U.S. policy.

McCain was an early supporter of the war in Iraq calling for toppling Saddam Hussein only a month after 9/11. This strategy diverted crucial resources from focusing on Osama Bin Laden. The New York Times reports that, "the White House shifted its sights, beginning in 2002, from counterterrorism efforts in Afghanistan and Pakistan to preparations for the war in Iraq." According to current and former military and intelligence officials the war in Iraq has consistently diverted resources and high-level attention from the fight against al Qaeda. Intelligence officials report that by 2006 the Iraq war had drained away most of the C.I.A. officers with field experience in the Islamic world. "You had a very finite number" of experienced officers, said one former senior intelligence official. "Those people all went to Iraq. We were all hurting because of Iraq." In fact, "when American military and intelligence officials requested additional Predator drones to survey the tribal areas, they were told no drones were available because they had been sent to Iraq." [New York Times, 6/30/08]

This version of Total Mail Converter is not registered.

Senator Obama advocates unilaterally striking terrorist targets in Pakistan. "They are plotting to strike again… If we have actionable intelligence about high-value terrorist targets and President Musharraf won't act, we will." [Washington Post, 8/02/07]

McCain attacked Obama for his willingness to strike at Al Qaeda targets in Pakistan, accused Obama of "confused" leadership and said he wanted to bomb "our ally" Pakistan. "Will we risk the confused leadership of an inexperienced candidate who once suggested bombing our ally, Pakistan?" On Larry King, McCain was asked "If you were president and knew that bin Laden was in Pakistan, you know where, would you have U.S. forces go in after him?" McCain responded "I'm not going to go there. And here's why, because Pakistan is a sovereign nation." [MSNBC, 2/20/08 . Larry King Live, 7/28/08]

Obama's position has become official U.S. policy. President Bush recently approved orders allowing unilateral strikes against terrorist targets inside of Pakistan. "President Bush secretly approved orders in July that for the first time allow American Special Operations forces to carry out ground assaults inside Pakistan without the prior approval of the Pakistani government, according to senior American officials. The classified orders signal a watershed for the Bush administration after nearly seven years of trying to work with Pakistan to combat the Taliban and Al Qaeda, and after months of high-level stalemate about how to challenge the militants' increasingly secure base in Pakistan's tribal areas." [NY Times, 9/10/08]

RUSSIA / GEORGIA

Claim 7: McCain will cite his response to the crisis in Georgia as evidence of good judgment.
Reality: McCain recklessly issued bellicose statements without waiting for all the facts, while Barack Obama, other world leaders, and even President Bush took a more measured approach. McCain then went on to claim that "we are all Georgians." In fact, McCain has had a dangerous policy towards Russia for some time proposing to kick them out of the G8 – a policy that would preclude any cooperation on critical issues such as nonproliferation.

McCain's response to Russia – without waiting for the facts -- was reckless and dangerous, another example of how his foreign policy would be more "aggressive" than Bush. "McCain took a remarkably — and uniquely — more aggressive stance, siding clearly with Georgia's pro-Western leaders and placing the blame for the conflict entirely on Russia." McCain's statement "put him more closely in line with the moral clarity and American exceptionalism projected by President Bush's first term." He went on to state that "I know I speak for every American when I say to him today, we are all Georgians." [Politico, 8/10/08 . CBS, 8/12/08]

McCain has attacked Obama for not being aggressive in his response, yet Obama's initial response was in line with almost all world leaders, including George Bush. "While virtually every other world leader called for calm in Georgia last Thursday morning, John McCain did something he's done many times over his career in public life: He condemned Russia…though neither he nor any other leader has suggested that the West has any real way to blunt Moscow's ultimate intentions. He's also faced the accusation that his encouragement of Georgia's dramatic defiance of Russia helped trigger the crisis." [Politico, 8/13/08]

The conflict was more complicated than how McCain portrayed it. "According to the Republican presidential candidate, 'today we are all Georgians.' Actually, the events of the past week in Georgia have little in common with either Hitler's dismemberment of Czechoslovakia on the eve of World War II or Soviet policies in Eastern Europe. They are better understood against the backdrop of the complicated ethnic politics of the Caucasus, a part of the world where historical grudges run deep and oppressed can become oppressors in the bat of an eye… When it comes to apportioning blame for the latest flare-up in the Caucasus, there's plenty to go around. The Russians were clearly itching for a fight, but the behavior of Georgian president Mikheil Saakashvili has been erratic and provocative. The United States may have stoked the conflict by encouraging Saakashvili to believe that he enjoyed American protection, when the West's ability to impose its will in this part of the world is actually quite limited." [Washington Post, 8/17/08]

McCain has on numerous occasions called for kicking Russia out of the G-8 – an idea that would almost certainly lead to a new Cold War and preclude any cooperation on key non-proliferation issues. In a Foreign Affairs article published late last year, McCain advocated kicking Russia out of the G-8: "Today, we see in Russia diminishing political freedoms, a leadership dominated by a clique of former intelligence officers, efforts to bully democratic neighbors, such as Georgia, and attempts to manipulate Europe's dependence on Russian oil and gas. We need a new Western approach to this revanchist Russia. We should start by ensuring that the G-8, the group of eight highly industrialized states, becomes again a club of leading market democracies: it should include Brazil and India but exclude Russia." McCain repeated this suggestion in his Los Angeles World Foreign Affairs Council speech that the G-8 should "include India and Brazil, but exclude Russia." [Foreign Affairs, 11-12/07. McCain, 3/26/08]

This version of Total Mail Converter is not registered.

IRAN

Claim 8:* McCain will say that talking to Iran is weak and naive.
Reality: There is a bipartisan consensus on the need to talk to Iran. Five secretaries of state including Henry Kissinger and Jim Baker all agreed recently that we have to talk to them directly. Obama's plan calls for tough direct diplomacy in combination with sanctions and other pressures. McCain's plan of refusing to talk is the same policy that George Bush pursued until very recently – a policy that has failed and that if continued will one day force the U.S. to make a no-win decision between attacking Iran or allowing it to attain a nuclear weapons capability.

Henry Kissinger, Jim Baker, Colin Powell, Madeleine Albright and Warren Christopher all agree we need direct talks with Iran without pre-conditions. Henry Kissinger, former Secretary of State under Presidents Nixon and Ford, not only indicated that he "was in favor of negotiating with Iran," but said that such negotiations should occur "without conditions," and should begin at a high level." Former Clinton Secretary of State Madeleine Albright advised that "You need to engage with countries you have problems with," and said "I believe we need to engage with Iran." Colin Powell, Secretary of State under George W. Bush echoed the need for negotiations stating: "Let's get together and talk about nuclear weapons." [AP, 9/15/08 . ABC News, 9/15/08 . Reuters, 9/16/08 .]

The Bipartisan Iraq Study Group believes the US should have direct talks with Iran. "Given the ability of Iran and Syria to influence events within Iraq and their interest in avoiding chaos in Iraq, the United States should try to engage them constructively. In seeking to influence the behavior of both countries, the United States has disincentives and incentives available." [Iraq Study Group, 12/06]

Even the Bush administration is moving toward Senator Obama's strategy of diplomatic engagement with Iran. The Bush Administration is beginning to embrace a number of foreign policy positions favored by Senator Obama. "On a range of major foreign policy issues over the past year, Bush has pursued strategies and actions very much along the lines of what Sen. Obama has advocated during his presidential race…" "On the diplomatic front, Obama has made a point of advocating dialogue with Iran" and though he has been vilified by conservatives for it, "in July, Bush sent a high-level U.S. emissary to attend nuclear talks with Iran…" In June, the Washington Post reported that "Senior officials at the State Department and beyond are mulling a proposal to open an interest section in Tehran, similar to the one the United States has operated in Havana since 1977." [Washington Post, 9/15/08 . Washington Post, 6/23/08]

McCain's policy of refusing to engage Iran is a continuation of a failed Bush policy that even the current administration has begun to back pedal from. Senator McCain has consistently derided Barack Obama as naïve for his willingness to have tough direct diplomacy with Iran. McCain has instead called for more sanctions and the continuation of a policy that has not worked for the past five years while Iran has developed 4,000 centrifuges. He even put out an advertisement two weeks ago reaffirming this position and deriding Obama's position on Iran. [John McCain conference call, 5/15/08 . JohnMcCain.com]

WORKING WITH ALLIES

Claim 9:* McCain will say he can work effectively with our allies.
Reality: John McCain has a long history of belligerence and heated rhetoric towards our allies. In the run up to the Iraq War he called France and Germany "vacuous and posturing" and referred to them as our "adversaries." Recently he said he might not meet with Spain's Prime Minister and on top of that he is quite unpopular internationally.

McCain attacked our allies as "vacuous and posturing" for opposing war in Iraq. "Sen. John McCain (R-Ariz.) said that "Iraq is the test" of both the U.N. and NATO. He charged that the alliance is failing the test because of the "flawed calculations" and "vacuous posturing" of Germany and France. McCain and Rumsfeld both said that recent French and German foot-dragging over even discussing the possible deployment of NATO assets, such as Patriot anti-missile batteries, to Turkey also threatened to damage the alliance." [Washington Post, 2/9/03]

John McCain engaged in the anti-French bashing of the far right because they opposed the invasion of the war. "The Lord said the poor will always be with us, and the French will be with us, too," said McCain, a member of the Armed Services Committee. "This is part of a continuing French practice of throwing sand in the gears of the Atlantic alliance. But now they're playing a dangerous game, and coming close to rendering themselves irrelevant." A few days later he even said that, "Sen. John McCain (R-Ariz.) likened France to an aging '40s starlet "still trying to dine out on her looks but doesn't have the face for it." [NY Times, 2/14/03. NY Daily News, 2/17/03]

This version of Total Mail Converter is not registered.

McCain attacked Germany for opposing the war – saying they lacked "political courage." McCain said that former German Chancellor Gerhard Schroeder "looks little like the ally that anchored our presence in Europe throughout the Cold War…A German Rip Van Winkle from the 1960s would not understand the lack of political courage and cooperation with its allies on the question of Iraq exhibited in Berlin today." [Washington Times, 2/14/03]

McCain is very unpopular around the world, and surveys have shown that the majority of the international community is rooting for him to lose. A recent BBC study found that of all the countries polled, none hope for a McCain presidency. In fact, in the case of a McCain administration, 36% of those polled thought that American relations with the world would stay the same, while a full 16% thought relations would further deteriorate.

DEFENSE SPENDING

Claim 10: McCain will say he will cut wasteful defense spending.
Reality: McCain has been all over the map on defense spending. His plan to add about 200,000 ground troops to the military would cost $25 billion a year. Meanwhile, in his budget plan released in July he promised to cut $160 billion from the budget by opposing the Future Combat System, yet he now criticizes Obama's promise to cut spending on that same program.

McCain has made grandiose promises on defense that are not grounded in reality and represent the exact opposite of the fiscal reform that he will supposedly bring to the White House. John McCain has pledged to expand the ground forces by about 200,000 over current levels. He also says he will modernize the armed forces by "procuring advanced weapons systems." Yet at the same time, McCain has pledged to control defense spending. This doesn't add up. The CBO estimates that increasing the ground forces to the current goal of about 750,000 will cost about $110 billion over seven years; this is roughly $15 billion per year. Using the same projections, increasing the size of the ground forces by an additional 150,000 over this same period would cost an additional $175 billion or $25 billion per year. The costs would likely be much higher as McCain is proposing a 25 percent increase in the size of the ground forces and attracting that many volunteers will require significant funding. [Foreign Affairs, 11-12/08 . John McCain.com 9/10/08 . CBO, 4/16/07]

John McCain's own budget plan - the one that he claims will reform Washington – opposes the Future Combat System and claims he would cut $160 billion in spending. McCain's plan submitted in July 2008 to the Washington Post specifically claims that balancing the budget "requires slowing outlay growth to 2.4 percent. The roughly $470 billion dollars (by 2013) in slower spending growth come from reduced deployments abroad ($150 billion; consistent with success in Iraq/Afghanistan that permits deployments to be cut by half -- hopefully more), slower discretionary spending in non-defense and Pentagon procurements ($160 billion; there are lots of procurements -- airborne laser, Globemaster, Future Combat System -- that should be ended and the entire Pentagon budget should be scrubbed)." And Senator McCain has long been an opponent of the Future Combat System. [Washington Post, 7/14/08 . The Hill, 4/05/05]

John McCain blasted Barack Obama for opposing Future Combat System – but McCain also opposed it. Barack Obama stated clearly that he would "cut tens of billions of dollars in wasteful spending," by "slowing the development of Future Combat Systems," while also working separately to "increase the size of our military," so the present strain on the armed forces would diminish. McCain misrepresented these separate positions, calling Obama a flip-flopper before audiences in Missouri "Of course, now he wants to increase it," McCain told an audience in Lee's Summit, Missouri on Monday. "But during the primary he told a liberal advocacy group that he'd cut defense spending by tens of billions of dollars.'" [CNN, 9/08/08]

Ilan Goldenberg
Policy Director
National Security Netwok
Tel: 202-289-7116
Email: igoldenberg@nsnetwork.org

--~--~---------~--~----~------------~-------~--~----~
You received this message because you are subscribed to the "big campaign" group.
To post to this group, send to bigcampaign@googlegroups.com
To unsubscribe, send email to bigcampaign-unsubscribe@googlegroups.com
E-mail ryan@campaigntodefendamerica.org with questions or concerns
This is a list of individuals. It is not affiliated with any group or organization.
-~----------~----~----~----~------~----~------~--~---

This version of Total Mail Converter is not registered.

This version of Total Mail Converter is not registered.

From: "t r u t h o u t" <messenger@truthout.org>
To: podesta@law.georgetown.edu
Date: 12/4/2014 10:16:11 AM
Subject: Seeds of the Future

View Recent Newsletters

Tell a friend about Truthout!

Thursday, 4 December 2014

truthout

Donate Today!

Truthout is a 501(c)3 nonprofit organization; donations are tax deductible.

Seeds of the Future

Richard Schiffman, Truthout: A handful of farmers and crop scientists are struggling to save the fast-diminishing stock of agricultural diversity for the rest of us.

Read the Article

In Ferguson, a Prosecutor Manipulates the Justice System to Prevent Indictment

Mark Weisbrot, Truthout: In the Ferguson grand jury decision, St. Louis County prosecutor Robert McCulloch not only assisted former police officer Darren Wilson, who killed Michael Brown, but proved himself a skilled public relations manager, assuring that Wilson would never be charged with a crime.

Read the Article

I Am Undocumented and I Am Unafraid

Gustavo Madrigal-Piña, Seven Stories Press: In this excerpt from Voices of a People's History of the United States: 10th Anniversary Edition, Gustavo Madrigal-Piña responds to harsh Georgia laws criminalizing immigrants and prohibiting "Dreamers" from attending the top public universities in the state.

Read the Excerpt

The US Needs a Truth and Reconciliation Process on Violence Against African Americans

Fania Davis, YES! Magazine: The decision not to indict Eric Garner's killer is just the latest story in a long history of violence against black men. What response can disrupt patterns set by centuries of racism? Truth and reconciliation processes offer the greatest hope, says Fania Davis.

Read the Article

The Fallacy of Right-Wing Appeals to Race in Criminal Justice Reform

Nancy A. Heitzeg, Critical Mass Progress: The right's plans for criminal justice reform may ultimately magnify the structural racism and classism at the root of the creation, proliferation and maintenance of the

BuzzFlash

Selling Individual Cigarettes or Walking Down the Street Are Not Grounds for Killing People

Mark Karlin, BuzzFlash at Truthout: White suburban kids sell cigs and walk down the street, but they don't get arrested, let alone murdered.

Read the BuzzFlash Commentary

"This Is Not a Protest - It Is an Uprising"

Read the Article at The Nation

The US Justice System Is Not Broken - It Is Acting Exactly as Designed

Read the Article at Deadspin

Jon Stewart Speechless

This version of Total Mail Converter is not registered.

prison industrial complex.
Read the Article

We Need to Start Holding Tax-Dodging Banksters Accountable

The Daily Take Team, The Thom Hartmann Program: The Supreme Court has legalized the purchase of lawmakers in Washington by corporate lobbyists and Wall Street hustlers. As a result, our economy is losing billions and billions of dollars each year to corporate tax avoidance.
Read the Article

Too Big to Ignore

Emily Schwartz Greco and William A. Collins, OtherWords: Why should policy makers focus on inequality? One answer is that by crimping consumption, inequality is a key factor behind the failure of the US economy to fully recover from the Great Recession.
Read the Article

Party On! The War Party Ascendant

Tom Engelhardt, TomDispatch: Thirteen years later, we are yet again floating on what seems to be a rising, not ebbing, tide of war, and the one qualification for a new secretary of defense is that he or she be a hot, not a cold, warrior.
Read the Article

Vince Warren on How Police Officers Get Away With Killing - From Ferguson to NYC

Amy Goodman and Nermeen Shaikh, Democracy Now!: Vince Warren, executive director of the Center for Constitutional Rights, talks about how the grand jury system can be used to shield police officers from prosecution, and retired NYPD detective Carlton Berkley discusses departmental restrictions on the use of chokeholds.
Watch the Video and Read the Transcript

Keystone XL Defeat Can Be a Win-Win for Us

Lesley Haddock, Fueling Dissent: If the Keystone XL pipeline is rejected, it will be thanks to the bravery and persistence of social justice and environmental activists, many of whom have dedicated the last few years of their lives to fighting every inch of the pipeline.
Read the Article

Stop Police Officers From Killing Our Children

Jeralynn Blueford, PinkTank: "I'll never get my son back, but if I raise my voice along with the voices of other mothers who have experienced unbearable loss, perhaps we'll be able to help save the lives of other mothers' children, and bring our children's murderers to justice."
Read the Article

An Anarchist Response to Ebola

Carwil Bjork-James with Chuck Munson, Agency: The world's institutions responded to the Ebola outbreak too slowly and too poorly. Global recognition that Black lives matter means fighting back not just when Black lives are senselessly taken, but when insufficient value and material care are put forward to sustain them.
Read the Article

Speechless After Eric Garner Grand Jury Decision
Watch the Video at Comedy Central

Beyond M.A.D.: Reviving Nuclear War
Read the Article at BuzzFlash

"Your Job Is to Make Money": Coal Boss Laid Bare After Miner Deaths
Read the Article at Talking Points Memo

Rape of Appalachia Continues as Obama Administration Fails to Stop Mountaintop Removal
Read the Article at BuzzFlash

Ten Ways to Be Like Martin Luther King After Ferguson
Read the Article at MSNBC

This version of Total Mail Converter is not registered.

Support Truthout with a tax-deductible donation

Please add messenger@truthout.org to ensure you receive our messages

Truthout is a proud member of the New spaper Guild/CWA, Local 36047

Subscribe | Unsubscribe

Privacy Policy

This version of Total Mail Converter is not registered.

From:	"Nick Merrill" <nmerrill@hrcoffice.com>
To:	"Nick Merrill" <nmerrill@hrcoffice.com>
Date:	2/4/2015 8:37:43 AM
Subject:	HRC Clips | 2.4.15
Attachments:	20150204 HRC Clips.docx

HRC Clips
February 4, 2015

HRC

Hillary Clinton, Obama entangled in vaccines debate as old comments resurface (Washington Times)
Vaccine debate presents a political minefield — as Hillary Clinton can attest (WAPO)
Hillary Clinton, grandma-in-chief (Politico)
Pro-Elizabeth Warren Group Opens New Hampshire Office (WSJ)
Here are the senators who have already endorsed Hillary Clinton (CNN)
Young people will hit the polls in 2016, and they want Hillary (Fusion)
Hillary Clinton trounces GOP foes in latest poll. Why that's not a big deal (Christian Science Monitor)
The GOP Elite Puts Its Foot Down (Politico Magazine)
The Kissinger primary (Politico)
Hillary Clinton more favorable to Florida voters than Jeb Bush (NY Daily News)
Bush, Clinton tied right now in Florida (Tallahassee Democrat)
Republican presidential race is wide open, but Kasich is a big factor in Ohio, poll shows (Cleveland Plain Dealer)
Hillary's 140-Character Campaign Strategy (Time)
New York Suburb Seeks to Host Hillary Clinton 2016 Campaign (Time)
Can Brooklyn cool rub off on Hillary Clinton? (Hill)

This version of Total Mail Converter is not registered.

Hillary Clinton, Obama entangled in vaccines debate as old comments resurface (Washington Times)

By Valerie Richardson
February 4, 2015
The Washington Times

Democrats were gleeful when Republicans Chris Christie and Rand Paul got tangled this week in the debate over the Disneyland measles outbreak, until similar words from the pasts of President Obama and 2016 front-runner Hillary Rodham Clinton came out.

Mr. Christie walked back his recent comments calling for "balance" and a role for "parental choice" on childhood vaccines, saying in a Monday statement that "with a disease like measles, there's no question kids should be vaccinated."

But the Democratic posturing as the party of science was short-lived. Several websites promptly dug up a comment from Mr. Obama during the 2008 presidential campaign in which he said the research on whether vaccines cause autism was "inconclusive."

Then it was reported Tuesday that Mrs. Clinton had responded to a questionnaire during the 2008 presidential primary race from a vaccine skeptics group in which she said, "I am committed to make investments to find the causes of autism, including possible environmental causes like vaccines."

The episode reveals that the emotionally charged vaccination issue has political pitfalls for both parties as candidates line up for the 2016 presidential contest, even though a Pew Research Center report released last week shows Democrats and Republicans alike strongly support childhood vaccinations.

A left-right coalition

For Republicans, the trick lies with soothing the party's libertarian wing, which reflexively resists government intervention in the decision-making of parents. For Democrats, the challenge is figuring out how to put Republicans on the ropes without alienating the large pockets of "anti-vaers" in heavily Democratic areas such as Los Angeles and San Francisco.

"This is one of those cases where the far left and the far right converge," said Republican political strategist Dick Wadhams. "I just think it's poor judgment for anyone to suggest that children should not be vaccinated. It defies logic that someone could even suggest that in this day and age."

Democrats jumped on the issue this week following comments by Mr. Christie and Mr. Paul, Kentucky Republican, who said Monday that vaccines "ought to be voluntary" during a radio interview with host Laura Ingraham.

"I'm not arguing vaccines are a bad idea. I think they are a good thing, but I think the parent should have some input," said Mr. Paul, an ophthalmologist who added that he did have his children vaccinated. "The state doesn't own your children. Parents own the children."

Mr. Christie and Mr. Paul are both oft-mentioned potential candidates for the 2016 GOP pnomination, making them juicy targets for the Democratic National Committee, which released a statement Monday blasting the Republicans as anti-science.

"Republican after Republican is bowing to the rhetoric of the anti-vaccination movement instead of standing up for the science supported by almost all doctors and scientists on protecting our kids and keeping our nation safe," the Democratic National Committee said in a Monday statement.

Mrs. Clinton chimed in with a Tuesday post on Twitter saying, "The science is clear: The earth is round, the sky is blue, and #vaccineswork," she tweeted. "Let's protect all our kids. #GrandmothersKnowBest."

Democratic resistance

But Democrats have their own cultural vulnerabilities on the issue. Among the communities hit hardest by the recent measles outbreak are Los Angeles and the Bay Area, where Democrats vastly outnumber Republicans and where the anti-vaccination movement is on the rise.

Such Democratic environmentalist icons as Robert F. Kennedy Jr. have directly blamed vaccines for a rise in autism despite a lack of support by the major scientific and medical organizations.

"Democrats love to masquerade as if they have no extremists in their party, and this is a classic case that exposes their own far left," Mr. Wadhams said.

A Sept. 10 analysis in the Hollywood Reporter found that vaccination rates have plummeted at some of Los Angeles County's most exclusive schools, while incidents of whooping cough and measles among children in Southern California are on the rise.

A study released Sunday in Pediatrics found that underimmunization rates in California have risen from 8.1 percent in 2002-

This version of Total Mail Converter is not registered.

2005 to 12.4 percent in 2010-2012.

By contrast, the state with the lowest rates of nonimmunization statewide is Mississippi, a state that, despite its conservatism and religiosity, is one of only two in the nation with a state school vaccination requirement that doesn't even have a religious exemption. (The other is West Virginia, according to the National Conference of State Legislatures.)

"It's no secret that anti-vaccine sentiments run high on the West Side," said the Hollywood Reporter article, referring to the wealthy Democratic Los Angeles County enclave, which includes Beverly Hills and Santa Monica.

"But the data reveals a community where ambiguous fears about the perceived threat of immunization have in fact caused a very real threat," the article continues. "This is a hard topic to discuss, especially here in Hollywood."

The 'Whole Foods' standard

In a 2011 interview, author Seth Mnookin released a book called "The Panic Virus: The True Story Behind the Vaccine-Austism Controversy" debunking anti-vaccine theories, and he noted in an interview with Science Magazine that they tend to follow a kind of green cultural liberalism that views with suspicion unnatural technologies such as pharmaceuticals.

"I talked to a public health official and asked him what's the best way to anticipate where there might be higher-than-normal rates of vaccine noncompliance, and he said take a map and put a pin wherever there's a Whole Foods. I sort of laughed, and he said, 'No, really, I'm not joking.' It's those communities with the Prius-driving, composting, organic food-eating people," he said.

Another potential threat to public health stems from the influx of illegal immigrants, an issue that was broached Tuesday by Rep. Mo Brooks, Alabama Republican. Like many other Republicans, he has fought to tighten border security over the objections of Democrats.

"I don't think there is any health care professional who has examined the facts who can honestly say Americans have not died because the disease is brought into America by illegal aliens who are not properly health care screened as lawful immigrants are," Mr. Brooks told radio host Matt Murphy on WAPI-AM in Birmingham.

His comment was promptly ridiculed in a post on the left-wing website ThinkProgress, which called his theory a "red herring" and said the only evidence of foreigners carrying in diseases was "a few incidents of cases traced to European travelers."

That wasn't how Dr. Marc Siegel described the situation in a July article in the liberal online publication Slate. His op-ed, "A Public Health Crisis at the Border," argued that the flood of unaccompanied minors "in poor health or suffering from a communicable illness who enter this country illegally create[s] public health risks."

"There have been reports of measles and chicken pox at the [processing] centers, both of which are highly contagious and can spread to other children who aren't vaccinated," said Dr. Siegel, medical director of Doctor Radio at New York University's Langone Medical Center.

Politicians get involved

As the number of measles cases climbs over 100, politicians are increasingly under pressure to take a stand on what was not long ago a nonissue. Ben Carson, another potential Republican presidential contender, came out squarely in favor of vaccinations in a statement Monday.

"Although I strongly believe in individual rights and the rights of parents to raise their children as they see fit, I also recognize that public health and public safety are extremely important in our society," said Mr. Carson, a former neurosurgeon in a statement to The Hill.

"Certain communicable diseases have been largely eradicated by immunization policies in this country, and we should not allow those diseases to return by foregoing safe immunization programs for philosophical, religious or other reasons when we have the means to eradicate them," Mr. Carson said.

As the issue and the politics mushroomed, White House press secretary Josh Earnest told reporters Tuesday that "the president believes it shouldn't require a law to exercise common sense and do the right thing. The science and the expert guidance is crystal-clear."

He also downplayed his boss' — and, by extension, Mrs. Clinton's — 2008 comments about vaccines and autism, saying that the study that raised questions about a link has since been "completely undermined."

The publisher of the major study suggesting a link — the prestigious British journal The Lancet, in a 1998 paper — indeed only repudiated the article in 2010, citing fraud by researcher Andrew Wakefield, who is now banned from practicing medicine.

Nevertheless, as Democrats and environmentalists say is the case with climate change today, there was overwhelming consensus in 2008, if not absolute unanimity, on the lack of a link between vaccines and autism. The Lancet study had come under withering criticism for, among other things, a sample size of 12.

This version of Total Mail Converter is not registered.

'Absolutely preposterous'

"It should have been clear to any science reporter that there was no way to draw the conclusion [Mr. Wakefield] did from that study. Even if his data were reliable, even if none of the issues of selection bias and fraud had ever come up, drawing huge, broad conclusions from a 12-person case study is absolutely preposterous," Mr. Mnookin said.

According to a 2008 CNN report on an autism lawsuit, "The CDC, American Academy of Pediatrics, Institute of Medicine and other prestigious medical organizations maintain there is no known link between vaccines and autism. Studies published in the New England Journal of Medicine and elsewhere also have found no link."

"The government has made absolutely no statement indicating that vaccines are a cause of autism," Dr. Julie Gerberding, former head of the Centers for Disease Control and Prevention, said at the time.

Nevertheless, both House Speaker John A. Boehner and Senate Majority Leader Mitch McConnell found themselves making statements supporting vaccinations Tuesday, as did such Republican presidential contenders as Sen. Marco Rubio of Florida, Louisiana Gov. Bobby Jindal and Wisconsin Gov. Scott Walker.

As for Mr. Paul, he tweeted a photo of himself getting a booster shot and issued a statement rebutting claims he and/or his party is anti-science.

"It just annoys me that I'm being characterized as someone who's against vaccines," Mr. Paul said.

"There's 400 headlines now that say 'Paul says vaccines cause mental disorders,'" he said. "That's not what I said. I said I've heard of people who've had vaccines, and they see a temporal association, and they believe that."

This version of Total Mail Converter is not registered.

Vaccine debate presents a political minefield — as Hillary Clinton can attest (WAPO)

By Karen Tumulty
February 4, 2015
The Washington Post

The latest tweet from Hillary Rodham Clinton sounded straightforward enough: "The science is clear: The earth is round, the sky is blue, and #vaccineswork."

But the issue of vaccinations has long been politically and emotionally fraught — involving not just public health but also the proper role of government, the prerogatives of parents and medical riddles that have yet to be solved.

Probably no one in public life today has felt those crosscurrents more strongly than the presumed front-runner for the 2016 Democratic nomination. On the issue of vaccination over the past two decades, Clinton has repeatedly found herself on the front lines of advocacy and criticism.

Other politicians — including two potential GOP presidential hopefuls, New Jersey Gov. Chris Christie and Sen. Rand Paul (R-Ky.) — have been learning those political lessons the hard way in recent days. Both made statements questioning whether childhood vaccinations should be mandatory, bringing a torrent of criticism, including from medical professionals who are alarmed over a recent rise in measles cases.

As a new first lady in 1993, Clinton championed what became the Centers for Disease Control and Prevention's Vaccines for Children program, designed to provide free inoculations against nine diseases to children who otherwise might not get them. It now covers 14 diseases.

Clinton's role in that endeavor landed her in the crossfire. Conservatives blamed her when shortfalls of some vaccines developed in subsequent years, arguing that the private market was better at allocating resources. "One of her pet projects is a bust," the conservative Wall Street Journal editorial board wrote in a 2003 piece headlined "Hillary's Vaccine Shortage."

Meanwhile, Clinton also found herself the target of a burgeoning movement that linked the rising rate of autism to thimerosal, a mercury-containing preservative that has since been removed from childhood vaccines. Some advocates of this theory went so far as to dub her "Thimerosal Hillary."

For reasons that scientists cannot explain, the incidence of autism is up markedly. Last year, the CDC estimated that 1 in 68 children age 8 had been identified with the range of conditions known as autism spectrum disorder. That was about 30 percent higher than previous estimates, reported in 2012, of 1 in 88 children.

Clinton, as a presidential candidate in 2008, wrote in response to a candidate questionnaire: "I am committed to make investments to find the causes of autism, including possible environmental causes like vaccines. . . . We don't know what, if any, kind of link there is between vaccines and autism — but we should find out."

Her then-rival, Sen. Barack Obama (D-Ill.), also called for more research into whether there was some correlation. And 2008 GOP presidential contender John McCain (R-Ariz.) went so far as to say there was "strong evidence" of a connection between vaccines and autism. But even in 2008, the weight of medical evidence was against such a link and the candidates who indulged such speculation were accused of pandering.

In 2010, the argument against vaccination received a devastating blow from the Lancet, a medical journal that 12 years before had published a study alleging that inoculations for measles, mumps and rubella were a cause of autism. The journal retracted the study, saying the supposed research had been falsified.

Another iteration of the vaccination issue flared in the 2012 Republican primary campaign, when then-Gov. Rick Perry of Texas found himself under fire for a mandate requiring most girls in his state to get inoculated against the human papillomavirus, a sexual infection that can lead to cervical cancer. Some social conservatives argued that it would encourage girls to have sex.

Republican leaders have not welcomed the rekindling of the vaccine debate sparked by Christie's comment Monday that parents should have "some measure of choice" in deciding whether to vaccinate their children. Paul — a physician with a libertarian philosophy — joined the argument with an unfounded claim that there are "many tragic cases of walking, talking, normal children who wound up with profound mental disorders after vaccines."

Paul took to Twitter on Tuesday to defend himself, saying he supports vaccinations and posing for photographs as he received a booster shot.

"I did not say vaccines caused disorders, just that they were temporally related — I did not allege causation," he wrote in one tweet.

House Speaker John A. Boehner (R-Ohio) sought to tamp the furor down by saying Tuesday, "I don't know that we need another law, but I do believe that all children ought to be vaccinated."

Meanwhile, several other potential 2016 contenders distanced themselves from Christie and Paul.

"Absolutely, all children in America should be vaccinated," Sen. Marco Rubio (R-Fla.) said Tuesday. "Unless their immune [system is] suppressed, obviously, for medical exceptions, but I believe that all children, as is the law in most states in this country, before they can even attend school, have to be vaccinated for a certain panel."

This version of Total Mail Converter is not registered.

Louisiana Gov. Bobby Jindal (R) also released a statement criticizing "fear mongering" and added: "Personally, I would not send my kids to a school that did not require vaccinations."

This version of Total Mail Converter is not registered.

Hillary Clinton, grandma-in-chief (Politico)

By Gabriel DeBenedetti
February 3, 2015
Politico

Hillary Clinton is embracing her inner grandma.

After Republican 2016 hopefuls spent a day struggling to finesse the vaccination debate, the 67-year-old Clinton weighed in roughly an hour before midnight: "The science is clear," she tweeted late Monday. "The earth is round, the sky is blue, and #vaccineswork. Let's protect all our kids. #GrandmothersKnowBest."

It was just 127 characters, but it struck a chord — especially her new hashtag. By Tuesday evening the tweet had garnered roughly 24,000 retweets — reaching millions of Twitter followers and making it her most-shared tweet since she jabbed Fox during February 2014's Super Bowl.

The Monday night tweet was just her sixth in 2015, but some of her backers felt it might shed new light on her candidacy.

The message offered a look at how Clinton might approach her likely 2016 campaign for the White House — and how she might combat Republican attacks on her age.

While Clinton allies and detractors uniformly cautioned that too much of her strategy should not be inferred from a single late-night tweet, her backers also said the post demonstrated her intention to use her family — specifically, her 4-month-old granddaughter, Charlotte — as an important strand of her campaign message. It also hinted at how she intends to try to garner positive press — and present herself as the adult in the room — as the crowded Republican field dukes it out.

"It does tap into something that is potentially really powerful for her in terms of how she connects, and how she communicates," said Chris Lehane, a Democratic strategist and alum of President Bill Clinton's White House. "When she offers a theory of government and connects it to her biography, in particular being a mom and a grandma, and talking about intergenerational equity issues and the possibility to do right by your kids — the combination there is a really, really powerful way to communicate."

Clinton first trotted out her granddaughter as a character in her 2014 stump speech while campaigning for Democrats across the country, using the infant Charlotte as a justification for her continued investment in the country's future. The 4-month-old Charlotte has been featured in more than a dozen of Clinton's public appearances, making her a staple.

"When you have this little baby, you spend a lot of time just staring at her. You really resolve, as her parents and grandparents … [to] do whatever we can to make sure she has the opportunities she deserves to have," Clinton said in New Hampshire in November.

"You should not have to be the grandchild of a president to get a good education, to get good health care," she said a month earlier in Philadelphia.

Democrats see this rhetoric as a way to spin Clinton's age to her advantage, and as a chance to show off Clinton's family life to female voters and her personal warmth to young voters.

Clinton is also expected to rely more on her prospective status as the first female president during her campaign, and allies expect her to focus on her daughter and granddaughter when making her case.

"Who doesn't like grandmothers? What generation doesn't like grandmothers? Young people like grandmothers, historically, more than mothers and fathers," said Jerry Crawford, the Des Moines attorney who served as the Midwest co-chairman of Clinton's 2008 campaign. "It really, really is very authentic. Anybody that's been a grandparent knows that once you are, you have it on your mind at every moment."

Terry Shumaker, a former ambassador and New Hampshire-based co-chairman of Bill Clinton's campaigns, added that Hillary Clinton had been working on children's issues since the 1980s, including during her tenure at the State Department, so it made sense for her to weigh in like this on a topic "near and dear to her heart."

Still, Clinton is older than each of the major likely Republican candidates, and conservative reactions to her Monday night message previewed the difficulties she might run into explicitly campaigning as a grandmother and as a candidate somehow separated from the bickering of the Republican hopefuls.

"Am I the only one who finds Hillary's #GrandmothersKnowBest hashtag not just cloying but creepy? Welcome to the grand-nanny state," tweeted Bill Kristol, editor of the conservative Weekly Standard.

Such objections also reflect Republican resistance to letting Clinton float above the mud of the nominating season in the event that she does not get a viable challenger. Democratic allies said occasional targeted tweets like Monday's could let Clinton seem like the adult in a room of fighting Republicans who will most likely get much more national attention with their squabbles. This tactic would let her stay engaged with the daily conversation without dragging herself into unproductively prolonged debates with Republicans, backers argue.

This version of Total Mail Converter is not registered.

But Republican critics peg messages like Clinton's tweet as overthought and artificial, a vulnerability they see in many of her communications.

Clinton's team has been tight-lipped while preparing for the likely campaign, releasing few public statements while the former secretary of state meets with advisers and largely stays out of the public eye. As a result, her occasional tweets are pored over by her backers and opponents as rare, if safe, insights into her thinking.

"She's demonstrating extreme caution both in how she is engaging on issues and in the way she frames them. An 11 p.m. tweet that reverses her previous position on the issue and reads like it was crafted by committee doesn't exactly scream 'authenticity,'" said Tim Miller of Republican opposition research firm America Rising, referring to Clinton's 2008 statement that she was committed to finding the causes of autism, including looking at vaccines.

Absent a Democratic challenger specifically criticizing Clinton and going after her presumed voters, however, many of her supporters see little downside to her only occasionally wading into the issue of the moment with a strategically placed policy-based barb against Republicans.

"This mom for one would love to see #GrandmothersKnowBest make an appearance in future tweets," said Democratic strategist Lynda Tran, an adviser to Ready For Hillary.

This version of Total Mail Converter is not registered.

Pro-Elizabeth Warren Group Opens New Hampshire Office (WSJ)

By Peter Nicholas
February 4, 2015
The Wall Street Journal

Sen. Elizabeth Warren (D., Mass.) has been sounding more definitive of late in saying she won't run for president.

Undeterred, a group of her most ardent supporters have hired four campaign staffers in New Hampshire and opened an office in Manchester in hopes of luring her into the race as a liberal challenger to Hillary Clinton.

Democracy for America, a liberal political action committee, is stepping up its efforts to draft Ms. Warren, announcing Wednesday that it is creating a pro-Warren campaign apparatus in the state that holds the first primary of the presidential campaign season.

The group has hired Kurt Ehrenberg, a former political director for the New Hampshire AFL-CIO, as state director of what it calls the "Run Warren Run" campaign.

Joining Mr. Ehrenberg are three field organizers: Jake Belanger, Diego Hernandez, and Jennica Simms -- all of whom have worked on Democratic congressional campaigns.

"I'm excited to join activists all across the Granite State to ensure we live up to our proud tradition of defying expectations, upsetting conventional wisdom, and picking presidents by working to bring Sen. Elizabeth Warren and her populist progressive vision for our country into 2016's first-in-the-nation primary," Mr. Ehrenberg said in a prepared statement.

Democracy for America said it also plans to open an office in Portsmouth, N.H., and will hold events later this month.

Whether any of this will make a difference is far from certain For months Ms. Warren used language that didn't entirely seem to rule out a presidential bid.

"I am not running for president," she would say. And say and say again. But in a recent interview she dropped the present tense construction that seemed to leave her room to change her mind.

Speaking to Fortune magazine she employed the future tense.

"Are you going to run for president?" she was asked.

"No," she replied.

Mr. Ehrenberg's task is to get Ms. Warren to reconsider. The idea is to demonstrate she enjoys an impassioned following in a state that has made or broken many a presidential candidate in modern American political history.

It won't be easy.

Mrs. Clinton, who is expected to announce her candidacy some time in the next two-to-five months (sorry, that's as specific an answer as anyone will give right now), would be the overwhelming front-runner in New Hampshire. She won the state in 2008, injecting new life in her campaign after she finished third in the Iowa caucuses that year.

Currently, RealClearPolitics shows Mrs. Clinton leading all candidates in New Hampshire, running more than 40 points ahead of Ms. Warren.

This version of Total Mail Converter is not registered.

Here are the senators who have already endorsed Hillary Clinton (CNN)

By Dan Merica

February 3, 2015

CNN

Hillary Clinton has yet to declare her intentions to run for president, but the likelihood of a 2016 campaign is such a foregone conclusion that 27 out of 46 senators in the Democratic caucus have already endorsed her all-but-certain plans.

Sen. Brian Schatz added his name to the growing list on Monday when he tweeted his support for Clinton and sent out a press release to reporters.

Ready for Hillary, the pro-Clinton super PAC that has urged Clinton to run since 2013, has been the force behind seventeen of these endorsements. Senators like Tim Kaine and Mark Warner of Virginia and Dick Durbin of Illinois and have all endorsed the former secretary of state through the super PAC. The group is also currently working to line up more endorsements.

"We've been fortunate to have prominent Democrats lend their credibility, their star power and their grassroots networks to help build a list of millions of Hillary supporters," group spokesman Seth Bringman said about the list of high-profile endorsements they have wrangled for Clinton.

What's more, every female Democratic senator in the last Congress backed Clinton in a secret letter. "All of the Senate Democratic women have written her a letter encouraging her to run," Sen. Kay Hagan, who lost reelection in 2014, told an audience in 2013.

In fact, before Clinton has even declared her candidacy, nearly 60% of Democratic senators have endorsed her run.

Here is the list:

Sen. Tammy Baldwin of Wisconsin - Signed a letter with all other female senators backing a Clinton run

Sen. Richard Blumenthal of Connecticut- Told CNN at a 2014 University of Connecticut event that he "would support her when and if she" runs.

Sen. Barbara Boxer of California - Signed a letter with all other female senators backing a Clinton run

Sen. Maria Cantwell of Washington - Signed a letter with all other female senators backing a Clinton run

Sen. Ben Cardin of Maryland - Headlined a December 2014 fundraiser organized by Ready for Hillary

Sen. Dick Durbin of Illinois - Headlined a June 2014 fundraiser organized by Ready for Hillary

Sen. Dianne Feinstein of California - Signed a letter with all other female senators backing a Clinton run

This version of Total Mail Converter is not registered.

Sen. Al Franken of Minnesota - The senator told MSNBC this in December 2014: "I think that I'm ready for Hillary. I think that we've not had someone this experienced, this tough, and she's very, very impressive." Franken has also expressed support through Ready for Hillary.

Sen. Kirsten Gillibrand of New York - Signed a letter with all other female senators backing a Clinton run

Sen. Martin Heinrich of New Mexico- Headlined a July 2014 fundraiser organized by Ready for Hillary

Sen. Heidi Heitkamp of North Dakota - Signed a letter with all other female senators backing a Clinton run

Sen. Mazie Hirono of Hawaii - Signed a letter with all other female senators backing a Clinton run

Sen. Bill Nelson of Florida - Nelson reportedly called Clinton in December 2014 to urge her to run. "It's time for a woman," he told The Tampa Bay Times. "I'm all for Hillary."

Sen. Tim Kaine of Virginia - Headlined a May 2014 fundraiser organized by Ready for Hillary

Sen. Amy Klobuchar of Minnesota - Signed a letter with all other female senators backing a Clinton run

Sen. Patrick Leahy of Vermont - Told Vermont Public Radio this in June 2014: "I told her if she decided to run I would support her and would be willing to do whatever she likes. I've made no secret of that ever since then."

Sen. Joe Manchin of West Virginia - He told Politico in January 2014 that he wants Clinton to run. "I don't know if there's anyone more qualified. I've seen it all," he said.

Sen. Claire McCaskill of Missouri - Signed a letter with all other female senators backing a Clinton run

Sen. Barbara Mikulski of Maryland - Signed a letter with all other female senators backing a Clinton run

Sen. Patty Murray of Washington - Signed a letter with all other female senators backing a Clinton run

Sen. Brian Schatz of Hawaii - Tweeted Monday morning that he was backing Clinton in 2016.

Sen. Charles Schumer of New York - The outspoken senator has gone as far to say that he would bet on Clinton running in 2016.

Sen. Jeanne Shaheen of New Hampshire - Signed a letter with all other female senators backing a Clinton run

Sen. Debbie Stabenow of Michigan - Signed a letter with all other female senators backing a Clinton run

This version of Total Mail Converter is not registered.

Sen. Mark Warner of Virginia - Headlined a July 2014 fundraiser organized by Ready for Hillary

Sen. Elizabeth Warren of Massachusetts - Signed a letter with all other female senators backing a Clinton run

Sen. Sheldon Whitehouse of Rhode Island- Told The Hill in January 2014 that he was backing Clinton.

Not all senators, however, are ready to endorse Clinton this early. Delaware Sens. Tom Carper and Chris Coons have both side-stepped questions about Hillary Clinton 2016, largely because of uncertainty around whether Vice President Joe Biden -- a Delaware native -- will run. Pennsylvania Sen. Bob Casey told CNN last year that it was too early to endorse and Sen. Bernie Sanders, an independent senator who caucuses with Democrats, is actively pursuing a 2016 run himself.

Here is the list of not yet and nos to Clinton 2016:

Sen. Sherrod Brown of Ohio - In a June interview, Brown said he wasn't "on board with anybody" after being asked about Clinton 2016.

Sen. Thomas Carper of Delaware - The senator told The Hill in 2014 that "It's entirely, entirely too early to be talking about anybody running for president."

Sen. Bob Casey of Pennsylvania - At a 2014 event in Philadelphia, Casey told CNN that it was too early to talk about Clinton 2016. "I'm not going to get into that," he said.

Sen. Chris Coons of Delaware - "I think 2016 is a long way off, we have to get through 2014," Coons told Politico in January 2014. "I have always supported Sen. Biden, Vice President Biden, and I think all of Delaware looks forward to a future in which he has great opportunities to serve."

Sen. Bernie Sanders of Vermont - The independent senator is actively pursuing a presidential run in 2016.

Some senators have been unclear about their support of Clinton in 2016. The best example is Senate Majority Leader Harry Reid.

Reid sent a fundraising email through Ready for Hillary in 2014 and regularly speaks highly of the Clintons. But he has not directly said that he is support her possible run.

Here is the list of senators whose support is unclear:

Sen. Michael Bennet of Colorado - The Colorado Democrat sent an email through Ready for Hillary in 2014, but to date, has not made it clear that he would back her run in 2016.

Sen. Cory Booker of New Jersey

Sen. Joe Donnelly of Indiana

This version of Total Mail Converter is not registered.

Sen. Angus King of Maine - The Maine senator has not said outright that he isn't backing Clinton, but in a post-election interview with MSNBC, the independent senator who caucuses with Democrats said, "I think that is going to be a difficulty for someone like Hillary Clinton, who has tremendous experience and background, but she's going to have a hard time saying, 'Oh, I'm a new person.'"

Sen. Ed Markey of Massachusetts

Sen. Robert Menendez of New Jersey

Sen. Jeff Merkley of Oregon

Sen. Chris Murphy of Connecticut

Sen. Gary Peters of Michigan - Clinton endorsed Peters in 2014 and although Peters hinted at Clinton's future, he didn't outright endorse her. "Whatever she does, she is going to be really great at it in the future," he said at the event with Clinton.

Sen. Jack Reed of Rhode Island

Sen. Harry Reid of Nevada

Sen. Jon Tester of Montana - After losing the chamber in 2014, the Montana Democrat was named chairman of the Democratic Senatorial Campaign Committee through 2016.

Sen. Tom Udall of New Mexico

Sen. Ron Wyden of Oregon

This version of Total Mail Converter is not registered.

Young people will hit the polls in 2016, and they want Hillary (Fusion)

By Brett LoGiurato

February 3, 2015

Fusion

Young people are planning to turn out the vote in 2016. And they have a clear choice at this point about who they want to be the nation's next president.

Those are some of the highlights from Fusion's Massive Millennial Poll, which surveyed 1000 people aged 18-34 about everything from politics to dating to race issues. The poll provides a barometer of millennials' priorities and preferred candidates ahead of the 2016 presidential election.

For one thing, they say they're increasingly engaged ahead of the all-important election — but it's also clear they're not very well-informed. And they think government can help them, particularly in an area where they've struggled to get ahead — in their jobs.

Young people are 'ready for Hillary'

Right now, young people want former Secretary of State Hillary Clinton to become the nation's first female president in 2017.

Clinton is the top choice among young Democrats and handily beats the GOP challenger who currently gets the highest percentage of the youth vote, 2012 nominee Mitt Romney, according to the survey. Romney last Friday said he would not run for the third time, putting Republicans in a fresh scramble to find a candidate who can compete with Clinton.

Young Democrats across all demographics pick Clinton to be the party's next nominee, according to the survey. More than half — 57 percent — of the Democrats surveyed prefer Clinton, compared with 10 percent who choose Vice President Joe Biden and another 10 percent who want Massachusetts Sen. Elizabeth Warren. At 19 percent, a large chunk are still undecided.

But young Republicans preferred a third presidential run from Romney before he made it official to supporters last week that he wouldn't run. More young people identified with the Democratic Party, so the Republican sample is decidedly smaller. (Note: Results showing Romney ahead were also based on a smaller sample size than the results with the rest of the Republican field.)

With Romney out of the mix, former Florida Jeb Bush benefitted the most: He could be the frontrunner with Romney out of the way. In a Romney-less field, Bush leads the pack at 16 percent, jumping 4 percentage points from a field that included Romney.

Bush is trailed by Kentucky Sen. Rand Paul (14 percent), former Arkansas Gov. Mike Huckabee (12 percent), New Jersey Gov. Chris Christie (8 percent) and Texas Sen. Ted Cruz (8 percent).

More young people still lean toward Democrats when they're pressed

According to the survey, 49 percent say they are politically unaffiliated — including a majority (58 percent) of young Latino voters, half of young male voters, and half of the 25-29-aged voters in the sample.

But when the self-identified independents were pressed further, half of those surveyed at least leaned toward identifying with the

This version of Total Mail Converter is not registered.

Democratic Party. Thirty-five percent, meanwhile, leaned more toward the GOP.

And if the election were held today, 48 percent would choose a generic Democratic candidate, compared with 35 percent who would pick the Republican nominee.

Jeb Bush does exceptionally well with young Latino voters

Could Republicans solve their Latino vote problem in 2016? The survey suggests they have a candidate who excites young Latino Republicans far more than the others.

That candidate is Bush, whose wife is Latina and who is generally viewed as more pro-immigration reform than any of the other potential Republican candidates at this point. Bush, along with Romney, did not appear at an Iowa summit last weekend hosted by noted immigration hawk Rep. Steve King.

According to the survey, 19 percent of Latino Republicans surveyed said they'd vote for Bush in the GOP primary. That was 8 percentage points higher than the next-closest candidates — Christie and Paul. Christie, however, blew out the rest of the field among young, African-American Republicans. He got 24 percent of the vote there, 17 points ahead of the next closest challengers — Bush and Paul.

Some other areas where Bush is relatively strong: in the 18- to 24-year-old crowd (12 percent), with self-identified "conservative" young Republicans (15 percent), and with young Republicans who have at least some college education (12 percent). He leads the crowded Republican field in each of those categories.

One question revealed how alarmingly uninformed young people are about politics

Are you between the ages of 18-34? Can you name one — just one — of your home state's senators?

Congrats! You did better than more than three-fourths of people your age. That's right — 77 percent of 18- to 34-year-olds in the new survey could not name even one US senator in their home state.

The finding provides fodder for the suggestion that millennials are relatively uninformed political citizens. But Fusion's survey also revealed that more than nine in 10 of the 18- to 34-year-olds plan to vote in the 2016 presidential election, so there's some inclination they want to learn more. [[More on this breakdown below.]]

Some interesting findings in the demographic breakdowns: more men (25 percent) than women (20 percent) were able to correctly name at least one of their senators. However, they were also more likely to guess and take a 50-50 shot at getting it right — women were more likely than men to say they "don't know" rather than give an incorrect response.

Meanwhile, certain demographic groups within the survey earned a particularly low grade. Just 18 percent of 18- to 24-year-olds, 16 percent of Latinos, and 10 percent of African-Americans could correctly identify one of their senators. However, whites were significantly more likely to guess than to say they didn't know.

Here's the one issue millennials most want the next president to tackle

A majority of millennials want their next president to take decisive action to improve their economic situations. A plurality — 19 percent — of respondents in the survey said they want the next president to address the economy and jobs.

This version of Total Mail Converter is not registered.

Coming in next on the list of important issues is health care (10 percent), education (7 percent), budgets and deficits (6 percent), and immigration and border control (4 percent).

The economy and jobs were the No. 1 issue across every demographic measured in the poll, from sex, age, race, ideology, and education level. All but one demographic — young men — ended up with health care as the No. 2 issue.

The economy, while picking up steam as a whole in recent months, continues to pose challenges, especially for millennials. The unemployment rate for 16- to 19-year-olds remains around 20 percent, and a Pew Research Center paper published last year found that millennials are driving a record increase in multi-generational home living.

Changing of the guard? Young people think government is helpful

Where millennials differ from the rest of the American population, however, is in their view that, overall, government is generally good. Fifty-seven percent of those surveyed said government is "helpful," compared with just 18 percent who called it "harmful." That suggests millennials want the next president to be more active in tackling their prioritized issues.

A 2014 Washington Post poll found that a plurality of registered voters viewed the government as more harmful than helpful. The difference was especially distinct in those who felt strongly about their position — 27 percent strongly felt the government was harmful, compared with 11 percent who strongly felt it was helpful.

Young people are actually excited to vote in 2016! Will it last?

More than three-quarters millennials say they are at least "very likely" to vote in the 2016 presidential election, a level of enthusiasm that has the potential to dwarf previous turnouts from young people in past elections.

In all, 77 percent 18 to 34-year-olds are "absolutely certain" or "very likely" to vote in 2016, according to the survey. Another 14 percent said they will "possibly" vote, bringing the total up to 91 percent. Just 8 percent say they are not likely to vote, while 1 percent is undecided.

Such an increase could represent a boon for whichever presidential candidate takes advantage. Multiple studies have shown that young voters propelled Obama to his two electoral victories, especially in 2012.

That year, according to the Pew Research Center, voters between the ages of 18-34 made up about 19 percent of the electorate, an increase from 18 percent in 2008.

But only about half of those eligible to vote in the age group went to the polls, according to a 2012 analysis from Center for Research and Information on Civic Learning and Engagement at Tufts University. That same analysis found that Obama won at least 61 percent of the youth vote in four key swing states — Florida, Ohio, Pennsylvania, and Virginia. The analysis concluded that if Romney had split the youth vote in those states, he could have won each of them.

The general enthusiasm spreads across demographics. Overall, 88 percent of men aged 18-34 are likely to vote. Even more women — 95 percent — are planning on heading to the voting booth in 2016.

This version of Total Mail Converter is not registered.

Ninety-three percent of young white people and African-Americans say they are likely to vote, while 88 percent of young Latinos plan to turn out. And 89 percent of high-school graduates, 90 percent of attendees of at least some college, and 94 percent of college graduates are likely to vote.

Why are some young people planning on sitting out? What would make them change their minds?

They have a few reasons, but the most popular they gave is that they "don't care about voting" — 16 percent of the young people who said they are unlikely to vote chose that option. Twelve percent of that group said they are "too busy," 9 percent said "nothing ever changes" or "my vote doesn't count," and 8 percent said they "don't trust the system," rounding out the top-five reasons.

What could change that? Millennials say they'd be more likely to vote if they could do so online (49 percent) or via a cell phone (38 percent). Another 26 percent said a more racially diverse palate of candidates would motivate them to vote, while 24 percent said more young candidates on the menu would be an encouraging factor.

African-Americans, in particular, said they'd be much more likely to vote if there were racially diverse candidates (24 percent, vs. 13 percent across the board), and if they could vote online (44 percent, vs. 32 percent across the board).

This version of Total Mail Converter is not registered.

Hillary Clinton trounces GOP foes in latest poll. Why that's not a big deal (Christian Science Monitor)

By Husna Haq

February 3, 2015

Christian Science Monitor

A new poll shows Hillary Clinton ahead of potential Republican rivals in three critical swing states: Florida, Ohio, and Pennsylvania. Why that doesn't mean much at this point in the 2016 presidential race.

A new Quinnipiac University poll released Tuesday shows Hillary Clinton trouncing nearly every potential Republican challenger in the 2016 presidential election in three critical swing states: Florida, Ohio, and Pennsylvania.

Since 1960, no candidate has won the presidency without winning at least two of those three states, and for some, this is further proof of Mrs. Clinton's early dominance in the 2016 race.

"Poll: Hillary Clinton wipes out GOP contenders - except Kasich," reads one headline. "Poll: Clinton sweeps GOP foes save Bush tie in Florida," reads another.

A lead in three key swing states is noteworthy. But Clinton shouldn't get too comfortable. More on that soon. For now, here's a closer look at the numbers.

In Florida, Clinton just barely leads former Gov. Jeb Bush 44 percent to 43 percent, falling within the 3.2 percent margin of error.

But she bests other potential GOP contenders in the Sunshine state by at least 10 points. In a hypothetical matchup, Clinton leads New Jersey Gov. Chris Christie by 18 points, Kentucky Sen. Rand Paul by 12 points, former Arkansas Gov. Mike Huckabee by 17 points and Florida Sen. and "native son" Marco Rubio by 10 points.

In Ohio, also, Clinton appears to lead other candidates despite matching Ohio Gov. John Kasich, 44 to 43 – well within the margin of error. Still, Clinton shows comfortable leads over Bush 47 to 36, Christie 47 to 34, Paul 48 to 36 and Huckabee 49 to 34.

Of the three states surveyed, Clinton finds the greatest support in Pennsylvania, according to the poll. Once again, she leads Bush 50 to 35, Paul 53 to 34, Huckabee 54 to 34 and former Pennsylvania Sen. Rick Santorum 54 to 34.

"While would-be Republican presidential candidates, even Native Son Rick Santorum, absorb less than stellar favorability numbers, Clinton has the closest thing to rock star ratings a politician can get in America today," Tim Malloy, assistant director of the Quinnipiac University Polls, said in a statement. "Pennsylvania, which just elected a Democratic governor, is shaping up early in the campaign season as the bluest of the Swing States."

She may be a Washington rock star, but right now, Clinton's lead isn't especially noteworthy. Here's why:

For starters, it's what you'd expect at this point in the 2016 race. The GOP vote is divided between as many as a dozen potential candidates, and the Democratic vote is essentially unified on one star candidate. It's no surprise, then, that the presumptive nominee (who has not yet, by the way, actually declared her intentions), sweeps.

This version of Total Mail Converter is not registered.

And this early on, it's about name recognition and as far as name recognition goes, Clinton has the advantage.

Of course, her lead isn't definitive everywhere – even this early on. As the poll points out, Clinton does, in fact, statistically tie two contenders in two swing states: Kasich of Ohio, and Bush, likely her most serious competitor. And the margins are narrowing in certain key states, Politico points out.

As the Miami Herald also notes, "if you 'unskew' the Quinnipiac poll (blending the average turnout by party ID from the last two presidential elections) Bush goes from trailing Clinton by 1 point to leading her by about 3, 46-43 percent in Florida."

And if we haven't already said it enough times – it's still early in the race and a lot can happen between now and Nov. 2016. As Hot Air's Ed Morrissey recently wrote, at this time eight years ago, "Obama['s] candidacy...looked like a bid to be Hillary's VP choice or a credibility-establishing effort for a later, more serious campaign."

In other words, now is not the time for Hillary Clinton to read the polling numbers and gloat.

This version of Total Mail Converter is not registered.

The GOP Elite Puts Its Foot Down (Politico Magazine)

By Bill Schier

February 3, 2015

Politico Magazine

Shots have been fired. The GOP herd is beginning to be culled. In less than a week, the establishment hounded Mitt Romney out, and the conservative movement wrote Sarah Palin out.

The message from Republican insiders is clear: We cannot let our primary become another clown show.

Meanwhile, the nascent Hillary Clinton campaign has signaled it wants to push back its planned entry from the spring to the summer. "If you have the luxury of time, you take it," one Democratic insider told POLITICO. But these Republican moves indicate that she may not have that luxury. Here's why.

We already knew the Republican National Committee, led by Chairman Reince Priebus, was trying to exert some adult supervision over the primary process.

Priebus and every other leading Republican strategist knows that recent GOP nominees have been weakened by a primary debate stage dominated by fringe characters—along with front-runners doing too little to distinguish themselves from the extremes. The resulting spectacle presents a horrible image of the party to general-election voters, weighing down the eventual winner.

Priebus' recent declaration that candidates will have to perform above a certain threshold in polls to warrant inclusion in debates, a threshold that will get stiffer later in the campaign, suggests he is aware that he needs to get as many fringe characters off the stage as possible. But he can't be confident that the poll respondents will oblige and elevate only mature candidates above the bar.

However, if Republican insiders have the wherewithal to contain the support and attention given to their circus acts, then that could greatly aid Priebus' project. The twin falls of Romney and Palin last week are solid evidence that the party wants to shape up and jettison any distractions. That's a warning for Democrats to stop laughing at the prospect of another GOP clown show a la 2012 and start preparing to grapple with a more serious opposition.

The rejection of Romney 3.0 wasn't just because he'd worn out his welcome. Clear-eyed Republicans knew they were going to have a hard enough time fighting a campaign on the Democratic turf of economic inequality; the last thing they needed was to have the face of Republican callousness toward the "47 percent" inject his reputation for inauthenticity into the cause of reducing the income gap.

But the dispatching of one damaged establishment candidate is a simpler matter than the more corrosive problem of a field top-heavy with frightening Tea Party candidates. That's why the conservative buzz coming out of Iowa's Freedom Summit, a presidential cattle call organized by anti-immigrant zealot Rep. Steve King, was potentially more consequential than Romney's fold.

Not only did conservative opinion leaders widely pan Palin's ramblings, extinguishing whatever fire she may have had for a run, but they also saved the bulk of their praise for Wisconsin Governor Scott Walker—a governor with a record, not a grenade-throwing pundit or a grandstanding senator. Even Rush Limbaugh was effusive: "Scott Walker wowed them in Iowa. … Scott Walker has shown the Republican Party how to beat the left. Scott Walker has the blueprint for winning and winning consistently and winning big in a blue state with conservative principles that are offered with absolutely no excuses."

This version of Total Mail Converter is not registered.

Conservative die-hards may not agree with the establishment Republicans who believe the party needs some ideological recalibration on issues like immigration. But they do seem to be getting on board with the notion that Republicans need to elevate serious presidential timber over the silly self-promoters, no matter how good they are at stirring the pot and making liberal heads explode.

Still, it's an open question whether conservative opinion leaders are able to lead conservative voters. Typically in Republican contests, "base" voters remain enamored with ideological perfection and splinter among several implausible candidates, allowing an establishment favorite to win early primaries with mere pluralities. Attempts by conservative activists to "Stop McCain" in 2008 and "Stop Romney" in 2012 were busts, failing to coalesce around a single alternative. But if 2016 is different, if the conservative rank and file is fed up enough with losing, and can be persuaded by their leaders to rally around a qualified, substantive candidate, they could dictate the outcome.

Take the latest Fox News poll. Without Romney, Jeb Bush leads the pack, but with a middling 15 percent. Right behind him are Rand Paul and Mike Huckabee with 13 percent each, followed by Ben Carson with 10 percent. Few believe any of those last three—with enough controversial comments to fill warehouses of opposition research—would have a prayer against Hillary Clinton. Yet combined they hold 36 percent of the Republican vote. Meanwhile, Walker is knocking on the door of the top tier with 9 percent. If the conservative elite put their collective weight behind Walker, he could scoop up much of that Tea Party vote and zoom past Bush.

This version of Total Mail Converter is not registered.

The Kissinger primary (Politico)

By Michael Crowley
February 4, 2015
Politico

You're a Republican thinking of running for president. It's a dangerous world, and your foreign policy credentials are a little thin.

Time to see Henry Kissinger.

Scott Walker did it. So did Marco Rubio and Chris Christie. Rick Perry paid a visit in September — he even tweeted a photo to prove it.

"It was an honor to speak with Dr. Kissinger today and hear his thoughts on America's foreign policy challenges," tweeted the then-Texas governor.

Rubio has "met with Kissinger a couple of times in the past, and always appreciates his insights," says a spokesman for the Florida senator, adding that Rubio has been reading Kissinger's latest book, "World Order."

At 91 years old, the former secretary of state, national security adviser and intellectual-cum-celebrity has come to occupy a unique place in the foreign policy firmament. Though some historians blame him for countless deaths in places like Vietnam, Cambodia and Bangladesh, Kissinger is more revered than ever in Washington. He has become a Yoda-like figure, bestowing credibility and a statesman's aura to politicians of both parties, including ones who may not actually share his worldview.

They may want more than a message: A Kissinger endorsement could be a major boost in a crowded GOP field. Though he often sits out primary contests, Kissinger backed John McCain in December 2007 when the Arizona Republican was still fending off other challengers. (He even granted a much-needed private audience to McCain's running mate, Sarah Palin, the next year.)

"People treat him as an oracle," says James Mann, a resident fellow at the Johns Hopkins School of Advanced International Studies and author of several books on foreign policy. "Candidates running for president like to be seen with or described as having talked to Kissinger, because they think it sends a message that they themselves are serious about foreign policy — when in fact they may not even know much about what Henry Kissinger believes or what he has done."

Kissinger's many admirers call him brilliant, with an unmatched grasp of history. They revere him for diplomatic feats like masterminding Richard Nixon's history-altering 1972 opening to China.

But the GOP's Kissinger crush is also surprising in some ways. The man who largely guided American foreign policy for a decade under Nixon and then Gerald Ford is a longtime proponent of the "realist" school of foreign policy. Realists prioritize order and stability above human rights, democracy and other internal affairs in foreign countries. Many of Kissinger's GOP admirers, including McCain, champion democracy promotion and military action to prevent atrocities.

And Kissinger disciples like Walker, Rubio and Perry may not share their tutor's support for diplomacy with Iran and engagement with China, nor his caution against "posturing" against Russian President Vladimir Putin.

Even more surprising, however, is Kissinger's embrace by Democrats, including providing private counsel to Barack Obama. A batch of White House visitor records released on Jan. 31 show that Kissinger visited the president in the Oval Office on Oct. 22. Unlike the Republicans who brag about their proximity to Kissinger, the White House did not publicize this meeting and would not characterize its substance. Kissinger's office did not comment for this story.

But other Democrats haven't been shy about their admiration for a man who was long reviled by the left, who regularly counseled George W. Bush and Dick Cheney during the 2000s, who endorsed John McCain in 2008 and Mitt Romney in 2012 — and whom credible historians say has not been held accountable for reprehensible actions during his Nixon administration tenure.

During his confirmation hearing to be secretary of state, John Kerry cited Kissinger's book "Diplomacy" as a "superb" guide to the modern world and met with him privately as the Obama administration built its later-aborted case for bombing Syria in September 2013. Last fall, Hillary Clinton wrote a glowing Washington Post review of Kissinger's late-2014 tome, "World Order," which she called "vintage Kissinger, with his singular combination of breadth and acuity along with his knack for connecting headlines to trend lines."

Most unlikely of all, perhaps, is the kinship between Obama's close adviser and United Nations Ambassador Samantha Power, with the Cold War-era diplomat five decades her elder. Last April ESPN tagged along with Power, a die-hard Red Sox fan, and Kissinger, a Yankees lover, for a trip to the ballpark in which the two likened their sports rivalry to their divergent worldviews. The two hold nearly polar opposite views of the role human rights should play in foreign policy, making Power what some call an idealist to Kissinger's realist. At Yankee Stadium, those differences were papered over with banter: "Wait until Samantha says 'realpolitik,'" Kissinger joked. "It means: He's a German and watch out for him."

This version of Total Mail Converter is not registered.

But the partnership between Kissinger and Obama officials can be serious business. Still connected around the globe by dint of his reputation and business activities as the founder of Kissinger Associates, a lucrative Manhattan-based international consulting firm, Kissinger is a constant traveler and source of valuable information from abroad.

For instance, Kissinger has been an important — if informal — conduit of information about Putin. The former U.S. diplomat is among a small handful of Americans granted audiences with the Russian leader. Kissinger has reported back to Washington on his contacts, including at least once directly to Obama's national security adviser, according to Michael McFaul, who served as the U.S. ambassador to Moscow until last year.

Before his occasional meetings with Putin, Kissinger would first visit McFaul in Spaso house, the U.S. ambassador's residence in Moscow, where photos of Kissinger visiting the same building in the early 1970s adorn the walls. He would "find out what the pulse of the [current U.S.] policy was" before seeing the Russian leader. Then, after seeing Putin, Kissinger would report on his contact back to officials in Washington.

"I was totally amazed at Henry's vigor, both intellectually and politically," McFaul added.

He has sometimes undertaken more specific assignments, as when, in August 2011 Hillary Clinton turned to Kissinger amid an international crisis following a bloody Israeli assault on a Gaza-bound Turkish aid flotilla. Clinton enlisted Kissinger to urge Israeli Prime Minister Benjamin Netanyahu to apologize to Turkey in the name of preserving an important regional relationship. (The account, described in Clinton's memoir "Hard Choices," does not say how the message was received, but Netanyahu did not apologize until much later.)

The cross-partisan relationship between Clinton and Kissinger is particularly notable. Soon after Clinton's review of his book appeared, Kissinger told USA Today that Clinton "ran the State Department in the most effective way that I've ever seen." He soon followed up by telling NPR that Clinton would be "a good president," adding that he planned to vote Republican.

Foreign policy analysts say the friendliness illustrates the extent to which Obama, for all the idealism he once represented, has pursued a cold-eyed policy of realism in the classic Kissinger style — for instance, through his unwillingness to intervene more aggressively to prevent atrocities in Syria's civil war.

Modern foreign policy debates are less about partisanship and more "between people who focus primarily on states and people who focus on people," says Anne-Marie Slaughter, a former top official in Clinton's State Department who now heads the New America Foundation. "He sees the world as a chessboard."

Some historians are harsher, questioning whether Kissinger should be accepted in polite company at all, citing actions and statements he made in the Nixon and Ford administrations that stretched the concept of realism to cruel callousness. In 1975, for instance, Kissinger said that the U.S. "will be friends with" the Cambodian Khmer Rouge, adding: "They are murderous thugs, but we won't let that stand in our way." A Nixon Oval Office tape from 1973 recorded him expressing little sympathy for Jews trying to flee oppression in the former Soviet Union. "If they put Jews into gas chambers in the Soviet Union, it is not an American concern. Maybe a humanitarian concern," Kissinger said.

"People in Washington have a remarkable ability not to ask questions about what their guest of honor actually did in Cambodia or Bangladesh," says Gary J. Bass, a Princeton professor of politics and international affairs and author of "The Blood Telegram," which is harshly critical of Kissinger for allowing thousands of preventable deaths during the 1971 creation of Bangladesh.

During his Jan. 28 testimony before McCain's committee, Kissinger was partly encircled by a group of protesters with the anti-war group Code Pink, who held a banner and chanted slogans calling for his arrest as a "war criminal." An outraged McCain threatened to have them arrested, calling one protester "low-life scum."

Republicans like McCain are totally unmoved by the charges against Kissinger, and recent GOP candidates have welcomed his support. Romney was grateful for Kissinger's backing in 2012, though — like so many others — couldn't resist an impersonation of his German-born advocate's distinctive accent. "I saw Dr. Kissinger" in New York, Romney said at a surreptitiously recorded 2012 fundraiser. "I said to him, 'How are we perceived around the world?' And he said one word: 'Veak!'"

As the 2016 campaign kicks off, a competition is already underway to gain Kissinger's favor. One early favorite could be Chris Christie. As the former New Jersey governor later told The Washington Post's Dan Balz for his book "Collision 2012," Kissinger summoned him to his midtown Manhattan office in mid-2011 and urged him to run for president, saying he had a rare connection with voters. When Christie replied that he knew little about world affairs, his host told him not to worry. "We can work with you on that. Foreign policy is instinct, it's character," Christie recalled Kissinger saying.

But Kissinger — whom Bob Woodward once described as having "a powerful, largely invisible influence" over George W. Bush's foreign policy — is also friendly with Bush's brother Jeb. Last spring Kissinger told the Post that he would be "delighted" to see Jeb Bush run, calling the former Florida governor "experienced, moderate and thoughtful."

Since Bush began signaling his intention to run for president in 2016 this winter, the two have not yet had a publicized meeting. If recent history is any guide, that tweet should be coming soon.

This version of Total Mail Converter is not registered.

This version of Total Mail Converter is not registered.

Hillary Clinton more favorable to Florida voters than Jeb Bush (NY Daily News)

By Leslie Larson

February 3, 2015

NY Daily News

In Florida, Florida, Florida voters are leaning toward Hillary, Hillary, Hillary.

Hillary Clinton was ranked more favorable (53%) to prospective Florida voters than the state's former Governor, Republican Jeb Bush (46%) and the state's current Republican Senator Marco Rubio (36%), according to a new Quinnipiac poll released Tuesday.

Despite the fact that it's their home turf, Bush faces a name-recognition issue with 13% of Floridians saying they hadn't heard of Bush and 27% saying they don't know Rubio.

Of respondents in Florida, only 6% haven't heard of Clinton.

Clinton faces stiffer competition against Bush when it comes to the ballot box.

When asked "if the election for President were being held today, and the candidates were Hillary Clinton the Democrat and Jeb Bush the Republican, for whom would you vote?" respondents put Clinton (44%) and Bush (43%) on a level playing field.

In a Clinton/Rubio matchup scenario, Clinton would win 49% of the vote and Rubio 39%, according to the poll.

Bush hasn't fully declared his candidacy for President but is in the process of "exploring" a run. He is traveling the country headlining a series of fundraisers for his Leadership and Super PACs.

Clinton says she hasn't made up her mind but will likely announce her decision in the Spring.

Rubio has reportedly told his top aides to prepare for a presidential campaign but has not formally declared his candidacy.

This version of Total Mail Converter is not registered.

Bush, Clinton tied right now in Florida (Tallahassee Democrat)

By Jim Saunders
February 3, 2015
Tallahassee Democrat

Bush v. Clinton could be a barnburner in Florida.

A Quinnipiac University poll released Tuesday shows former Gov. Jeb Bush and former U.S. Secretary of State Hillary Clinton in a virtual tie in a hypothetical 2016 presidential race in Florida. The poll gave 44 percent to Clinton and 43 percent to Bush.

While presidential primaries and caucuses are still a year away --- and the fields of candidates are loaded with speculation --- the poll indicates Bush would be the toughest opponent for Clinton in the critical swing state of Florida.

That might not be surprising, as Bush was a popular two-term Republican governor. But the poll also shows the Democrat Clinton leading another native son, Republican U.S. Sen. Marco Rubio, by a margin of 49 percent to 39 percent in Florida.

Quinnipiac polled voters in Florida, Ohio and Pennsylvania, which are all pivotal states in presidential races. Clinton easily topped potential Republican candidates in each of the states, with the exception of Bush in Florida and Ohio Gov. John Kasich in Kasich's home state.

"There is a reason why Hillary Clinton has followed a slower, less aggressive schedule when it comes to ramping up her expected presidential campaign than have virtually all of her potential White House opponents," Peter A. Brown, assistant director of the Quinnipiac University Poll, said in a prepared statement accompanying the results. "She holds double-digit leads over all her potential GOP opponents in the three biggest swing states, except for two native sons, former Florida Gov. Jeb Bush and Ohio Gov. John Kasich. And she is under little pressure from within her own party to hit the campaign trail."

A Bush-Clinton race in Florida would draw tens of millions of dollars, countless stories about political dynasties and memories of the 2000 Bush v. Gore presidential recount. That recount, of course, pitted George W. Bush, the brother of Jeb Bush, and Al Gore, the vice president under former President Bill Clinton.

But if Jeb Bush is derailed from getting the Republican nomination next year, the poll indicates other GOP candidates could have a difficult time beating Hillary Clinton in Florida. Along with the sizable margin in a hypothetical race against Rubio, Clinton also led by double digits in match-ups against New Jersey Gov. Chris Christie, U.S. Sen. Rand Paul of Kentucky and former Arkansas Gov. Mike Huckabee.

The Connecticut-based Quinnipiac, which frequently conducts polls in Florida and other states, surveyed 936 Florida voters from Jan. 22 to Feb. 1.

This version of Total Mail Converter is not registered.

Republican presidential race is wide open, but Kasich is a big factor in Ohio, poll shows (Cleveland Plain Dealer)

By Stephen Koff
February 4, 2015
Cleveland Plain Dealer

WASHINGTON, D.C. -Seventeen months before Republicans convene in Cleveland, the path to the GOP presidential nomination is equally cluttered and wide open, with no single candidate holding a clear advantage, according to a new poll this morning of three crucial swing states including Ohio.

Former Florida Gov. Jeb Bush holds an advantage in only one of the states, namely, Florida.

Ohio second-term Gov. John Kasich, on the other hand, could be considered the front-runner in the Buckeye state right now, although while he has teased about a candidacy, he has not jumped in. And his position in a fanciful primary race, carrying 14 percent of Ohio's Republicans, would only be three percentage points ahead of Wisconsin Gov. Scott Walker, and four points ahead of both Bush and Kentucky U.S. Sen. Rand Paul. Statistically, that would make Ohio a tie.

Beating them all: "Don't know."

Meantime in Pennsylvania, Bush would lead with 12 percent but the neighboring governor from New Jersey, Chris Christie, would be only one point behind - a statistical tie - and former Arkansas Gov. Mike Huckabee would come close, with 10 percentage points.

No candidate has won the presidential race without taking at least two of these three states, note the pollsters, from Quinnipiac University in Connecticut.

This level of competitiveness does not exist on the Democratic side. Asked about potential party nominees, 51 percent of Ohio Democrats picked former Secretary of State Hillary Clinton. Sixty-one percent of Florida Democrats picked her, as did 54 percent of Pennsylvania Democrats.

U.S. Sen. Elizabeth Warren came in second in Ohio, at 14 percent - double the percentage of votes that Vice President Joe Biden would get on a Democratic ballot in the state.

Yet these second-position opinions may be squishy as Play-Doh at this point. When the Democratic question was asked differently -- "Who is your second choice?" -- Biden shot up to the top in all three swing states.

Quinnipiac political polls are widely followed, but this particular survey comes with a caveat: The man who had led the GOP field in Ohio and Pennsylvania, former Massachusetts Gov. Mitt Romney, announced near the end of the survey period that he would not run. The poll was conducted from Jan. 22 to Feb. 1, and Romney made his announcement Jan. 30. Quinnipiac pollsters recalculated the matchup, factoring in the second-choice picks of survey respondents who had said Romney was their first choice.

"Mitt Romney's withdrawal from the presidential race, at first blush, has no statistical benefit in Florida, Ohio or Pennsylvania for any candidate for the Republican presidential nomination," Peter A. Brown, assistant director of the Quinnipiac Poll, said in a statement. "From the beginning of this survey, we asked Romney supporters who they would vote for if the 2012 standard-bearer bowed out, so we are able to measure the results of that decision. Looking at the final tally, his supporters moved evenly to a variety of the remaining candidates."

Initially, Romney was picked by 15 percent of Ohio respondents identifying themselves as Republicans. Had Romney remained, Kasich would have been Ohio Republicans' second choice for president, at 11 percent. But indicative of the competitive nature of the primary at this point, when most candidates are still feeling out their viability, the "don't know" category still led in Ohio, at 18 percent.

In fact, of the three states, only Republican voters in Florida showed overwhelming support for a potential nominee - namely, Bush, their former governor. Bush got 30 percent of the vote in the initial poll, recalculated to 32 percent with Romney's exit.

Quinnipiac surveyed 943 Ohioans, including 337 Republicans and 315 Democrats. The sample size factored into the margins of error: 5.3 percentage points for Republicans and 5.5 for Democrats.

In a survey of a potential general-election matchup, released Tuesday, Quinnipiac said that Clinton would have a double-digit lead among Ohio voters over most Republican challengers - but not over Kasich. If he were in the race, Ohio would show a dead Kasich-Clinton heat.

After a series of primaries and caucuses starting early next year, Republicans will finalize their pick and formally nominate a candidate during their convention in Cleveland July 18-21. Democrats will quickly follow but have not yet selected a city for their convention.

This version of Total Mail Converter is not registered.

Hillary's 140-Character Campaign Strategy (Time)

By Ryan Teague Beckwith

February 3, 2015

Time Magazine

She's pioneered a new way to use Twitter.

Hillary Clinton isn't officially running for president and she isn't exactly campaigning yet either.

Since last year's book tour, her public appearances have been limited to speeches, both paid and unpaid, and even campaign events where she isn't appearing are tightly controlled. That creates a supply-and-demand problem, though, when news breaks and the public wants to know where she stands on an issue.

Enter Twitter. Though Clinton didn't join the social media platform until mid-2013, she's pioneered a new way of using it to flesh out her campaign platform 140 characters at a time.

It's a great political strategy for her, though it leaves a bit to be desired among the public and the press. Clinton's tweets come late in the news cycle, allowing her to score a quick point off Republican in-fighting after much of the debate has played out.

They're also tightly scripted, which means there's no problem of going off-message or losing control of the story, like she did during what should have been a softball interview with NPR that touched on her changing views on gay marriage.

The 140-character limit on Twitter also means that Clinton's pronouncements aren't as substantive as they often seem at first. Without reporters asking follow-up questions, Clinton can make a rather general statement about, say, being in favor of vaccination, without explaining her past doubts.

Or she can criticize an attempt to roll back the Dodd-Frank bank reforms without specifying exactly which changes to the law she would support or oppose.

This version of Total Mail Converter is not registered.

New York Suburb Seeks to Host Hillary Clinton 2016 Campaign (Time)

By Sam Frizell
February 3, 2015
Time Magazine

Local luminaries in a suburb of New York City are calling on Hillary Clinton to place her campaign headquarters in White Plains—a small city close to Clinton's home in Westchester County—despite the draw of the nearby metropolis.

At least one Congresswoman and a major real-estate developer are lobbying Clinton to place her headquarters in Westchester if she runs for president, aiming for the prestige and economic benefits of a large operation. "A Clinton campaign would be good for Westchester, and a Clinton Presidency would be great for America," said Congresswoman Nita Lowey, the Democratic representative for much of the county. Lowey has encouraged Clinton directly to place her headquarters in the county if she runs.

Half an hour from Manhattan by train, prosaic White Plains is as functional a campaign headquarters as a pair of Crocs and about as chic. A suburb with plentiful office parks, PepsiCo's headquarters and 50,000 residents, the Democratic-leaning New York satellite is also squarely in Hillary heartland. The Clintons have had a home in Chappaqua, a hamlet 15 minutes away, since 1999, and White Plains is within striking distance of the presumptive candidate's power base in New York City. Clinton aides hinted last year White Plains is a strong option for a possible headquarters.

But recent lobbying efforts by businesses and local politicians may not be enough to keep Clinton close to home, as the presumptive 2016 candidate reportedly weighs a New York City campaign headquarters. New York is home to a large cadre of Clinton allies and devoted young Democrats that could make up her staff.

Where a candidate decides to locate their headquarters can have an outsized influence on the tenor of a campaign. Obama's decision in 2007 to base his campaign headquarters in Chicago made him a more credible Beltway outsider and may have kept his campaign grounded by keeping it far from the New York and D.C. media bubbles. Clinton and John McCain, on the other hand, both had headquarters in the D.C. suburbs during the 2008 campaign.

Robert Weisz, the CEO of the largest privately-held property owner in Westchester, said he has reached out to Clinton's staff, aiming to lease his properties to potential campaign. A Democrat and past Clinton donor, Weisz owns 2.5 million square feet of real estate in the county and plenty of contiguous office space large enough to host a presidential campaign.

During Clinton's 2008 bid for president, Weisz hosted an 800-person Clinton event on his property on 1133 Westchester Avenue, a commercial space in White Plains. Now he's among the local real estate firms that are keen on bringing a Clinton campaign to the New York suburb. "We reached out to her staff for several reasons: one to rent space, and one to be helpful to her possible campaign," Weisz said.

Westchester County Executive Rob Astorino, the Republican nominee in New York's gubernatorial election last year, said he hasn't reached out to Clinton directly to ask her to move her headquarters to the county, but that he likely will. "I would love for her to set up shop here," Astorino said.

White Plains has the advantage of relatively cheap office space, compared to New York City. The current average annual rent price per square foot of office space in White Plains is around $25, compared with around $60 in Manhattan and $30-$35 in Brooklyn, according to a 2013 report. That can add up. President Obama's 2012 headquarters occupied 50,000 square feet in Chicago's Prudential building, where rents averaged $22-$25 per square foot annually.

A White Plains headquarters could also attract a more dedicated staff that is willing to regularly commute or live at a distance from the city.

It remains unclear whether local excitement and cheap rent is enough to keep Clinton away from New York City, which has all the pomp, panache and power brokers that White Plains lacks.

The Big Apple's mayor, Bill de Blasio, ran her first senatorial campaign, and Clinton has connections in Manhattan's financial industry. According to reports, potential bivouacs for a 2016 campaign include Brooklyn or Queens, where the former Secretary of State would be close to a large base of young Democrats who would form the spine of her campaign staff.

A spokesperson for Clinton didn't respond to a request for comment.

If the Clinton campaign decides to decamp from Westchester and heads to New York's outer boroughs, she would likely be courted by a wide array of friendly real estate developers interested in leasing her space.

Bruce Ratner, a prominent Democrat and real estate developer, has extensive Brooklyn properties including the Barclay's Center, a potential site for the 2016 Democratic National Convention. Stephen L. Green, who is one of New York's largest office landlords, was a member the so-called Hillraisers, an elite coterie of donors that bundled over $100,000 each for Clinton during her 2008 run.

Last August, Clinton signed a two-year lease for a personal office in a Midtown Manhattan skyscraper owned by Green. Green's firm also owns office space in downtown Brooklyn.

White Plains notables also argue that accessibility to Westchester County Airport—mere minutes from the suburb— make the New York satellite a better option than the city.

This version of Total Mail Converter is not registered.

"White Plains would be a terrific location for her campaign headquarters," White Plains Mayor Tom Roach said. "Of course, we would love to have her headquarters here if she decides to run."

This version of Total Mail Converter is not registered.

Can Brooklyn cool rub off on Hillary Clinton? (Hill)

By Amie Parnes
February 4, 2015
The Hill

Brooklyn is casting a wary eye at the latest hipster who might be moving in: Hillary Clinton.

The news that Clinton is considering running her expected 2016 presidential campaign from New York City's most populous borough is being greeted in Gotham with surprise and snark.

It "just goes to show you that Brooklyn is now whiter than ever," said Livia Scott, a sketch comedian at the popular Upright Citizens Brigade Theatre who lives in New York and has seen the borough's gentrification over the years. "So, welcome, Hillary!"
While Clinton's campaign machine might seem an odd match for the East Coast Portlandians who ride fixed-gear bicycles and pride themselves on their ironic facial hair, the idea has been gaining traction in recent weeks. Allies say Clinton had all but ruled out putting her headquarters in the Westchester County suburbs of White Plains near her Chappaqua, N.Y., home, as The Hill first reported on Monday.

The Daily News on Tuesday reported that Clinton aides have already scoped out office space in Brooklyn Heights, just across the river from Manhattan.

"Well, she already has the hipster black-rimmed glasses," one Clinton ally said. "Now she just needs some plaid and a carefree attitude and maybe an education of Mumford and Sons."

Another Democratic consultant said the idea of putting Clinton headquarters in the borough is "completely understandable," but questioned whether it would send the right message.

"The people who think it's a great idea are the same people who think 'Girls' is good," the consultant said about the HBO series centered on an aspiring writer and her friends in Greenpoint, Brooklyn.

The Twitterverse reacted to the headquarters plan by labeling Clinton "Hipster Hillary," with some calling the plan "edgy." The Daily News reported that "Brooklyn may be the new Westchester" for Clinton, while Brooklyn Magazine hailed the borough as "the new Democratic Party mecca" because the party's nominating convention might be held there in the summer of 2016.

Rep. Jerrold Nadler, a Democrat who was born in Brooklyn and represents parts of the borough, encouraged the move, saying there are plenty of reasons to set up shop.

"It's a place of vibrancy and great ethnic diversity," Nadler said in an interview. "It's symbolic of the vibrancy of the country. It's one of the reasons the convention ought to be held there."

The congressman — who said he doesn't think of himself as a hipster — said he hasn't lobbied Clinton to put her campaign headquarters in Brooklyn but would do so if asked.

If Clinton were to land across the Brooklyn Bridge from Manhattan, it would be a vastly different locale from 2008, when her campaign for the White House was based out of the former Immigration and Naturalization Services building in Arlington, Va., a suburb of Washington.

Nadler stopped short of contrasting the two spots but said, "I presume she's learned a lot about running a presidential campaign. ... Maybe part of that is to pick a better location."

Observers say it's clear that Clinton and her allies want to replicate the cool factor generated by Obama's Windy City operation in 2008, which attracted an army of young volunteers who gave the campaign an edge.

Reid Cherlin, a former Obama spokesman turned writer who left the Beltway for the artisanal goods capital of New York, said the would-be campaign "has the right idea being away from D.C., but Brooklyn might not be the best spot.

"Unless they were to be deep into what you might call 'real Brooklyn,' they're just going to be a few subway stops from the center of the media universe," Cherlin said. "It's still better than D.C, but I don't know that it gets you the fresh air, as it were, that you want."

"I live in Brooklyn, and I love Brooklyn," Cherlin added. "So it's no knock on the borough. But putting the headquarters here also would read as a message move, trying to be cool or whatever, in the way that many brands are now doing. But I don't see a real benefit to that for them. And I don't actually think they do, either."

Cherlin suggested that the borough of Queens might be a better match for the campaign, saying it has "more real people" and is "close to the power centers but psychologically less so."

Scott, on the other hand, called a Brooklyn-based campaign a "no-brainer."

"It's a wise move for the people who are advising her," she said. "It's all about what's cool. If she's going to win, she's going to have to get the cool vote. It's not about capturing the young vote but capturing the cool-geist."

Still, she deadpanned: "The people who are most cool have probably moved to Philadelphia by now."

This version of Total Mail Converter is not registered.

This version of Total Mail Converter is not registered.

From:	"Burns Strider" <burns.strider@americanbridge.org>
To:	CTRFriendsFamily <CTRFriendsFamily@americanbridge.org>
Date:	10/23/2014 12:56:46 AM
Subject:	Correct The Record Thursday October 23, 2014 Morning Roundup

Correct The Record Thursday October 23, 2014 Morning Roundup:

Headlines:

US News: Hillary Clinton on the Campaign Trail

"When Clinton started doing more campaign-like events earlier this year, she seemed rusty and off her game. Now she is showing considerable skill on the stump, and she is putting it to good use in urging support for Democratic candidates across the country."

CNN: Hillary Clinton is returning to Iowa

"Hillary Clinton is headed back to Iowa on October 29, according to a Democratic source with knowledge of the trip."

CNN: Rand Paul to lay out four-pronged platform on foreign policy

"It's also expected that Paul will take aim at former Secretary of State Hillary Clinton, a frequent target of his in speeches on the campaign and fundraising trail, especially when it comes to the 2012 terrorist attack against the U.S. compound in Benghazi."

Huffington Post: Paul Krugman: How About A Clinton-Warren Ticket Instead Of A Matchup?

"Nobel Prize-winning New York Times columnist Paul Krugman has an interesting vision of the 2016 Democratic presidential ticket: Hillary Clinton for president and Sen. Elizabeth Warren 'looking over her shoulder so she doesn't stray too far.'"

This version of Total Mail Converter is not registered.

Associated Press, via The Fresno Bee: Clinton renews ties in state she lost in '08

"Hillary Rodham Clinton is on her way to Minnesota to give a late boost to Democrats on this fall's ballot and renew ties that could help her in a possible presidential bid."

MLive: Bill Clinton targets Koch brothers, lauds Democrats' 'great experiment' in Flint speech

"Stabenow also took the opportunity to make what appeared to be a plug for a 2016 presidential run by Clinton's wife, former Secretary of State Hillary Clinton."

National Journal: Elizabeth Warren, Then: 'I Am Not Running For President.' Now: 'I Don't Think So.'On the delicate parsing of campaign speech.

"In a new interview with People, Sen. Elizabeth Warren openly shifted her tone when asked about her presidential ambitions."

USA Today: The model for 'Madam Secretary?' It's not Hillary

"Téa Leoni had a model in mind when she shaped the role of Secretary of State Elizabeth McCord in the new CBS series Madam Secretary. It wasn't Hillary Rodham Clinton."

Articles:

US News: Hillary Clinton on the Campaign Trail

By Kenneth T. Walsh

October 23, 2014 7:19 a.m. EDT

This version of Total Mail Converter is not registered.

[Subtitle:] Potential 2016 presidential candidate campaigns on behalf of fellow Democrats.

Former Secretary of State Hillary Clinton is doing everything possible to pave the way for a presidential run in 2016 short of actually announcing her candidacy, and fellow Democrats mostly like what they see.

When Clinton started doing more campaign-like events earlier this year, she seemed rusty and off her game. Now she is showing considerable skill on the stump, and she is putting it to good use in urging support for Democratic candidates across the country. She made an enthusiastic pitch for women's votes in Colorado this week, arguing that Democrats are pushing for pay equality and making other efforts to help women while Republicans are blocking such moves. And she said Democrats have Middle America's interests at heart. "We need votes for people who believe in you, who worry about you and do everything in their power to give you and your families opportunities," she told a Democratic crowd in Aurora, Colorado.

A senior Democratic strategist who has advised his party's congressional candidates for decades says Clinton is easing concerns that she is too much a part of the past. "She is defining herself as a contemporary figure," he said. "At this point, I'm sure more people feel they would be going forward with Hillary than backward with Hillary." And she is proving that she is not solely an adjunct of her husband, former President Bill Clinton, the strategist said, adding: "She is showing that she is her own person."

Republicans, however, see her as too liberal and burdened with heavy baggage, partly from her husband's presidency when she stood by him during the Monica Lewinsky sex-and-lies scandal. She also has baggage from Barack Obama's presidency, during which she was secretary of state. GOP strategists say she has been tarnished by what they consider Obama's weak foreign policy.

Clinton will travel back to Iowa on Oct. 29, according to CNN, for her second visit in about a month. She is expected to campaign again for Iowa Democrats including Bruce Braley, the party's nominee for the Senate who is in a close race with Republican nominee Joni Ernst.

But there are other implications to her visit. Iowa will be the first state to hold presidential nominating caucuses in 2016, so Clinton's every step in the state is closely scrutinized to assess her appeal and whether she actually intends to run for the White House. She leads in the polls for the Democratic nomination but says she hasn't decided whether to run.

Democrats of all stripes seem eager for her to enter the race. Liberals remain suspicious of her views on national security and they consider her too hawkish about using American power abroad. But many liberals have been reluctant to criticize Clinton because they believe she has a good chance to maintain the Democratic party's control of the White House and they don't want to undermine her. Also, many liberals don't see realistic alternatives to Hillary Clinton at this time. Centrist Democrats like her because they think she would not be a left-wing zealot and would push a Democratic agenda in Congress more effectively and pragmatically than President Obama.

Clinton has traveled extensively on behalf of Democratic candidates this year, unlike Obama who has not been invited to appear with some major Democratic candidates in conservative states (even though he has been featured at many private fundraisers for his party across the country). In the past several weeks, Clinton has traveled to California, Colorado, Florida, Illinois, Iowa, Kentucky, Michigan, Nevada and Pennsylvania. Democratic operatives who are close to Clinton say she will be actively campaigning right through the midterm election on Nov. 4.

Clinton, the former first lady and senator from New York ran for president in 2008 and lost the nomination to Obama. Early in that campaign cycle, she was the prohibitive favorite among Democrats, as she is now, but her campaign fizzled. So there is always the chance for an upset. But for now, Hillary Clinton is soaring, and she appears to be enjoying the ride.

This version of Total Mail Converter is not registered.

CNN: Hillary Clinton is returning to Iowa

By Dan Merica

October 22, 2014

Washington (CNN) -- Hillary Clinton is headed back to Iowa on October 29, according to a Democratic source with knowledge of the trip.

The former first lady's visit comes just a little more than a month since she returned to Iowa after a six year hiatus. Clinton stumped for Bruce Braley, Iowa's Democratic Senate nominee, and other Iowa Democrats at the 37th annual - and final - Harkin Steak Fry in September. She had last visited the state in 2008.

Braley is currently locked in a tight race to succeed Harkin in the Senate with Republican Joni Ernst.

A number of big name Democrats have come to Iowa to help Braley. Vice President Joe Biden will stump for the Senate hopeful at an event in Davenport on Monday and first lady Michelle Obama stumped for him earlier this week.

Any visit Clinton makes to Iowa - the crucially important first-in-the-nation caucus state - is immediately seen through the lens of 2016 politics given that the former first lady is widely seen as the Democratic frontrunner for president and has admitted that she is considering a run.

Clinton's October visit to stump for Democrats in Iowa comes near the end of her prolonged push for Democrats across the country. Clinton has headlined political events in California, Colorado, Michigan, Kentucky, Nevada, Pennsylvania, Illinois and Florida in the last month. And is expected to return to New Hampshire and Georgia by election day.

While all of these events have been for Democrats seeking to win in November, the campaigning is also a way for Clinton to satisfy Democrats who expect their potential future presidential nominee to help the party in the years before the run.

By election day, Clinton is expected to visit over 15 states in her midterm push.

This version of Total Mail Converter is not registered.

CNN: Rand Paul to lay out four-pronged platform on foreign policy

By Ashley Killough

October 23, 2014

(CNN) -- For the first time since facing an onslaught of criticism this year over his foreign policy views, Sen. Rand Paul will spell out his comprehensive national security platform Thursday in remarks that his office bills as a major foreign policy speech.

The Kentucky Republican, who's aggressively laying groundwork for a potential presidential campaign, is set to deliver his address in New York at the Center for the National Interest, a think-tank founded by former President Richard Nixon.

In a four-pronged framework Paul will attempt to cement himself as a "conservative realist," according to his spokesman, and address critics that characterize his views as isolationist.

Paul has tried to defend his traditionally non-interventionist positions in interviews and high-profile Senate floor speeches this year, as well as a speech early last year at the Heritage Foundation.

But he aims to approach his speech Thursday from the perspective of a major, would-be U.S. leader, rather than a lawmaker, according to his spokesman.

In four points, he'll outline how and when he would advocate for the use of force if the U.S. or U.S. interests are threatened, and he'll underscore his widely-known position that a U.S. president should seek authorization from Congress before taking military action.

He's also set to talk at length about maintaining diplomatic relationships abroad, as well as discuss his views on sanctions—a topic he has not thoroughly elaborated on in the past.

And finally, he'll reiterate a stance he has consistently taken--that the country's debt is one of its biggest national security threats.

The first-term senator will disparage President Obama's handling of international affairs in his speech—not unfamiliar territory for Paul, who has repeatedly slammed the president for not coming to Congress before using force abroad.

It's also expected that Paul will take aim at former Secretary of State Hillary Clinton, a frequent target of his in speeches on the campaign and fundraising trail, especially when it comes to the 2012 terrorist attack against the U.S. compound in Benghazi.

His speech comes as he attempts to further distance himself from the more libertarian views trumpeted by his father, three-time presidential candidate and former congressman Ron Paul.

This version of Total Mail Converter is not registered.

Elected with a wave of tea party support in 2010, Rand Paul has more sought to broaden his appeal to establishment Republicans and even Democrats as he eyes the presidency.

The attention has attracted finely tuned scrutiny to his views and past statements on foreign policy, as Paul has been known to break with his own party and lean towards staying out of foreign entanglements. (Last month he slammed hawkish lawmakers for being "barnacled enablers" that have "never met a war they didn't like.")

He was widely panned this year when he evolved in his opinion about the crisis in Ukraine, as well as the threat of ISIS in the Middle East, as both situations continued to worsen.

On ISIS, for example, he penned an opinion piece earlier this summer openly questioning the value of launching air strikes against militants in Iraq.

But not long after the beheading of American James Foley, Paul became supportive of a U.S.-lead air campaign against the terrorist organization—a change that critics made sure to highlight as a massive flip-flop but what Paul reluctantly admitted as a change in views based on the situation at hand, the "realist" side of his worldview.

Huffington Post: Paul Krugman: How About A Clinton-Warren Ticket Instead Of A Matchup?

By Amber Ferguson

October 22, 2014 7:08 p.m. EDT

Nobel Prize-winning New York Times columnist Paul Krugman has an interesting vision of the 2016 Democratic presidential ticket: Hillary Clinton for president and Sen. Elizabeth Warren “looking over her shoulder so she doesn't stray too far."

Speaking on HuffPost Live Wednesday about Clinton’s domestic policy, Krugman said, “When she talks now, she sounds substantially to the left of the old Hillary Clinton.”

“If she becomes president and then turns ... [and] runs back to the right, that’s going to be a problem. ... I guess part of one's hope, if she becomes president, [is that] she will in fact feel some need to avoid alienating the Democratic wing of the Democratic Party, which is for all practical purposes led by Elizabeth Warren right now,” Krugman said.

As for a presidential bid from the Democratic senator from Massachusetts, he said it “would be an interesting thing” but predicted it would be unsuccessful.

Warren has pushed back on rumors that she might go for the White House, telling ABC’s David Muir in April that she's "not running for president" but thinks "Hillary Clinton is terrific."

This version of Total Mail Converter is not registered.

Watch the full interview here .

Associated Press, via The Fresno Bee: Clinton renews ties in state she lost in '08

[No author mentioned]

October 23, 2014

ST. PAUL, MINN. — Hillary Rodham Clinton is on her way to Minnesota to give a late boost to Democrats on this fall's ballot and renew ties that could help her in a possible presidential bid.

The former U.S. secretary of state, senator and first lady was headlining a rally Thursday at Macalester College and later holding a fundraiser for Democratic Gov. Mark Dayton.

Her appearance was geared toward energizing voters about to decide the re-election fates of Dayton and first-term Democratic Sen. Al Franken.

Dayton was a vocal Clinton backer when she sought the party's presidential nomination in 2008 and says he'd be in her corner if she runs in 2016. In the prior campaign, Clinton lost Minnesota's caucuses to now-President Barack Obama.

MLive: Bill Clinton targets Koch brothers, lauds Democrats' 'great experiment' in Flint speech

By Gary Ridley

October 22, 2014 5:00 p.m. EDT

FLINT, MI -- The Koch brothers and out-of-state interest groups were in the crosshairs of former President Bill Clinton as he stopped in downtown Flint to stump for Democratic candidates.

"When someone who is trying to sell you something has a strategy designed to stop you from thinking, they don't have your best interest at heart," Clinton said Wednesday, Oct. 22, during a roughly 30-minute speech at the Riverfront Banquet Center.

This version of Total Mail Converter is not registered.

Clinton accused the Kochs and other interest groups of pumping millions of dollars in negative ads into Michigan to drive a wedge into the electorate and stop voters from thinking for themselves.

"Wherever people treat each other right, wherever they recognize their special individuality but embrace our common humanity, wherever people have open and honest disagreements for the purpose of reaching the best decision and they work together, good things are happening," Clinton said.

Clinton was in Flint to campaign for Democratic candidates in the upcoming November election, particularly gubernatorial candidate Mark Schauer and U.S. Senate candidate Gary Peters. Peters and Schauer shared the stage with Clinton during his speech.

U.S. Rep. Dan Kildee, D-Flint Township, who hosted the event, and Vanessa Guerra, Democratic candidate for the state's 95th District House seat, also shared the stage with Clinton.

Democratic Party leaders have been vocal about rallying voters to the polls for the Nov. 4 election and Wednesday'sspeech was the most recent in a series of events aimed to increase voter turnout.

Clinton, who has made multiple other campaign stops around the country this election season, called his party's drive to recruit more voters to the polls a "great experiment."

Michigan Democratic Party Chairman Lon Johnson has implemented methods used by the successful President Barack Obama campaigns of 2008 and 2012 to try and draw out Democratic voters, but Republicans -- whose candidates tend to perform better in mid-term elections -- have countered by using technology to try to connect with more voters.

A recent poll shows Schauer trailing Republican Gov. Rick Snyder by eight points, but Schauer supporters told MLive the numbers were "dead wrong." Recent polls show Peters has opened a double-digit lead over Republican challenger Terri Lynn Land.

"I'm not happy about what's going on in this campaign and I see what's going on in Washington and all this gridlock and all this crazy stuff and I think, 'I know why that happened,'" Clinton said. "It happened because a different America shows up in the mid-term elections than shows up in the presidential elections."

Clinton said his message could also be beneficial to his Republican counterparts.

"If I'm right it would be good for our Republican friends, too, because we don't need a one-party country," Clinton said. "We need an ongoing debate and they would not be able to be taken over by their extremists and say all these kind of crazy things that are going on."

A long line of other prominent Democratic lawmakers and candidates, including current U.S. Sens. Debbie Stabenow and Carl Levin, echoed Clinton's claims as they took the stage.

Stabenow also took the opportunity to make what appeared to be a plug for a 2016 presidential run by Clinton's wife, former Secretary of State Hillary Clinton.

This version of Total Mail Converter is not registered.

"I kind of like the sound of another Clinton presidency," Stabenow said to a chorus of cheers.

Roughly 1,000 people were expected to attend the speech and Clinton spoke to a conference room full of mostly partisan supporters.

"I thought that it was great," Ron Panter said of Clinton's speech.

Panter, of Flushing, said he is a typical Democratic voter but respected Clinton's message of politicians working together in Washington.

However, Genesee County's Republican leadership said Clinton's message isn't what the hard-hit Flint and Genesee County community needs.

"I noticed everyone in the MLive pictures online are standing line to get into this event look like they're really dressed nice and haven't been hurt by this failing economy; unlike if you go a couple blocks over to the rest of Flint where our residents are suffering greatly," said Tammy Allen, chairwoman of the Genesee County GOP.

"Bill Clinton used his star power to steady Obama's re-election in 2012 when he was losing to Mitt Romney," Allen added. "Clinton said then, that Obama had four years and needed another four to turn things around. Clinton was wrong then -- and he's wrong now."

National Journal: Elizabeth Warren, Then: 'I Am Not Running For President.' Now: 'I Don't Think So.'On the delicate parsing of campaign speech.

By Emma Roller

October 23, 2014

[Subtitle:]On the delicate parsing of campaign speech.

Trying to read into politicians' language is often an exercise in futility—like trying to divine postmodern critical theory from Amelia Bedelia.

But in a new interview with People, Sen. Elizabeth Warren openly shifted her tone when asked about her presidential ambitions.

For the past year (at least), Warren has repeated the same line to every reporter who asked about any larger ambitions she might have: "I am not running for president."

This version of Total Mail Converter is not registered.

"No, I am not running for president," Warren told Katie Couric in September. "It is absolutely critical right now that we focus on the 2014 elections."

Now, however, she's injecting more room for change into her response.

"I don't think so," she told People when asked if she's interested in running. "If there's any lesson I've learned in the last five years, it's don't be so sure about what lies ahead. There are amazing doors that could open."

Some political groups, like Ready For Warren, are already set to throw those doors open and embrace her, no matter how hesitant Warren may be to walk through them.

2016 forecasters are already projecting Warren could be a more progressive alternative to Hillary Clinton in the Democratic primaries. The People interview, which doesn't go online in full until Friday, also gives a brief window into the relationship between the two women. "We have talked," Warren told the magazine. "It's not much more than that. Not much more."

It's not the first time Warren has suggested some distance with Clinton. In her interview with Couric in September, Warren was asked if she thinks Clinton is "too cozy" with Wall Street. "I worry a lot about the relationship between all of them—regulators, government, and Wall Street," Warren said. Asked about Clinton, again, specifically, Warren said, "Well, I worry across the board."

And both Warren and Clinton have upped their national profiles in recent months. Warren, like Clinton, has become a regular campaign surrogate in 2014—though Clinton didn't start campaigning in earnest until after Labor Day.

For now, both women are content to campaign for other Democrats.

USA Today: The model for 'Madam Secretary?' It's not Hillary

By Susan Page

October 22, 2014 3:22 p.m. EDT

BROOKLYN, N.Y. — Téa Leoni had a model in mind when she shaped the role of Secretary of State Elizabeth McCord in the new CBS series Madam Secretary.

It wasn't Hillary Rodham Clinton.

This version of Total Mail Converter is not registered.

"Truthfully, I didn't really go for a politician," Leoni says. "Elizabeth McCord is not a lifetime politician and not ambitious. I think more about the women, particularly the women who raised me — my grandmother and my mother. They were much more influential. But no one in my family has blond hair, so I'll give that one to Hillary."

In an interview with USA TODAY, Leoni and co-star Tim Daly say the story of a woman raising children, nurturing her marriage and negotiating the workplace makes the show "relatable" to viewers, even if her workday happens to include winning the release of American hostages and saving nuclear negotiations with Iran. "Her circumstance may be larger, a more powerful job, whatever, but this is still a working mother," she says.

Daly says his character — husband and religion professor Henry McCord — could be "an even more influential role model than the character of Elizabeth, because I think it's time that men kind of embrace and get over the fact that they're going to be married to women who are powerful or make more money or who have more notoriety. ...

"They ought to have enough confidence to be able to say, 'Go, honey, this is awesome,' and not be threatened by the fact that their spouse is doing it."

Like Bill Clinton does in all-but-openly urging his wife to run for president in 2016?

"Yes," he says.

To which Leoni interjects, "You did not model yourself on Bill Clinton."

"Oh, no," he agrees with a drawl.

Leoni and Daly sat down with Capital Download, a weekly video newsmaker series, on the set of the Brooklyn studio where the series is filmed. During a break in the filming of episode 11, they plop in leather-like chairs around a long table in the faux White House Situation Room, a presidential seal on the wall behind them.

She picks up the microphone wires draped on the chair and holds them up to her chest as though they were attached to a defibrillator. "Clear! Clear!" she shouts to no one in particular.

When Daly struggles to get his microphone threaded underneath his navy sweater and attached to the collar, she takes over. "This is not a guy thing," she declares. "I don't mean to be sexist, but it's not."

Leoni says she likes playing "a fish out of water" — that is, not exactly a secretary of State in the mold of Henry Kissinger or Colin Powell. "There's a fantasy aspect to these roles, the idea of coming into one of the most powerful positions on Earth and having a go at it, with thinking outside the box and not going maybe the way it's traditionally meant to be done."

It is, she adds, a job that suits a women's strengths. "I do think as women we could be lauded a little bit more strongly for our inherent diplomatic skills."

Besides their acting careers, both Leoni and Daly have a history of engagement in public affairs. Daly is president of the Creative Coalition, an arts advocacy group. Leoni's grandmother, Helenka Pantaleoni, served as president of the UNICEF U.S. Fund for decades; Leoni now sits on the group's board of directors.

This version of Total Mail Converter is not registered.

And they're not oblivious to the draw of D.C: They've already accepted invitations for next spring's White House Correspondents Association Dinner from CBS News veteran Bob Schieffer ("I have a real crush happening there," she says of the host of Face the Nation) and Madeleine Albright. Who really was secretary of State.

Calendar:

Sec. Clinton's upcoming appearances as reported online. Not an official schedule.

· October 23 – MN: Sec. Clinton fundraises for Gov. Mark Dayton (AP)

· October 23 – MN: Sec. Clinton campaigns for Gov. Mark Dayton (Star-Tribune)

· October 24 – RI: Sec. Clinton campaigns for Rhode Island gubernatorial candidate Gina Raimondo (Politico)

· October 24 – Mass.: Sec. Clinton campaigns for Mass. gubernatorial candidate Martha Coakley (CNN)

· October 24 – NE: Sec. Clinton campaigns for ME gubernatorial candidate Mike Michaud (PressHerald)

· October 25 – NC: Sec. Clinton campaigns for Sen. Kay Hagan (AP)

· October 29 – IA: Sec. Clinton campaigns for Iowa Democrats (CNN)

· October 30 – Washington, DC: Sec. Clinton speaks at the launch of The International Council on Women's Business Leadership (CNN)

· November 2 – NH: Sec. Clinton appears at a GOTV rally for Gov. Hassan and Sen. Shaheen (AP)

· December 1 – New York, NY: Sec. Clinton keynotes a League of Conservation Voters dinner (Politico)

· December 4 – Boston, MA: Sec. Clinton speaks at the Massachusetts Conference for Women (MCFW)

This version of Total Mail Converter is not registered.

From: theSkimm <dailyskimm@morning7.theskimm.com>
To: john.podesta@gmail.com
Date: 3/20/2016 9:44:03 PM
Subject: Daily Skimm: Sprung

Is this email not displaying correctly? View it in your browser.

theSkimm

Skimm for March 21st

Skimm'd while cleaning out closets

QUOTE OF THE DAY

"I am beginning a new journey, on Instagram" - Pope Francis , intro'ing his new Insta account and announcing he did not give up social media for Lent. #Blessed.

SKIMM THIS

'LL HAVE THE CUBAN

THE STORY

Yesterday, President Obama landed in Cuba , kicking off a spring break trip that no sitting US president has taken in 88 years.

BACK UP.

The US has been giving Cuba the cold shoulder since the late 50s due to things like a Communist revolution, a missile crisis, and a president named Castro. The US responded in the early 60s by cutting off all diplomatic relations with Cuba, and putting the country under a full embargo (think: no trade, no travel, no importing Cuban cigars for dad).

WHAT'S HAPPENING NOW?

In late 2014, after a little push from Pope Francis, Obama announced that the US and Cuba were having relations again. Diplomatic relations . Cue the US reopening its embassy in Cuba and easing up on travel restrictions — and crossing its fingers that the rest of Latin America noticed. Some are hoping this trip could be the diplomatic push the US needs to end the embargo. Problem is, the GOP-controlled Congress has to sign off on that. And many Republicans don't think Cuba's changed its ways. It doesn't help that older Cuban-Americans (a VIP group of voters) are mostly against lifting the embargo. And in case you missed it, it's an election year.

theSKIMM

This trip is a BFD for Cuba, which is hoping that having relations with the US will help boost the country's tired economy. And this trip is Obama's way of reminding Congress that he thinks the embargo's gone out of style. By about fifty years.

THE *: Can't get enough of Obama Havana good time? We got you covered.

This version of Total Mail Converter is not registered.

SKIMM THIS

REPEAT AFTER ME...

WHAT PEOPLE ARE TALKING ABOUT...

Salah Abdeslam. On Friday, police in Brussels captured the top suspect in the Paris terror attacks. Officials say 26-year-old Abdeslam was the guy in charge of logistics for the November attacks that left 130 people dead. He is thought to be the only surviving suspect. He's also thought to have a lot of good intel on ISIS, which claimed responsibility for the attack. And Abdeslam's been pretty chatty in captivity. He told investigators that he's been planning more attacks from Brussels, and has had access to lots of weapons. Meanwhile, Belgian's foreign minister said the country's captured dozens of others involved in planning the attacks, but believes more are out there. He called on European countries to be especially careful with their border checks, since Abdeslam's capture might give his terrorist friends a reason to run. Next, France is aiming to bring him back into the country to face trial.

WHAT PEOPLE ARE WATCHING...

Russia. Over the weekend, a FlyDubai passenger plane crashed while trying to land in a southern Russian city. All 62 people onboard were killed. The plane was making its second landing attempt in bad weather when it crashed short of the runway and burst into flames. The plane reportedly circled above the airport for about two hours before trying to land. Investigators say it's still too early to tell what exactly caused the crash, but they're looking at pilot error, technical issues, or strong winds. Both black boxes have been recovered and are being analyzed in Moscow.

SKIMM THIS

WHAT TO SAY WHILE WAITING FOR TODAY'S APPLE EVENT...

It's like watching paint dry. Yesterday, paint giant Sherwin-Williams agreed to buy rival Valspar for a casual $9.3 billion. Sherwin-Williams has long been one of the top dogs of the paint market in the US and Canada. But now, if this deal goes through, homeowners in places like China and Australia can debate the pros and cons of Porpoise vs. Parakeet for the new porch. Both companies took home a combined $15 billion last year. Paint everybody else impressed.

SKIMM THIS

WHAT TO SAY WHEN YOU DROP YOUR FAVORITE COFFEE MUG...

Busted. Just like your March Madness bracket . Thank Middle Tennessee State, Little Rock, and Wichita State.

SKIMM THIS

ONE THING TO KNOW

Eaglet: A baby eagle. Over the weekend, bald eagles named Mr. President and the First Lady became parents to two eaglets. More than a million people watched the livestream. If you don't find them adorable, you don't love freedom.

SKIMM THIS

SKIMM SHARE

Start off your week right by sharing theSkimm.

Share That Sh*t

This version of Total Mail Converter is not registered.

SKIMM BIRTHDAYS

*indicates Skimm'bassador. Pour it up, pour it up.

*Satya Patel (San Francisco, CA); William Danilow (New York, NY); *Michelle Peleg (San Francisco, CA); *Dayne Wahl (Providence, RI); *Allie Hamilton (Columbus, OH); *Liz Ellis (St. Louis, MO); *Kelsey Hendricks (Portland, OR); *Meghan Hrinkevich (Westfield, NJ); *Brittney Lifsey (Charlotte, NC); *Emily Trofholz (Chicago, IL); *Miriam Andrusier (Brooklyn, NY); *Marcy Kaplan (Dix Hills, NY); *Sarah McCliment (Blacksburg, VA); *Alee Bevilacqua (Dunmore, PA); *Ami Sawhney (St. Louis, MO); *Heather Stebenne (Taunton, MA); *Jeff Wagner (Indianapolis, IN); *Jenn Grimmer (Chicago, IL); *Julia Huang (Hinsdale, IL); *Roxanne Demarest (Columbus, OH); *Sara Seyedroudbari (Philadelphia, PA); *Sarah Smith (Memphis, TN); *Colleen Cecil (Chico, CA); *Sheila Garcia (Miami, FL); *Cara Creger (Atlanta, GA); *Evie Cannell (New York, NY); *Alicia Urquhart (Washington, DC); *Hannah Schoechert (Woodruff, WI); *Richard Hastings (Tucson, AZ); *Jessica Faye Arbogast (Atlanta, GA); *Carrie DiGregorio (New Orleans, LA); *Hannah Billings (Virginia Beach, VA); *Kayla Shkreli (Hopkinton, MA); *Mandy Stewart (New Braunfels, TX); *Rosie Jahng (Holland, MI); *Sara Nicholson (Seattle, WA); *Lauren Pernal (South Brunswick, NJ); Bill Glenn (Katonah, NY); Elizabeth Kern (Philadelphia, PA); Shara Grossman (Somerset, MA); Claire Stern (New York, NY); Katie Flynn (Boston, MA); Henry Cashin (New York, NY); Ali Cumings (State College, PA); Allie Southard (New York, NY); Jennifer Goldberg (Washington, DC); Danielle Caruso (Mexico City, Mexico); Caroline Paris (New York, NY); Kate Fergusson (Los Angeles, CA); Caroline Sollmann (New York, NY); Kaley Bell (Nashville, TN); Blair McBride (Austin, TX); CA Tolchinsky (Fort Lauderdale, FL); Dana Diment (Carrollton, GA); Hannah Bruce (Bloomington, IN); Darlene White (San Diego, CA); Andrew Butash (New York, NY); James Southerton (Mifflinburg, PA); Luna Zemmol (New York, NY); Rachel Shapiro (Boston, MA); Reda Hicks (Houston, TX); Theresa Peot(Riverbank, CA); Torrey Barrett (San Francisco, CA); Marie Strycharz (New York, NY); Christy Mclellan (Lakeland, FL); Judi Lang (Columbus, OH); Barb Ulrich (Largo, FL);Mary Mallaney (San Francisco, CA); Maya Shimony (Washington, DC); Patricko Droho (New York, NY); Tarah Hirschey (Wellesley, MA); Brynne Becker (Philadelphia, PA); Chloe Schockling (Greenville, SC); Dolores Barrock (Milwaukee , WI); Devon Rudberg (New York, NY); Angela VanMoorsel (Stamford, CT); Alexis Carscadden(Chicago, IL); Brexton Pham (Stanford, CA); Jared Brandman (New York, NY); Jill Fawbush (Minneapolis, MN); Joeann Fossland (Tucson, AZ); Kayla Shkreli(Hopkinton, MA); Louise Vabderlpi (Delray Beach FL); Mallory Meiser (Berkeley, CA);Melanie Drouhard (Knoxville, TN); Nancy McConnell (Overland Park, KS); Rachel Fillman (Seattle, WA); Sally Good (Greenville, SC); Samantha Bristow Hills (Sydney, Australia); Sharon Carty (Dexter, MI); Victoria Robinson (New York, NY); Hannah Higgin (Blairstown, NJ); Treslyn Roberts (Centennial, CO); Mahnoor Ulhaq (Vacoas, MAU); Victoria Lang (Saint Louis, MO); Stacey Pacino (New York, NY); Stephanie Luetters (Atlanta, GA); Alexis Bennett (Edina, MN); Garrett Lepaw (New York, NY)

Skimm'd something we missed?

Email SkimmThis@theSkimm.com • Read in browser »

SHARE & FOLLOW US

FACEBOOK TWITTER TUMBLR INSTAGRAM PINTEREST

This version of Total Mail Converter is not registered.

Copyright © 2016 theSkimm, All rights reserved.

Our mailing address is:

theSkimm Inc.

584 Broadway, Ste. 409

New York, NY, 10012, United States

Update Profile

Unsubscribe

This version of Total Mail Converter is not registered.

From:	"Alexandria Phillips" <aphillips@hillaryclinton.com>
To:	"Alexandria Phillips" <aphillips@hillaryclinton.com>
Date:	7/12/2015 1:11:14 AM
Subject:	H4A News Clips 7.12.15
Attachments:	7.12.15 H4A News Clips.docx

H4A News Clips

July 12, 2015

TODAY'S KEY STORIES..... 4

Hillary Clinton Picks Up Teachers Union Endorsement // NYT // Maggie Haberman & Amy Chozick – July 11, 2015 4

Clinton pushes middle class income boost // AP // Ken Thomas - July 12, 2015..... 6

Clinton to center campaign on raising middle-class incomes // WaPo // Philip Rucker and Jim Tankersley – July 11, 2015 8

SOCIAL MEDIA..... 10

Ken Thomas (6/11/15, 4:41 pm) - Hillary Clinton wins the endorsement of @AFTunion. It's the 1st major union to endorse in 2016 campaign..... 10

Jeb Bush (7/11/15, 6:32 pm) - .@HillaryClinton can stand with @AFTunion. I'm standing with the kids. #edreform nypost.com/2015/06/23/sch 11

HRC NATIONAL COVERAGE..... 11

The Best Way to Vilify Hillary Clinton? G.O.P. Spends Heavily to Test It // NYT // Ashley Parker & Amy Chozick – July 11, 2015..... 11

Shaping a Campaign Against Hillary Clinton // NYT // Ashley Parker – July 11, 2015..... 15

Hillary Clinton Economic Plan to Chart Center-Left Course // WSJ // Laura Meckler - July 12, 2015 17

Teachers union endorses Hillary Clinton in Democratic race // WaPo // Lyndsey Layton – July 11, 2015 19

Hillary Clinton Gets Endorsement From Teachers Union for Her Presidential Bid // AP // Dave Urbanski – July 11, 2015 20

Can Hillary Clinton lead the Key stone army? // Politico // Elana Schor – July 11, 2015 20

American Federation of Teachers endorses Hillary Clinton for president // Politico // Nirvi Shah – July 11, 2015 24

Clinton gets key union endorsement as riv al enjoys a groundswell of support // Reuters // Amanda Becker – July 11, 2015 25

Clinton to pledge to close carried interest tax loophole: adviser // Reuters – July 11, 2015..... 26

American Federation of Teachers Endorses Hillary Clinton // HuffPo // Dave Jamieson – July 11, 2015 26

Major teachers union endorses Hillary Clinton // CNN // Cassie Spodak – July 11, 2015..... 27

American Federation of Teachers endorses Hillary Clinton // MSNBC // David Taintor – July 11, 2015 28

American Federation of Teachers Endorses Hillary Clinton For President // ABC News // Luz Kreutz – July 11, 2015 29

Hillary Clinton Wins Key Endorsement From American Federation of Teachers // TIME // Sam Frizell – July 11, 2015 30

Clinton to deliver major economic speech in New York Monday // The Hill // Alex Bolton – July 11, 2015 31

Clinton wins major labor endorsement // The Hill // Alexander Bolton – July 11, 2015..... 31

Sunday shows preview: Hillary speaks // The Hill // Mark Hensch – July 11, 2015..... 32

This version of Total Mail Converter is not registered.

Memo to Hillary: 'You're Still the Problem' // The National Review // Ron Fournier – July 11, 2015 34

Hillary Clinton's Economic Agenda To Focus On Boosting Middle Class Income: Reports // IB Times // Mark Hanrahan - July 12 2015..... 37

Clinton campaign draws in a host of new donors // The Boston Globe // Annie Linskey – July 11, 2015 37

Hillary Clinton, a Woman of Her Words // RealClearPolitics // Carl M. Cannon - July 12, 2015 . 40

Clinton to deliver economic speech Monday, with tax policy at issue // Fox News – July 11, 2015 42

Union Leaders Will Finally Hav e Their Day With Hillary // The Daily Caller // Connor Wolf – July 11, 2015 44

Hillary Clinton Hammers Local Officials Over Immigration // Breitbart // Javier Manjarres – July 11, 2015 45

Hillary Clinton Will Center Economic Proposals on Increasing Middle-Class Income // Slate // Daniel Politi – July 11, 2015 46

Clinton plans Cedar Rapids party Friday // The Des Moines Register // Tony Leys – July 11, 2015 46

OTHER DEMOCRATS NATIONAL COVERAGE..... 47

DECLARED..... 47

O'MALLEY..... 47

SANDERS..... 47

Class or Ideology? My Conv ersation With Bernie Sanders // NYT // Nate Cohn – July 9, 2015... 47

Sanders Courts Martha's Vineyard Donors // NYT // Jonathan Martin – July 11, 2015..... 49

Anthony Weiner Isn't Buying Bernie Sanders' Presidential Bid // HuffPo // Ashley Alman – July 11, 2015 50

Sanders draws early support for White House bid from long-time union allies // Fox News – July 11, 2015 51

Bernie Sanders picking up steam in early primary states, could give Hillary Clinton a scare // NY Daily News // Cameron Joseph – July 11, 2015..... 53

Weiner: Sanders 'needs to explain' why he's running as a Democrat // The Hill // Mark Hensch – July 11, 2015 55

Bernie Sanders becoming a problem for Hillary ; tramples all over her talking points // Biz Pac Review //Tom Tillison – July 11, 2015..... 56

UNDECLARED..... 57

OTHER..... 57

Dem senators call for executive action on gun control // The Hill // Alex Bolton – July 11, 2015 57

GOP..... 58

DECLARED..... 58

BUSH..... 58

Jeb and the Nation of Takers // NYT // Paul Krugman – July 11, 2015..... 58

Jeb bests Hillary in American worker tweet-off // CNBC // Larry Kudlow – July 11, 2015..... 59

Sununu: Jeb Bush is 'less forgiving of slights' than his father // Yahoo News // Jon Ward – July 11, 2015 61

Jeb Bush's mind-blowing fundraising haul in one chart // Business Insider // Brett Logiurato – July 11, 2015 64

RUBIO..... 65

With no clear base of support, Marco Rubio gambles on a broad approach // WaPo // Sean Sullivan – July 11, 2015 65

Rubio revisits childhood in Vegas, calls Putin a criminal // AP // Kimberly Pierceall – July 11, 2015 67

Rubio Focuses On Cuban Immigrant Upbringing In Vegas Talks // AP – July 11, 2015..... 68

This version of Total Mail Converter is not registered.

Rubio starts winning over voters — in Spanish // The Washington Times // Kellan Howell – July 11, 2015 68

Marco Rubio would ban abortion if elected, compares it to slavery // The Examiner – July 11, 2015 69

PAUL..... 70

Paul raises $7 million for White House run // The Hill // Alexander Bolton – July 11, 2015..... 70

CRUZ..... 70

The New York Times say s Ted Cruz's book has high sales because of 'strategic bulk purchases' // Reuters – July 11, 2015 70

Cruz demands NY Times apologize for ‘lying’ about ‘A Time for Truth’ sales // Washington Times // Kellan Howell – July 11, 2015..... 71

Ted Cruz fights back: Campaign calls on ‘lying’ NY Times to release ev idence of bulk book sales // BizPac // Michael Dorstewitz – July 11, 2015..... 72

CHRISTIE..... 72

Reuters: Christie Now Third in Poll // Newsmax // Sandy Fitzgerald – July 11, 2015..... 73

PERRY..... 74

Rick Perry tells crowd it's a 'show me, don't tell me' election // The Des Moines Register // Maya Kliger – July 11, 2015 74

Rick Perry is Running for President — Here is What He Has Raised so Far in 2015 // IJ Review // Meagan Vazquez – July 11, 2015..... 75

GRAHAM..... 75

Lindsey Graham Speaks Against Clinton and Trump Over Immigration // Latin Post // Roberto Ontiveros – July 11, 2015 75

SANTORUM..... 76

Santorum: I’ll Use Immigration To Go For Workers’ Votes // Breitbart // Ian Hanchett – July 11, 2015 76

CARSON..... 77

Clinton Foundation donor-owned Politico publishes hit piece on Dr. Ben Carson // Breitbart // Michael Patrick Leahy – July 11, 2015..... 77

Carson: Illegal immigrants should become guest workers if they register, pay taxes and back taxes // Breitbart – Ian Hanchett – July 11, 2015..... 79

Ben Carson on Donald Trump as a Running Mate: Anything Is Possible // Mediaite // Ken Meyer – July 11, 2015 80

JINDAL..... 81

Producers Plan Rock Opera Based on Exorcism Bobby Jindal Witnessed in College // Bloomberg News // Ben Brody – July 11, 2015..... 81

Jindal calls for end to direct ag subsidies, RFS // The Des Moines Register // Linh Ta – July 11, 2015 81

TRUMP..... 83

Donald Trump Defiantly Rallies a New ‘Silent Majority’ in a Visit to Arizona // NYT // Nick Fandos – July 11, 2015 83

Trump tells supporters, ‘We have to take back the heart of our country’ // WaPo // Philip Rucker & Robert Costa - July 11, 2015..... 85

Donald Trump won’t stop talking about immigration. Next up: Rallying 9,000 in Phoenix. // WaPo // Philip Rucker & Robert Costa – July 11, 2015..... 88

Donald Trump Antes Up On Immigration Stance In Las Vegas // AP – July 11, 2015..... 90

Trump: Mexico's 'Killing Us' at Border and on Trade // AP // Bob Christie & Kim Piercell – July 11, 2015 90

Donald Trump storms Phoenix // Politico // Ben Schreckinger – July 11, 2015..... 92

Trump draws thousands in Phoenix, continues immigration theme // CNN // MJ Lee – July 11, 2015 95

This version of Total Mail Converter is not registered.

Trump on Jeb Bush: "I don't see him as a factor" // CBS News // Reena Flores – July 11, 2015.. 98

Trump wins hearts of some, scorn from others in Ariz. // USA Today // Yvonne Wingett Sanchez – July 11, 2015 99

'I'm, like, a really smart person': Donald Trump exults in outsider status // The Guardian // Rory Carroll – July 12, 2015 102

Donald Trump expects 9,000 people at his immigration rally in Arizona // VOX // Dara Lind – July 11, 2015 104

Here's what Donald Trump supporters believe, according to their emails to me // VOX // Andrew Prokop – July 11, 2015 105

Donald Trump Outdoes Himself In Defiant Phoenix Speech // TIME // Zeke Miller – July 11, 2015 106

Trump basks in adulation at Arizona immigration rally // The Hill // Mark Hensch – July 11, 2015 108

Donald Trump meets with families of Americans killed by illegal aliens // Brietbart // Michelle Moons – July 11, 2015 110

Love him or hate him, Donald Trump could 'create chaos' for GOP in 2016, experts predict // NY Daily News // Celeste Katz – July 11, 2015 111

Jeb Bush Beware: Trump's Know Nothing Populism Is A Hit With Conservatives In Phoenix // Politicus // Keith Brekhus – July 11, 2015 113

UNDECLARED..... 114

WALKER..... 114

Scott Walker Works to Gain Credibility as Official Campaign Begins // NYT // Patrick Healy - July 12, 2015 114

Scott Walker's primary strategy: Motorcycles, barbecue and a Winnebago // WaPo // Jenna Johnson – July 11, 2015 117

Scott Walker tweet said he's running, but who posted it? // AP – July 11, 2016..... 118

Twitter Accidentally Made Scott Walker a Presidential Candidate Ahead of Schedule // ABC News // Jordyn Phelps – July 11, 2015..... 119

Could union-busting Scott Walker be the next president? // BBC // Gary O'Donoghue – July 11, 2015 119

OTHER..... 122

GOP primary candidates compete for anti-abortion vote // AP // Bill Barrow – July 11, 2015.. 122

White House contenders Trump, Bush in virtual dead heat: Reuters/Ipsos poll // Reuters // Will Dunham – July 11, 2015 124

Senate Republicans push to punish 'sanctuary cities' // The Hill //Jordan Carney – July 11, 2015 125

Poll: Jeb, Trump in virtual tie // The Hill // Mark Hensch – July 11, 2015 128

Donald Trump continues to rise in recent GOP poll, now almost even with Jeb Bush; Chris Christie polls third // NY Daily News // Denis Slattery – July 11, 2015..... 129

OTHER 2016 NEWS..... 130

OPINIONS/EDITORIALS/BLOGS..... 130

Power of the Pocketbook: Women Gaining Influence As Campaign Donors // NPR // Lauren Leatherby - July 12, 2015 130

MISCELLANEOUS ADDED BY STAFF..... 132

TOP NEWS..... 132

DOMESTIC..... 132

Obamacare Flexes Muscles With New Medicare Payment Plans // NYT // Margot Sanger-Katz – July 11, 2015 132

Voting Rights Legacy of the '60s Heads to Court as North Carolina Law Is Tested // NYT // Erik Eckholm – July 11, 2015 133

INTERNATIONAL..... 136

This version of Total Mail Converter is not registered.

Meeting on Greece Debt Breaks Up With No Deal // NYT // James Kanter – July 11, 2015..... 137

Iran Leader Ayatollah Ali Khamenei Calls U.S. 'Embodiment of Arrogance' // WSJ // Asa Fitch & Jay Solomon – July 11, 2015 140

Monday Deadline Looms For Iran Nuclear Talks // AP // Matthew Lee & George Jahn – July 11, 2015 141

TODAY'S KEY STORIES

Hillary Clinton Picks Up Teachers Union Endorsement // NYT // Maggie Haberman & Amy Chozick – July 11, 2015

A major teachers union on Saturday voted to make an early endorsement of Hillary Rodham Clinton, a lift to her presidential campaign as she tries to fend off a stronger-than-expected challenge from the left.

The endorsement from the American Federation of Teachers was not a surprise. The group is led by Randi Weingarten, a longtime ally of Mrs. Clinton, and it backed her in her losing primary battle against Barack Obama in 2008.

But the union is giving her its support again at an opportune moment for Mrs. Clinton, just before her first major speech on the economy, scheduled for Monday, which is seen as an attempt, in part, to neutralize the criticism leveled at her by her leading challenger, Senator Bernie Sanders of Vermont. Mr. Sanders has surged in the polls by appealing to the populist anger of many Democrats over economic issues.

Education policy remains one of the few areas of unsettled debate within the Democratic Party. President Obama's education agenda has often infuriated the teachers unions, and last year, the head of the National Education Association, another union representing teachers, called for the secretary of education, Arne Duncan, to be fired.

Advocates of changes to the system, including some major Democratic donors, consider Mr. Obama an ally and have been pressuring Mrs. Clinton to adopt Mr. Obama's posture. But in meetings with the A.F.T. last month, Mrs. Clinton said that teachers shouldn't be the "scapegoat" for society's ills.

After that meeting — members also heard from Mr. Sanders and Martin O'Malley, the former Maryland governor — Ms. Weingarten praised Mrs. Clinton's performance and detailed responses to members' concerns.

The timing of the endorsement risks angering other union leaders, particularly Richard Trumka, the president of the A.F.L.-C.I.O. Mr. Trumka has called on Mrs. Clinton to embrace labor's economic agenda, and has been privately urging individual unions to hold off any endorsements.

But in an interview, Ms. Weingarten said the membership overwhelmingly supported Mrs. Clinton, something which became clear in two town halls and in two separate member polls the group took in the last six weeks.

As a senator, Ms. Weingarten said, Mrs. Clinton was given a 100 percent rating from the teachers union on her voting record. She said she had repeatedly heard from the union's members that they believed Mrs. Clinton would "make the country a fairer place for working people."

This version of Total Mail Converter is not registered.

And Mrs. Clinton has deep ties to the teachers union, beyond the endorsement it made in her 2008 campaign. She worked frequently with Ms. Weingarten when Ms. Weingarten led the teachers union in New York City. In March, just before Mrs. Clinton made her candidacy official, she and Ms. Weingarten appeared together on a panel in Washington to discuss expanding opportunities in urban areas sponsored by the Center for American Progress, the liberal group that has advised the Clinton campaign as it settles on an economic framework.

In addition, former President Bill Clinton's chief of staff, Tina Flournoy, is a former A.F.T. official.

In addition to discussing women and family issues on Monday, Mrs. Clinton is expected to support Mr. Obama's plans to extend overtime pay to workers and strengthen collective bargaining. She will also emphasize policies that would help the largely female members of the A.F.T., including pushing for paid family leave and affordable childcare, according to aides.

Clinton pushes middle class income boost // AP // Ken Thomas - July 12, 2015

Hillary Rodham Clinton will make boosting middle class incomes and wages the focus of her economic agenda, pointing to stagnant paychecks as the central challenge facing the U.S. economy.

The Democratic presidential candidate intends to lay out the themes of her economic plan in a speech on Monday, emphasizing the need for the real income of everyday Americans to rise steadily alongside corporate profits and executive compensation.

While Republican candidate Jeb Bush has called for an annual growth rate of 4 percent, Clinton will assert that the nation's economy should not be judged by a specific growth figure but rather by how much income increases for middle-class households.

"For a typical working American, their income has not been rising anywhere near as fast as it should be rising, and that is the challenge we face," said David Kamin, a New York University law professor who has advised Clinton's campaign. "It's not a new problem, and it's going to take a holistic vision."

Clinton's campaign on Saturday provided a preview of her speech to be given at The New School, a university in New York City. The campaign said the Democratic front-runner will point to economic progress during her husband's two terms in the 1990s and more recently under President Barack Obama. But she will aim to identify ways of improving upon the uneven nature of the nation's recovery since the Great Recession, bolstering wages even as the unemployment rate has fallen to a seven-year low of 5.3 percent.

Clinton on Saturday picked up the endorsement of the American Federation of Teachers union, the first major labor union to endorse a presidential candidate. The union is led by Randi Weingarten, a longtime Clinton ally, and comes as Clinton has sought the support of labor leaders.

The former secretary of state is expected to begin outlining a series of specific economic proposals this summer on issues like wage growth, college affordability, corporate accountability and paid leave.

"It's a new moment, and she's bringing new ideas to the table of how to do that," said Neera Tanden, a former Clinton policy adviser who leads the Center for American Progress.

In Clinton's approach to the economy, more Americans would share in the prosperity and avoid the boom-and-bust cycles of Wall Street that have led to economic turbulence of the past decade. She is also expected to argue that the nation should not be fatalistic about globalization and that specific policy steps can help U.S. workers achieve better living standards.

This version of Total Mail Converter is not registered.

Clinton, who is seeking to become the nation's first female president, is also expected to address ways of making it easier for women to join the workforce.

In framing an economic vision, Clinton will attempt to meet the demands of liberals within her own party who are wary of her willingness to regulate Wall Street while inspiring confidence among a larger electorate who will judge her policies if she wins the Democratic nomination.

Progressives encouraged Elizabeth Warren to seek the presidency, but the Massachusetts senator, who has railed against Wall Street and corporate excesses, declined to run. Many of those same liberals are now packing large gatherings held by Vermont Sen. Bernie Sanders, who is challenging Clinton for the nomination and has made economic inequality the chief plank of his campaign.

Alan Blinder, a Princeton University economist and former economic adviser to President Bill Clinton, said the former first lady has expressed interest in policies to curb excessive risk on Wall Street, such as a financial transactions tax on high-frequency trading, taxes on large Wall Street banks based on their risk profile and eliminating the so-called carried interest loophole that allows managers of hedge funds and private equity firms to pay a lower tax rate than most individuals.

"I'm pretty sure that as the details come out you and others will judge them to be more anti-Wall Street than pro-Wall Street," Blinder said. "This is not going to look like an agenda that came out of a bunch of Wall Streeters."

Clinton has said she will take nothing for granted in the primary contest, but the economic message will allow her to begin contrasting herself with Republicans. In recent speeches, she has portrayed the Republican presidential field, including Bush, the former Florida governor, as supportive of "top-down" economic policies and large tax breaks for the wealthy.

"They're back to the trickle down, cut taxes on the wealthy and everything will be fine," Clinton said last week in Iowa. "This will be the biggest economic debate, because they know the only way they can win the White House back is to somehow convince voters that what we have done didn't work."

Clinton to center campaign on raising middle-class incomes // WaPo // Philip Rucker and Jim Tankersley – July 11, 2015

Centering her presidential campaign on boosting incomes for middle-class Americans, Hillary Rodham Clinton on Monday will begin unveiling an economic policy agenda designed to lift working families that have experienced years of wage stagnation and economic anxiety.

In a major address in New York, the Democratic front-runner will lay out a diagnosis for why wages have been stuck and a framework to ensure that economic growth benefits more ordinary workers, according to campaign officials.

"She believes that making sure the real incomes of everyday Americans are rising steadily and strongly is the defining economic challenge of our time," said one campaign official, who previewed Clinton's remarks only on the condition of anonymity.

This version of Total Mail Converter is not registered.

Clinton will endorse a host of popular Democratic policies such as raising the minimum wage and investing more in infrastructure. She will emphasize proposals tailored toward working women, one of her most important bases of support, such as expanding access to child care and providing workers with paid family and sick leave.

Hillary Rodham Clinton, pictured here campaigning in Iowa last week, will introduce a menu of economic policies tailored toward working women. (Jim Young/Reuters)

The ideas, in many ways, sound similar to the second-term agenda of President Obama, who faced an economic crisis in his first term and in his second started to more directly to address the nation's long-running economic problems. But he has struggled to pass major legislation with a Republican-dominated Congress.

Clinton will say she wants to build on his agenda, and, in working to craft an economic vision of her own, she goes further in her emphasis on giving women more flexibility to enter the workforce and on new government efforts to change the investment and pay decisions of corporations.

Clinton's speech, to be delivered at 10 a.m. Monday at the New School, a progressive university in Greenwich Village, will cement a leftward shift in the Democratic Party. In the aftermath of the Great Recession, concerns about the widening gap between rich and poor have risen to the top of the party's agenda.

Clinton is carving out space between the Republican candidates, who pay more attention to growing the economy than to raising wages, and her leading Democratic primary opponent, Sen. Bernie Sanders (I-Vt.), who focuses more on redistributing income to solve the inequality problem than on growth.

Clinton's aides said she plans to assert that the Republican candidates use rhetoric designed to appeal to middle-class voters but are proposing dated, trickle-down policies from the Reagan presidency — such as tax cuts for the wealthy, with the hope that they fuel growth that eventually benefits working families.

The U.S. economy grew only 2.4 percent last year, and over the past 15 years, economic growth has slipped well below the averages of the 1980s and 1990s. Former Florida governor Jeb Bush is promising to grow the economy by 4 percent a year.

But Clinton will argue that "the measure of our economic success should be how much incomes rise for middle-class households, not an arbitrary growth figure," according to the Clinton campaign official.

Clinton's speech is sure to draw fire from Republicans, who will chafe at her calls for higher taxes on the wealthy and more regulation of Wall Street and business in general. Many conservative economists warn that such proposals stunt economic growth.

In her speech, aides said Clinton will argue that tectonic forces in the global economy are conspiring against middle-class families — such as automation and technology, which are eliminating middle-skill jobs that once provided solid incomes, as well as the new "sharing economy," epitomized by Uber, which has created efficiency but also jobs lacking benefits and protections. But she will say that the government should enact policies to shape how these forces affect Americans.

"She's really addressing the issues of the moment," said Neera Tanden, president of the Center for American Progress, who has been advising Clinton on policy. "The challenges we face today are different than when she was running eight years ago. . . . She sees that the challenges are large and profound, but she thinks they're issues we can address and that we shouldn't just be subject to these global trends."

Clinton will at least implicitly critique Obama, whom she served as secretary of state, with her discussion about stagnant wages under his watch. But aides said she intends to commend him for facing and passing an urgent test to grow the economy quickly.

This version of Total Mail Converter is not registered.

Advisers said Clinton's economic agenda will be organized in three parts. The first is about breaking down barriers to joining the workforce, including increased private and public investments in an infrastructure bank, tax relief to small businesses and clean energy development.

As part of her workforce focus, Clinton will decry that women's participation in the workforce has stalled after decades of growth and that many working parents, especially single mothers, have passed up job opportunities because of their family obligations. She will preview policies on child care, paid leave and paid sick days.

Clinton's second area of focus is reducing income inequality. She will assert that the current economy unfairly rewards some work, such as financial trading, more than other work, such as building and selling products. She will celebrate Obama's new rules on overtime, but also urge raising the minimum wage, fighting wage theft and overhauling the tax code to make the wealthiest Americans pay what she considers their fair share, as well as supporting collective bargaining and reducing health-care costs.

The third area is corporate reform. She plans to argue that companies should focus more on creating lasting value, including investing in their workers, than on earning quarterly profits to satisfy shareholders. To that end, she will call for more investments in research and development, changes in tax structure and new rules on shareholder activism.

Clinton will introduce these ideas in Monday's speech and then roll out more detailed prescriptions on issues such as college affordability, paid leave, wage growth and corporate accountability throughout the summer.

Liberal groups, which have been skeptical of Clinton's candidacy and especially its closeness to Wall Street, will be watching her speech with a skeptical eye.

Adam Green, co-founder of the Progressive Change Campaign Committee, a group allied with liberal Sen. Elizabeth Warren (D-Mass.), has not seen Clinton's agenda but said he will be listening to hear whether Clinton takes on "the power of Wall Street and corporate bad actors."

"Do her proposals go big and represent game-changers in the lives of millions of people?" Green asked. "Or do they go small and tweak around the edges?"

Jared Bernstein, a liberal economist who has advised Obama and Vice President Biden and was briefed on Clinton's plans, said he thought she would satisfy progressives because her agenda "reconnects growth and middle-class prosperity."

For the past several months, Clinton and her advisers have met with more than 200 domestic policy experts. Campaign aides Jake Sullivan, Ann O'Leary and Maya Harris, with input from Gary Gensler, a Warren ally and the campaign's chief financial officer, developed the policy.

A number of outside advisers were involved as well, including Nobel Prize-winning liberal economist Joseph Stiglitz; former Obama White House economic advisers Gene Sperling, Alan Krueger, Christina Romer and Ronnie Chatterji; economists Alan Blinder and Heather Boushey; political scientist Jacob Hacker; law professor David Kamin; and Tanden.

This version of Total Mail Converter is not registered.

SOCIAL MEDIA

Ken Thomas (6/11/15, 4:41 pm) - Hillary Clinton wins the endorsement of @AFTunion. It's the 1st major union to endorse in 2016 campaign.

Jeb Bush (7/11/15, 6:32 pm) - .@HillaryClinton can stand with @AFTunion. I'm standing with the kids. #edreform nypost.com/2015/06/23/sch ...

HRC NATIONAL COVERAGE

The Best Way to Vilify Hillary Clinton? G.O.P. Spends Heavily to Test It // NYT // Ashley Parker & Amy Chozick – July 11, 2015

Inside an office park here, about a dozen women gathered to watch a 30-second television spot that opened with Hillary Rodham Clinton looking well-coiffed and aristocratic, toasting champagne with her tuxedoed husband, the former president, against a golden-hued backdrop.

The ad then cut to Mrs. Clinton describing being "dead broke" when she and her husband left the White House, before a narrator intoned that Mrs. Clinton makes more money in a single speech, about $300,000, than an average family earns in five years.

The message hit a nerve. "She's out of touch," said one of the women, who works as a laundry attendant.

"Her reality is just so different than mine," murmured another, as operatives from American Crossroads, a Republican "super PAC," watched closely from behind a one-way mirror.

In rooms like this one around the country, an expensive and sophisticated effort is underway to test and refine the most potent lines of attack against Mrs. Clinton, and, ultimately, to persuade Americans that she does not deserve their votes. While the general election is 16 months away, Republican groups are eager to begin building a powerful case against the woman they believe will be the Democratic nominee, and to infuse the public consciousness with those messages.

American Crossroads, a Republican "super PAC," conducted two four-hour focus groups in Florida to test a series of attack ads against Mrs. Clinton. Here are descriptions of some ads, along with some reactions from the participants.

On the campaign trail, Mrs. Clinton focuses on policy issues, like the economic vision she plans to lay out in a speech on Monday.

But in private, her campaign has prepped for the anticipated lines of attack against her.

The effort to vilify Mrs. Clinton could ultimately cost several hundred million dollars, given the variety and volume of political organizations involved.

The typical voter has not necessarily fully tuned in to election coverage or followed the intricacies of Mrs.

This version of Total Mail Converter is not registered.

Clinton's use of a private email account or foreign donations to her family's foundation. But Republicans are acutely aware that early attacks labeling Mitt Romney as elitist were impossible for him to shake in 2012, and they view these next several months as critical in laying the groundwork to taint, and ultimately defeat, Mrs. Clinton.

That is why, on a rainy night here, Crossroads, which was founded by the Republican strategist Karl Rove, gathered about 50 voters representing groups that it believes can be persuaded to vote against Mrs. Clinton — an all-white mix of young men, low-income adults, married mothers and politically moderate women.

One problem in developing negative messages about Mrs. Clinton, Republican strategists have found, is that she and her husband have survived so many controversies by dismissing them as partisan attacks. So the Republican organizations are seeking to develop lines of attack that resonate more deeply or raise unsettling questions about Mrs. Clinton's character.

They showed the voters, who received $100, sandwiches and soft drinks for their time, more than a dozen 30-second ads. (Crossroads allowed a reporter to observe the focus groups under the condition that the participants' names be withheld.)

The ads highlighted Mrs. Clinton's deleting of emails from her private account, tried to tie her to President Obama, portrayed her as distant from middle-class Americans and sought to persuade women that they do not need to support her because of her gender.

An ad shown to a focus group contests Mrs. Clinton's comments that she and her husband were "dead broke" when they left the White House.

But many, essentially, struck the same theme, depicting Mrs. Clinton as untrustworthy, an image that even Democrats supporting the Clinton campaign acknowledge is a weakness. About 57 percent of Americans do not believe Mrs. Clinton is honest and trustworthy, according to a CNN poll released June 2.

"She's got an open wound, and part of our job is to pour salt in it," said Glen Bolger, a co-founder of Public Opinion Strategies, the Republican polling firm that conducted the focus groups.

Mrs. Clinton's allies point to relatively low trust numbers for Mr. Clinton in the 1992 and 1996 elections and his ability to win voters despite his personal failings.

An ad titled "Shadow," which ranked among the most effective ads that Crossroads tested in Orlando, argued that scandal trailed Mrs. Clinton like a menacing shadow. "Whitewater, Travelgate and Filegate," a narrator began, referring to scandals from decades ago, including one over a real estate deal. Then the narrator moved on to more recent controversies, including her deleted emails, the foreign donations to her family foundation and the four Americans killed in the 2012 attacks on the United States compound in Benghazi, Libya.

"There's a sense of distrust, a sense of unease about her authenticity and her candor, that isn't hard to stimulate," said Steven Law, the president of Crossroads.

In modern campaigns, given the fragmented way media is consumed, television ads are important but not always enough to create a narrative, especially over a long period.

Crossroads plans to use a kaleidoscopic approach for its anti-Clinton campaign. In order to target particular voters with tailored messages, the campaign will feature tools including television and radio spots, digital ads on mobile devices, and pre-roll, the commercials that play before videos online.

This version of Total Mail Converter is not registered.

Crossroads is eager to establish itself as the leading attack dog against Mrs. Clinton, but it is a crowded field, especially as other super PACs are emerging as bigger players in the Republican money world.

In this ad, a narrator ominously warns that scandal follows Mrs. Clinton like a shadow.

Right to Rise, a super PAC supporting former Gov. Jeb Bush of Florida, recently held its own briefing for Republican groups to highlight data it gathered from its own focus groups and polling of women, information that can be used in attacks against Mrs. Clinton. It stressed that Mrs. Clinton's "dead broke" comments were particularly devastating, as were her deleted emails, though they required more explanation. Though the Clintons were in fact dealing with debt and legal fees when they left the White House, Mrs. Clinton later called her comments "inartful."

In addition, America Rising PAC, an opposition research group that focuses heavily on attacking Mrs. Clinton, began its effort with Twitter and other online posts more than a year ago before moving to paid digital ads.

Mrs. Clinton's campaign and Democratic groups believe that attacks on her trustworthiness and wealth could be the most damaging if they do not aggressively combat them. Rather than debating policies that would help working Americans, "they're trying to make her Mitt Romney in a pantsuit," said David Brock, the founder of several pro-Clinton outside groups and author of the forthcoming book, "Killing the Messenger: The Right Wing Plot to Derail Hillary and Hijack Your Government."

The Clinton campaign has also tried to turn the trust issue around by arguing that while the opposition tries to make voters distrust how Mrs. Clinton handled her email as secretary of state, they can trust her more than Republicans to look out for middle-class Americans.

Christina Reynolds, a spokeswoman for the campaign, said billionaires funding the attacks "are committed to keeping the policies in place that keep the deck stacked in favor of them at the expense of the voters she talks to around the country."

Democratic political groups, of course, will undertake their own offensive to attack a Republican nominee or front-runner, much as they did with Mr. Romney. But their task has been made more difficult by the large and uncertain Republican field.

Both sides agree that the work undertaken long before the election, often in the year before it, creates the foundation for the most damaging attacks.

Ahead of the 2004 election, Mr. Rove and others involved in President George W. Bush's re-election campaign tried to convince voters that Senator John Kerry was an opportunistic flip-flopper. The critique did not catch on until March of that year, when Mr. Kerry, in response to a question about funding for the military operations in Iraq and Afghanistan, said he "actually did vote for the $87 billion before I voted against it."

An ad features Mrs. Clinton saying she is "two steps short of a hoarder," and then has a narrator speak of the emails she deleted from her time as secretary of state.

"The groundwork had been laid pointing out all the examples of flip-flopping in the past," said Colin Reed, the executive director of America Rising.

Republicans could hardly hide their giddiness when Mrs. Clinton made her "dead broke" remark last year. To many in the political world, the comment evoked Mr. Romney's misstep at a 2012 fund-raiser where he said "47 percent" of Americans were overly dependent on government.

This version of Total Mail Converter is not registered.

Long before Mr. Romney made that comment, Priorities USA Action, the Democratic super PAC, had devoted months to portraying the Republican candidate as "a plutocrat who doesn't care about people like you," said Bill Burton, a Priorities co-founder.

"The best thing you can do is set the table for a key vulnerability and hope the candidate lives up to the hype, which they likely will do," Mr. Burton said.

In Orlando, the "dead broke" ad emerged as the most effective spot, partly because it captured the gulf between Mrs. Clinton's life and those of the less affluent people gathered.

"She's broke at another level," said one man, who owns an electrical company and makes less than $50,000 annually. "She could be broke, you know, compared to the people in her world. O.K., in her status. 'Oh, my God, I can't buy a jet this year — we're broke, we're not going to Europe, sorry.' "

Another ad that resonated, called "Throw Away," opens with Mrs. Clinton saying she never throws anything away and is "two steps short of a hoarder" before a narrator points out that she deleted about 30,000 emails from her time at the State Department.

But Crossroads still has some fine-tuning to do. A few women watching expressed sympathy for Mrs. Clinton, saying they sometimes felt like hoarders, too, and often deleted spam and other personal emails. Maybe that was what Mrs. Clinton had done?

"They could have been from Bed Bath & Beyond," one woman said of the emails. "Who knows?"

Shaping a Campaign Against Hillary Clinton // NYT // Ashley Parker – July 11, 2015

American Crossroads, a "super PAC" founded by Karl Rove, the Republican strategist, recently conducted two four-hour focus groups in Florida to test a series of attack ads against Hillary Rodham Clinton. Crossroads gathered about 50 voters who represented groups it believes can be persuaded to vote against Mrs. Clinton — an all-white mix of young men, low-income adults, married mothers and politically moderate women. Here are descriptions of some ads, along with some reactions from the participants. (A reporter was permitted to observe, under the condition that names of the participants be withheld.)

'Dead Broke'

An ad highlights Mrs. Clinton's comments that she and her husband were "dead broke" when they left the White House and argues that the Clintons' version of "dead broke" is very different from that of the typical American. The ad describes the lucrative fees Mrs. Clinton has received for making speeches and for being an author.

Responses

"She's rich broke. She's not really our kind of broke, like, 'I don't even have money to go get a sandwich.' " — Politically moderate woman who works as a paralegal

This version of Total Mail Converter is not registered.

“For her to say she's dead broke, and the way the economy is, it’s kind of a slap in the face when you're struggling.” — Married mother

“She has no clue. I think she’s completely out of touch with how the middle class lives.” — Low-income woman

“It’s essentially faulting her for going out and getting a book deal, when it’s like, O.K., she went out, made the most of an opportunity. Who among us wouldn’t do that? This is like, ‘Here’s $8 million for your life.’ Of course I’m going to take that.” — Young man

‘Throw Away’

An ad features Mrs. Clinton saying she does not throw anything away and is “two steps short of a hoarder, ” and then has a narrator speak of more than 30,000 emails she deleted from her time as secretary of state.

Responses

“Her saying, ‘I don’t throw anything away, I’m a hoarder,’ is taken out of context. What was she talking about? Maybe they were talking about: Does she have every prom dress she ever wore? I was almost offended that that was so out of context.” — Politically moderate woman

“We should care because it could lead to leaking and hacking, and I think, isn’t that a federal offense to do that?” — Politically moderate woman

“I think the ad was believable, but I just don’t think that it’s the biggest issue, and I don’t think anybody — I think, yeah, she deleted all the emails. We all know that.” — Politically moderate woman

“She gives me this feeling of like a greasy used car salesman sometimes, but I think I get that from a lot of politicians, but there’s a point where I just feel like I get worked over.” — Politically moderate woman

‘Shadow’

In this ad, a narrator ominously warns that scandal follows Mrs. Clinton like a shadow, before listing several scandals that have plagued her, including the Whitewater real estate deal in Arkansas and the deaths of four Americans in the 2012 attacks in Benghazi, Libya.

Responses

“Not really particularly believable because they were so long ago, and a lot of people who will be voting, who are 21, will have no idea what a Whitewater is, or maybe what led up to the first Clinton presidency.” — Low-income man

“I felt like it was a really low blow, even for dirty politics, to put the pictures of the people who were killed" in Benghazi. — Politically moderate woman

This version of Total Mail Converter is not registered.

"That commercial said to me: When you have Hillary Clinton somewhere, you're going to have a scandal. So why would you put her here where it's really important, because there's going to be a scandal?" — Politically moderate woman

"Everything in the whole commercial made her seem so shady from the beginning to the end. And I think it was just that what, is what impacted me, is just, you know, why would you want to vote for her? You know, why? I mean, after all that. And it's put right out there, it just, it covered a lot for me, and that's why I liked it." — Married mother

'Woman on the Street'

This ad features women explaining that they would love to see a female president but that they just do not support Mrs. Clinton. The women then list several reasons for thinking that she does not best represents them.

Responses

"They were all just against her. Nobody was there for her." — Female grocery clerk who leans Democratic

"I kind of liked that commercial. I thought it was one of the most effective ones because it's still the fact that it was all women saying that stuff. And the point they were, you know, getting across, how it doesn't necessarily have to be her." — Low-income man

"Getting a woman president probably wouldn't be too much of a role model for me. I do prefer men over women as far as leaders, which is kind of chauvinistic of me, but I do." — Politically moderate woman

"It's an ad that might work on Lifetime." — Young man

Hillary Clinton Economic Plan to Chart Center-Left Course // WSJ // Laura Meckler - July 12, 2015

Democratic presidential front-runner's economic speech expected to highlight differences between herself and GOP, other liberal contenders

Hillary Clinton is preparing to lay out an economic plan that seeks to chart a center-left ideological course, rejecting ideas put forth by Republican presidential contenders but also striking a contrast with the liberal wing of her own party.

In a Monday economic speech, the Democratic presidential front-runner will focus on the differences between herself and her Republican foes. She will accuse them of seeking economic growth without regard to whether the middle class thrives, and say that raising incomes for all Americans is "the defining economic challenge of our time," a campaign aide said.

But the speech in New York City will also draw implicit contrasts with Sen. Bernie Sanders, who is mounting a strong challenge from the left for the Democratic nomination. He is focusing heavily on economic inequality, arguing that the economic pie should be divided more fairly and calling for taxes on the wealthy to pay for initiatives that will boost the middle class.

This version of Total Mail Converter is not registered.

Mrs. Clinton will put relatively more emphasis on the need to make the pie larger. Her economic policy advisers say she aims to walk a course between a focus on inequality and one on growth.

It is a balancing act that reflects her broader approach to policy so far in her presidential quest. She is proving to be quite liberal in some areas—particularly social policy such as immigration, gay marriage and gun control—while centrist on other issues, including some economic ones.

To promote growth, Mrs. Clinton will urge tax cuts for small businesses and new government spending on infrastructure, the Clinton aide said. She also will propose ways to make it easier for women to succeed in the workplace, including support for child care and paid leave.

To address income inequality, Mrs. Clinton will call for raising the minimum wage, increasing taxes on the wealthy, boosting the power of unions and reducing health-care costs. She's also likely to propose some new rules governing Wall Street.

She plans to endorse greater use of profit-sharing programs, which aim to more broadly share a company's success with its workers, and a college-affordability program, which is likely to stretch beyond the proposal for free community college advanced by President Barack Obama, advisers say. A middle-class tax cut plan is also in development.

Republicans are likely to charge that the Clinton formula, while advertised as centrist, still will expand both government spending and growth-sapping regulatory burdens.

But there is little sign she intends to embrace many of the most liberal and in some cases, expensive, ideas being pushed by Mr. Sanders and former Maryland Gov. Martin O'Malley, who is also challenging Mrs. Clinton from the political left.

She is unlikely to propose breaking up Wall Street banks or installing a single-payer health-care system. A wholesale expansion of Social Security, as many on the left would like, is unexpected as well. She has sent mixed messages on a pending Asian trade deal, which labor unions and other liberals reject outright. She backs an increase in the minimum wage, but it isn't clear whether she will embrace an increase to $15 an hour, as some are pushing.

More centrist postures on such issues may be more helpful to her in a general election, if she wins her party's nomination. For now, though, one of her political imperatives is to show Democrats how she will take the fight to the GOP.

She intends to do that in part by lodging an attack on former Florida Gov. Jeb Bush, a leading GOP presidential contender, who said in his announcement speech that his economic goal is 4% growth. He didn't offer specifics as to how he will achieve that, beyond mentioning a reduction in regulations and a tax overhaul.

Mr. Bush argued that wages will grow for all, not just the rich, with an expanding economy. He described "growth that lifts up the middle class" and "makes a difference for everyone."

Glenn Hubbard, an economic adviser to former President George W. Bush who is now advising Jeb Bush, said in an interview that, like Mrs. Clinton, Mr. Bush doesn't support growth without wage improvements.

This version of Total Mail Converter is not registered.

"It's about inclusive economic growth," he said. "To my mind, you can't fix the problem of a troubling pattern of wage stagnation unless and until you can have a steady state of economic growth in the country."

Mrs. Clinton will contend that an expanding economy alone isn't enough to achieve widespread gains, and data shows that growth hasn't translated into wage gains in recent years.

In 2013, median household incomes stood at levels last seen in 1995 after adjusting for inflation, while per capita output over that span increased by around 30%.

One of the unanswered questions about Mrs. Clinton's policy agenda is how sharply she will critique Wall Street and whether she'll propose significant new regulations governing financial institutions. Princeton economist Alan Blinder, who was briefed on the plan, said he expects Mrs. Clinton to call for more regulation, more taxation and a greater emphasis on financial stability.

"She may surprise people with her toughness on Wall Street excesses," the former Federal Reserve vice chairman said.

Teachers union endorses Hillary Clinton in Democratic race // WaPo // Lyndsey Layton – July 11, 2015

The American Federation of Teachers endorsed Hillary Clinton for the Democratic presidential nomination on Saturday, the first national union to back a candidate for the 2016 primary.

The endorsement was not a surprise to close observers - the AFT had supported Clinton in 2008 instead of Barack Obama - but the early timing may be designed to give Clinton a boost against her surging rival, Sen. Bernie Sanders (I-Vt.).

"In vision, in experience and in leadership, Hillary Clinton is the champion of working families need in the White House," AFT president and longtime Clinton ally Randi Weingarten said.

In a statement released by the union, Clinton said she was "honored" by the nod. "I know from my own family that teachers have the power to change lives, " she said. "We need to make sure every child has access for a quality public education and to the teachers with the tools to help them succeed."

Weingarten and Clinton have been friends since their days in New York, when Weingarten led the city's teachers union and Clinton ran successfully for the U.S. Senate. Weingarten sits on the board of the pro-Clinton PAC Priorities USA.

The 1.6 million-member AFT, along with its sister union, the 3 million-member National Education Association, have been under siege from both elements within the Democratic and Republican parties.

The unions have been fighting the expansion of public charter schools, which are largely not unionized, as well as teacher evaluations based on test scores and challenges to tenure and other workplace protections.

This version of Total Mail Converter is not registered.

The unions have both been critical of many of the education policies of the Obama administration, saying they have led to a "blame the teacher" culture. They argue that evaluating teachers based on student test scores does not recognize the complexities of teaching students who often come from impoverished homes or struggle with disabilities and language barriers that affect their achievement.

Clinton, Sanders and former Maryland Gov. Martin O'Malley all met with both the AFT and NEA leadership last month in an effort to win their backing.

Clinton struck a particularly sympathetic tone in her meeting at the NEA, telling the union that people are "dead wrong to make teachers scapegoats for all of society's problems."

Clinton's relations with teachers unions didn't begin as smoothly, when she first entered public life. As first lady of Arkansas in 1982, Clinton pushed to broaden course offerings in public schools, smaller class sizes and institute competency testing for teachers - an idea that provoked a fierce pushback from the union.

But as a U.S. senator and first lady, Hillary Clinton promoted policies much more friendly to the teachers unions, including expanding preschool and after school programs. As a presidential candidate in 2008, she opposed merit pay for teachers, another stance in line with the unions.

Hillary Clinton Gets Endorsement From Teachers Union for Her Presidential Bid // AP // Dave Urbanski – July 11, 2015

Hillary Rodham Clinton has won the endorsement of the American Federation of Teachers. It's the first major labor union to make an endorsement in the 2016 presidential campaign.

Randi Weingarten, the president of the union, says in a statement Saturday that Clinton is the "champion working families need in the White House."

The endorsement was widely expected. The teachers' union supported Clinton's primary campaign in 2008 and Weingarten is a longtime Clinton ally.

The AFT represents more than 1.6 million members nationwide, including K-12 teachers and school personnel, higher education faculty and staff, early childhood educators and retirees.

Can Hillary Clinton lead the Keystone army? // Politico // Elana Schor – July 11, 2015

An army of liberal green activists has yet to coalesce around a Democratic presidential candidate, and Bernie Sanders and Martin O'Malley are fighting to win them over.

Hillary Clinton's two challengers from the left are each targeting the grassroots greens who, often upstaging the mainstream environmental groups, rallied throngs of opponents against the Keystone XL pipeline — turning an obscure regulatory fight into a symbol of America's addiction to fossil fuels.

Many of those activists are without a standard-bearer in the Democratic field, and are still suspicious of Clinton because of her refusal to rule out the Keystone project. And they've demonstrated the capacity to put supporters in the streets, including more than 1,100 anti-Keystone protesters who went to jail after White House sit-ins four years ago.

That's offering an opening to the progressive Sanders, who has emerged as Clinton's top rival in the polls, and

This version of Total Mail Converter is not registered.

O'Malley, whose once-promising campaign has yet to gain traction. Each has rolled out aggressive plans to fight climate change that are well to the left of anything Clinton has offered: Sanders is pushing a carbon tax, for example, while O'Malley pledges to wean the U.S. electricity system entirely off fossil fuels by 2050.

Sanders even launched his candidacy at an event with fellow Vermonter Bill McKibben, the activist who rose to prominence by leading the anti-Keystone crusade as part of the campaign to fight climate change.

There's little chance that major environmental groups like the Sierra Club or the League of Conservation Voters will endorse a candidate anytime soon — Clinton remains the prohibitive Democratic front-runner, and she too is pledging action on climate change, in contrast to the GOP White House hopefuls who are almost uniformly opposed. Still, Sanders' and O'Malley's efforts to display their green bona fides raise questions that could force Clinton to adopt a more aggressively liberal posture on issues ranging from fracking to Arctic offshore drilling.

"[I]t is a badge of honor with voters, particularly voters most likely to participate in Democratic primaries and caucuses, for a candidate to show that she or he is willing to take on big oil, the Koch brothers, other carbon polluters, and the climate change deniers," said Democratic pollster Geoff Garin, who helped lead Clinton's strategy team during the final months of her 2008 campaign.

The "growing number of people who are willing to become politically engaged and mobilize around climate and clean energy issues," he added, "can provide the kind of grassroots people power that campaigns depend on."

And as with the surge in Sanders' support from union members, despite AFL-CIO chief Richard Trumka's attempts to tamp it down, leaders of mainstream environmental groups will have a hard time reining in the passions of their activists and volunteers who have followed McKibben to get arrested at anti-Keystone rallies.

A source close to the Sanders camp says the candidate's appeal among the rank-and-file union members is sign of what's to come in the green movement.

"You're going to see the same thing happen in the environmental community — Sanders is going to attract tremendous support among grassroots activists because he's putting the issues front and center," the source said.

Not to be outdone, O'Malley's campaign has already begun courting environmental groups on the national, state and local level, efforts that will ramp up even further in the coming weeks, spokeswoman Haley Morris said.

O'Malley spent last weekend in Iowa on a campaign push that focused on his green proposals, such as his call to transition U.S. utilities to clean energy sources and shift tax incentives from fossil fuels to renewable energy. He outlined the plan in a Des Moines Register column published before his swing through the state.

"We need to hear from all of the candidates on where they stand — not just that this should be a priority, but what their specifics are, what their plan is to get it done," the O'Malley camp's Morris said.

Politically engaged environmental activists say Clinton has yet to prove herself. One example came when 350 Action, an affiliate of the environmental group founded by McKibben, joined the liberal magazine The Nation in asking candidates to swear off campaign money from the fossil-fuel industry: Sanders signed on early, and O'Malley followed suit Tuesday. But "Hillary Clinton, like the 14 Republican candidates contacted, did not reply" to the request, the magazine wrote.

"Broadly speaking, our movement is looking for a candidate who can take us off fossil fuels and do what it takes to avoid catastrophic global warming," said 350 spokesman Karthik Ganapathy. "Hillary Clinton needs to do a lot to show us that's her."

This version of Total Mail Converter is not registered.

Friends of the Earth Action spokesman Ben Schreiber said green activists can take inspiration from the liberal resistance led by Sen. Elizabeth Warren (D-Mass.) that recently prodded Clinton to move left on trade. “It’s imperative that the environmental community force her to flesh out her priorities” on climate change, he said.

Still, the anti-Keystone activists represent only a small slice of the Democratic electorate, and they aren’t likely to form a core base for either Sanders or O’Malley to mount a major challenge for the nomination. And Clinton may have less to prove to mainstream Democrats, whom polls show view climate change as a growing priority but still only one of many issues they care about.

Climate has “become a much more potent issue for Democratic voters than in the past,” Democratic former energy secretary and New Mexico Gov. Bill Richardson said in an interview. And it’s becoming “a base vote for Democrats,” he added. “But is it a single-issue, decisive vote? Not yet.”

Richardson warned Sanders and O’Malley that Clinton’s “vulnerability” on climate change, fracking and clean energy “doesn’t compare with” the potency of the Iraq War during the 2008 presidential race, when he — and then-Sen. Barack Obama — slammed her vote to authorize military force.

Democratic pollster and consultant Mark Mellman said global warming is an important issue for the party’s voters, but that it remains one of many issues where Clinton’s foes seek to exploit “hair’s-breadth differences, from a policy point of view, among these candidates.”

Clinton did try to appeal to the green wing of the party with her June campaign kick-off speech, in which she mocked Republicans who deny climate science and called for a shift to a clean-energy economy.

But beyond her call to impose additional fees and royalties on fossil-fuel extraction, she hasn’t proposed concrete plans, although Clinton campaign spokesman Ian Sams said there would be more to come.

“Tackling climate change will be a top priority for Hillary Clinton in her campaign,” Sams said by email, describing her campaign launch remarks as a first step in outlining “her ideas for how America can lead the global fight against climate change by becoming the clean energy superpower of the 21st Century, through developing renewable power and building cleaner power plants.

At stake are not just the young liberals who turned out in droves for climate marches galvanized by Keystone. Big money is also at play from newly prominent donors like the billionaire Tom Steyer and his green-minded, deep-pocketed network of allies.

Steyer held a fundraiser for Clinton’s campaign in May, but he has yet to formally endorse a White House candidate after rocketing to prominence by spending $74 million in an attempt to help elect climate-focused Democrats during the 2014 midterms. His NextGen Climate super PAC drew environmentalists to O’Malley by publicly praising the candidate’s climate platform, which emerged on the same day as Pope Francis’ June encyclical on the environment.

Steyer, who’s expected to spend big on the 2016 elections, appeared to redouble his demands after Obama announced last week that the administration was setting a goal of getting 20 percent of the nation’s electricity from renewable sources. White House contenders, Steyer said, must “put forward plans that build upon — and extend — President Obama’s bold leadership on clean energy, set even more ambitious targets, and create the more prosperous future our kids deserve.”

Sanders and O’Malley are rolling out detailed proposals to slash carbon emissions and transition the U.S. economy to run on wind and solar power instead of coal and oil, challenging Clinton to keep up.

This version of Total Mail Converter is not registered.

At his campaign launch in May featuring 350's McKibben, Sanders described climate change as a "planetary crisis" and explicitly called for a "tax on carbon" to address it.

"The environmental community has, for the first time, a serious presidential candidate who's made climate change fundamental to their candidacy," Mark Longabaugh, a senior Sanders campaign adviser, said in a recent interview.

Climate change and the environment still tend to rank lower than top-tier issues like jobs and the economy among voters, but there is evidence that it is rising in prominence — and that it could be a particularly potent issue for the eventual Democratic nominee.

Nearly six in 10 voters told The Washington Post in March that they want "the next president to be someone who favors government action to address climate change," with 97 percent of those people describing the issue as important to them. Among opponents of climate action, nearly a third said the issue was "not so important" to them. In an April poll for The Wall Street Journal and NBC News, climate change ranked third on a list of issues Democrats said was their top concern, behind jobs and health care, but beating out issues like terrorism and immigration.

By contrast, climate change ranked dead last among issues Republicans said they were concerned about.

American Federation of Teachers endorses Hillary Clinton for president // Politico // Nirvi Shah – July 11, 2015

The American Federation of Teachers is endorsing Hillary Clinton.

The endorsement was expected from the 1.6 million-member union, which represents workers including teachers, nurses and college and university employees.

AFT President Randi Weingarten and Clinton have been longtime friends, dating back to Clinton's time as a New York senator, when Weingarten was head of the state's United Federation of Teachers. Weingarten is also on the board of Priorities USA Action, a super PAC supporting Clinton's White House campaign.

"Clinton is a tested leader who shares our values, is supported by our members and is prepared for a tough fight on behalf of students, families and communities," Weingarten said after Saturday's decision by the union's executive council to endorse Clinton for president.

The union met with Clinton, Vermont Sen. Bernie Sanders and former Maryland Gov. Martin O'Malley in early June.

"I am absolutely convinced that education must be at the top of our agenda again. So I am putting it at the heart of my campaign," Clinton told a panel of AFT leaders at the time. AFT endorsed Clinton during the 2008 election, too.

On Saturday, Clinton said of the endorsement that "I'm honored to have the support of the AFT's members and leaders, and I'm proud to stand with them to unleash the potential of every American."

Weingarten noted Clinton's push to expand early childhood education and care in Arkansas, her work on health care and defense of public service workers after 9/11.

No Republican candidates agreed to meet with AFT leaders.

This version of Total Mail Converter is not registered.

“Hillary Clinton, a product of public schools herself, believes in the promise of public education,” Weingarten said, using the catchphrase from an AFT-backed campaign supporting public schools. Clinton “understands that to reclaim the promise of public education, policymakers need to work with educators and their unions. She’s ready to work with us to confront the issues facing children and their families today, including poverty, wage stagnation, income inequality and lack of opportunity.”

On Twitter, Weingarten addressed the early endorsement. “Members want to shape the debate, not chase it. 79% of primary voters want us to endorse in the primary,” she tweeted.

AFT said it conducted a long, thoughtful process before making its decision. Members had multiple opportunities to weigh in on the decision. Some 79 percent who vote in Democratic primaries said the union should endorse a candidate, and Clinton was the favorite by a three-to-one margin.

The National Education Association, the nation’s larger teachers’ union with nearly 3 million members, hasn’t made a decision about its endorsement, and one isn’t expected until the fall. It did not endorse either Clinton or Barack Obama in 2008.

The NEA also met with Clinton, O’Malley and Sanders last month.

Clinton has said she supports the Common Core, plans to issue a plan to address student loan debt and invest in early childhood education.

Clinton gets key union endorsement as rival enjoys a groundswell of support // Reuters // Amanda Becker – July 11, 2015

Democratic presidential candidate Hillary Clinton on Saturday 7scored a key endorsement from a large teachers union at a time when her chief rival is picking up support from organized labor.

By backing Clinton, the American Federation of Teachers, which as the nation's second-largest education union represents 1.6 million members, became the first national union to endorse a 2016 candidate.

The endorsement comes just two days before Clinton delivers a speech about the economy that labor leaders will watch closely. Some of them have already expressed public support for U.S. Senator Bernie Sanders of Vermont, who is also seeking the nomination.

"Hillary Clinton is a tested leader who shares our values, is supported by our members, and is prepared for a tough fight," AFT President Randi Weingarten said in a statement, citing Clinton's record as a former first lady, U.S. senator and secretary of state.

Weingarten and Clinton are longtime friends and allies. The AFT endorsed Clinton in 2007 when organized labor split between supporting her or now-President Barack Obama.

Both Sanders and Clinton are set to meet with labor leaders this week as they court a crucial base of support for Democratic candidates.

Looming over the meetings is a Pacific Rim trade deal that the Obama administration is finalizing and which has drawn vociferous criticism from labor. The issue is a difficult one for Clinton, who was Obama's secretary of state and has remained largely silent about the agreement, which Sanders has consistently opposed.

This version of Total Mail Converter is not registered.

Clinton's campaign released a statement saying she was honored to receive the AFT's endorsement.

"The men and women of AFT work throughout our communities in our preschools, K-12 schools, hospitals, colleges and universities, and public agencies," Clinton said in the statement. "Their voices and the voices of all workers are essential to this country."

Clinton also has a crucial meeting at the end of the month with the executive council of the AFL-CIO, an umbrella group for 56 unions, including the AFT.

The AFL-CIO has not said whether or when it will endorse a primary candidate. In 2008, when its member unions were split between Clinton and Obama, it backed Obama only when it became clear he was going to be the Democratic nominee.

AFL-CIO President Richard Trumka has urged local and state federations to remain neutral as the process plays out.

Clinton to pledge to close carried interest tax loophole: adviser // Reuters – July 11, 2015

Democratic presidential contender Hillary Clinton will pledge on Monday to close the carried interest tax loophole that allows private equity fund managers to pay a lower tax rate on much of their earnings, according to a draft of a speech seen by an outside adviser.

Clinton, who is seeking her party's nomination to run in the November 2016 election, took a similar stance during her last presidential campaign in 2007, and is expected to reaffirm it in a speech on her economic policy in New York City on Monday.

American Federation of Teachers Endorses Hillary Clinton // HuffPo // Dave Jamieson – July 11, 2015

Hillary Clinton picked up an early if not surprising endorsement on Saturday from one of the country's largest labor unions: the American Federation of Teachers.

The executive council of the 1.6-million member AFT voted "overwhelmingly" in favor of backing the early frontrunner for the Democratic nomination, according to an announcement from the union. It marks the first endorsement from a major national labor union during the 2016 presidential campaign.

"Hillary Clinton is a tested leader who shares our values, is supported by our members, and is prepared for a tough fight on behalf of students, families and communities," Randi Weingarten, the union's president, said in the statement.

Weingarten and Clinton have been personal friends for years and the union threw its weight behind the Democrat during her 2008 campaign as well. In the resolution declaring its endorsement, the AFT said it polled its members twice and held two town halls before deciding which primary candidate to back.

This version of Total Mail Converter is not registered.

The endorsement comes at a helpful time for Clinton as Vermont Independent Sen. Bernie Sanders surges in polls. Still considered a long shot, Sanders has proven to be an attractive candidate to progressives in the labor movement, particularly those turned off by Clinton's unclear positions on President Barack Obama's looming trade deal. A number of local labor federations are flirting with the idea of getting behind Sanders, Politico reported.

Clinton joined one of the AFT's executive council meetings last month, where she said teachers had become unfair targets of political attacks, according to the union.

"It is just dead wrong to make teachers the scapegoats for all of society's problems," Clinton had said. "Where I come from, teachers are the solution. And I strongly believe that unions are part of the solution, too."

Clinton plans to meet with officials from the AFL-CIO labor federation later this month to address their concerns with her unclear stance on the White House's trade pact, Reuters reported Thursday. The AFL-CIO vehemently opposed giving the president so-called fast-track authorization for the deal, though Congress ultimately granted it in June.

Major teachers union endorses Hillary Clinton // CNN // Cassie Spodak – July 11, 2015

Hillary Clinton scored a major union endorsement on Saturday when the American Federation of Teachers announced its support for the Democratic frontrunner.

The endorsement is not a surprise, as the AFT also backed Clinton in 2007 in her primary battle against then-Sen. Barack Obama, but it is the first national union to endorse a candidate in the 2016 Democratic primary.

"In vision, in experience and in leadership, Hillary Clinton is the champion working families need in the White House," AFT President Randi Weingarten said in a statement. "Hillary understands that to reclaim the promise of public education, policymakers need to work with educators and their unions."

According to the AFT, Democratic candidates Bernie Sanders and Martin O'Malley also sought their endorsement, but members of the union chose Clinton by a three-to-one margin.

Clinton, through a statement released by her campaign, said she was honored to have the support of the AFT.

"We need to make sure every child has access to a quality public education and teachers with the tools to help them succeed," Clinton said. "The men and women of AFT work throughout our communities in our preschools, K-12 schools, hospitals, colleges and universities, and public agencies. Their voices and the voices of all workers are essential to this country."

A union's endorsement provides candidates with an extra boost in grassroots work, with members often helping to canvass neighborhoods and work the phones in the run-up to an election.

"Leading up to November 2016, AFT members are expected to make more than 1 million phone calls and knock on more than 500,000 doors," the AFT said in its statement announcing the endorsement.

This version of Total Mail Converter is not registered.

American Federation of Teachers endorses Hillary Clinton // MSNBC // David Taintor – July 11, 2015

The American Federation of Teachers endorsed Hillary Clinton for president on Saturday.

AFT, which boasts 1.6 million members, said it was the first major union to endorse a Democratic candidate in the 2016 election cycle. AFT is the second largest teachers' union in the country.

"In vision, in experience and in leadership, Hillary Clinton is the champion working families need in the White House," AFT president Randi Weingarten said in a statement. "Hillary Clinton is a tested leader who shares our values, is supported by our members, and is prepared for a tough fight on behalf of students, families and communities. That fight defines her campaign and her career."

Clinton said she was "honored" to win the group's endorsement.

AFT endorsed Clinton in 2008, and Weingarten is a longtime Clinton ally. Last year, Weingarten joined the board of the main super PAC supporting Clinton.

Clinton, along with Democratic candidates Sen. Bernie Sanders and former Gov. Martin O'Malley, met with the union's leaders last month in Washington, D.C., in an attempt to clinch the group's endorsement.

"What you saw, bottom line, is that the three candidates talked about a reset of education policy in america," Weingarten told msnbc's Richard Lui in early June. "... Over and over and over again, all three of them talked about how, in Hilary's words, teachers cannot be scapegoats for society's problems; in Martin O'Malley's words – and he has a daughter who teaches in Baltimore – you can't vilify teachers; in Bernie Sanders' words, he wants a political revolution because it's time to stop having this kind of cutting, cutting, cutting of public education."

Teachers unions have lately found themselves in the crosshairs of many education reform activists and Republicans, who see the unions as caring less about educating children than protecting themselves. Reformers tend to favor charter schools, which are often not unionized, along with stricter teacher testing standards, and less employment protection for educators.

American Federation of Teachers Endorses Hillary Clinton For President // ABC News // Luz Kreutz – July 11, 2015

Hillary Clinton has scored the first national labor endorsement of the election cycle.

The American Federation of Teachers (AFT) today chose to back Clinton in the Democratic primary for president.

"In vision, in experience and in leadership, Hillary Clinton is the champion working families need in the White House," AFT President Randi Weingarten said in a statement released this afternoon. "Hillary Clinton is a tested leader who shares our values, is supported by our members, and is prepared for a tough fight on behalf of students, families and communities."

This version of Total Mail Converter is not registered.

Ahead of the endorsement, the AFT, the smaller of two national education unions, met with Clinton as well as other Democratic presidential candidates Bernie Sanders and Martin O'Malley.

Their ultimate decision to back Clinton is not a surprise.

The union endorsed Clinton over then-Senator Barack Obama during the 2008 presidential primary, and Weingarten is a longtime Clinton supporter, who helped Ready for Hillary, the super PAC that raised money for Clinton ahead of her official presidential announcement.

Today, the AFT pointed to Clinton's efforts as first lady and as a senator to expand access to early childhood education and quality healthcare, as well as her efforts at secretary of state to promote LGBT rights, in explaining why they chose to endorse Clinton over O'Malley and Sanders. They also noted that Clinton was a product of public schools herself.

In a statement, Clinton responded to the endorsement, saying she is "honored" to have the group's support and "proud to stand with them to unleash the potential of every American."

The American Federation of Teachers represents 1.6 million education professionals across the country.

The group says they expect to make more than 1 million phone calls and knock on more than 500,000 doors on behalf of Clinton before November 2016.

Hillary Clinton Wins Key Endorsement From American Federation of Teachers // TIME // Sam Frizell – July 11, 2015

Hillary Clinton has secured the first major union endorsement of the 2016 Democratic presidential primary.

The American Federation of Teachers, a powerful, 1.6 million-strong national union, voted on Saturday to endorse the former secretary of state, calling Clinton a “champion” for “working families.”

“Hillary Clinton, a product of public schools herself, believes in the promise of public education,” said Randi Weingarten, the president of the AFT. “From early childhood learning through higher education, she sees how that promise can create real opportunity for kids, building a much-needed bridge to the middle class.”

The endorsement from the AFT does not come as a surprise. Clinton speaks often on the campaign trail about early childhood education, particularly on the importance of speaking and singing to young children, and has called for universal pre-kindergarten. She’s also endorsed President Obama’s plan to make community colleges free, and introduced a proposal to prevent for-profit colleges from fleecing veterans.

Weingarten is also a long time ally and friend of Clinton’s.

Nonetheless, it’s an important first union endorsement for Clinton, who is still struggling to establish herself as the favored candidate of the Democratic base.

The AFT’s endorsement is a major strategic advantage for Clinton, too. The AFT says it will make 1 million phone calls and knock on more than 500,000 doors in the run-up to the 2016 election.

This version of Total Mail Converter is not registered.

In many ways, Clinton's competitor for the Democratic nomination, Vermont Senator Bernie Sanders, can claim a more natural alliance with the unions considering his staunch union activism and socialist roots. The AFL-CIO, the biggest alliance of unions in the country with 16 million members, has not yet endorsed a candidate for president. Many members and local affiliates say they identify most with Sanders, but that may not sway the union either way.

"I'm honored to have the support of AFT's members and leaders, and proud to stand with them to unleash the potential of every American," Clinton said in a statement after the endorsement. "Their voices and the voices of all workers are essential to this country."

Clinton to deliver major economic speech in New York Monday // The Hill // Alex Bolton – July 11, 2015

Hillary Clinton will deliver a major economic speech Monday at the New School in New York, outlining several proposals her campaign plans to unveil in more detail down the road, according to media reports.

At the center of her policy vision is a call to boost the stagnating incomes of middle-class families, which has been a core Democratic tenet for several years.

The speech is the product of scores of conversations with elite thinkers of the liberal policy establishment, such as former White House advisor Gene Sperling, Nobel laureate Joseph Stiglitz, liberal think tank president Neera Tanden, economist Alan Blinder and Jared Bernstein, former senior economic adviser to Vice President Joe Biden.

Clinton will push for the creation of an infrastructure bank to spur public and private investment, paid family medical leave, increasing the minimum wage, greater corporate profit sharing, small business tax relief, federal subsidies for college and raising taxes on the nation's wealthiest earners.

She will also focus on income inequality and what she's referred as distorted incentives in corporate America that motivate executives to focus on maximizing short-term profit instead of long-term growth.

Much like Obama has done over the past six years, Clinton will emphasize investment in education and new sectors such as renewable energy as the path to future economic prosperity, instead of quick fixes like cutting taxes and wiping out regulations.

She will also push back against Republican presidential candidate Jeb Bush's pledge to return the domestic economy to 4 percent growth without providing a detailed policy roadmap for how to get there.

She will praise the economic records of Obama and her husband, former President Bill Clinton, and contrast them to the economic plunge that began during former President George W. Bush's final year in office.

Clinton wins major labor endorsement // The Hill // Alexander Bolton – July 11, 2015

The American Federation of Teachers (AFT), the nation's third largest labor union, has endorsed Hillary Clinton for president.

"For nearly a century, the American Federation of Teachers has worked to expand opportunity for the people and communities they serve. I'm honored to have the support of AFT's members and leaders, and proud to stand with them to unleash the potential of every American," Clinton said in a statement.

It is the first international labor union endorsement in the 2016 presidential race.

This version of Total Mail Converter is not registered.

The AFT includes 1.6 million members and retirees around the nation.

“I know from my own family that teachers have the power to change lives. We need to make sure every child has access to a quality public education and teachers with the tools to help them succeed,” Clinton said.

The AFT ranks third in size behind the National Education Association and the Service Employees International Union.

The AFL-CIO, a federation made up of 56 smaller member unions, is not considered to be in the same category.

Sunday shows preview: Hillary speaks // The Hill // Mark Hensch – July 11, 2015

Democratic presidential candidate Hillary Clinton is staying in the media spotlight following her first national TV interview as a 2016 contender earlier this week.

The former secretary of State sat down with CNN’s Brianna Keilar on July 7, delivering a wide-ranging discussion over topics as diverse as immigration, the GOP’s presidential field and her transparency.

Clinton continues her push for a more public persona Sunday morning with an appearance on CNN’s “State of the Union.”

South Carolina Gov. Nikki Haley (R), meanwhile, makes a notable appearance of her own on NBC’s “Meet the Press.”

Haley will share her thoughts on last week’s historic removal of the Confederate battle flag from her state’s Capitol grounds.

The landmark moment is generating national buzz for Haley in the wake of a renewed debate over the controversial symbol.

Here is the list of Sunday morning’s expected guests across all five major news networks:

CNN’s “State of the Union”: Clinton headlines Sunday by giving only her second national TV interview as a White House hopeful to host Jake Tapper.

The frontrunner for the Democratic nomination will continue filling in the blanks on her message and positions following her inaugural appearance on CNN last week.

Sen. Lindsey Graham (R-S.C.) is also appearing amid his own 2016 Oval Office bid.

Graham will address his presidential ambitions and weigh in on his state’s debate over the Confederate flag.

CNN completes its coverage with Wisconsin Gov. Scott Walker’s two sons, Alex Walker and Scott Walker, Jr.

The two brothers will humanize their father before his expected 2016 campaign launch Monday.

NBC’s “Meet the Press”: Haley chats with host Chuck Todd about the Palmetto State’s groundbreaking change of heart over the Confederate flag.

The rising Republican star will also explain how her state is addressing its minorities’ concerns going forward.

Sen. Bob Corker (R-Tenn.) then stops by NBC’s studios and outlines his thoughts on the negotiations over Iran’s nuclear arms research.

This version of Total Mail Converter is not registered.

The Senate Foreign Relations Committee chair will analyze the framework deal's details before a Monday deadline for the final version.

CBS's "Face the Nation": House Speaker John Boehner (R-Ohio) sits down with host John Dickerson and explains his party's internal strife over the Confederate flag.

Sen. Tom Cotton (R-Ark.) then offers his take on the Iran talks and their repeated delays for a final accord.

Cotton, a noted critic of the deal, will articulate why he thinks the accord is not in America's best interest.

Sen. Bernie Sanders (I-Vt.) rounds out CBS's Sunday morning coverage.

The Democratic presidential candidate will explain his strategy for catching up with Clinton and winning his party's coronation next year.

ABC's "This Week": Host George Stephanopoulos welcomes GOP presidential candidate Carly Fiorina and Sen. Bob Menendez (D-N.J.) on Sunday.

Fiorina, a former Hewlett-Packard CEO, will give the latest update on her longshot bid for the Republican nod next election cycle.

Menendez will weigh in on the Iran talks before Monday's latest deadline.

The Senate Foreign Relations Committee member is one of the most notable Democrats opposing the deal.

"Fox News Sunday": Host Bret Baier welcomes Senate Majority Leader Mitch McConnell (R-Ky.) to Fox News' studios Sunday.

McConnell will explain his take on the Iran negotiations and what role Congress will play in their final outcome.

Baier then welcomes one 2016 contender from each side of the political spectrum.

Louisiana Gov. Bobby Jindal (R) will detail how he offers an alternative to other White House hopefuls in 2016.

Former Sen. Jim Webb (D-Va.) also stops by "Fox News Sunday" just one week after launching his presidential campaign.

The 2016 race's latest Democratic entrant will articulate his strategy for winning his party's nomination against uphill odds.

Memo to Hillary: 'You're Still the Problem' // The National Review // Ron Fournier – July 11, 2015

The following is a faux memo, although its contents are based upon my interviews with people close to Hillary Clinton, including some I've known since my years covering the Clintons in Arkansas. These sources spoke on condition of anonymity because attempts to make their case directly to the Democratic front-runner and her campaign team were icily received. Like my December 2013 memo titled "You're the Problem," this represents their point of view.

To: Hillary

This version of Total Mail Converter is not registered.

From: A few of us

Subject: We love you, but you're still the problem

The last time we wrote as a group, you were deciding whether to run for president. Conventional wisdom pegged you as a dead-certain candidate; we knew better. We knew you were worn from a lifetime of service, personal tension, and the getting-vaster Right Wing Conspiracy. We knew you truly wanted to devote the rest of your years to charity and Charlotte. We also knew you wanted to be president -- and we're not embarrassed to say we thought you'd be a good one.

We had qualms. To review, we warned that an American public buffeted by socio-economic change has lost faith in Washington, the U.S. political system, and virtually every social institution. We said that would be a particular problem for you in 2016, because you are viewed as a creature of Washington, a calculating politician, and an institution ("not just because of your age," we wrote, "The Clinton family itself is an institution, one freighted with baggage.")

Remember how mad this paragraph made you?

And so your biggest hurdle isn't your age, the president's record, your husband, or even Benghazi/Whitewater, etc. It's you, Hillary. You're the problem—that is, if you once again present yourself as an institution of Washington awaiting a political coronation. To win, you must be the anti-Hillary. You need to blast the public's caricature of you to smithereens and replace it with what we know as the Real Hillary.

We're your friends. We love you enough to tell you the truth. Your political advisers and hangers-on mocked our advice to be hyper accessible, honest, authentic, vulnerable, flexible, small, competent, and populist. Take a minute to re-read the 2013 memo. We were very specific, particularly in the closing few paragraphs.

You didn't listen, Hillary. Now look what you've done.

You launched your historic campaign in the worst possible way: walled off from the media and the public – cautious, rigid, and institutional. You may disagree. Your hired guns may have convinced you, for example, that the scripted conversation with selected voters are authentic. They're not. What would be authentic? The Hillary we've long cherished in private: warm, open, and honest – unafraid of making mistakes and owning up to them. We haven't seen that Hillary. More important, the voting public hasn't seen that Hillary. Does she still exist?

Which brings us to the matter of trust. Hillary, this makes us want to cry. We can't figure out why you would compromise the most important commodity of leadership over such banalities. Why take money from foreign nations while serving as secretary of State? Why take money from foreign leaders who hate women? Why not comply with White House rules – fair and ethical guidelines designed to protect the reputation of your family's (wonderful) charitable foundation? You know this has always bothered us: Why would you and Bill blur so many lines between foundation money, your personal finances, and your government work? That's not how you operated in Arkansas.

“I find them informative and appreciate the daily news updates and enjoy the humor as well."Richard, VP of Government AffairsSign up form for the newsletter

And the emails! Why did you need a private server? Why would you violate clear federal and White House rules on email storage, security, and transparency? Who deletes their email, scrubs their server, and ducks subpoenas?

We love you, Hillary, but even we suspect there are foundation-related emails on that server. They may be embarrassing, but we'd like to think they're not nearly as politically damaging as stonewalling.

This version of Total Mail Converter is not registered.

Your CNN interview made us cringe: "Everything I did was permitted." No it wasn't, Hillary. You are either being misled by your team or you're lying. We can't bring ourselves to suspect the latter – and urge you again to hire more honest advisers.

"People should and do trust me." No and no. You've told us yourself: Trust has to be earned, not assumed. And polls show that most Americans think you're dishonest. We've always trusted you, but we can understand why others don't. You've made some poor choices and, rather than fix them, you blamed the GOP and the media. You wouldn't let Chelsea say the dog ate her homework, so why do you think this is a good idea?

We can't make it any plainer: You're the problem, Hillary.

You're also the solution. You can turn this around. You've got some time to restore trust.

Start by handing over the server to the State Department inspector general for review. Let him certify that you had nothing to hide. (Frankly, there are too many holes in your version of events.)

Second, return some of the foreign money donated to the foundation. Not all of it, perhaps, but at least the most egregious stuff – money from bad actors and from people who did business with your State Department.

Of course, that won't stop attacks from Republicans or the carping of cynics in the media like Fournier (what is it with that guy? We made his career!). But it's the right thing to do and the smart thing to do.

Voters today, particularly young Americans, have higher expectations for honesty and authenticity than they did in the 1990s. They also have more information at their disposal. It's not like the good old days when James, Paul, and George could spin a handful of journalists to make a story go away. There are no more gatekeepers, Hillary. There are now 300 million investigative journalists, and you're giving them too much room for doubt.

Trust matters. Don't believe your folks on the morning conference call who tell you it doesn't. They're only worried about winning, because it makes them rich. Winning makes you president, so you need to take the right road to victory.

Staying the course might get you elected (Republicans are fully capable of nominating somebody who makes you the least-worst alternative), but it will leave you a diminished leader: No trust, no mandate, no ability to unite the country or represent more than the most hardened partisans. We're happy to see you adapting populist polices and rhetoric, but even your progressive friends are wondering, "Is she being honest?"

Choose a better course, Hillary. Whenever we hear you gripe about the Clintons being held to a higher standard, do you know what we say to ourselves? "Hell, yes, it's a higher standard, because you should travel a higher road. You're a Clinton!" We expected better. The country needs better. Stop being the problem. Be the Hillary we once knew.

Hillary Clinton's Economic Agenda To Focus On Boosting Middle Class Income: Reports // IB Times // Mark Hanrahan - July 12 2015

Democratic presidential front-runner Hillary Clinton will outline her economic agenda in a speech in New York Monday, placing a strong emphasis on boosting middle class incomes, according to reports.

This version of Total Mail Converter is not registered.

In the speech, at the progressive university The New School in lower Manhattan, Clinton will call for greater wage equality, tax hikes on the rich and raising the minimum wage. In addition, she will argue for policies to encourage workforce participation, especially among women, including paid leave and paid sick days, better child care services and access to education, according to a preview of the speech the campaign gave to the Huffington Post.

In addition, Clinton will urge business to move away from what an aide called “quarterly capitalism” and more towards long-term sustainability.

Another campaign official told the Washington Post that Clinton is to argue that “the measure of our economic success should be how much incomes rise for middle-class households, not an arbitrary growth figure.”

Clinton aims to position herself between Democratic competitor Sen. Bernie Sanders, whose platform is focussed more on redistributing wealth, and Republicans who argue for tax cuts for the wealthy, a policy her aides described to the post as dated, trickle-down economics from Ronald Reagan’s presidency.

Clinton will have to walk a fine line in her speech when it comes to President Barack Obama, who she served under as Secretary of State. While aides told Politico that she will praise the president, for dragging the economy back from the brink of a depression in 2009, the primary focus of her speech will be middle-class incomes that have barely outpaced inflation over the last four decades, a problem she will describe as the defining economic challenge facing the next president.

This could be seen as an implied criticism of Obama's economic record, which Clinton will be keen to avoid, as many of the president's policies are strongly supported by the Democratic base.

Clinton campaign draws in a host of new donors // The Boston Globe // Annie Linskey – July 11, 2015

There’s a man who played a bat-wielding judge on TV known for meting out extreme justice. There’s a group of Yale law professors. And a famously spurned political spouse.

These are some of the new faces that helped Hillary Rodham Clinton’s presidential campaign raise $45 million in its first three months, a period in which her team made a concerted effort to expand her list of givers.

Nearly half of the roughly 70 hosts listed for fund-raising parties Clinton has attended are either new fund-raisers for Clinton or new to the world of presidential politics, a Globe review of records released by the campaign shows.

This fresh crop of hosts, and increasingly hostesses, speaks to Clinton’s ability to swell her reach beyond the circle that backed her 2008 presidential bid. And the campaign’s unusual daily disclosure of its fund-raising harvest is a not-so-subtle way to demonstrate that monied Democrats are coalescing behind Clinton, unlike last time she ran, when she and Barack Obama split elite Democratic donors.

Clinton is also using her long list of well-to-do friends to outpace upstart Bernie Sanders and lock down support that could be tempted away by others. Her events are usually clustered, with at times three fund-raisers stacked back-to-back-to-back on the same day.

Clinton spends about 90 minutes at each of about 50 parties she’s so far attended, according to her schedule and a sampling of hosts who agreed to speak for this story. That’s about 75 hours of face-to-face schmoozing — not counting other types of events or candidate calls the campaign isn't disclosing.

This version of Total Mail Converter is not registered.

"You want to showcase the passion and that you have an army of donors," said Sheila Krumholz, the executive director of the Center for Responsive Politics, a Washington-based group that tracks political giving. "And you want to ward off others from entering."

'We're not hedge fund people. We're regular people who think winning this election is so important.'

One of the most colorful additions to the Clinton fund-raising roster is South Carolina's Akim Anastopoulo, a personal injury lawyer who starred as a judge known as "extreme Akim" in a television show called "An Eye for an Eye."

In the show — whose tag line was "real people, real problems, real revenge" — Anastopoulo would order very unconventional sentences. For example, he once directed members of a rock band to trash a bar after the owner didn't pay their fees.

Anastopoulo had never before given to Clinton; he backed John Edwards in 2007. This time he had about 120 people to his Charleston, S.C., home to meet Clinton.

Clinton's team also tapped Marc Winkelman who publishes Kirkus Reviews, the book review publication. "I have more time to devote this time than I did last time around," said Winkelman, explaining why he's pressing his friends to cut checks for Clinton.

When Hillary Clinton launched her presidential campaign, Winkelman was among the first to give money. He also offered to "host something," as he put it.

"I didn't know what that meant exactly at the time," he said. Among other things, it meant tidying up the garage — a last-minute effort that he and his wife undertook when they realized that Clinton would enter their house from there and not the front door.

Across the country, a group of Yale Law School professors — some with deep personal ties to the Clintons — also put on a presidential fund-raiser for the first time.

"We're not hedge fund people," said Judith Resnik, a law professor whose ties to Clinton go back to the 1980s. "We're regular people who think winning this election is so important."

She and her husband Dennis Curtis (a Yale law professor who knew Clinton from her time at the university) offered to host the party when they learned she'd be in New Haven. "We swooped her up," she said.

Perhaps the most surprising Clinton event hostess was one with a name more typically found in bold in the New York tabloids: Silda Wall Spitzer.

Her party for Clinton was her most public political act since 2008, when she stood stoically by her now ex-husband, former New York Governor Eliot Spitzer, amid his very public infidelity. That performance helped inspire the TV series "The Good Wife."

This version of Total Mail Converter is not registered.

Clinton is planning a third trip to Hollywood to vacuum up cash in August said Democratic fund-raiser Andy Spahn who helped Obama raise money and expects to do the same for Clinton. “No other candidate has much traction out here,” he said.

Clinton’s show of fund-raising strength isn’t likely to affect insurgent Democratic contender Bernie Sanders, who is raising most of his money online and shuns the cocktails-and-checks circuit.

But the donors flocking to the Clinton camp complicate efforts by more traditional Democrats with less online appeal, such as former Maryland Governor Martin O’Malley, former US Senator Jim Webb of Virginia, and former Rhode Island Governor Lincoln Chafee — and even, should he chose to run, Vice President Joe Biden. As one Democratic fund-raiser put it: There are only so many people willing to ask their friends to write $2,700 checks to politicians.

Money raised at these near daily Clinton parties provides the financial spine for the campaign — it is highly regulated cash that the campaign can spend directly. That makes it different from funds raised by the so-called super PAC groups which are allowed to raise and spend unlimited amounts but can’t directly coordinate with the campaign.

One area that is proving awkward for Clinton is her campaign’s effort to raise new cash from people who work in industries that she bashes on the trail. On June 13, at Clinton’s first large-scale campaign rally on New York’s Roosevelt Island, she took rhetorical aim at hedge fund operators, saying that “the top 25 hedge fund managers making more than all of America’s kindergarten teachers combined.”

Twelve days later — again in Manhattan — she held a pair of fund-raisers hosted by people who work for some of those same hedge funds.

About 80 people showed up at the first event — hosted by five women, including two who work for hedge funds and two who work for private equity firms. Also, longtime Clinton donor Sally Susman, an executive with Pfizer, was listed as a host.

About 100 people attended the next one, hosted by Blair Effron, a founder of the investment bank Centerview Partners.

The Clinton’s storied ability to stay in touch with donors over decades means a lot of the names on their first quarter list are familiar.

Two days before Jay Jacobs, the CEO of TLC Kids Group hosted a fund-raiser for Clinton in Florida he penned an op-ed for the Huffington Post defending the Clinton Foundation, which failed to provide the donor disclosures or ethics reviews Hillary Clinton promised when she was being confirmed as secretary of state.

He took on her detractors, accusing them of criticizing her via “innuendo, omission of facts, and through wild speculation.”

Hillary Clinton, a Woman of Her Words // RealClearPolitics // Carl M. Cannon - July 12, 2015

Hillary Rodham Clinton, by her own admission, is running for president of the United States for the fourth time. It apparently doesn’t get any easier.

This version of Total Mail Converter is not registered.

It was back in 1992, while ostensibly stumping for her husband, that Mrs. Clinton told an audience of women, “If you vote for him, you get me.” Bill Clinton himself quipped in New Hampshire that he’d coined a new campaign slogan: “Buy one, get one free.”

Four years later, after Mrs. Clinton had helped staff the administration, fired White House Travel Office personnel, overseen a health care task force, and sat in on cabinet meetings, Americans realized that this co-presidency talk was no joke. This gave some voters pause and others confidence: Either way, the Clintons got a second term. Bill had to retire in 2001, but Mrs. Clinton had already secured a Senate seat in New York—where she’d never lived—as a steppingstone to her third presidential bid in 2008.

She narrowly lost the Democratic Party nomination that year to a phenom from Illinois few people saw coming. Now, during her fourth presidential campaign, it’s clear that Mrs. Clinton still isn’t over it, and that she knows whom to blame. Not Bill, for making the couple’s last two years in the White House an open book on his sex life. Not Barack Obama for cutting in line. Not her own campaign staff for mismanaging their delegate counts.

No, Mrs. Clinton’s animus—the scapegoat for every bad headline, alarming poll number, and impertinent reporter’s question—was on display in Tuesday’s interview with CNN’s Brianna Keilar: It’s all the Republicans’ fault, and by extension, the media’s. This worldview was succinctly expressed in a telling exchange between Keilar and Clinton:

“We see in our recent poll, that nearly six in 10 Americans say they don’t believe that you’re honest and trustworthy,” Keilar asked. “Do you understand why they feel that way?”

“Well,” Clinton responded, “I think when you are subjected to the kind of constant barrage of attacks that are largely fomented by and coming from the right…”

“But do you bear any responsibility for that?” Keilar pressed.

“I can only tell you, Brianna,” the candidate replied, “that this has been a theme that has been used against me and my husband for many, many years.”

It’s an incongruous argument, if you think about it. Clinton is essentially claiming that the mere fact of having a longtime reputation for deviousness is itself exculpatory. The whole interview had a similar quality.

But Clinton has been so cloistered and inaccessible since announcing her 2016 campaign that the fact of the interview was news in itself. She hadn’t taken questions about her secret email system since her March 10 news conference at the United Nations in which she said that the entire reason she set up a parallel email system on a secret server was to avoid the inconvenience of having two cell phones.

She reprised this line Tuesday to Keilar. It seems to contradict a video of Clinton speaking to female Silicon Valley executives that emerged within hours of her U.N. news conference. In answer to the question “iPhone or Android? ,” Clinton replied, “iPhone,” before adding, “In full disclosure—and a BlackBerry.” She continued: “I’m like two steps short of a hoarder. So I have an iPad, a mini iPad, an iPhone and a BlackBerry.”

Nor was her answer to Keilar about why she destroyed records that were under subpoena very forthright. “You're starting with so many assumptions,” Clinton said. “I’ve never had a subpoena. Again, let’s take a deep breath here.”

This version of Total Mail Converter is not registered.

Although critics pounced, it's possible both answers were essentially truthful. Regarding her account of the number of smartphones, Clinton's first answer concerned her state of mind in 2009. The second was in 2015. If she became more tech-proficient in those six years, she'd hardly be the only one.

As for the subpoena, "never" is not the right modifier, but in the context of the question, it seems that Mrs. Clinton was saying that by the time she received the March 4, 2015 subpoena from the House Select Committee on Benghazi she had already wiped her server clean of the 33,000 emails she deemed personal.

Republicans plausibly argue that those emails were already covered by a 2013 subpoena issued to the State Department by the House Committee on Oversight and Government Reform. In any event, almost every expert on federal document preservation, Republican and Democrat, says Clinton skirted legal obligations to preserve all communications relating to her work at the State Department—and that government archivists, not Clinton, arbitrate which are personal and which are official.

Clinton just denies this flatly. "There was no law," she told Keilar. "There was no regulation. There was nothing that did not give me the full authority to decide how I was going to communicate. … When I mailed anybody in the government, it would go into the government system."

Little of this is true. There is a law, and it's called the Federal Records Act, and she followed neither its letter nor its spirit. Moreover, all her emails did not "go into the government system" because many of the people she emailed about State Department business did not work for the U.S. government. In addition, a 2005 State Department rule requires employees to conduct work on an authorized informational system with "the proper level of security control to provide nonrepudiation, authentication and encryption, to ensure confidentiality, integrity, and availability of the resident information."

If all this wasn't clear enough, a 2011 directive issued under her name instructed State Department officials to "avoid conducting official Department business from your personal e-mail accounts." The concern in that instance was foreign hackers, which was prescient, because Clinton's own private email was later hacked.

Once upon a time, Mrs. Clinton had a clearer understanding of why hiding executive branch email looks so bad. "Our Constitution is being shredded," she said in 2007 in reference to Bush administration concealment. "We know about the secret wiretaps, the secret military tribunals, the secret White House email accounts. It's a stunning record of secrecy and corruption, of cronyism run amok."

Clinton to deliver economic speech Monday, with tax policy at issue // Fox News – July 11, 2015

Democratic presidential frontrunner Hillary Clinton is set to give a major economic speech Monday, after weeks of deferring about her plans to improve the U.S economy including whether she'll raise taxes.

The focus of her economic agenda will be to increase middle class income and wages. And she will argue that stagnant paychecks is the biggest challenge facing the U.S. economy.

Clinton's campaign on Saturday provided a preview of her speech, which will also include the argument that the real income of everyday Americans must rise steadily alongside corporate profits and executive compensation.

Clinton declined in a CNN interview earlier this week to say whether she would raise taxes on big corporations or the country's highest wage-earners, as primary challenger Sen. Bernie Sanders has proposed.

This version of Total Mail Converter is not registered.

“I think we have to grow the economy faster and fairer,” she said. “So we have to do what will actually work in the short term, the medium term and the long term. … then, I’ll look forward to the debate.”

While top-tier Republican candidate and former Florida Gov. Jeb Bush has called for an annual growth rate of 4 percent, Clinton will assert that the nation's economy should not be judged by a specific growth figure but rather by how much income increases for middle-class households.

"For a typical working American, their income has not been rising anywhere near as fast as it should be rising, and that is the challenge we face," said David Kamin, a New York University law professor who has advised Clinton's campaign. "It's not a new problem, and it's going to take a holistic vision."

The Clinton campaign said the former first lady and New York senator in her speech at The New School, a university in New York City, will point to economic progress during her husband's two terms in the 1990s and more recently under President Obama.

But she will aim to identify ways of improving upon the uneven nature of the nation's recovery since the Great Recession, bolstering wages even as the unemployment rate has fallen to a seven-year low of 5.3 percent.

Clinton is also expected to begin outlining a series of specific economic proposals this summer on issues like wage growth, college affordability, corporate accountability and paid leave.

In Clinton's approach to the economy, more Americans would share in the prosperity and avoid the boom-and-bust cycles of Wall Street that have led to economic turbulence of the past decade.

Clinton, who is seeking to become the nation's first female president, is also expected to address ways of making it easier for women to join the workforce.

Clinton will attempt to meet the demands of liberals within her own party who are wary of her willingness to regulate Wall Street while inspiring confidence among a larger electorate who will judge her policies if she wins the Democratic nomination.

Progressives encouraged Elizabeth Warren to seek the presidency, but the Massachusetts senator, who has railed against Wall Street and corporate excesses, declined to run. Many of those same liberals are now packing large gatherings held by Sanders, who has made economic inequality the chief plank of his campaign.

Alan Blinder, a Princeton University economist and former economic adviser to Clinton’s husband, President Bill Clinton, said she has expressed interest in policies to curb excessive risk on Wall Street, such as a financial transactions tax on high-frequency trading, taxes on large Wall Street banks based on their risk profile and eliminating the so-called carried interest loophole that allows managers of hedge funds and private equity firms to pay a lower tax rate than most individuals.

Clinton has said she will take nothing for granted in the primary contest, but the economic message will allow her to begin contrasting herself with Republicans.

In recent speeches, she has portrayed the Republican presidential field, including Bush as supportive of "top-down" economic policies and large tax breaks for the wealthy.

This version of Total Mail Converter is not registered.

"They're back to the trickle down, cut taxes on the wealthy and everything will be fine," Clinton said last week in Iowa. "This will be the biggest economic debate, because they know the only way they can win the White House back is to somehow convince voters that what we have done didn't work."

Union Leaders Will Finally Have Their Day With Hillary

Union Leaders Will Finally Have Their Day With Hillary // The Daily Caller // Connor Wolf – July 11, 2015

Democratic presidential hopeful Hillary Clinton has had a tough time gaining union support, but with an upcoming private meeting, she may soon have the chance to prove herself.

Source for Reuters say the meeting will be part of ongoing efforts by the AFL-CIO to determine who to endorse for the 2016 presidential election. The union, like many throughout the labor movement, has been hesitant to back Hillary. This despite her being the frontrunner for the Democratic party.

The meeting is expected to take place during a union executive council gathering in Maryland between July 29-30.

The tilt away from Hillary boils down to President Barack Obama's recent efforts on trade. Unions, hoping to make the Trans-Pacific Partnership (TPP) an important campaign issue, have put pressure on Hillary to take a firm stance against the trade agenda. After a long delay, all unions got from her was a request for the president to work better with Democratic lawmakers.

Leadership within the AFL-CIO will get its change to press her on trade and other lingering issues during the private meeting. It may also give Hillary the chance to defend her positions or lack thereof. The meeting could prove to be critically important for Hillary.

Unions wield considerable political influence and are some of the most generous contributors during campaigns, especially to Democrats. If enough unions decide not to officially endorse Hillary, it could be devastating for her campaign.

Though the AFL-CIO seems to be giving Hillary the chance to prove herself, many within the labor movement have already given up on her. Outgoing Communications Workers of America President Larry Cohen joined many smaller unions last week and endorsed self-proclaimed socialist Sen. Bernie Sanders for the Democratic nomination. The retiring labor movement icon even said he plans to volunteer for his campaign.

AFL-CIO President Richard Trumka, however, has warned against endorsing him. This despite Trumka also criticizing her over trade. In early June he sent a memo to the leaders of associated unions telling them not to endorse Sanders.

During its executive council gathering in Maryland, the union is also expected to meet separately with Hillary Democratic rivals Sanders and former Maryland Gov. Martin O'Malley.

Despite not yet demonstrating a strong position on trade, Hillary has still tried in other ways to court unions. She prominently showed off union-made gear in May during the official launch of her online campaign shop, and she urged people to stand firmly for unions during a speech in Chicago.

This version of Total Mail Converter is not registered.

Hillary Clinton Hammers Local Officials Over Immigration // Breitbart // Javier Manjarres – July 11, 2015

The shooting death of 32-year-old Kathryn Steinle on a San Francisco, California, pier has taken another twist, as the gun used to kill her appears to belong to a federal agent.

Convicted felon Francisco Lopez-Sanchez, the illegal immigrant who has been deported back to Mexico on five separate occasions and has been accused of shooting Steinle, said that the gun he found wrapped in a shirt accidentally went off.

His public defender is also saying that the shooting looks to be accidental.

Democrat presidential candidate Hillary Clinton used her primetime interview on CNN to excoriate San Francisco authorities for ignoring the Department of Immigration and Customs Enforcement (ICE) request to turn over Sanchez to them: "The city made a mistake, not to deport someone that the federal government strongly felt should be deported."

One of Clinton's Republican presidential rivals, Donald Trump, has also been critical of law enforcement officials in San Francisco and has taken full advantage of the tragic incident, using it to back up his claims blaming Mexico for sending "rapists" and "killers" into the United States.

Hillary Clinton Will Center Economic Proposals on Increasing Middle-Class Income // Slate // Daniel Politi – July 11, 2015

Hillary Clinton will begin to outline her economic agenda on Monday, when she is scheduled to make clear that her campaign will revolve around how to increase incomes for middle-class Americans. Increasing the wages of working-class Americans has emerged as the "defining economic challenge of our time," a Clinton aide said, according to the New York Times. Campaign staffers gave details of the speech to the press, noting that Clinton would advocate for paid family medical leave, a higher minimum wage, and more profit-sharing in private companies.

The speech will come at a time when the more left-leaning Democrats are making their voices heard by backing Bernie Sanders. But the preview of Monday's speech makes it clear Clinton "will strike less of a rabble-rousing tone than Sanders, challenging "top-down" Republican policies without suggesting that capitalism is inherently rigged against families on the bottom," notes Politico.

Rather than going after any intraparty challenger though, Clinton is expected to say that while Republicans advocate growing the economy, they don't care whether that means middle-class families will be better off. "She firmly believes that yes, we have to grow, but we have to grow together," a campaign official said, according to the Wall Street Journal.

In addition, Clinton is expected to call for more stringent rules on Wall Street and tax reform in an effort to get companies to focus on long-term strategy rather than quarterly profits. But "it's not a jihadist speech against them," a longtime Clinton policy adviser tells Bloomberg. "It's not that people are doing crazy things that are evil. It's more like, they're not doing things that are helpful in the long term. There's a problem when the last thing a CEO wants to do is invest in their business and raise wages."

Clinton's speech is largely expected to be more about vision than strategy, with the specifics on how to turn proposals into reality expected to be rolled out over the next few months.

This version of Total Mail Converter is not registered.

Clinton plans Cedar Rapids party Friday // The Des Moines Register // Tony Leys – July 11, 2015

Hillary Clinton plans to host a public kick-off party in Cedar Rapids on Friday afternoon, before she appears with rival Democratic presidential candidates at a state party event that evening.

The Clinton party is scheduled to start at 3:45 p.m. Friday at Cedar Rapids' Veterans Memorial Building, the campaign said Saturday.

The former secretary of state and New York senator also will appear Friday evening at the Iowa Democratic Party's Hall of Fame dinner at the Cedar Rapids Convention Center. Also slated to appear are former Maryland Gov. Martin O'Malley, Vermont Sen. Bernie Sanders and former Virginia Sen. Jim Webb.

OTHER DEMOCRATS NATIONAL COVERAGE

DECLARED

O'MALLEY

SANDERS

Class or Ideology? My Conversation With Bernie Sanders // NYT // Nate Cohn – July 9, 2015

"Everything I'm telling you may end up being wrong," Bernie Sanders, the Vermont senator seeking the Democratic nomination for president, said early in our conversation on Thursday.

I had written an article concluding he had slim chances of winning the nomination, based on the limits of his ideological appeal. Mr. Sanders was building a coalition of liberals, as have past liberal anti-establishment Democrats, and it was likely to fall short.

But Mr. Sanders, who has surged in the polls against Hillary Clinton, called to advance a different theory of the race. "I look at these things more from a class perspective," he said.

"I'm not a liberal. Never have been. I'm a progressive who mostly focuses on the working and middle class."

The difference between a liberal and a progressive focused on workers might seem slim, but it nonetheless shapes how he envisions the potential of the political coalition he hopes to assemble. He believes he can mobilize a working-class coalition spanning ideological divides.

"Ordinary people are profoundly disgusted with the state of the economy and the fact that the middle class is being destroyed and income going to the top 1 percent."

Many of these people "may not be liberal" or may not "agree with me on gay marriage," but "they want a fighter,"

This version of Total Mail Converter is not registered.

he said in the cordial conversation.

The issues that could potentially rally disaffected lower- and- middle-class voters “cross traditional liberal-conservative lines,” Mr. Sanders argued. He is in a good position to raise these issues, he said, citing his positions on trade, issues affecting older Americans and the minimum wage.

If Mr. Sanders did build a coalition of working-class voters, it would look a lot different from the coalitions assembled by recent liberal Democratic primary candidates. It would be positioned to do far better among Hispanic, black and less educated white voters than recent anti-establishment Democratic challengers, like Barack Obama, Howard Dean, Bill Bradley and Jerry Brown.

In fairness to Mr. Sanders, few, if any, recent Democratic candidates represented the economic, populist left. The anti-establishment candidate of the last four competitive primaries all featured challenges from intellectual, professional-class liberals. Mr. Brown, Mr. Bradley, Mr. Dean and Mr. Obama — each educated at some point at an Ivy League university — all fared well in Marin County, Calif., and Greenwich, Conn.; none appealed much to voters in the Appalachians or along the Rio Grande.

Even the candidate who came closest to running as a populist, John Edwards, fared best among voters in Iowa and South Carolina who made more than $100,000 per year. He did do well among conservatives in relatively conservative areas, like South Carolina or along the Iowa-Missouri border, but it is hard to say whether that was a reflection of his policy views or his identity as a Southern white man, perhaps especially when running against a black man and a white woman.

But so far, Mr. Sanders’s support looks a lot like the liberal coalitions assembled by those other candidates. His support is as closely tied to ideology as that of any recent Democratic candidate.

In Iowa, a Quinnipiac poll shows Mr. Sanders ahead by four percentage points among “very liberal” voters, but trailing by 43 points among nonliberal Democrats.

In New Hampshire, a CNN/WMUR/UNH survey showed Mr. Sanders leading by seven points among “liberal” voters, but trailing by more than 20 points among nonliberal voters.

These figures follow the pattern of Mr. Obama’s support among nonblack voters in his 2008 primary against Mrs. Clinton. Mr. Obama excelled among liberal groups, but struggled among less liberal voting blocs, like Hispanics or older and Southern white voters. He made up for it with exceptional strength among black voters, one of the least liberal groups in the Democratic Party.

So far, there are few signs that Mr. Sanders is faring especially well among working-class Democrats. Neither the Iowa nor the New Hampshire poll showed any significant differences in support between higher- and lower-income voters, or more or less educated voters.

Mr. Sanders’s campaign has taken him to bastions of liberalism, like Madison, Wis., and Portland, Me., where past liberal challengers have fared well. He has not held rallies in the working-class communities where Mr. Brown or Mr. Bradley faltered, like Fresno, Calif., or Scranton, Pa. Mr. Sanders’s most recent stop outside of the early states was to Arlington, Va., one of the country’s most affluent counties. The median household income there sits near $100,000.

When asked why his campaign was struggling to attract the working-class, less liberal voters he thought he might be reaching, Mr. Sanders acknowledged the challenges facing his campaign. “I’m not well known in the African-American community, despite a lifelong record,” he said, acknowledging one of the most consistent critiques of his chances. “That’s a real issue, and I have to deal with it.”

This version of Total Mail Converter is not registered.

“I’m running against Hillary Clinton, who is one of the best-known people in the world,” he said.

Mr. Sanders is certainly not as well known among the party’s moderate and working-class voters as he is among liberal voters, but the huge gap in support between liberal and less liberal voters far exceeds the difference in name recognition.

Mr. Sanders draws hope from his experiences in Vermont, where he says liberals “have not been the strongest supporters.” It’s where he has found a base among working-class voters.

But it is not clear that his experience with white working-class voters in Vermont will be repeated nationally. Mr. Dean, Mr. Obama and Mr. Brown all carried Vermont in their primary campaigns. Mr. Bradley fell short in Vermont, winning 44 percent of the vote, but it was his second-best state. (He lost all 50 states against Al Gore in 2000.)

Despite their success, all those candidates struggled among white working-class voters outside of a few northern states, like Oregon and Wisconsin.

As Mr. Sanders puts his theory to the test, he is confident. “At the end of the day, you may be right,” he said. “I believe that you will see, maybe, you’re wrong.”

Sanders Courts Martha’s Vineyard Donors // NYT // Jonathan Martin – July 11, 2015

Senator Bernie Sanders of Vermont has risen in the polls thanks in part to his denunciations of the forces of concentrated wealth, drawing thousands of liberals to hear his jeremiads against corporate power in early nominating states and liberal hubs such as Madison, Wis.

But Mr. Sanders quietly stepped off the campaign trail this weekend to visit Martha’s Vineyard, a favorite summer destination of the country’s elite, in order to mix with representatives of some of the same interests he inveighs against in his stump speech.

Mr. Sanders attended the annual Democratic Senatorial Campaign Committee fund-raiser on the Massachusetts island, a popular gathering that draws some of the most prominent business lobbyists and fund-raisers in the Democratic Party.

One prominent attendee, a supporter of Hillary Rodham Clinton’s presidential campaign, suggested Mr. Sanders’s appearance suggested he was more pragmatic than his rhetoric would let on.

“Bernie is attracting throngs and has a wave going preaching against the one percent,” said the attendee, requesting anonymity to speak candidly. “So why would he take the weekend to spend in Martha’s Vineyard with wealthy people who are donating at least $37,000 and change to the DSCC?” (That is the minimum contribution to the Senate Democrats campaign arm in order to attend the event).

The criticism illustrates the rising irritation among some establishment-aligned Democrats with Mr. Sanders, an independent who caucuses as a Democrat. Some in the party are personally fond of Mr. Sanders, but believe his challenge of Mrs. Clinton, the overwhelming front-runner, is quixotic and will serve chiefly to push Mrs. Clinton to the left and delight Republicans hoping the former secretary of state has to spend money on a primary threat.

This version of Total Mail Converter is not registered.

Asked about Mr. Sanders's appearance at the fund-raiser, his spokesman, Michael Briggs, said he would not recalibrate his populist language in the wealthy enclave.

"The people who financially support the Democratic Party need to hear the message that Bernie is giving all over the country and that is resonating all over the country," Mr. Briggs said. "It is also important that the Democrats take back the Senate."

Democrats need to win four seats next year, five if they do not win the presidency, to reclaim control of the Senate.

Anthony Weiner Isn't Buying Bernie Sanders' Presidential Bid // HuffPo // Ashley Alman – July 11, 2015

Unsuccessful New York City mayoral candidate and former Rep. Anthony Weiner admitted Saturday that he just doesn't get Sen. Bernie Sanders' (I-Vt.) bid for the Democratic nomination for president.

Weiner -- acknowledging his wife, Huma Abedin, is a longtime aide to Sanders' challenger Hillary Clinton -- wrote in a column published by Business Insider Saturday that he doesn't understand why the independent senator is vying for the support of a party "he always avoided joining."

"After a career of steadfastly insisting that the Democratic party was not his home, now he wants to not only be a member of the party but its standard bearer? What changed?" Weiner asked in the column.

Weiner described serving in Congress with Sanders in the early 2000s, saying he satiated his homesickness for the five boroughs by challenging Sanders on his party affiliation, often igniting a "bombastic reaction" from the senator.

"He would tell me that I shouldn't confuse the fact that our voting records generally matched with party agreement," Weiner wrote in the column. "He was a proud socialist and thought the institutional Democratic Party was too cautious and lacking imagination. As much as I prodded, I would never get him to think about joining the Democrats for a moment."

Sanders launched his bid for the Democratic nomination for president in April. He's said he characterizes himself as an "independent Democrat." While Sanders has been open about his discomfort with the Democratic Party, he recognizes the "dilemma" of trying to run as a third-party candidate, given the organizing power of the Republicans and Democrats.

The senator stands 40.4 points behind Clinton, according to HuffPost Pollster, which aggregates all publicly available polling data:

Sanders draws early support for White House bid from long-time union allies // Fox News – July 11, 2015

Democratic presidential candidate and Vermont Sen. Bernie Sanders is getting support from unions members across the county that includes a mix of long-time political backers and potential voters apparently wary of party frontrunner Hillary Clinton's relationship with Wall Street and Big Business.

This version of Total Mail Converter is not registered.

Sanders has already gotten support from one of the country's most influential labor leaders, Larry Cohen, the outgoing president of the roughly 700,000-member Communications Workers of American.

Cohen cited Clinton's failure to publicly oppose giving President Obama so-called "fast-track" approval on trade deals under the pending Trans Pacific Partnership legislation, which unions argue, if approved, would send manufacturing jobs overseas.

He also told The Huffington Post that organized labor is not a rubber stamp for the Democratic Party "and certainly not for corporate Democrats."

And the grassroots group Labor for Bernie 2016 has already pulled support from hundreds of union members with similar concerns.

"While we come from different unions and backgrounds, our goal is a government that carries out the will of the people, not prop up the profits of the 1 percent at the expense of the rest of us," reads a letter on the group's website that already has 1,109 signatures.

Some AFL-CIO chapters have also expressed support for Sanders, including ones in South Carolina and Vermont, which has resulted in group President Richard Trumka reminding state and local divisions of the labor federation that only national leadership can announce an endorsement, as reported first by Politico.

Though Trumka was in fact citing existing bylaws, the announcement was seen by some as an attempt to quell the Sanders uprising, considering Clinton and her well established campaign, right now, have a much better shot at beating Republicans in the 2016 White House race.

Democratic-leaning strategist Kelly Grace Gibson told FoxNews.com this week that Clinton and Sanders each have a grassroots following, though perhaps not composed of exactly the same people or groups. And she argued that a unified endorsement like the one the AFL-CIO gave President Obama late in his 2008 primary race against Clinton has a bigger impact.

"The purpose of the whip-cracking is … Trumka is trying to maintain the importance and weight of the endorsement," she said.

Republican leaning strategist and lobbyist Matt Keelen say that "at the grassroots level, most Democrats, at least those being talked about in the news anyway, are not particularly thrilled with (Clinton's) corporatist, crony capitalist, Democratic strategy."

Clinton, Sanders and fellow Democratic candidate Martin O'Malley, a former Maryland governor, reportedly have been invited to meet privately and separately with the members of the AFL-CIO's executive council when they gather in late July in suburban Washington.

Meanwhile, Sanders, a progressive, continues to draw large crowds at campaign events, including 10,000 recently in Madison, Wis., more than 2,500 in Council Bluffs, Iowa and 7,500 this week in Portland, Maine.

Sanders also has significantly cut into Clinton's lead, according to a recent CNN/WMUR New Hampshire primary poll.

This version of Total Mail Converter is not registered.

The poll shows Sanders has cut the lead from 38 percent to 8 percent in roughly the past two months, 43-to-55-percent, compared to 51-to-13 percent in May.

That Sanders is now getting union support and financial backing is no surprise, considering he has been a long-time champion for organized labor.

The top-5 campaign committees and leadership PACs for Sanders since 2009 are Sheet Metal Workers ($27,500); Communications Workers of America ($23,000); American Postal Workers ($20,000) Unite Here ($20,000) and Machinists/ Aerospace Workers Union ($20,000), according to OpenSecrets.org.

The group LaborUnionReport.com also conducted an informal survey recently in which respondents favored Sanders over Clinton 76 percent to 11 percent and reportedly cited such factors as Clinton's silence on the trade pact, her having worked for the Rose law firm, which helped employers fight unions and her having been a member of the Walmart board of directors.

Still, Sanders, a self-described socialist, will have a difficult path to victory even if he wins the union endorsement, considered essential for any Democratic presidential candidate.

Beyond Clinton's much larger war chest, she also has a far bigger and more-organized campaign operation and Capitol Hill endorsements.

The Hill reports Clinton has endorsements from at least 26 of the 69 Democrats in the Congressional Progressive Caucus.

"I think it's clear to say that Clinton is the candidate for most members of Congress and the Democratic establishment," Sanders told the newspaper.

Bernie Sanders picking up steam in early primary states, could give Hillary Clinton a scare // NY Daily News // Cameron Joseph – July 11, 2015

Berniementum is building in the early primary states — and capturing the imaginations of liberal activists across the country.

Vermont Sen. Bernie Sanders has emerged as the clear early favorite of progressives resistant to Hillary Clinton's charms in Iowa and New Hampshire, and he's drawing big crowds.

"He has certainly picked up some buzz," said former Iowa Democratic Party Chairman Scott Brennan.

Sanders trailed Clinton by just 8 percentage points with Democrats in a recent New Hampshire poll from CNN, and by 19 points in a recent Quinnipiac University poll of Iowa, though Clinton has had larger leads in other state-level polling.

Sanders recently drew 10,000 people to a rally in liberal Madison, Wis., and thousands have gathered to see him from Maine to Minneapolis. With little organization, he raised $15 million in his first three months as a candidate — one-third of what Clinton brought in but a hefty sum driven by small online donations.

This version of Total Mail Converter is not registered.

Still, it remains to be seen whether Sanders, a quirky, 73-year-old self-described democratic socialist, can give Clinton a real scare.

His fans point out he was talking about income inequality long before it became cool and is tapping into a cultural moment of fury with what he calls the “billionaire class.”

And he’s channeling the emotions of Democrats who think Clinton is too careful on the trail and cozy to Wall Street.

We are worried about him, sure. He will be a serious force for the campaign, and I don’t think that will diminish.

“Hillary sounds more presidential because she talks in shades of gray. But Bernie Sanders has the luxury of talking in black and white, and that’s exciting,” said Thomas Henderson, the chairman of the Polk County Democrats, Iowa's largest county organization.

Sanders’ cantankerous, doom-and-gloom style delighted roughly 400 progressive activists gathered Thursday in Arlington, Va., who chanted, “Bernie! Bernie!”

Clinton’s campaign says it’s taking his rise seriously, though public comments may be aimed at raising expectations for Sanders.

“We are worried about him, sure. He will be a serious force for the campaign, and I don’t think that will diminish,” Clinton communications director Jennifer Palmieri said on MSNBC on Monday.

Polls show that Democrats like Clinton, but they’re having trouble getting excited about her.

“Right now 2016 feels more like a slog,” said Brennan. “She’s been a public figure for a long time. So it’s a little harder to generate that newness and enthusiasm that Barack Obama was able to capture and Senator Sanders is capturing now.” But much of Sanders’ momentum comes from consolidating the insurgent liberal vote that has long failed to pick the Democratic nominee.

Many compare his rise to past left-wing insurgents who flamed out like Howard Dean in 2004 and Bill Bradley in 2000.

A supporter cheers at a campaign rally for Sanders in Madison, Wis., where he drew 10,000 people.

“Sanders for now has become the candidate of progressive New Hampshire Democrats and progressives elsewhere,” said University of New Hampshire Professor Dante Scala.

Sanders’ campaign recognizes the challenge of expanding his base of support past hardcore white liberal activists.

“He’s quickly rising in the early state polls where voters are actually paying attention,” Sanders strategist Tad Devine said. “Now it’s the question of can we expand the scope of his appeal to the broad constituencies of the

This version of Total Mail Converter is not registered.

Democratic Party — African-American voters, Latino voters, women, young voters."

Sanders recently addressed the National Association of Elected and Appointed Latino Officials, is heading to the National Council for La Raza's annual convention next week and will soon head to the Southern Christian Leadership Conference's annual gathering. Devine points out he has a long civil rights history, dating back to his getting arrested at 1960s protests.

Sanders' campaign thinks he can make Clinton squirm by forcing her to respond to policy proposals like free college education and raising taxes on the wealthy. Clinton refused to say whether she agreed with Sanders' call to raise taxes on the wealthy, instead promising to outline her economic proposals on Monday.

But it's not clear that the Clinton operation is all that alarmed. Her campaign has been girding from the start for a challenge from the left. She has made a point to embrace economic populism and to focus on issues key to minority groups, who will be key players in later primary states. And her campaign is gearing up with a massive ground game — her field operation in Iowa alone has almost as much staff as Sanders' entire campaign.

Democratic observers remain skeptical that Sanders has any chance to catch Clinton.

"For a while, it has been a foregone conclusion in many people's minds that she will be the nominee, and any time you inject some excitement into the race it takes on a life of its own. How deep that goes I don't know," said New Hampshire AFL-CIO President Glenn Brackett.

Weiner: Sanders 'needs to explain' why he's running as a Democrat // The Hill // Mark Hensch – July 11, 2015

Former Rep. Anthony Weiner (D-N.Y.) is skeptical of Bernie Sanders' hunt for the Democratic presidential nomination in 2016.

Weiner wonders why the Independent Vermont senator plans on switching his party affiliation next election cycle, according to a Business Insider op-ed published Saturday.

Weiner charged that Sanders has never expressed a desire to become a Democrat before entering the 2016 race.

"He was a proud socialist and thought the institutional Democratic Party was too cautious and lacking in imagination," he said of his time in Congress with Sanders.

"As much as I prodded, I would never get him to think about joining the Democrats for a moment."

Weiner noted that Sanders' reluctance to go Democrat earlier leaves the party's voters with unanswered questions about his motivations.

"What exactly does he think he's doing in a Democratic presidential primary?" Weiner asked. "Why is he asking for the nomination of a party he always avoided joining?"

"After a career of steadfastly insisting that the Democratic Party was not his home, now he wants to be not only a member of the party but its standard bearer?" he asked. "What changed?"

Weiner also speculated Sanders' newfound interest in the party may be a strategy for improving his chances in next year's presidential election.

"Is Bernie's newfound party affiliation just a practical decision to run in a party that can win rather than risk being a Nader-esque spoiler in a third party line next November?" Weiner asked.

This version of Total Mail Converter is not registered.

"That's a fair calculation, but doesn't it wipe away Bernie's three decades of standing as a principled socialist?"

Weiner did acknowledge that he believes "Bernie is right about a lot of things."

"He is right that a Medicare for All healthcare plan is a simpler, cheaper and more American solution to our healthcare needs than a jury-rigged system that is better under ObamaCare but still has too many gaps," he said.

"And his battle cry on behalf of working Americans is almost as good as Hillary Clinton's," he said of Clinton, the Democratic presidential favorite, also his wife Huma Abedin's employer.

"In spite of all this, if Bernie wants to lead this party, he needs to explain what he's doing here in the first place," Weiner added.

Weiner also said he believes Sanders addresses a desire for progressive ideas within the Democratic electorate.

"There's no question Bernie's leftist agitating is filling a void in this primary process," he said.

"The Democratic Party has a strong primal scream element right now," Weiner said. "It expresses itself in frustration that the high expectations of change that came with President Obama have not been met."

"It howls at the failure of candidates who hew to the middle of the road and it feels the need to counter the batshit crazy it sees dominating the debate on the other side of the aisle," he added.

Bernie Sanders becoming a problem for Hillary; tramples all over her talking points // Biz Pac Review // Tom Tillison – July 11, 2015

Democratic presidential contender Bernie Sanders continues to gum up the works in the coronation of Hillary Clinton as the party's nominee for the 2016 election.

Sanders' latest trespass was to walk all over Clinton's talking points in response to Republican presidential candidate Jeb Bush's comment that Americans "need to work more hours."

Taking Bush's comment out of context, Clinton, the so-called champion of the working class, took a cheap shot at the Republican:

Enter Sanders, an open socialist, who has been refreshingly candid on the campaign trail — and drawing plenty of interest.

Taking Bush's comment at face value, that part-time workers need full-time jobs, he trampled on Clinton's spin in an interview Friday on CNN.

"Of course we need full-time jobs rather than part-time jobs," Sanders said.

"If he [Bush] is talking about the need for more full-time jobs than part-time jobs, that's absolutely correct," he added.

This version of Total Mail Converter is not registered.

The muffled popping sound heard around that time was of heads exploding at Team Hillary. A social media user summed it up well by asking how long it would be before Sanders becomes “too big a problem” for Clinton.

UNDECLARED

OTHER

Dem senators call for executive action on gun control // The Hill // Alex Bolton – July 11, 2015

Connecticut Sens. Chris Murphy and Richard Blumenthal, both Democrats, have called on President Obama to take executive action to close a “loophole” in federal gun control legislation.

The so-called “default to proceed” rule under the Brady Handgun Violence Prevention Act allows firearm dealers to sell a weapon to an individual if they have not been notified by the FBI of a buyer’s criminal background within three business days.

If the background check has not been completed within three days, the dealer has discretion to sell the firearm.

The rule allowed Dylann Roof, the alleged killer of nine people at a predominantly black church in Charleston, S.C., to purchase a gun even though he was arrested on a felony drug charge and admitted to possessing drugs.

"We shouldn't give known criminals the benefit of the doubt when it comes to guns. If law enforcement needs more than three days to ensure they're not giving weapons to dangerous people, Washington must allow them the time to do their jobs,” Blumenthal and Murphy said in a joint statement.

“If we refuse to act, we're just biding time until this happens again."

The criminal background check on Roof was not initiated until two days after Roof first attempted to purchase the gun and did not discover his admission of drug possession until five days later.

FBI Director James Comey told reporters Friday that Roof “should not have been allowed to purchase the gun he allegedly used that evening,” referring to the deadly June 17 attack.

Republicans, however, blame the failure to bar Roof from obtaining a gun on “bureaucratic bungling” and say additional regulation is not necessary.

“It’s disastrous that this bureaucratic mistake prevented existing laws from working and blocking an illegal gun sale. The facts undercut attempts to use the tragedy to enact unnecessary gun laws,” Senate Judiciary Committee Chairman Chuck Grassley (R-Iowa) said in a statement.

An FBI examiner faxed a request for information on Roof’s arrest to the wrong county’s sheriff’s office.

Comey has announced a 30-day investigation into the matter.

GOP

DECLARED

This version of Total Mail Converter is not registered.

BUSH

Jeb and the Nation of Takers // NYT // Paul Krugman – July 11, 2015

Maybe we were unfair to Mitt Romney; Jeb "people should work longer hours" Bush is making him look like a model of empathy for the less fortunate. All the obvious points apply: longer hours would mean more GDP (if and when the economy ever gets back to full employment), but not necessarily better lives, especially if the increase in GDP doesn't trickle down.

But I think it's also important to understand where this is coming from. Partly it's Bush trying to defend his foolish 4 percent growth claim; but it's also, I'm almost certain, coming out of the "nation of takers" dogma that completely dominates America's right wing.

At my adventure in Las Vegas, one of the questions posed by the moderator was, if I remember it correctly, "What would you do about America's growing underclass living off welfare?" When I said that the premise was wrong, that this isn't actually happening, there was general incredulity — this is part of what the right knows is happening. When Jeb Bush — who is a known admirer of Charles Murray — talks about more hours, he's probably thinking largely about getting the bums on welfare out there working.

As I asked a few months ago, where are these welfare programs people are supposedly living off? TANF is tiny; what's left are EITC, food stamps, and unemployment benefits. Spending on food stamps and UI soared during the slump, but came down quickly; overall spending on "income security" has shown no trend at all as a share of GDP, with all the supposed growth in means-tested programs coming from Medicaid:

But isn't there an epidemic of people declaring themselves disabled? Actually, no. You have to bear in mind the reality that people don't stay perfectly healthy until they reach 65, or 70, or whatever age plutocrats think they should work until. As all of us pre-seniors can attest, things start to go wrong with increasing frequency all along the life cycle; sometimes they can be managed, but often they can't, especially for manual workers. And if you look at age-adjusted disability rates, they have been flat or even declining:

But none of this will, of course, make any dent in the right-wing narrative: they just know that the rising number of bums on welfare is a problem, even though there basically isn't any welfare and there are no more bums than there ever were.

Jeb bests Hillary in American worker tweet-off // CNBC // Larry Kudlow – July 11, 2015

Jeb Bush is right and Hillary Clinton is wrong. You can probably say that about a lot of things. But in this case, it's about the need for more part-time American workers to work full-time in order to improve their own lots as well as the lot of the economy.

The mini spat started when Jeb Bush short-handed the point that "people should work longer hours" in a meeting with New Hampshire's Union Leader. Hillary Clinton then tweeted, "Anyone who believes Americans aren't working hard enough hasn't met enough American workers."

A few hours later, Bush clarified his position with his own tweet: "Anyone who discounts 6.5 million people stuck in part-time work and seeking full-time jobs hasn't listened to working Americans."

Bush is right about Americans needing to work longer hours. He's also right that there are far too many involuntary part-time workers — 6.5 million today compared to a pre-recession 4.2 million. These folks are stuck because of economic reasons, traceable in large part to a slow-walking recovery and a variety of government policies that are discouraging full-time work.

This version of Total Mail Converter is not registered.

Much of this is reflected in the U-6 unemployment rate, which is the total unemployed plus people marginally attached to the labor force as well as those who are part-time for economic reasons (could only find part-time work, slack work or business conditions, etc.). That unemployment rate was 10.5 percent in June, nearly double the 5.3 percent headline unemployment number (the U-3 unemployment rate). The unusually wide spread between these rates, in part, reflects discouraged people who want to work and can't find a job, and, in part, the people who want to work more but can't get longer hours.

And Jeb Bush was probably also thinking about the low labor-force participation rate, which stands at a rock bottom 62.6 percent compared to 66 percent in 2008.

I don't know which candidate is "closer to the people," but Bush is closer to the statistical truth — at least as registered by the Bureau of Labor Statistics. In other words, facts.

So, Bush is basically saying: There are too many part-timers, they would like to work longer, and if they had that opportunity, they and their families and the economy would benefit.

I still believe these labor-market problems are deeply rooted to this slow-paced recovery. We never had the snapback that other deep recessions produced. And there are a number of ill-conceived tax, regulatory, and monetary policies that have discouraged work, undermined incentives, and created obstacles to the kind of 4- or 5-percent growth that should have occurred over the past six years.

For example, means-tested small entitlements — like overextended unemployment insurance, Social Security disability insurance, and food stamps — have clearly perverted work incentives. Eligibility has been substantially raised and time limits have been removed. So in many cases, on a net after-tax basis, it pays more not to work.

Then there's Obamacare, which throws off a million economic disincentives. But here's one that goes directly to the Jeb Bush part-time employment issue: the so-called 29ers. If an employee works 29 hours a week, the employer does not have to purchase health care. So instead of working 34.5 hours a week, the long-term trend, you now have a lot of people at 29 hours or less because of bad government health-care policy.

By the way, economist Ed Lazear, the former chairman of the Council of Economic Advisers under President George W. Bush, estimates that every one-tenth of an hour less worked costs the economy between 350,000 and 400,000 jobs.

We don't yet know all the details of Jeb Bush's economic plan. But on the campaign trail, he's talking about fixing how we tax and regulate, a broken immigration system, and unleashing a domestic energy revolution.

And we know he favors a 4 percent economic-growth target as a means of recovering from past policy sins and restoring American opportunity and prosperity for all. Governor Chris Christie has adopted the same target. It's way too early to endorse, but both of these gentleman have the story right.

Hillary, so far, has it wrong.

Sununu: Jeb Bush is 'less forgiving of slights' than his father // Yahoo News // Jon Ward – July 11, 2015

This version of Total Mail Converter is not registered.

John H. Sununu, the former governor of New Hampshire who was White House chief of staff to President George H.W. Bush for most of Bush's only term in office, has a new book out arguing that Bush should have a more venerated place in American history. In "The Quiet Man: The Indispensable Presidency of George H.W. Bush," Sununu argues that Bush's presidency was far more successful, and consequential, than he is given credit for.

Sununu writes that Bush's quiet, humble style, his belief in the importance of personal diplomacy, and his ability to get along with others and reach compromise were crucial to easing the collapse of the Soviet Union and the transition in Eastern Europe from communist rule. Those qualities were key to assembling the coalition that helped push Iraqi dictator Saddam Hussein out of Kuwait in 1991. And, he argues, they made it possible for Bush to productively work with the overwhelmingly Democratic-controlled Congress.

Yahoo News spoke with Sununu at his home in Hampton Falls, N.H., where six of his eight children, and 13 of his 16 grandchildren, live within a 10-minute drive. Below is an edited transcript that has been shortened for brevity and clarity.

Yahoo News: In the words of Larry King, it's a terrific book, I'm gonna start reading it tonight. Did you notice that he said that?

John H. Sununu: [Laughs] Yeah, I know Larry well. We're old New York baseball team fans. Larry was a Dodger fan. I was a Yankee fan.

Still are?

Yeah, I'm a die-hard loyalist.

How do you describe yourself when someone asks you where you're from? Because you've got Greek, Palestinian.

Yeah, my dad's family was Palestinian, Greek Orthodox community. They came to Boston in 1904. He was born in Boston, was in the import and export business, ended up doing a project in Cuba. I was born in Cuba. You know, that's the family. It's a little complicated.

On the Cold War, the shorthand that I think most people have in terms of their memory of it is that Reagan called for the wall to come down and down it came.

Between that and the reality, there's a lot that happened.

Well, at the most I think Bush gets credit for managing the transition, but I think the intent of your book seems to argue that he was a catalyst, if not a responsible manager.

You know, anything as significant and as complicated as that doesn't happen by accident. A lot of people think it would have been automatic. But one of the important points that nobody pays attention to — but you can get a lot of it out of Gorbachev's book ["Memoirs"] — is that he was always fighting internally the hard-liners who were just looking for an excuse to get rid of him and to stop it all. And the art form that Bush had was understanding that reality and easing it, handling it, really, with a very careful touch that allowed it to happen. … He produced a change that really did change the world.

This version of Total Mail Converter is not registered.

You mention emotions a fair amount in the book. It seems like you think that overemotionalism is often a problem, whether it's in government or media or whatever. You think that's a modern phenomenon?

I've never thought of it in that context, that it was sort of an absolute. There are times —

You mentioned Gingrich, you mentioned Dan Rather.

There are times when people let their judgment be sometimes detrimentally influenced by their emotions, and great leaders have control of that. And it happens both ways. Some people, in an effort to mimic what they think is good practice, don't let emotions be enough of a part, and some people let it be too much of a part. To rally a nation in difficult times, can you imagine, how could Churchill have rallied England if he didn't use a little bit of emotion, you know? So somebody else in that role could have underplayed the emotional part.

How long did you work on this book?

About a year. I kind of put the framework together in three months, and then I spent nine months getting it right, going to the library, working with the library people, going through my own records.

There's a lot of implicit criticism of Reagan.

I really didn't mean it as criticism. I meant it to set the tone of the moment. I think Reagan was a great president. … In order to understand the climate that Bush came into, you really have to at least put into context the last couple of years of the Reagan administration, in which things got difficult. He got hit with Iran-contra, the savings and loan problem started to get to be serious, although nobody really understood how serious it was. His relationship with Congress got soured, partially because of Iran-contra. Some of his European allies began to give him a tough time, Mitterrand in particular. So there was a context of the time that Bush comes into as the successor and people have to understand that … he had to clean up certain things, particularly savings and loan and the relationship with Congress. If he didn't fix the relationship with Congress, nothing really could have happened.

What Bush inherits in his election is a situation that needs to be fixed. It's not a criticism of Reagan. It happens to two-term presidencies all the time. The great work of most presidencies is done in the first years.

It seems like a major theme of the book is that oftentimes people who do things well but aren't flashy about it don't really get the credit.

That is a very important theme of the book. And it's an important theme in American politics, because quite often people follow the shiny object of hot rhetoric instead of effective governance. We've become a hot-rhetoric political society, and hot rhetoric doesn't always achieve results.

Why do you think that is?

That's a good question.

I blame television.

This version of Total Mail Converter is not registered.

I'll blame media in general, not just television. I think social media has amplified it. And look, media is very powerful in politics. Roosevelt discovered the radio, Kennedy discovered network TV, Clinton discovered cable TV and Obama discovered social media. Discovered in the sense of learned how to effectively use it.

They're all Democrats.

And they're all Democrats. So when your message is weak, you can overcome it by tugging at the emotions. And so the emotional side of politics has become very important.

You seem to hate the press in some respects.

No, there are certain components of the press that I lost a lot of respect for, where they are more concerned about a story that will sell a paper or get ratings on television than they are about the impact that that story might have...

I was struck by the point in your book where you talk about the conversations you had with Bush's advisers leading up to '92, where you were telling them that Bill Clinton was going to be the nominee —

My message to them was, "Here's a guy who's a real political animal, who has a fire in the belly, and who knows how to communicate with the electorate." And I thought Cuomo wanted to be coronated, and if he didn't get coronated he wouldn't run.

Is there anybody in the field now who you feel has that same hunger and fire in the belly to be president, same qualities as Bill Clinton?

I don't want to talk about specific candidates in this field. Everybody's trying to find me, get me to say something that becomes the equivalent of an endorsement, and I have too many friends running. I am not going to — I am trying extremely hard not to endorse.

That was a good way to try to get you to do it, though, right?

Well, a little amateurish, but that's all right. [Laughs]

A little amateurish? It wouldn't be a Sununu interview without an insult.

[Laughs] I mean, don't launch if you can't take return fire [laughs, slaps table]. It's all done in good humor, you know.

You also said to Larry King that Jeb is like his mother. Why?

I think Jeb is a little bit more [long pause] — less, less forgiving of slights by others. Barbara is the tough — if somebody attacks George Herbert Walker Bush, Barbara remembers that forever. And I think Jeb has a little of that.

This version of Total Mail Converter is not registered.

It's going to be an interesting election.

One would hope that the country decides to go for substance rather than style. They made that mistake last time.

And that is Marco Rubio's greatest weakness.

Yeah, but remember he was also speaker of the House [in Florida], so he had to herd cats. I give him credit for that. He had to deal with the legislature from more than just a member's perspective. So Marco is more experienced than people give him credit for. I'm not endorsing him or anything, but I'm just saying don't underestimate that trait.

Jeb Bush's mind-blowing fundraising haul in one chart // Business Insider // Brett Logiurato – July 11, 2015

Former Florida Gov. Jeb Bush's (R) nascent campaign said Thursday that it had raised an eye-popping $11.4 million in the first 16 days he was official candidate for president.

On top of that, the super PAC supporting Bush's run for president, Right to Rise PAC, said it had hit its goal of raising $100 million through the first half of the year. Charlie Spies, the PAC's treasurer and general counsel, said it had raised more than $103 million from January 6 to June 30.

The numbers make Bush's campaign by far the best funded of any presidential candidate — even Democratic front-runner Hillary Clinton. Clinton's campaign raised $45 million in her first 81 days as a candidate, according to her campaign. But outside groups supporting her have raised only about $24.3 million, according to Bloomberg.

Here's a look at how they fare head to head. Combining the totals from the campaigns and outside groups supporting the candidates, the Bush corner has raised about $114 million, compared with just less than $70 million for Clinton.

In his 16 days as an official candidate, meanwhile, Bush raised approximately $760,000 per day. Clinton has raised about $555,555 each day.

RUBIO

With no clear base of support, Marco Rubio gambles on a broad approach // WaPo // Sean Sullivan – July 11, 2015

Lunch was about to be served, and Marco Rubio was working the room — hard. He mocked surprise that one table's cookies were left untouched. He posed for a photo and teased, "I even held my stomach in!"

This is not considered Rubio territory, but he is campaigning with urgency in Iowa anyway. He spent Tuesday through Thursday hopscotching from happy hour to cookout to meet-and-greet, and plans to return for more of the same this week as well.

He doesn't have much of a choice. It's been nearly three months since Rubio launched his presidential campaign amid lofty expectations from many Republicans, who view the youthful Cuban American senator from Florida as the party's best hope for a rapidly changing electorate.

This version of Total Mail Converter is not registered.

But polls show he hasn't made a dent in the leads enjoyed by Wisconsin Gov. Scott Walker and former Florida governor Jeb Bush in the first four primary states. Bush, meanwhile, just announced a massive $114 million fundraising haul, while Walker is set to officially kick off his campaign Monday.

So Rubio has embarked on a strategy to compete in each of the four early states of Iowa, New Hampshire, South Carolina and Nevada. The hope is to strike it big in at least one by cobbling together a diverse coalition of Republican voters. It is perhaps the best option for a contender who, unlike Bush and Walker, has neither an obvious path to the nomination nor a clearly defined base of support.

After focusing heavily on fundraising leading up to the June 30 quarterly deadline, Rubio is forging a bigger presence on the campaign trail. His swing through Iowa was his most extensive visit here since launching his bid in April. He also traveled to Nevada on Friday for a two-day visit, and his campaign has reserved TV advertising time in all four of the early states.

Central to Rubio's pitch is an emphasis on his youthfulness and an optimistic, if imprecise, vision of the future. At 44, Rubio is among the youngest candidates.

"Quite frankly, I'm the only one running up to now that is running on this message that the future is now. It is here. And we cannot be left behind by it," he said at a Wednesday morning stop in Urbandale where a packed dining room of Republicans tucked into pancakes and sipped coffee.

One of them was Sharon Clearman, 72, of Johnston, Iowa. Rubio impressed her, but she also likes Walker. "He did a big thing," Clearman said.

Her reference was to Walker's moves to curtail the power of public unions. It made him a national conservative icon and won him deep loyalty from activists.

Rubio does not have any political accomplishments of similar magnitude. Asked to name his signature achievements in government after lunch at the Cedar Rapids Country Club, he responded with a mixed list: the policy blueprint he wrote as a state lawmaker and legislation he pushed in the U.S. Senate to support girls in developing countries and hold Veterans Affairs accountable.

Those who have seen Rubio speak have noticed his emphasis on the future.

"Senator Rubio is just more overt saying, 'I'm going to take you to the future, and then look at my record if you don't believe I've done that,'" Iowa Republican Party Chairman Jeff Kaufmann said, "whereas [Ted] Cruz and Walker are saying, 'Look at my record, I'll take you to the future.'"

If Rubio is suffering from a resume deficit compared to Walker, he suffers from a major resource deficit against Bush, who is leading in New Hampshire. A pair of outside groups backing Rubio have raised about $32 million, less than a third of the amount raised by a super PAC allied with Bush. Rubio's campaign has not yet released its total.

This version of Total Mail Converter is not registered.

Rubio's team says it is playing a long game. The plan is to introduce him to as many voters as possible because of his talent as a communicator. If other candidates stumble, supporters believe Rubio would be poised to move up.

"I think this guy is the guy who can win," said Ed Failor Jr., an Iowa conservative activist supporting Rubio. "I think he's a guy who has an ability to speak to a group and keep their attention."

Rubio's attempt to stay in the mix for the long haul is evident in his cautious rhetoric. Last week, for example, he declined to say whether he backs Congress giving Puerto Rico the ability to file for bankruptcy like municipalities in the states. Bush has said that right should be granted. It's a sensitive topic pitting many Latino voters against conservatives who oppose such a move.

Meanwhile, Rubio's reliance on his youth and freshness sometimes prompts a comparison considered unflattering in Republican circles.

"You are an extremely articulate, energetic, bright, young first-term senator. That reminds me of somebody eight years ago," one man told him at the Urbandale breakfast. The crowd chuckled, instantly recognizing the reference to President Obama.

Rubio argued forcefully that Obama was a "backbencher" in the Illinois legislature while he was the Florida House speaker. Rubio also noted that he has served longer in the U.S. Senate than Obama had when he launched his White House bid.

"There are major differences between me and the person who is there now," he concluded.

The policy differences between Rubio and many of his Republican competitors are harder to spot. Rubio is running as a staunch military hawk like most of his opponents. On immigration — which is again consuming the party as an issue — Rubio has backed away from support for comprehensive reform he once backed in the Senate.

With so many GOP candidates, it's become nearly impossible for Rubio, or anyone else, to monopolize a certain position. And that makes it difficult for him to separate himself from the pack.

"I've got the field narrowed from 15 to maybe six or seven," said Patrick Williams, 48, a ninth-grade teacher from West Des Moines.

Rubio is one of them.

Rubio revisits childhood in Vegas, calls Putin a criminal // AP // Kimberly Pierceall – July 11, 2015

Republican Sen. Marco Rubio called Russian President Vladimir Putin a criminal on Saturday in a presidential campaign speech less focused on foreign and domestic policy than recounting his parents' immigrant experience to voters in his childhood hometown.

"He is a dangerous person," Rubio said of Putin, "and we should never be under any illusions as long as he runs that country."

This version of Total Mail Converter is not registered.

When GOP presidential candidate Donald Trump visited Las Vegas on Saturday, he said he could be pals with Putin and that "I think we would get along very, very well."

Rubio's immigrant parents, who came to the U.S. from Cuba, found jobs in the casino industry in Las Vegas. The Florida Republican would visit Henderson, about a half-hour drive from Las Vegas, as a child.

"When I grew up, there was nothing out here but an ice skating rink," he told an audience at a sprawling golf course and retirement community. Watching the nuclear war movie "War Games" as a child, he said he fretted when actor Mathew Broderick's character picked Las Vegas for a target.

Rubio, 44, largely repeated the family story he related Friday to the Libertarian-leaning FreedomFest gathering in Las Vegas, saying that his parents embody the American dream and that he was indebted to the United States. Running for president is his way of repaying his obligation, he said.

Rubio received the most applause from the retirees when he vowed that as president he would make sure that "we will remain the single most powerful military force the world has ever known" by competing with other nations that are investing billions in new military technology.

He also elicited applause when he promised to repeal and replace President Barack Obama's Affordable Care Act.

On a local issue, Rubio repeated his stance that Yucca Mountain in Nevada remains the only option for eventually storing the country's nuclear waste. Many people in Nevada oppose the project, and its senior U.S. senator, Harry Reid, has vowed that Yucca Mountain not become the nation's nuclear dump.

Rubio Focuses On Cuban Immigrant Upbringing In Vegas Talks // AP – July 11, 2015

Florida Sen. Marco Rubio says he is indebted to America and running for president is his way of repaying his obligation.

The 44-year-old Republican candidate told the Libertarian FreedomFest audience on Friday how his parents made their way from Cuba to Las Vegas, where they found jobs in the casinos. Rubio says his parents embody the American dream.

Rubio told several hundred voters in a suburban retirement community on Saturday that as president he would make the U.S. the single greatest military superpower by competing with other nations that are investing billions in new military technology. He also promised to repeal and replace President Barack Obama’s Affordable Care Act.

Rubio also repeated his stance that Yucca Mountain in Nevada is currently the only option for storing the country’s nuclear waste.

Rubio starts winning over voters — in Spanish // The Washington Times // Kellan Howell – July 11, 2015

Marco Rubio increased his popularity among latin voters on the campaign trail in Iowa this week, chatting with a woman from San Salvador in Spanish.

This version of Total Mail Converter is not registered.

The woman, Claudia Steele, who is now an American citizen and voter, told Mr. Rubio that she was the only Latina member of her local Republican organization.

The 2016 GOP contender responded, “Hay que cambiar eso,” meaning “We need to change that,” ABC news reported Friday.

The 44 year-old Florida Senator was welcomed openly by the Spanish speakers who came out to meet Mr. Rubio over the course of his three-day trip through the Hawkeye state.

According to 2003 U.S. Census bureau data, just 5.5 percent of the population of Iowa identifies as Hispanic or Latino, but many came out to support Mr. Rubio this week.

Mr. Rubio and fellow GOP candidate and former Florida Gov. Jeb Bush’s ability to speak in Spanish is helping the two gain popularity with Latin voters, while Donald Trump continues to receive backlash over comments comparing illegal immigrants to rapists and drug dealers.

“It helps him communicate and connect with the community,” Ms. Steele said of Mr. Rubio in an interview with ABC News.

Marco Rubio would ban abortion if elected, compares it to slavery // The Examiner – July 11, 2015

Of all of the social issues in American politics, a woman's right to choose and abortion are close or at the top of the list. With the issue almost completely split down party lines, the difference between a Republican or Democrat in the White House is crucial to the cause.

More Americans continue to support access to abortion in all or some cases. According to the most recent numbers by Gallup, 80 percent of Americans now support abortion in all or certain circumstances. Only 19 percent said that it should be illegal across the board, with 1 percent having no opinion. Despite these numbers, Republican presidential hopeful Sen. Marco Rubio spoke at the National Right to Life Committee’s annual convention in New Orleans on July 10, and pushed his pro-life stance hard, as reported by Right Wing Watch.

Promising to restrict a women's right to choose "at home and around the world," Rubio called Roe v. Wade, the Supreme Court decision that made abortion legal, "historically and egregiously flawed" to the cheers of the crowd. The Florida Senator continued, claiming that fighting for an unborn fetus was the same as fighting to eliminate slavery.

"Sometimes in contemporary American life, we come to believe that all the great causes are over, that the past generation fought all the important battles: abolition, the Civil Rights Movement, women’s suffrage...but it's not true. In face, one of the most important battles is the one that you are engaged in now."

Rubio has a long history of being anti-choice, from voting against stem cell research, to supporting a mandatory ultrasound before an abortion. If a Republican like Rubio does find his way into the White House, with control of both houses of Congress, women's rights in the United States might be taking a few steps back.

PAUL

This version of Total Mail Converter is not registered.

Paul raises $7 million for White House run // The Hill // Alexander Bolton – July 11, 2015

Sen. Rand Paul (R-Ky.) has raised $7 million since launching his White House bid in April, mostly through small-dollar donations.

Paul, a Tea Party favorite who inherited a national grassroots fundraising network from his father, former Rep. Ron Paul (R-Texas), received money from 108,205 donors, according to his campaign.

Eighty-five percent of his total came as contributions of $50 or less, and 96 percent came in increments of $100 or less. His average donation was $65.

Breitbart.com first reported the figures.

Paul's fundraising haul lags behind rivals like former Florida Gov. Jeb Bush, who raised $11.4 million in just over two weeks in June. Right to Rise USA, a super PAC supporting Bush, has collected $103 million this year.

Sen. Ted Cruz (R-Texas), who is vying with Paul for Tea Party voters, raised $14.2 million since announcing his campaign in March. Super PACs aligned with Cruz have raised $37 million.

But Paul can point to broad grassroots support as a sign that his campaign has wide appeal even though he has had trouble finding GOP mega-donors to back him.

New York hedge fund manager Robert Mercer is expected to pour tens of millions into the race to help Cruz, and Miami businessman Norman Braman will spend up to $25 million to help Sen. Marco Rubio (R-Fla.).

Super PACs supporting Rubio have raised more than $31 million, according to the Washington Post.

CRUZ

The New York Times says Ted Cruz's book has high sales because of 'strategic bulk purchases' // Reuters – July 11, 2015

Republican presidential hopeful Ted Cruz says his book "A Time for Truth" is a legitimate bestseller and on Friday challenged The New York Times to prove its contention that the tome's high sales were due to bulk buying.

In a statement on his campaign website, the Texas senator said The Times should apologize or release evidence of its analysis. He said he was being kept off the bestseller list because the newspaper is politically biased against him.

New York Times spokeswoman Danielle Rhoades Ha said the company stands by its statement on Thursday that Cruz's book did not meet the standards for its bestseller list, "which includes an analysis of book sales that goes beyond simply the number of books sold."

"In the case of this book, the overwhelming preponderance of evidence was that sales were limited to strategic bulk purchases," the statement said.

Cruz's campaign denied there were any strategic bulk purchases and said booksellers at events on his campaign tour had long lines for people buying "A Time for Truth: Reigniting the Promise of America" and getting it autographed by the candidate.

This version of Total Mail Converter is not registered.

The campaign also pointed to sales on Amazon, where the Cruz book was the ninth bestseller in the political category. They also said Cruz's book was No. 3 on Nielsen BookScan's list of top-selling books this week.

Nielsen did not immediately respond to an emailed request for comment.

Cruz demands NY Times apologize for 'lying' about 'A Time for Truth' sales // Washington Times // Kellan Howell – July 11, 2015

Ted Cruz's campaign blasted The New York Times on Friday after it was revealed that the Texas Senator's new book, "A Time for Truth" would be kept off the bestseller list, despite reported sales putting the book at No. 3 on the list.

The GOP presidential contender's book reportedly sold 11,854 copies in its first week, more than "all but two of the Times' bestselling titles," Politico reported Thursday.

The Cruz campaign released a statement on Thursday titled "New York Times is Lying" and called on the Times to release their evidence for compiling the bestsellers list or issue a formal apology.

"Their decision to blackball Cruz's book suggests that the Times very much does not want people to read the book," the statement said.

The Times recently claimed in a statement that they excluded Mr. Cruz's book because "the overwhelming preponderance of evidence was that sales were limited to strategic bulk purchases."

Mr. Cruz's campaign responded that this claim was "false, and the Times knows it. There were no 'strategic bulk purchases."

Mr. Cruz spent last week on a nation-wide book tour, signing copies of his book at multiple locations. Booksellers at each event had long lines—sometimes over 400 people per event," the statement said.

Campaign spokesman Rick Tyler called on the Times to release evidence proving their claim or "issue a public apology to Senator Cruz and Harper Collins editor Adam Bellow for making false charges against them."

The Times has not yet responded to the claims.

Ted Cruz fights back: Campaign calls on 'lying' NY Times to release evidence of bulk book sales // BizPac // Michael Dorstewitz – July 11, 2015

Sen. Ted Cruz's presidential campaign and publisher HarperCollins are calling out The New York Times as liars.

Sales figures suggest Cruz's book, "A Time for Truth," should be in the No. 3 spot on the newspaper's list of bestselling books.

The Times is now saying it refuses to include the book on its coveted list because "evidence" suggests the sales figures were bloated by “strategic bulk purchases.”

This version of Total Mail Converter is not registered.

Tina Andreadis, HarperCollins’ publicity director, released a statement to BuzzFeed News on Friday indicating that the publisher conducted a thorough investigation and “found no evidence of bulk orders or sales through any retailer or organization,” according to the Washington Free Beacon.

When the issue first arose, the Times indicated the book didn’t meet the newspaper’s bestseller criteria.

“We have uniform standards that we apply to our bestseller list, which includes an analysis of book sales that goes beyond simply the number of books sold,” Times spokeswoman Eileen Murphy wrote. “This book didn’t meet that standard this week.”

When asked for specifics, Murphy replied: “Our goal is that the list reflect authentic best sellers, so we look at and analyze not just numbers but patterns of sales for every book.”

When pushed further, Murphy replied, “In the case of this book, the overwhelming preponderance of evidence was that sales were limited to strategic bulk purchases,” according to Politico.

The Cruz campaign isn’t mincing words. It’s calling the paper a liar.

CHRISTIE

Reuters: Christie Now Third in Poll // Newsmax // Sandy Fitzgerald – July 11, 2015

Donald Trump and Jeb Bush are in a virtual dead heat atop the field of 2016 candidates seeking the GOP nomination, but the quickest rise has been for New Jersey Gov. Chris Christie, who has been placing low in most polls but marked a third-place finish in a new Reuters-Ipsos poll released Saturday.

The numbers show Bush, a former Florida governor, hanging on the top by just a hair, with 16.1 percent of respondents in an online poll of Republicans. Billionaire real estate developer Trump squeezed in just behind Bush with 15.8 percent of the respondents.

But Christie rose up to take third place with 9.5 percent of the vote, after announcing his candidacy on June 30.

Christie was followed in the Reuters poll by:

Kentucky Sen. Rand Paul at 8.1 percent;

Surgeon and author Ben Carson at 7.2 percent;

Wisconsin Gov. Scott Walker at 5.8 percent;

This version of Total Mail Converter is not registered.

Former Arkansas Gov. Mike Huckabee, 5.5 percent;

Former Texas Gov. Rick Perry, 5.3 percent;

Texas Sen. Ted Cruz, 5 percent;

Florida Sen. Marco Rubio, 3.9 percent;

Louisiana Gov. Bobby Jindal, 2.1 percent;

Former NY Gov. George Pataki, 2 percent;

Former Pennsylvania Sen. Rick Santorum, 1.6 percent;

Former Hewlett-Packard CEO Carly Fiorina, 1.6 percent;

Ohio Gov. John Kasich, 1.4 percent;

South Carolina Sen. Lindsey Graham, 1.3

However, when voters were given a choice of three candidates, Bush, Trump or Rubio, Bush led with 42 percent of the voters, followed by 28.4 percent for Trump and 20 percent for Rubio. Christie was not included in that part of the poll.

When it came to Democrats in the poll, former Secretary of State Hillary Clinton remained with a comfortable lead of 48.3 percent of the self-identified Democrats polled, but Vermont Sen. Bernie Sanders is gaining ground, earning 22.9 percent. Vice President Joe Biden, who has not entered the race, still got 10.7 percent of the prospective voters.

Overall, according to Real Clear Politics average of established polls, Bush is hanging on to the lead by 5.8 percentage points over the other challengers. Walker, who has not announced his candidacy, is in second, and Carson is in third place overall. Christie is in 10th place according to overall polling, and Trump is in sixth.

In the Reuters/Ipsos poll of the Republican race, 404 self-identified Republicans age 18 or over were questioned from July 6-10. The poll had a credibility interval, a measure of accuracy, of 5.7 percentage points.

In the Reuters/Ipsos poll of the Democratic race, 504 self-identified Democrats age 18 or over were questioned over the same time period, with a credibility interval of 5.1 percentage points.

PERRY

This version of Total Mail Converter is not registered.

July 11, 2015

At two coffee shop meet-and-greets in Knoxville and Oskaloosa on Saturday, Republican presidential candidate and former Texas Gov. Rick Perry urged voters to look at his executive and military experience.

Perry's central message was his record: He referenced his time serving in the military when discussing the current size of the military and foreign policy, and the conservative judges he appointed to the Texas Supreme Court when discussing the recent Supreme Court ruling on gay marriage.

There was regular applause and nods of agreement from the largely conservative crowds at both locations when Perry spoke of the need for a large military, limited government and strict adherence and interpretation of the Constitution.

"He thinks along the same lines that we do. Everything he supports, we support," said Darrell Rogers, a 74-year-old retired resident of Oskaloosa.

Perry also spoke of his experience securing the border and improving the high school graduation rate in Texas without subscribing to federal programs like No Child Left Behind and Common Core.

Many listeners were receptive to his message of experience. "I think being governor has given him experience in the art of presiding, not just shooting from the hip like we have currently," said Terry Bradley, a 60-year-old guitar player from Newton. "He's created jobs and he's got the education system."

"I really liked it when he said no one gave him a blueprint of how to deal with the crisis of like when the space shuttle fell down in east Texas and when Hurricane Katrina people came over. That was kind of impressive. I like how he said he had to deal with tough issues," said Bryan Johnson, a 42-year-old resident of Oskaloosa.

Perry also stated, when referencing the shooting by an undocumented immigrant that occurred last week in San Francisco, that he would cut funding to "sanctuary cities" — cities that have passed laws prohibiting law enforcement officers from detaining suspects on order from immigration authorities.

At the event

Settings: Coffee Connection in Knoxville and Smokey Row in Oskaloosa

Crowds: Both coffee shops were packed, primarily with conservative supporters.

Reaction: Crowds greeted Perry enthusiastically and applauded multiple times as he talked.

What's next: Perry will have six campaign stops all over Iowa in the next week, ahead of his appearance at the 2015 Family Leadership Summit in Ames on Saturday.

Rick Perry is Running for President — Here is What He Has Raised so Far in 2015 // IJ Review // Meagan Vazquez – July 11, 2015

Former Gov. Rick Perry's campaign announced Friday that they've raised just over $1 million in less than a month, adding onto a total of $18 million from outside, independent PAC supporters.

This version of Total Mail Converter is not registered.

In a statement, the 2016 presidential candidate's campaign manager, Jeff Miller, said:

"Americans are looking for a tested leader with an optimistic vision for the future, and we are pleased with the broad support Gov. Perry is receiving across the country…Governor Perry is well positioned and between the campaign and independent sources, the necessary funds will be in place to run a competitive, successful campaign."

By comparison, in 2012, the Texas Republican received $19,707,936 overall.

However, the new Perry total looks meager next to this campaign season's biggest fundraisers. Jeb Bush raised $114 million in the first six months of 2015, while Hillary Clinton has raked in $45 million.

GRAHAM

Lindsey Graham Speaks Against Clinton and Trump Over Immigration // Latin Post // Roberto Ontiveros – July 11, 2015

Republican presidential hopeful Lindsey Graham is speaking out about his fellow candidates and their stands on immigration.

Responding to Hillary Clinton's recent comments that none of the Republican presidential candidates currently support a pathway to citizenship for undocumented immigrants, Graham said that he does not "need a lecture from Hillary Clinton about immigration reform." Speaking to CNN about Clinton and President Obama's own record of inaction regarding Immigration, the South Carolina Republican senator wants to remind "everybody who cares about immigration reform" that when Obama and Clinton had a chance to transform the system neither lifted a finger.

Graham spoke about participating in various bipartisan "gangs" that worked on immigration reform, and had no recollection of Clinton being a part of any of the discussion

"I don't remember seeing her at the table. She never came to any of the meetings I was at. She was a public voice in 2009. I never remember her saying, 'wait a minute, President Obama, you promised to do immigration reform, honor your promise.' She didn't say a word," Graham said.

This is only the latest jab at Clinton, as a few days earlier the South Carolina senator spoke on "Fox & Friends" about the former Secretary of State's avoidance of the press.

"I think it's the lack of confidence in her ability to distinguish herself from Barack Obama," he said as reported in Politico.

Graham laments that the GOP is in "is in a hole with Hispanics," and places the blame squarely on the shoulders of celebrity real estate magnate turned politician Donald Trump.

"I don't need a lecture from Donald Trump or anybody else about border security," Graham said.

"Here's the mistake. You're right to point out a broken immigration system, but you're wrong to say the following: That of the 11-plus million illegal immigrants, most of them are rapists and drug dealers. Most of them are good, hardworking people, cleaning our toilets, picking the crops that we all enjoy, changing the beds and working three or four jobs in the shadows to try to keep their family afloat."

This version of Total Mail Converter is not registered.

SANTORUM

Santorum: I'll Use Immigration To Go For Workers' Votes // Breitbart // Ian Hanchett – July 11, 2015

Republican presidential candidate and former Pennsylvania Senator Rick Santorum said immigration is a "good example" of an issue that could be used to get workers' votes and touted his record on the subject on Friday's "Hannity" on the Fox News Channel.

Santorum argued, (relevant remarks begin around 9:45), "if you look at the issues that I've been talking about. I announced from a, you saw it, I announced from a factory floor in western Pennsylvania. We're going to go right after those workers."

He continued that he "absolutely" wants to go after the votes of union workers, and "you go after all workers who feel like neither party cares about them. Immigration's a good example of that. I know Donald Trump is getting a lot of attention on the immigration issue. But if you look at the organizations that are the pro-worker immigration groups like NumbersUSA and FAIR, you know who has the only A rating [from NumbersUSA] of any of the candidates including Donald Trump? ... Rick Santorum. In fact, there's only one other candidate, and that's Scott Walker, who's got a B-, but nobody else has a better than a C grade [note: Trump does have a C+, every other candidate has a C or lower]. So, I think we're — while people may have nice rhetoric, we're the ones that have the right policies that are going to connect with American voters."

CARSON

Clinton Foundation donor-owned Politico publishes hit piece on Dr. Ben Carson // Breitbart // Michael Patrick Leahy – July 11, 2015

On Tuesday, Politico ran an article with this blaring headline: "Ben Carson's Godly Riches: He reaped $2 million in fees from Christian groups in 2014 alone. Now he wants their votes."

The headline, which implies some sort of hypocrisy on Dr. Carson's part, is belied by the actual content of the article.

"Clearly if you were to read in great detail Politico's article, they are clearly only admonishing Dr. Carson in their headline and not the true substance of their story," Armstrong Williams, Dr. Carson's business manager, tells Breitbart News in an exclusive interview.

"The reason being they truly had nothing to report," Williams notes.

Politico, which is owned by Clinton Foundation donor Robert Allbritton, failed to point out in the article that during that same time period Hillary Clinton charged speaking fees ranging from $200,000 to $325,000, and Bill Clinton charged $250,000 for his average speaking fee. In 2010, Bill Clinton was paid a $500,000 speaking fee by a Russian company. Even former first daughter Chelsea Clinton charged speaking fees of $65,000, well in excess of Dr. Carson's fees.

This version of Total Mail Converter is not registered.

In 2014, Dr. Carson's speaking fees ranged from $12,320 to $48,500.

During roughly the same period of time that Dr. Ben Carson earned $2 million in speaking fees, Bill and Hillary Clinton together earned $25 million in speaking fees.

The actual facts of Dr. Carson's 2014 speaking engagements reported by Politico do not match the article's somewhat sensationalist headline.

One fundraiser at which Carson spoke "brought in a net profit of $150,000," after Carson's fee was paid, the article reports.

At another fundraiser, the host organization was very pleased with the outcome of Carson's speaking engagement. "He did a really good job for us in bringing in people who may not have known about HopeWorks," the group's executive director Ron Wade told Politico.

"They couldn't find anything negative or controversial about Dr. Carson's speaking engagements," Carson's business manager Williams says.

When asked about Politico's failure to report the vastly higher speaking fees charged by Hillary, Bill, and even Chelsea Clinton, Williams is quick to point out Politico's bias.

"Without a doubt the good Dr. Carson is held to a different standard," Williams says. "It's nitpicking by Politico. There's really nothing negative they can report."

The Politico bias, Williams argues, is as apparent from the people the authors chose not to interview as it is of those they chose to interview.

"Politico could not find anyone who was not satisfied with Dr. Carson's speaking engagement. Imagine the many individuals interviewed for the article that were not included, because they had high praise for the good doctor."

Williams' comments support the perception that Politico is often a "mouthpiece" for establishment Republicans as well as the Democrat elites. "A lot of these sources Politico used are coming from within the establishment," he says.

Carson's strong showing in the polls has had an impact on his rivals for the Republican Presidential nomination, Williams argues. "Republican establishment candidates are very threatened by Dr. Carson," he tells Breitbart News. "The establishment media consistently are searching for phony reasons to negate his immense popularity," he adds.

From a strategic perspective, Carson offers something establishment Republicans can't provide—appeal to disaffected conservative voters.

"Dr. Carson is popular among many conservative Christians and Millennials who did not vote in the last presidential election," Armstrong says.

This version of Total Mail Converter is not registered.

Currently, “outsiders” like Dr. Carson, Donald Trump , Sen. Ted Cruz (R-TX)96%

, and Carly Fiorina appear to be gaining traction, while more establishment- oriented candidates appear to be languishing.

“That article is trying to negate the progress and phenomenal gains Dr. Carson is making as an outsider,” Williams says.

The popularity of “outsider” candidates in the Republican Presidential primary field is likely to continue its upward movement in spite of Politico’s transparent and unsuccessful attempts to discredit them.

Carson: Illegal immigrants should become guest workers if they register, pay taxes and back taxes //
Breitbart – Ian Hanchett – July 11, 2015

Republican presidential candidate Ben Carson said there was no “rational reason” for sanctuary cities while saying border security doesn’t necessarily mean “you have to build fences and walls” and advocating for allowing illegal immigrants in the US to become guest workers if they register, pay back taxes, and pay taxes going forward on Friday’s “Your World with Neil Cavuto” on the Fox News Channel.

Carson began by saying, “a number of us are extremely concerned about this whole sanctuary city mess, but even more importantly, the illegal immigration problem that we have. I’ve spoken very strongly about that, and we need to go ahead and solve the problem. We have the ability to do it. We don’t have the will to do it.”

He continued, “What I would do is I would secure the borders, north, south, east, and west. That does not necessarily mean you have to build fences and walls. We can take advantage of electronic surveillance, drones, and a variety of technological features. And then, part two is we have to turn off the spigot that dispenses the goodies. If there’s no goodies, there’s no reason for people to try to breach our security wall, that takes care of the people coming in, but then you have the 11 plus million who are here already. What I would do is allow them to become guest workers. If they register, and they get involved in a back tax program and taxes going forward. That does not make them citizens. This does not give them the right to vote. If they want to do that, they can get in the back of the line and go through the process just like everybody else.”

When asked if he would outlaw sanctuary cities, Carson answered, “I certainly don’t think that there’s any rational reason for sanctuary cities. I’m glad there’s focus on them now, because I would like the people who advocate for them to come out and tell us exactly why we need them, and I can tell them 100 reasons why we don’t.”

Carson then addressed the racism charges against advocacy against sanctuary cities and the rhetoric of Donald Trump, saying, “It’s a very easy political football, the racism trick. Basically, anything that involves people of two different races, now is because of racism, and it’s just the way to drive wedges, like we’re driving wedges in between gender, we’re driving wedges from income, we’re driving religious wedges, driving intergenerational wedges. Why are we falling for this? You know, we the American people are not each other’s enemies. It’s the people who are driving all the wedges where are the enemies, divide and conquer is their strategy. We have to be smarter than that.” And “I like people who are willing to say what they believe. It’s perhaps gotten me in some trouble over the last several months, but I’m still going to say what I believe. I’ve learned how to tone it down a little bit so people can actually hear what I’m saying and not just focus on the words, but that’s a skill that people learn with the course of time. But there’s no question that we in the process in this country have given away all of our values and principles for the sake of political correctness, and as a result of that we’re in a tailspin.”

He continued, “I think the Republicans actually need to engage in this conversation. A few weeks ago, went to the National Association for Latino Elected Officials, got a conference in Las Vegas, spoke to them, told them that I wasn’t changing my speech because I’m in front of a different audience, and presented lots of different programs. I said I know you guys aren’t just interested in immigration, and they were very receptive, and I got another lot of very warm comments. I think we have to go into all the different communities and we have to talk, we have to present logical reasons for people to not buy into the propaganda that is utilized to simply keep them in a state of dependency and control and and culling their votes. We don't want to that, people are smarter than that.

This version of Total Mail Converter is not registered.

Ben Carson on Donald Trump as a Running Mate: Anything Is Possible // Mediaite // Ken Meyer – July 11, 2015

Whenever he is not defending his explosive comments on illegal immigrants, Donald Trump's presidential campaign has been determined to express how his wealth and successful business career distinguish him from his competitors, who he has described as professional politicians.

Dr. Ben Carson has also had his share of controversial comments, but has sided with Trump on certain issues in the past, while also making the case about how being a political outsider allows him to speak and approach issues differently. Fox's Neil Cavuto had Carson for an interview on Friday, where he asked Carson that, should he receive the Republican nomination, would he ever consider combining forces for the ultimate GOP combination of Carson/Trump 2016.

"I have had a chance to associate with [Trump] now that I have moved down to Florida," Carson said. "He's a very smart guy, and he is a fun guy. So, I will leave it at that."

Cavuto pressed on, asking Carson, "so you might," to which Carson's final word was: "All things are possible. Absolutely."

Earlier in the interview, Carson said Trump should not back down from his controversial statements, instead reiterating his position that political discussion is stifled by PC culture.

"There's no question that we are in the process in this country of giving away all of our values and principles for the sake of political correctness," Carson said. When asked about whether Trump's media attention was a distraction to the other candidates, he said, "we need to discuss these things openly. I like people who are willing to say what they believe."

JINDAL

Producers Plan Rock Opera Based on Exorcism Bobby Jindal Witnessed in College // Bloomberg News // Ben Brody – July 11, 2015

It's enough to make your head spin.

Two producers plan to make a rock opera based on the exorcism performed on a friend of Bobby Jindal's that the Republican presidential candidate watched in college, according to New Orleans' Times–Picayune.

Producer Chris Chiari, a Colorado marijuana activist who twice ran to become a state representative in Florida, told the Times–Picayune that the piece doesn't aim to portray conservative Louisiana governor in a negative light. Rather, it will focus on the relationship between Jindal and the friend who underwent the ritual, a woman named Susan. Jindal later wrote they were "emotionally interdependent without a deeper commitment."

"It's a love story more than anything."

This version of Total Mail Converter is not registered.

"It's a love story more than anything," Chiari said, according to the newspaper. "It's more about a story about a young man's inability to love."

Chiari said in the story that the exorcism doesn't come until the "final act" of the hour-long opera. He also said the production has enough private funding to get "into the game," although a Kickstarter campaign he and the other producer started hasn't been very successful.

Co-producer Brian Welsh was the prospective campaign manager for Stormy Daniels, the porn star who mulled a bid unseat Louisiana Senator David Vitter in 2010, the Times-Picayune reported.

Jindal calls for end to direct ag subsidies, RFS // The Des Moines Register // Linh Ta – July 11, 2015

Louisiana Gov. Bobby Jindal and U.S. Sen. Chuck Grassley agreed on a need for federal agriculture subsidy reforms, including moving away from direct annual subsidies to farmers, during a fundraiser for Grassley in Marion on Saturday afternoon.

During a one-on-one interview with the Register before the private fundraiser, Jindal said he wants to continue the reforms happening now, and move subsidies toward an insurance model that helps farmers in dire situations.

"We need to support a strong, farm-based, agriculture-based economy, but we also need to move away from the old system where it was constant annual subsidies," Jindal said.

Iowa ranked second in the nation in ag subsidies, collecting $24.9 billion between 1995 and 2012, according to a study released in 2013 by the Environmental Working Group. According to the group, 10 percent of farms in Iowa collected 59 percent of all subsidies, or about $12.3 billion, during the period.

Jindal said he wants to move toward a cyclical program that is fair to taxpayers, but also helps farmers. The 2014 farm bill moved away from direct payments to farmers, and instead focused on crop insurance coverage.

"We don't go to the federal government every time there's a tornado or there's a storm, but if you do have an overwhelming disaster like a Katrina, it is appropriate to go to the federal government," Jindal said.

Earlier in the day, at the Cedar Rapids Art Museum, Jindal saw one of his highest turnouts this caucus season, with about 230 people attending a town hall forum put on by the Believe Again super PAC. Jindal discussed the renewable fuel standard, which he supported in 2005 when he was in the U.S. House of Representatives. Now, Jindal said, it's time to phase it out.

"Everybody should be treated the same," Jindal said. "We need clean coal, we need nuclear, we need solar, we need ethanol, we need all of it."

Jindal said it's time to treat all energy industries equally. However, he said it's important to make changes gradually to reduce the impact on people who have been receiving government assistance.

"At the time, I thought it was a good thing to help the industry get on its feet to compete," Jindal said. "But I also think it's time now to try and phase it out. The reason I say that is I don't like the government picking winners and losers."

This version of Total Mail Converter is not registered.

Mike Anderson, 58, of Cedar Rapids attended the town hall after seeing Jindal's commercial about "hyphenated Americans," saying he agreed that U.S. citizens should stop being separated by race and income.

"I thought it was great," Anderson said. "I hope he can keep that clear message."

Laura Kamienski, 35, of Cedar Rapids said that she has followed Jindal's political career in Louisiana, and that she has been a fan of his opinions. Kamienski said she is considering voting for Jindal, former Texas Gov. Rick Perry or Ohio Gov. John Kasich in the Iowa caucuses.

"I want someone that I agree with their policy position, and I believe they're going to get it done," Kamienski said.

TRUMP

Donald Trump Defiantly Rallies a New 'Silent Majority' in a Visit to Arizona // NYT // Nick Fandos – July 11, 2015

Donald Trump, the real estate mogul and reality television star who has taken center stage in the race for the Republican presidential nomination this week, delivered a rambling monologue on Saturday, dismissing a long list of critics — including Jeb Bush, Hillary Rodham Clinton and Macy's — while rallying what he termed a new silent majority of voters.

Mr. Trump had less to say about immigration, the topic on which his comments have garnered so much attention, than about those who have criticized him. For more than an hour, he ticked through a list of businesses and candidates who have tried to censure him since his long-shot campaign began three weeks ago, and made light of their practices and intelligence.

"How can I be tied with this guy?" Trump said of Mr. Bush, whom many consider the Republican front-runner. "He's terrible. He's weak on immigration."

It also demonstrated what his party fears most about him: that he is an orator without regard for decorum who is willing to mock other Republicans.

The speech, hosted by the Republican Party of Maricopa County, drew several thousand people to the Phoenix Convention Center, making it one of the largest events for any candidate so far, though short of the crowd of 10,000 predicted by the Trump campaign. Outside, in the 100-degree desert heat, supporters who could not make it into the room waved American flags and sparred with a smaller but vocal group of protesters.

"The silent majority is back, and we're going to take our country back," Mr. Trump declared as he left the stage.

Sheriff Joe Arpaio of Maricopa County, whose tactics in tracking down illegal immigrants drew national attention and a federal conviction for racial profiling in 2013, preceded Mr. Trump on stage at the businessman's invitation.

This version of Total Mail Converter is not registered.

As he had earlier in the day in Las Vegas, Mr. Trump also brought to the stage Jamiel Shaw Sr., the father of a teenager killed in 2008 by an undocumented immigrant in Los Angeles, to share the story of his son's death and to endorse Mr. Trump.

Mr. Trump's trip to the immigrant-heavy border region was the first since he asserted in his campaign announcement on June 16 that those crossing the United States-Mexico border illegally included rapists and criminals. Those remarks have earned Mr. Trump sharp criticism from business and political leaders across the country, including companies such as Macy's, Univision and NBC that have cut ties with him in recent weeks.

He came to Phoenix after addressing a series of private and public audiences Friday and Saturday in Los Angeles and Las Vegas.

"This has become a movement because people don't know what's happening," Mr. Trump said. "We can't be great if we don't have a border."

His welcome here was not entirely warm. Phoenix's vice mayor and several pro-immigrant groups had called for the city to bar him from speaking at the convention center, which it owns. Mayor Greg Stanton, a Democrat, rejected those calls, saying he would respect Mr. Trump's right to free speech.

But just as Mr. Trump's presence in the nominating race has confounded national Republican leaders trying to expand the party's appeal to minority groups, his visit here posed a dilemma for state officials trying to distance themselves from the anti-immigrant policies of the recent past.

Arizona's senators, John McCain and Jeff Flake, both Republicans, decided not to attend the event, as did the Republican governor, Doug Ducey. Mr. Flake also called on the Maricopa County Republican Party to rescind its invitation to Mr. Trump, a request that was ignored.

On Saturday, Mr. Flake said Mr. Trump's remarks, which he called "intolerant" and "inaccurate," would hurt Republicans here and around the country as they attempt to appeal to a broader demographic of voters.

"Particularly in Arizona, we have had such a long stretch of this kind of rhetoric and this kind of talk," Mr. Flake said in a telephone interview before Mr. Trump's speech. "We seem to be moving beyond that here, and this kind of rhetoric just pulls us back."

For many here, the event revived an image of the state, embodied by Sheriff Arpaio, as unwelcoming and harsh in its enforcement of illegal immigration laws — a perception that Mr. Ducey has worked hard to dispel. He barely discussed immigration during his campaign last year, and since taking office in January, he has worked to make his mark as a business-centric leader, focused on taxes and improving Arizona's beleaguered public education system.

Saturday's crowd, though, suggested that the topic remains a galvanizing force among the Republican Party's conservative base here. Many who had lined up outside the convention center said Mr. Trump was the only candidate willing to speak up about what they see as the risks of illegal immigration and the failures of federal law enforcement to solve the problem.

"I'm very interested in Mr. Trump," said Rod Patrick, a 72-year-old retired rancher and small business owner. "It's not necessarily because he's a good guy, but I'm fed up with politicians."

Steve Donaldson, 31, agreed, saying that Mr. Trump's experience in international business, rather than elective politics, made him the best-prepared candidate for the presidency. Mr. Donaldson said Mr. Trump could have been more artful in crafting his points about illegal immigration, in particular, but thought that the abrasive approach was actually helping him in the polls.

This version of Total Mail Converter is not registered.

"I think his delivery on some of his points could use a little finesse," he said, "but that's also what I like most about him."

Trump tells supporters, 'We have to take back the heart of our country' // WaPo // Philip Rucker & Robert Costa - July 11, 2015

Republican presidential candidate Donald Trump, whose caustic comments about Mexicans have inflamed the immigration debate, told thousands of cheering supporters here Saturday that "we have to take back the heart of our country."

In a rambling, defiant speech delivered in this border state that has been the epicenter of the nation's divisive battle over immigration reform, Trump declared: "These are people that shouldn't be in our country. They flow in like water." One man in the crowd of 4,200 shouted back, "Build a wall!"

Basking in polls that show he has risen to the top of the crowded Republican field, Trump took obvious glee in mocking former Florida governor Jeb Bush, the establishment favorite who is setting fundraising records.

"Jeb Bush, let's say he's president — Oy, yoy, yoy," Trump said. He asked the crowd: "How can I be tied with this guy? He's terrible. Terrible. He's weak on immigration."

Trump's 70-minute address here, which sounded more like a stream-of-consciousness rant than a presidential-style stump speech, put an exclamation point on his bombastic push since his presidential announcement last month to return immigration to the forefront of the national conversation.

Trump criticizes U.S. border policy, trade agenda(1:22)

Republican presidential hopeful Donald Trump criticized U.S. immigration and trade policies on Saturday in a speech that veered from accusing Mexico of deliberately sending criminals to the U.S. to professing respect for the Mexican government. (AP)

Bush and illegal immigrants were not the only targets of Trump's scorn: He also criticized Macy's, NBC, NASCAR, U.S. ambassador to Japan Caroline Kennedy, Democratic presidential candidate Hillary Rodham Clinton and, several times, the media.

Republican leaders say they believe the celebrity billionaire has virtually no chance of being their nominee, much less of making it to the White House. And, for now at least, his following seems limited to the far right as opposed to the party's mainstream.

Yet Trump has reignited a heated debate over an issue, immigration, that the GOP had been determined to settle after it hurt Republicans in the most recent presidential election.

Party leaders increasingly fear that Trump could do damage to more viable candidates, such as Bush, who could lose their own footing on immigration. These candidates confront a familiar challenge: During the primary season, they must deal with the anger and anxiety that many on the right feel about illegal immigration. But they must do it in a way that will not damage their appeal to a broader electorate in November 2016.

This version of Total Mail Converter is not registered.

Republicans are handling Trump delicately for another reason as well: They fear that he could leave the GOP entirely and wage a well-funded third-party campaign, a possibility that Trump has not ruled out.

After Trump repeatedly referred to illegal immigrants in the harshest of terms — calling them, among other things, killers and rapists — Republican National Committee Chairman Reince Priebus called Trump and asked him to tone things down. But that, if anything, has reinvigorated Trump and his vocal supporters.

The crowd in Phoenix began lining up outside the convention center before dawn, with many spending hours in temperatures that exceeded 100 degrees. Hundreds of people, who stood in lines snaking down several downtown blocks, did not make it into the ballroom for his speech.

Many of Trump's supporters blame illegal immigrants for crime and economic problems but also express dismay over cultural changes.

"We don't recognize our country anymore," said Jan Drake, 72, who lives in a retirement community outside Phoenix. "If you're coming into our country, you have got to conform to what we stand for. You speak English. You don't try to change our country to what your country was."

After watching Trump on television the past couple of weeks, Drake said that she has become convinced that "he would be a very strong president. He doesn't kowtow to anybody. The Republican Party will try to squeeze him out because they're afraid of him. But he can tell them where to go — to pound sand."

After he walked onto a catwalk stage here like a rock star, Trump basked in his crowd. "The word is getting out that we have to stop illegal immigration," he said.

While Trump was railing against Spanish-language broadcaster Univision, a handful of protesters in the crowd interrupted. Trump's security guards arrived to break up the skirmish that followed. His supporters screamed "USA! USA! USA!" in the protesters' faces as the guards escorted them out of the convention hall.

"I wonder if the Mexican government sent them over here," Trump said from the stage. He assured the crowd, "Don't worry, we'll take our country back."

Trump also had harsh words for Islamic State terrorists. If he becomes president, Trump said, "They will be in such trouble . ISIS, believe me, I would take them out so fast. You have to do it."

But it was his crusade against illegal immigrants that had Trump's crowd most enthused. After expressing shock that his immigration message has resonated so strongly with the GOP base, Trump said, "The silent majority is back, and we're going to take the country back." He walked off the stage to Twisted Sister's "We're Not Gonna Take It."

Earlier, as his plush Boeing 757 headed from an appearance in Las Vegas to Phoenix, Trump sat in a leather chair, surrounded by binders of articles about him and sipping a Coca-Cola — the full-calorie kind, he noted, because, "Have you ever seen a thin person drinking Diet Coke?"

"Something is happening in America. You may not want to see it, but something big is happening. People are sick and tired of politicians, and I'm here for them," he said in an interview. "I'm ready to go right at the Mexican government. I'm going to charge them $25,000 per illegal immigrant and, oh, I'll make them pay."

This version of Total Mail Converter is not registered.

"Would Bush do that? Would Rubio? I don't think so," Trump added, taking aim at two of his more mainstream rivals, Bush and Sen. Marco Rubio (R-Fla.).

Polls consistently show that a majority of Americans, including most Republicans, support an overhaul of the law to give millions of undocumented immigrants a means of staying in this country legally. But a passionate fraction of the Republican electorate believe otherwise.

Lou Brudnock, 71, said he is attracted to Trump's brash "truthfulness" on immigration and his willingness to be politically incorrect.

"This country today is sad, sad, sad," Brudnock said. "You can't say anything or they call you 'a racist.' It's like we're back in Nazi Germany. But look around, man. It's people here reading and listening to his message."

Trump, by virtue of his celebrity, has provoked a backlash far more widespread than ever seen toward lesser-known immigration hard-liners, such as former Colorado congressman Tom Tancredo (R). That means he could leave lasting damage to the GOP and whoever turns out to be its 2016 standard-bearer.

All of those cross-pressures were in play Saturday at Trump's appearances here and in Las Vegas. More mainstream Republicans had anticipated the spectacle and made no secret of their concern.

"I had hoped that we had moved on from some of the coarse rhetoric," said Sen. Jeff Flake (R-Ariz.). "When there's so many candidates, you can appeal to a very small segment of the population and get news and get elevated." Flake is a leading proponent of a comprehensive immigration measure that would include a path to citizenship for those who are in the country illegally.

Arizona has been a hotbed of anti-immigration sentiment, having passed a 2010 law that requires law enforcement officials to check the immigration status of people they detain and suspect are in the country illegally.

Maricopa County, Ariz., Sheriff Joe Arpaio — who in some ways is the face of that law, having been the subject of racial-profiling lawsuits — helped warm up the crowd before Trump's arrival.

"I know that Donald Trump is speaking out," Arpaio said. "He's getting a lot of heat. But, you know, there's a silent majority out here."

"We're not silent anymore!" a man in the crowd shouted.

Arpaio brought up the mostly dormant questioning of President Obama's birth certificate. He and Trump are perhaps the most vocal of the "birthers," who falsely contend that Obama was not born in the United States.

Immigration also has gained new attention after the June 30 shooting death of a woman along San Francisco's heavily touristed waterfront, allegedly by an illegal immigrant who had been deported five times from the United States.

This version of Total Mail Converter is not registered.

Trump — along with much of the rest of the Republican field — has criticized the policies of "sanctuary cities," where officials cannot detain those they suspect of being in the country illegally unless they have other grounds to do so.

Republican strategists say that it is possible to address anxiety over illegal immigration within the GOP base without alienating the electorate at large. Advisers to Bush and Rubio, for instance, say that their candidates can play a long game on the issue, continuing to make a case for comprehensive changes to the law, while waiting for the Trump boomlet to subside.

"You can give a fuller picture of those types of people who are coming to America who are not documented, who are not legal," said Peter Wehner, who was a top official in George W. Bush's White House. "And you can speak about them in a humane and decent and true way."

Donald Trump won't stop talking about immigration. Next up: Rallying 9,000 in Phoenix. // WaPo // Philip Rucker & Robert Costa – July 11, 2015

Republican presidential candidate Donald Trump, whose caustic comments about Mexican migrants have inflamed the debate over illegal immigration, is taking his tough-talk road show to this border state that has been the epicenter of the divisive national battle over reform.

Ignoring a plea from the Republican Party chairman to tone down his rhetoric, Trump plans to rally more than 9,000 supporters here in Phoenix on Saturday afternoon. Maricopa County Sheriff Joe Arpaio, who built a national profile with his aggressive efforts to hunt down and deport undocumented immigrants in the Phoenix area, will join him on stage.

In remarks at the downtown Phoenix Convention Center, Trump plans to renew his vow to build an impenetrable wall across the U.S.-Mexico border and to attack by name several Republican presidential candidates as weak on immigration, according to people with knowledge of Trump's plans.

The Trump event, hosted by the Maricopa County Republican Party, has invited a barrage of criticism -- from the city's Democratic leaders, local business executives and more mainstream Republican office holders, such as Arizona's two senators, John McCain and Jeff Flake, who believe his language about an issue as sensitive as immigration is far too explosive.

But Trump expects to find a large and receptive audience, at least here in Arizona. The event, initially scheduled for the Arizona Biltmore, a historic luxury resort, was moved this week to the convention center to accommodate the thousands of people who were requesting tickets. By Saturday morning, more than 9,000 people had been given tickets to the event, according to Trump's campaign.

In his speech, Trump plans to single out several campaign opponents by name. People familiar with Trump's prepared remarks said he intends to go after former Florida governor Jeb Bush for having said many immigrants come to the United States out of an "act of love"; to cast Sen. Marco Rubio (Fla.) as a typical politician for once trying to achieve comprehensive immigration reform, a priority of President Obama's; and to accuse former Texas governor Rick Perry of being weak and unable to secure his state's border with Mexico.

Trump, a billionaire real estate mogul and reality television star, wants to make the case that other candidates are beholden to big donors and corporate lobbyists who are advocating changes to immigration law, but that he won't be influenced by anyone because he's funding his own campaign.

Sam Nunberg, a Trump adviser, said Trump's goal is to be a conduit for Republicans who feel like outsiders within their own party, especially on immigration.

This version of Total Mail Converter is not registered.

"His persona is a mix of Ross Perot and Ronald Reagan," Nunberg said in an interview Friday. "A successful businessman disliked by the elites, a natural communicator, and someone who speaks for and is part of the conservative base."

Trump is expected to be greeted in Phoenix by protesters, just as he was at another campaign event Friday in Los Angeles, where he met with the families of crime victims who were killed by people who had come to the United States illegally.

"The illegals come in and the illegals killed their children," Trump said. "And we better get smart in the United States."

Before touching down in Phoenix, Trump will be in Las Vegas, where he will address Freedom Fest, a gathering of libertarian-minded activists. He also plans to hold a news conference in Las Vegas.

Donald Trump Antes Up On Immigration Stance In Las Vegas // AP – July 11, 2015

Business developer and Republican presidential hopeful Donald Trump says his comments about immigration have become a movement and has pointed to violence perpetrated by immigrants in the U.S. illegally to defend his stance.

Trump is speaking on Saturday to a couple of thousand people gathered for the annual Libertarian-led FreedomFest inside a Planet Hollywood ballroom on the Las Vegas Strip.

Trump brought on stage Jamiel Shaw Sr., a Southern California man whose 17-year-old son was shot and killed in 2008 by a man in the country illegally. Shaw told the crowd about his son's death, adding he trusts Trump.

One Arizona woman who says she's been a Libertarian for 43 years held a sign protesting that "Donald Trump is not a Libertarian."

Trump: Mexico's 'Killing Us' at Border and on Trade // AP // Bob Christie & Kim Piercell – July 11, 2015

Republican presidential hopeful Donald Trump criticized U.S. immigration and trade policies on Saturday in speeches that veered from accusing Mexico of deliberately sending criminals across the border to professing respect for the Mexican government and love for its people.

Speaking to a gathering of Libertarians in Las Vegas before headlining an event in Phoenix, Trump repeated his charge that Mexico was sending violent offenders to the U.S. to harm Americans and that U.S. officials were being "dumb" in dealing with immigrants in the country illegally.

"These people wreak havoc on our population," he told a few thousand people attending the Libertarian gathering FreedomFest inside a Planet Hollywood ballroom on the Las Vegas Strip.

This version of Total Mail Converter is not registered.

In the 4,200-capacity Phoenix convention center packed with flag-waving supporters, Trump took a different view — for a moment — and said: "I love the Mexican people. I love 'em. Many, many people from Mexico are legal. They came in the old-fashioned way. Legally."

He quickly returned to the sharp tone that has brought him scorn as well as praise. "I respect Mexico greatly as a country. But the problem we have is their leaders are much sharper than ours, and they're killing us at the border and they're killing us on trade."

His speeches in both venues were long on insults aimed at critics and short on solutions to the problems he cited. When he called for a wall along the U.S.-Mexico border, the audience in Las Vegas groaned.

In a break from the immigration rhetoric that has garnered him condemnation and praise, Trump asserted that he would have more positive results in dealing with China and Russia if he were president and said he could be pals with Russian President Vladimir Putin.

Asked by an audience member in Las Vegas about U.S.-Russia relations, Trump said the problem is that Putin doesn't respect Obama.

"I think we would get along very, very well," he said.

Trump has turned to victims of crime to bolster his argument that immigrants in the U.S. illegally have killed and raped. In Las Vegas and Phoenix, he brought on stage Jamiel Shaw Sr., a Southern California man whose 17-year-old son was shot and killed in 2008 by a man in the country illegally. Shaw vividly described how his son was shot — in the head, stomach and hands while trying to block his face — and how he heard the gunshots as he talked to his son on the phone.

Shaw said he trusted Trump, and encouraged the crowds in both cities to do the same.

Trump's speeches were filled with tangents and insults leveled at business partners such as Univision and NBC that have dropped him in the wake of his comments that Mexican immigrants bring drugs and crime to the U.S. and are rapists. He also directed familiar barbs at other presidential contenders, including Democrat Hillary Rodham Clinton ("the worst secretary of state in the history of the country"), news media figures ("lyin' Brian Williams") and President Barack Obama ("such a divisive person"). He called journalists "terrible people."

As Trump lambasted Univision for cancelling its broadcast of the Miss USA pageant, one of his many business enterprises, a group of young Latinos unfurled a banner pointed toward the stage and began chanting insults. They were quickly drowned out by the crowd, and nearby Trump supporters began to grab at them, tearing at the banner and pulling and pushing at the protesters. Security staff managed to get to the group and escorted them out as Trump resumed speaking.

"I wonder if the Mexican government sent them over here," he said. "I think so."

Arizona's tough-on-immigration Sheriff Joe Arpaio introduced Trump in Phoenix after outlining the things he and the candidate have in common, including skepticism that Obama was born in the United States. He went on to criticize the federal government for what he called a revolving door for immigrants, saying many of them end up in his jails.

"He's been getting a lot of heat, but you know, there's a silent majority out here," Arpaio said, borrowing from a phrase Richard Nixon popularized during his presidency in a speech about the Vietnam War.

This version of Total Mail Converter is not registered.

A single protester standing outside the room where Trump spoke in Las Vegas was more concerned about the businessman being tied to the Libertarian Party.

"I've been a Libertarian for 43 years and Trump ain't no Libertarian," said Linda Rawles, who asserted that including Trump in FreedomFest set back the party's movement.

Donald Trump storms Phoenix // Politico // Ben Schreckinger – July 11, 2015

Most other candidates would have folded. Some might have doubled down. On Saturday, Donald Trump tripled down.

After refusing to back off during weeks of fierce backlash for his comments about the alleged criminality of undocumented Mexican immigrants, Trump met on Friday in Beverly Hills with the families of people killed by such immigrants. A day later, he came to Arizona and said, “We have to stop illegal immigration. We have to. We have to,” to the cheers of 4,000 supporters.

On Monday, RNC Chairman Reince Preibus called Trump to congratulate him on his success and reportedly ask him to “tone it down.”

But Donald Trump only tones it in one direction: up.

“I love the Mexican people … I respect Mexico … but the problem we have is that their leaders are much sharper, smarter and more cunning than our leaders, and they’re killing us at the border,” said Trump, in front of a giant American flag at the Saturday afternoon rally at the Phoenix convention center. He added, “They’re taking our jobs. They’re taking our manufacturing jobs. They’re taking our money. They’re killing us.”

At one point, Trump brought a man named Jamiel Shaw up to the podium to talk about his late son, explaining, “an illegal immigrant shot him violently.”

Republican presidential candidate Sen. Lindsey Graham, R-S.C., speaks during the Atlantic Councilâ€™s series â€œAmericaâ€™s Role in the Worldâ€? at the Atlantic Council's offices in Washington, Wednesday, July 8, 2015. (AP Photo/Andrew Harnik)

He compared himself favorably to other moguls like Martha Stewart and Richard Branson, mocked the brands that cut ties with him, and called out “lyin’ Brian Williams” and much of the rest of the news media.

He assured his supporters, “I’m, like, a really smart person.”

And he vowed to be politically effective. “I know the system better than anybody. I’m a donor,” he said. “Of course I give to Democrats, I want to get things done … They all loved me. They don’t love me so much anymore.”

Trump concluded by declaring, “The silent majority is back, and we’re going to take the majority back, and we are going to make America great again.”

This version of Total Mail Converter is not registered.

Ahead of the event, John McCain called Trump's immigration comments "offensive." Arizona's other Republican senator, Jeff Flake, called his views "coarse, ill-informed and inaccurate." News outlets and fact-checkers pointed out that Trump's assertion — that the undocumented immigrants coming from Mexico are that country's criminal element — appears to be flat wrong.

But while the press and the party condemn Trump's rhetoric, many voters are eating it up. When Trump mentioned McCain, the crowd booed.

People who showed up for the event said that, like them, Trump is a straight-talker. They ascribed their enthusiasm, in some cases devotion, to their conviction that Trump alone has the courage to say what other politicians believe (and at least when Trump looked out at the scene and declared,"This is absolutely unbelievable," they were probably right).

Hazel Powell, 68, said she is happy for the first time in seven years because of Trump's candidacy. After President Obama's election, she went into self-exile in Bulgaria, where she taught English for two years in the Peace Corps. "I was depressed every day," said Powell, wearing a cowboy hat, American flag nail polish, American flag cowboy boots, and a shirt that said, "Arrest Obama."

"He just seems to have things clear in his head," said Powell of Trump. "I just hope he keeps it up because I'm happy now. He's done a number on me and many other people, emotionally."

"He says what he means like I do. He's not wishy-washy," said Joan Rosicki, 67, of Phoenix. "He's for the people. It doesn't matter if you're male or female. He also is for the Spanish people. I am, too. We just don't like the lawlessness."

She said she had been a fan of New Jersey Gov. Chris Christie until he took a helicopter ride with, and hugged, President Obama in the wake of Hurricane Sandy in 2012. Of the president, she said, "he wants to be a dictator. I don't know if he's ever going to leave. My friends all told me he has to because of the First Amendment."

A spokeswoman for Trump said 10,000 people had signed up for free tickets (those tickets were spotted being sold on Craigslist for $100). The ballroom's maximum occupancy was 2,158. A convention center event staffer said the fire marshall had agreed to allow twice that number inside and estimated that at least 1,000 more people would be left out in the sun.

When the door opened to let supporters into the ballroom, the first wave ran in, creating a miniature stampede.

Diane Brest, the first person in line an hour before Trump's scheduled 2 p.m. arrival, said she had been waiting there since 4:45 a.m. "You want to make sure you get in the door," said the transplant from New York, clutching a red Solo cup. As she spoke, security broke up a scuffle that had broken out between two men behind her over their places in line.

In a YouGov/Economist online poll released on Thursday, Trump led the Republican field with 15 percent support, four points ahead of both Jeb Bush and Rand Paul. His lead was even greater when the poll tabulated respondents' first- and second-choice candidates.

Trump chose his Saturday venue well. In Arizona, home to some of the most fervent opposition to illegal immigration in the country, even some political leaders had his back. "Trump is kind of telling it like it really, truly is," said the state's former governor, Jan Brewer, who supported some of the country's strictest and most controversial anti-immigration efforts in office, ahead of his visit.

This version of Total Mail Converter is not registered.

Joe Arpaio, the sheriff of Maricopa County, which includes Phoenix, spoke before Trump arrived. Arpaio has earned national notoriety for his aggressive approach to targeting undocumented immigrants. In 2013 a federal court found him guilty of racial profiling — the Justice Department concluded in 2011 that he oversaw the worst pattern of racial profiling by a law enforcement agency in the nation's history — and he's been accused of abuse of power and violating election laws.

Arpaio drew loud cheers, saying that both he and Trump had questioned Obama's citizenship and taken on "the illegal immigration problem," and that they shared a birthday — June 14.

Trump drew scores of protesters as well. Dozens of them erupted in shouts of "stop the racism" inside the ballroom during his speech, before being booed and shouted down with chants of "U.S.A! U.S.A!" and escorted out by security.

"He's not fit to be president. To me, he's just a big clown" said Tom Malejo, 67, outside the event, clutching a sign with Trump's face that said "Arizona rejects your racism."

A gray-haired white man in line for Trump cupped his hands over his mouth and shouted at Malejo and a companion, "Vamos por Mexico."

Around the corner, another protester, dressed as the devil, yelled, "I'm the devil! I support Donald Trump!"

Trump draws thousands in Phoenix, continues immigration theme // CNN // MJ Lee – July 11, 2015

At what was his largest campaign event yet -- with a huge U.S. flag stretched from one side of the stage to the other -- Donald Trump addressed his faithful followers Saturday at the Phoenix Convention Center.

Two dozen supporters stood behind the Republican presidential candidate holding signs reading, "Trump, Make America Great Again," while an estimated 5,000 supporters looked on.

Expressing his amazement at the size of the crowd, Trump said, "This is unbelievable. This began as 500 people in a ballroom in Phoenix."

The campaign was asked to move to a larger venue to accommodate the thousands of people who wanted tickets, according to Trump spokeswoman Hope Hicks.

The Trump campaign said 15,000 tickets were distributed for the event at the Phoenix Convention Center, where the North Ballroom has a capacity of only 4,200, according to the facility's website. The campaign said thousands were turned away because of fire regulations.

The candidate was welcomed by several high-profile supporters, including Maricopa County Sheriff Joe Arpaio, whose stands against illegal immigration and often controversial punishments have earned him a reputation as a hard-nosed, unyielding lawman.

During his speech, Trump turned the lectern over to Jamiel Shaw Sr., the father of a high school student killed by an undocumented immigrant, who spoke about why he is supporting the candidate.

This version of Total Mail Converter is not registered.

Although campaign aides said earlier Saturday that Shaw was going to introduce the candidate, he ended up speaking midway through the speech.

Shaw's son, a high school football star, was shot and killed in Los Angeles in 2008 by a gang member born in Mexico. On Friday, Trump met in Los Angeles with Shaw and other family members of victims of crimes perpetrated by undocumented immigrants. He then gave a lengthy press conference in which he consistently railed against illegal immigration. Saturday's speech was filled with similar words.

Brief disturbance

Playing to the crowd, Trump dug in on the controversial themes that have made him loved by some and despised by others. As he mentioned earlier in the day at a Las Vegas campaign rally, Trump claimed China is laughing at U.S. trade negotiations. "They have geniuses and we have people who don't have a clue. We have stupid leaders," he said.

Trump, who announced his White House campaign bid last month, sparked national outrage by saying that some people crossing the border into the United States from Mexico were "rapists" and "criminals." A slew of corporations, including Macy's, NBC and ESPN, responded to his inflammatory remarks by severing business ties with the real estate magnate.

"I love the Mexican people," he said. "I love their spirit. I respect Mexico as a country. Their leaders are much sharper and smarter than ours."

But, Trump said, "They're killing us at the border and killing us in trade."

Trump also promised to release financial documents next week that will show he is an even more successful businessman than has been reported.

"I'm not saying that to brag," he said.

A short protest broke out during the speech. Some protesters held up a banner and Trump supporters started screaming at them. It was unclear what the banner read.

There was a brief scuffle and for a few minutes it was very tense. Security came and escorted the protesters out.

"I wonder if the Mexican government sent them over here," Trump said.

"Don't worry, we'll take our country back," he said, as the crowd cheered.

'He can inspire a crowd'

Robert Bowater said he came to see Trump in Phoenix because he thinks the issues of illegal immigration and sanctuary cities deserve more attention.

This version of Total Mail Converter is not registered.

Bowater, a 68-year-old resident of Pinal County, Arizona, said he doesn't expect any President to deport all undocumented immigrants, but he thinks more can be done to punish the ones who commit crimes in the United States.

"I'd like to see a mass deportation of the criminals," Bowater said.

Just as Bowater was saying he thought it was possible that Trump could win the presidency, Linda Murtha -- standing behind him -- couldn't help but shake her head.

"He can't win," said Murtha, a Chandler resident in her early 40s, but "he definitely can inspire a crowd."

She came to the event with her mother, Provi Murtha, who was interested in seeing "The Donald" in person. Like her daughter, Provi is skeptical of Trump's intentions. She noted that he's donated to Democrats, including Hillary Clinton.

"Is he a Democrat? Is he a Republican? What is he?" Provi wondered aloud. Even though she came to see the event, "I'm not going to make up my mind to vote for Donald Trump, that's for sure."

Both Provi and Linda Murtha said they like Kentucky Sen. Rand Paul.

Freedom Fest warm-up

In a warm-up to his appearance at the Phoenix campaign rally, Trump stopped by Freedom Fest in Las Vegas, an annual gathering of conservatives, where he addressed a crowd of several hundred people and took questions.

But first he called Shaw to the stage. The room was hushed as Shaw talked about his son who was gunned down seven years ago by an undocumented immigrant. Shaw said the man who killed his son had been released from a county jail on his third gun charge, four months early. His son was walking home, and was close enough for Shaw to hear the gunshots.

Shaw said he almost thinks of Trump "as a father figure" even though the two are similar in age. "He's the kind of man you would want to be your dad," Shaw said. "He's a nice guy. He put himself out there for black people. I know I can trust him," Shaw continued.

He said when Trump spoke out about illegal immigration he saw that "Trump loves America" and is willing to risk his life for it.

Trump doubles down – again

Trump doubled down once more on comments that have ignited a controversy in the United States

Illegal immigration is "a major, major problem in this country" that has to be solved, Trump said.

This version of Total Mail Converter is not registered.

Promising to secure U.S. borders with a impenetrable fence, Trump claimed undocumented immigrants are coming to the United States from all over the world. "This isn't just Mexico," he said. "They're coming from the Middle East, and we better be very careful," Trump warned.

And the support that he is receiving from Shaw and others demonstrates that the businessman's message is appealing to some voters who view illegal immigration as a serious problem.

On the subject of trade, Trump was blunt with his opinion of U.S. trade negotiators, "Chinese leaders are much smarter than (President Barack) Obama and his bunch of clowns," he said to laughter and applause from crowd.

"I make good deals. I have great respect for China. Their leaders are too smart for our leaders," he said.

Trump fervor increasing

Trump's fervor appears to increase with each campaign rally as he ramps up his rhetoric against illegal immigration.

Detractors are many, including some in his own party, but Trump is gaining supporters as well -- evidenced by the switch in venues for Saturday's event to the Phoenix Convention Center. Trump tweeted Saturday night that he would not be attending the Miss USA Pageant in Baton Rouge, Louisiana, on Sunday because he had campaign stops scheduled in Phoenix. Trump is a partial owner of the Miss Universe Organization, which oversees the pageant.

A CNN/ORC poll released July 1 found Trump and Republican rival, former Florida Gov. Jeb Bush, on the rise nationally.

The two are the only GOP presidential contenders to enjoy double-digit support among Republicans and Republican-leaning independents.

Trump on Jeb Bush: "I don't see him as a factor" // CBS News // Reena Flores – July 11, 2015

In the last few weeks Republican presidential candidate and real estate mogul Donald Trump has faced no shortage of GOP criticism over his vitriol against Mexican immigrants. And on Saturday, he proved that his political detractors wouldn't be left wanting for Trump's own brand of criticism.

Several GOP contenders vying for the White House have denounced their fellow candidate for his remarks, including former Florida Gov. Jeb Bush, whose wife Columba is Mexican, has said that there should be "no tolerance" for the views of the reality television star.

Trump, whose most recent poll numbers show him in a close race with Bush, knocked the GOP establishment frontrunner, saying "I don't see [Bush] as a factor."

"How can I be tied with Jeb Bush?" Trump said at a rally at the Phoenix, Arizona convention center. "He's terrible. He's weak on immigration. Sanctuary cities. Did you know that he had five of them in Florida when he was governor?"

This version of Total Mail Converter is not registered.

"We have incompetent politicians -- not only the president," Trump told the crowd, which, according to his campaign, numbered in the thousands. "I mean, right here in your own state you have John McCain. I just hate to see when people don't have common sense, don't have an understanding of what's going on. ... Some people don't get it and I don't think they'll be in office much longer."

Trump made headlines recently when he categorized Mexican immigrants as criminals and "rapists" during his presidential announcement speech. It only fueled the Trump fire -- and the poll numbers -- when business after business severed their corporate relationships over his inflammatory remarks.

The political backlash has been fierce. When the 2016 contender announced his event in Phoenix, it drew wide-ranging criticism, including from long-time GOP legislators like McCain and Jeff Flake, Arizona's other senator. Even Republican National Committee Chair Reince Preibus reportedly told Trump to tone down his rhetoric.

Several immigration protesters interrupted Trump's speech just as he finished his criticisms over the television station Univision, which recently cut ties with him. Trump addressed the hecklers, saying "I wonder if the Mexican government sent them over.

"Mexico is taking our jobs, manufacturing, taking everything and killing us on the border," Trump said. "Don't worry, we'll take our country back very soon." The crowd eventually drowned out the protesters with chants of "USA! USA!"

One possible method Trump suggested to "take back our country" involved charging a fee to Mexico for every undocumented immigrant that entered the U.S.

"Every time Mexico sends someone over, we charge Mexico $100,000 for someone they send over," Trump proposed. "They make so much money - it's peanuts. We charge Mexico $100,000. It starts to add up. We have to take care of our country. We have to do something to take back our country."

Maricopa County Sheriff Joe Arpaio, Arizona's law enforcement official infamous for his tough-on-immigration policies, took the stage ahead of Trump.

Arpaio signaled that he had one definitive thing in common with Trump: a birth certificate. It was a throwback to a 2012 election issue -- President Obama's birthplace -- that spelled the end of Trump's initial flirtations with a presidential candidacy.

Trump also visited Freedom Fest in Las Vegas, Nevada early Saturday afternoon. Speaking to a more subdued crowd, he gave a similar speech, bashing the press, touting his vast fortune, and reiterating that he loved the Mexican people along with the Chinese, even if he "beat" them often.

Trump wins hearts of some, scorn from others in Ariz. // USA Today // Yvonne Wingett Sanchez – July 11, 2015

During a campaign stop Saturday in Phoenix, Donald Trump's larger-than-life personality and harsh rhetoric on immigration made him a hero to some local Republicans, while deepening the disdain of his critics, who said Trump's inflammatory remarks are further alienating Latinos from the GOP.

This version of Total Mail Converter is not registered.

Trump, a Republican presidential candidate who has faced mounting criticism for labeling immigrants as rapists and criminals, doubled-down on his illegal immigration message before a cheering crowd inside the Phoenix Convention Center.

In a speech lasting more than an hour, Trump, a real-estate mogul and former reality-TV star, expressed love for Mexico, saying his remarks have been taken out of context by the media. Trump repeatedly said he respects Mexico's leaders, who are "too smart" for American leaders, whom he repeatedly called "stupid." And Trump later told the media that he expects to win the Latino vote.

He offered no detailed plan to address illegal immigration, but pledged before 4,200 people to build a wall along the U.S.-Mexico border.

After a disruption by a group of Latinos in the audience, he told the crowd: "Don't worry, we'll take our country back."

The crowd cheered wildly.

Trump's message — and his delivery — moved voters like Scottsdale conservative Jim Ettwein.

"He's an egotistical guy, but I love an egotistical guy in this case," said Ettwein, a management consultant. "He's making the campaign fun, interesting, issue-oriented. And I think he's speaking from his heart; he really believes this stuff."

Trump's remarks on illegal immigration, Mexico and the border resonate with a segment of the Republican base, Ettwein said, "because no matter what you think about certain Mexicans, or other Mexicans coming over, there are many good Mexicans here but there's an awful big problems that we're not addressing."

And Trump will address it, said voter Dolores McCaslin, 62, an independent.

McCaslin, who waited hours for Trump to take the stage, said she was blown away by his "impassioned" speech on illegal immigration and the military. She said it solidified her belief that Trump would make a trustworthy president, one who can make great the nation's standing in the world.

"We need new, we need fresh and we need a man that's got a backbone, and he appears to have that," McCaslin said. "He loves the Mexican people. He doesn't like illegals. I love that."

Others jeered Trump's message and said he's using the immigration issue to get attention. Some of the dozens who gathered outside called him "racist" while others held signs reading "Deport Trump" and "Arizona rejects your racism."

Some protesters shouted at Trump supporters, who shouted back as they waited to be let into the building.

"Deport you, deport you," several Trump supporters shouted at the protesters, who gathered in the street and on the sidewalk. Phoenix police Sgt. Trent Crump characterized protesters as "law-abiding citizens" who want to express their First Amendment rights.

This version of Total Mail Converter is not registered.

Gilbert Romero was with the group of about a dozen protesters that disrupted Trump's speech. A member of the crowd shoved him as the group was escorted from the room.

Outside the convention center, Romero told The Republic that Trump is a polarizing figure.

"Trump's racist rhetoric does not represent Arizona and he is not welcome in Phoenix," he said.

Romero said he was disappointed that Trump mocked the protesters by suggesting they were working for the Mexican government.

"I was born less than one mile from the convention center," Romero said.

Alejandro Landeros, of Glendale, said Trump is creating an atmosphere of hatred toward Mexicans.

"I feel sad this is happening," he said. "They think it's OK to put us down. They judge us without knowing. We're just coming here because we want to make a difference but we're getting shut down."

Alfonso Aguilar, executive director of the Latino Partnership at American Principles in Action, called Trump's remarks on immigration "baseless" and "insulting" to both Mexican-Americans and undocumented immigrants.

"They are not criminals. They're not rapists. That's an insult," Aguilar said at a news conference following Trump's speech. "Studies actually show that immigrants coming into the community lower crime rates. Immigration creates economic opportunity. It creates jobs for the working class."

He also said that many people who work for Trump are Mexican-Americans, or could be undocumented, and that Trump has profited from their work.

"He's using this (campaign) as another reality show to get attention," he said. "He's playing with the American voters. He does not have the executive temperament to be president of the United States."

'I'm, like, a really smart person': Donald Trump exults in outsider status // The Guardian // Rory Carroll – July 12, 2015

GOP presidential candidate rails against immigrants, Mexico, the media and Jeb Bush in Phoenix rally despite protests from Latinos calling on him to 'Stop the hate'

Donald Trump was on a roll and he was not going to let anyone, least of all Latino infiltrators, spoil his triumph.

"This has become a movement," he exulted from the podium. "The silent majority is back, and we're going to take our country back ... the word is getting out that we have to stop illegal immigration."

Thousands of supporters packed into the Phoenix convention center on Saturday roared their approval. Finally here was a candidate who would catch and banish "the illegals".

This version of Total Mail Converter is not registered.

Right around then a few pro-immigrant activists hidden in the crowd outed themselves and unfurled a banner: “Stop the hate.”

The defiance lasted just a few seconds before Trump supporters swarmed around them pulling, grabbing and shoving. Security guards intervened and frogmarched the intruders away amid jeers and insults.

Trump’s voice boomed over the commotion. “I wonder if the Mexican government sent them over here. I think so.” The jeers intensified. “Don’t worry,” he reassured the crowd, “we’ll take our country back.” Chants of USA erupted.

It was a brief, telling moment in the Republican candidate’s campaign event in Arizona, the highlight of a weekend swing through western states. Instead of cooling it, as Republican leaders have pleaded, the real estate tycoon-turned GOP insurgent dialed up anti-illegal immigrant rhetoric. His supporters adored it.

“He says everything that’s in our hearts. No baloney,” said Mary Przybylo, 75. “He’s got to keep it up. Keep it going.” Others echoed the sentiment. “He’s not afraid to say what we feel,” said Kent Pyper, 47, who runs a printing business. “No one else tells it like it is.”

That perception has made Trump, so often derided as a buffoon, an electric candidate. He has tapped a deep well of anger which is powering a surge in the polls.

The Phoenix rally shone a light on that momentum. It also exposed frailties. Trump’s freewheeling campaign may be sowing the seeds of its own destruction.

The hour-long speech was vintage Trump. An unscripted, rambling mix of jokes, boasts, provocations, policy prescriptions to “make America great again” and tirades against illegal immigrants, Mexico’s government, Democrats, the media, terrorists and especially fellow Republicans.

“Let’s say Jeb Bush is president: ay, ay, ay,” he groaned, eliciting laughs. “How can I be tied with this guy? He’s terrible.”

He mocked Macy’s, ESPN and other business partners who have dumped him, saying he would have the last laugh. “Thousands and thousands of people are cutting up their Macy’s credit cards.”

One moment he bragged about his best-selling books, the next he vowed to zap Islamic State. Then he was talking about trade deals with Japan, Caterpillar trucks, golf balls, phone calls from Paris, Humvees, conversations with his wife, Sino-Russian relations, sanctuary cities, Hillary Clinton and his desire to send Sergeant Bowe Bergdahl, the US hostage traded for Taliban prisoners, back to Afghanistan.

“I went to the Wharton School of Business,” he noted several times. “I’m, like, a really smart person.”

The press, he said, jabbing a finger at a phalanx of television cameras, were liars. “They’re terrible people. Terrible. Not all of them, but many of them.”

Trump promised to release personal financial records this week, which will clear the way for him to debate rivals in an August 6 televised debate.

This version of Total Mail Converter is not registered.

If there was a connecting thread it was illegal immigration and how it was draining America's greatness. The warm-up speakers were Mary Ann Mendoza, whose police officer son Brandon died in a vehicle accident with an undocumented immigrant, and Maricopa county sheriff Joe Arpaio, who lamented that they escaped justice.

Trump introduced Jamiel Shaw, the father of a Los Angeles high school student shot dead by an undocumented Mexican immigrant in 2008.

Trump said he loved Mexico's people but decried their leaders as cunning manipulators of an "out of control" border. He promised to fine Mexico $100,000 for every person who illegally entered the US. "This has become a movement. This has become a movement because people don't know what's happening. We can't be great if we don't have a border."

Every time he bashed illegal immigrants the 5,000-strong capacity crowd – hundreds had to listen from outside – roared.

Republican leaders concluded after Barack Obama's victory in 2012 that the party must reach out to Latinos to stand a chance of capturing the White House in 2016. Most of Trump's rivals have criticised, to varying degrees, his statements about Mexico sending rapists, criminals and diseases into the US.

That leaves the reality television host a clear field to tap a current of anger and resentment among certain white people, rich and poor, Republicans and non-Republicans.

"He's telling like it is. He's an American hero," said Elizabeth Shoemaker, an elderly woman wearing a cowboy hat and holding a Trump = Truth placard. Marty Hermanson, 54, a former local GOP party chairman in a pinstriped suit, said the candidate was expressing people's inner feelings. "He's hit a nerve."

Supporters ranged from Tammie Malkow-Dunham, 46, a soft-spoken Canadian who resents people skipping the queue for citizenship, to Alice Novoa, a peroxide blonde in a star-and-stripes jacket who ranted about a Mexican plan to use immigrants as fifth columnists to invade and massacre US Christians.

There was also Rick Kral, 73, a retired electrical engineer, fretting about Islamist terrorists flocking through El Paso ("it's on the internet"), and Diana Brest, 64, an unemployed former insurance worker who feared losing out in the job market to younger, bilingual people. "They need to be escorted off our land." Brest had queued since 4.45am, first in line, to nab a prime spot.

Trump's unfiltered, unvarnished rhetoric taps the sense that undocumented immigrants are competitors, or cheats, or worse, and that a lily-livered, politically correct GOP abandoned the fight.

Their zeal has energised Trump's campaign. But Phoenix also exposed the downsides.

The Republican party of Maricopa county hosted the event but almost the entire state party leadership, including the senators John McCain and Jeff Flake, and governor Doug Ducey, stayed away. Maverick is one thing, outcast another.

The event galvanised a small but spirited Latino response. About a hundred protesters braved searing heat outside the center to chant for hours. Francisca Porchas 33, one of the infiltrators who unfurled the banner inside the hall, emerged seething. “I was pushed and elbowed. It was actually very scary. He’s stirring extremist sentiment.” Jose Patino, 26, who was also jostled, predicted a Latino backlash at the polls. “He’s probably hurting his party and helping the Democrats.”

This version of Total Mail Converter is not registered.

After Trump left the stage, and the adrenaline of the event ebbed, some supporters conceded doubts about their hero’s long term viability. “Presidential material? Huh. Do I have to answer that?” asked Joe Przybylo, 67, a retired postal worker. “I like the straight talking. It’s from the heart. But, you know, it can be a bit rough. Maybe he needs more work.”

Donald Trump expects 9,000 people at his immigration rally in Arizona // VOX // Dara Lind – July 11, 2015

Donald Trump is holding a rally on Saturday in Phoenix, Arizona where he expects 9,000 people to show up. He's focusing on immigration and crime — which has gone from an offhand comment during his presidential campaign launch last month to the central theme of his run.

Accordingly, Trump's going to be introduced by Jamiel Shaw Sr., whose son was killed by an unauthorized immigrant in 2008. Shaw's become a visible figure among conservative opponents of unauthorized immigration (he's testified before Congress multiple times about the death of his son).

Arizona isn't an early primary state. But it's been the epicenter of populist, anti-immigration sentiment for Republicans for several years now. Trump's going to appear with Maricopa County Sheriff Joe Arpaio — who's become nationally famous for his emphasis on rounding up unauthorized immigrants (as well as the conditions of the "tent cities" he's put them in). And the rally is sponsored by the Maricopa County Republican Party.

But Arizona's GOP is also a microcosm for the deeper split in the Republican Party. Both the state's senators, John McCain and Jeff Flake, were original cosponsors of the comprehensive immigration reform bill the Senate passed in 2013 — and both have criticized Trump for the inflammatory comments about immigrants that have become a hallmark of his presidential campaign (repeatedly calling them rapists and murderers, and saying that Mexico and other countries aren't "sending their best people").

But the criticism from McCain and Flake is exactly what Trump says distinguishes him from the rest of the Republican Party. His speech Saturday, according to press reports, will criticize other Republican candidates for president for not taking the immigrant threat seriously — because they're beholden to business interests that want to encourage immigration.

In other words, Trump is claiming that because he's rich enough to finance his own campaign, he's able to speak the truth about immigration in a way other candidates can't.

The speech was originally scheduled to take place at a smaller venue, but got moved to the convention center this week due to a surge in demand, according to Trump's campaign.

Here's what Donald Trump supporters believe, according to their emails to me // VOX // Andrew Prokop – July 11, 2015

The very arguments that are leading media elites to mock and dismiss Donald Trump could actually be empowering his rise in the polls.

As I've started writing more about Trump in recent weeks, I've begun getting much more email from his fans. The messages reflect a certain symbiotic relationship between Trump and the establishment he professes to loathe: As the media piles on and as corporations cut their ties, Trump's utter unwillingness to concede an inch endears him further to his supporters, sending his numbers higher.

This version of Total Mail Converter is not registered.

RelatedIs Trump following the path of Michele Bachmann and Herman Cain?

The thoughts and feelings expressed in these messages suggest that Trump is tapping into something real — real enough to send his poll numbers up and real enough for people to take time out of their day to send strongly-worded messages to a reporter. Many of these emails I've gotten are derogatory toward unauthorized immigrants, and some are blatantly racist. Others praise Trump as a principled outsider who has the ability to get things done.

So here are a representative sample of the Trump-related emails I've gotten over the past 48 hours, as a reminder that Trumpmentum is real and is, in some ways, being fed by the negative coverage Trump has gotten. For people who hold Trump's opinions, and who have felt powerless against a media establishment that often dismisses their views, watching Trump fight on their behalf has been an inspiring experience — and they are willing to speak up and defend him in turn.

While there's probably not enough here to win him an election, don't dismiss the sentiment in these emails or the arguments coming from Trump as fake. He is tapping into something that really exists, even if many in the media wish it didn't.

Donald Trump Outdoes Himself In Defiant Phoenix Speech // TIME // Zeke Miller – July 11, 2015

Donald Trump is not going anywhere.

Casting himself as more than a billionaire real-estate magnate and reality television star on his bid for the White House, Trump claimed Saturday to speak for a “silent majority” of Americans who are frustrated with the direction of the country.

Rather that deterred, he appeared energized by the pushback his candidacy has received from the Republican Party and his primary opponents after suggesting weeks ago that many who have entered into the U.S. illegally are “rapists.” In a rambling speech to a crowd of thousands in the Phoenix Convention Center, he struck a potent combination of populist and protectionist policies, designed to tap into the undercurrent of unease within American society.

“The silent majority is back, and we’re going to take the country back,” he said, referencing former President Richard Nixon’s famous speech reaching out to Americans who were opposed to protests of the Vietnam War. “We’re going to make America great again.”

Trump promised to fine Mexico $100,000 for every person crossing into the U.S. illegally, pledged to tax imports by American-owned businesses that have shipped jobs overseas, and said he could destroy the Islamic State of Iraq and Greater Syria [ISIS] with overwhelming force. “I would take them out so fast,” he said.

He knocked traditional conservatives for not being committed to taking care of the poor. “I know this doesn’t sound very conservative, but we’ve got to take care of everyone, not just the people up there,” he said, motioning to the ceiling, as the crowd roared and whistled.

For more than an hour, the speech featured Trump meandering into name-calling of celebrities and businesses that have dissociated with him as he has become embroiled in negative headlines. “Thousands and thousands of people are cutting up their Macy’s credit card,” he claimed, of the department store that dropped his branded clothing line.

This version of Total Mail Converter is not registered.

Trump, who is all-but-certain to make the GOP debate stage on Aug. 6 in Cleveland, indicated he would release his personal financial disclosure this week, which would clear the way for him to face off with his Republican rivals.

The speech was rife with Trump's signature over-the-top flourishes and free-associations. "I went to the Wharton School of Business," he said at one point."I'm, like, a really smart person."

"The press are liars. They're terrible people. Terrible," he said, pointing at the assembled cameras and scribes. "Not all of them, but many of them."

"ISIS right now is building a hotel in Iraq," he said. "They're competing with me."

"How can I be tied with this guy, he's terrible," he added of Jeb Bush, referencing recent surveys showing them neck-and-neck among Republican voters. "I'm killing everybody on jobs," he said of his poll numbers. "I'm killing everybody on leadership."

At one point he bragged about the number of lobbyists he has employed and donations he has made to political candidates of all stripes, but promised he would be incorruptible. "I don't need money," he said, adding that if people wanted to donate to his campaign, he wouldn't turn them away.

Trump also warned that Bush would be a poor negotiator on the international stage, and criticized him for his flip-flopping answer on whether he would have invaded Iraq.

Trump discussed Sgt. Bowe Bergdahl, the U.S. solider who was held captive by the Taliban for nearly five years after disappearing from his forward operating base and traded for the release of five prisoners at Guantanamo Bay in 2014, saying he would "send him back."

Trump also maintained his aim on the Mexican government, accusing its leaders of being "totally" in control of Spanish-language broadcaster Univision, which ditched broadcasting his Miss Universe pageant amid the furor over his immigration comments. "They're killing us at the border, and they're killing us in trade," he said of Mexico. "They're killing us"

As a small group of protestors scuffled with Trump supporters and security as they tried to hold up a banner, Trump quipped, "I wonder if the Mexican government sent them over here, I think so. We'll take our country back."

Trump basks in adulation at Arizona immigration rally // The Hill // Mark Hensch – July 11, 2015

GOP presidential candidate Donald Trump addressed thousands of potential voters Saturday at a wild rally in Phoenix, basking in the adulation of supporters after several weeks of controversy.

The New York businessman told listeners that support is building for his tough talk on border security and illegal immigration.

"The word is getting out that we have to stop illegal immigration," he said. "We have a situation that is absolutely out of control."

This version of Total Mail Converter is not registered.

“We’re getting ripped,” Trump added. “We’re getting taken apart piece-by-piece slowly.”

The outspoken billionaire blamed America’s traditional political class for letting immigration reach crisis levels.

“We have incompetent politicians and not just the president,” Trump said of President Obama.

“Right here, in your own state, you have John McCain,” he said of Arizona’s Republican senator.

“I just hate to see that people don’t have common sense,” Trump added.

“For some reason, some people just don’t get it,” he said. “I don’t think they will be in office much longer.”

Trump covered familiar ground during Saturday’s event, linking illegal immigration with violent crime and arguing America is no longer competitive in the global economy.

The White House hopeful’s tough talk drew Hispanic protesters, who tried disrupting his remarks that evening.

Security ejected the hecklers, as Trump continued describing illegal immigration as a public menace.

Trump then introduced Jamiel Shaw, whose son was shot and killed by an illegal immigrant.

“Think about your child laying in the street dead,” Shaw said of his son’s murder. “We were not designed for that.”

“I felt real hope,” he said of hearing Trump’s attacks on violence stemming from illegal immigration.

“When Trump came out aggressive like that, it showed he can weather the storm.” Shaw added. “We need someone who can weather the storm. He’s the only person talking about saving our country.”

Trump’s address is the fever pitch of national attention over his outspoken views on border control and immigration policies.

His campaign announced before Saturday’s event it was moving to the Phoenix Convention Center amid overwhelming demand for additional seating.

Arizona’s Republican Party made it clear Friday it was not involved in the crowded scene.

“Immigration is an important issue, which is why all the candidates in the Republican presidential primary are talking about it,” Tom Sifert, a spokesman for the Arizona GOP, told The Hill.

“The state party did not play a direct role in Trump’s visit this weekend, but all the Republican candidates that have visited Arizona in the last few months have had well-attended events, and we expect that tradition to continue,” he said.

Trump’s stop in Phoenix also follows an appearance at FreedomFest in Las Vegas earlier that afternoon.

A Latino heckler challenged Trump’s stance on border security and illegal immigration during a question-and-answer-session there.

“Did the government of Mexico get you to come up here and say this?” Trump asked the man after he said he is “insulted” by Trump’s campaign rhetoric.

“Senor Trump, you’re fired,” the audience member retorted as Trump moved the Q&A session to other participants and reiterating his vow he will build a wall along America’s southern border with Mexico.

This version of Total Mail Converter is not registered.

Trump has weathered three weeks of international outrage over his formal campaign launch in New York last month.

The New York business mogul sharply criticized Hispanic immigrants and Mexico during the speech June 16.

“They’re sending people who have a lot of problems,” Trump said during his announcement speech at New York City’s Trump Tower.

“They’re bringing drugs. They’re bringing crime. They’re rapists,” he added. “And some, I assume, are good people.”

Multiple businesses have since terminated their corporate relationships with the outspoken billionaire.

Macy’s, NASCAR, NBC and Univision have all severed ties with Trump over remarks that critics say are bigoted and racist.

The backlash is not hurting Trump’s place in the polls, however.

A Reuters/Ipsos sampling released Saturday discovered that he is in a virtual deadlock with former Gov. Jeb Bush (R-Fla.) for control of potential Republican voters.

An Economist/YouGov survey published Thursday, meanwhile, had Trump is the preferred GOP nominee for president among 15 percent of respondents.

A third ranking by the left-leaning Public Policy Polling (PPP) firm had him leading the Republican presidential field in North Carolina as well.

Trump’s abrasive remarks are worrying Republican leaders that it is harming their chances with the crucial Hispanic voting bloc next election cycle.

Republican National Committee Chairman Reince Priebus reportedly spoke with Trump on Wednesday, requesting that he halt his outbursts on immigration.

Trump has repeatedly ignored the RNC’s requests for a softer tone on the topic in public.

Saturday’s rally offers proof Trump intends on making border security and illegal immigration key portions of his campaign platform.

Donald Trump meets with families of Americans killed by illegal aliens // Brietbart // Michelle Moons – July 11, 2015

2016 Presidential candidate and real estate mogul Donald Trump met Friday afternoon with family members of Americans killed by illegal aliens in the wake of a multiple deportee felon confessing to shooting and killing young Kate Steinle in San Francisco, California.

Sabine Durden lost her son Dominic Durden to the actions of an illegal alien three years ago come Sunday. After participating in Friday’s meeting with Trump she spoke exclusively with Breitbart News sharing her experience inside the meeting:

Mister Trump met with the families in a separate room. He listened to each one of our stories and was visibly shaken and touched. We got hugged and he promised to continue to fight for us and our kids. We then went to a separate room where the press was staged. He addressed them and then gave each of us time to share our story. The press tried to pin him down on his previous comments. He stood his ground. I had a coke bottle that read

This version of Total Mail Converter is not registered.

HERO on it and I told him that he should have it. He is my hero because he was the only one who got attention to this truly important issue.

It was such a pleasure and true honor to meet this man. A legend and someone to bring America back.

Leading up to the meeting Durden was extremely excited. Afterwards she also remarked of Trump's patient listening ear saying it energized her to continue sharing her story and the important message of the need for border and immigration law enforcement.

The families of Jamiel Shaw Jr., Sabine Durden, Don Rosenberg, Lupe Moreno, and Brenda Sparks, all who have lost loved ones, were included in Friday's meeting.

Trump has come under fire in the mainstream media over comments made about illegal immigration since the announcement of his candidacy. He has since risen to number one in polls of the Republican field for president.

Breitbart News reported not only Friday on the families included in the meeting and brief portions of their stories, but also at an event last November, the National Day of Remembrance for Americans killed by illegal aliens. Many of the families have had to fight fiercely to see their loved ones' killers brought to justice or even just deported. Others have watched their loved ones' killers go free.

Trump will address attendees at Freedom Fest in Las Vegas, Nevada and later at a stadium venue in Phoenix, Arizona.

Durden also recently penned separate, open letters to both President Barack Obama and Donald Trump. The letters came in stark contrast to one another as the letter to Obama expressed Durden's grievance over the president inviting a known illegal alien to an LGBT event at the White House who then heckled the President about deportation.

Durden questioned when Obama would acknowledge her and others who have lost loved ones to the actions of foreign nationals illegally present in the United States and "WHEN do legal citizens that have been affected by this immigration issue, get a chance to share their side of the story with you?" (original emphasis). The letter is included in an exclusive Breitbart News report.

Love him or hate him, Donald Trump could 'create chaos' for GOP in 2016, experts predict // NY Daily News / / Celeste Katz – July 11, 2015

Depending on who you ask, Donald Trump is either a brave truth-teller or a flash-in-the-pan loudmouth masquerading as a legitimate candidate for President.

Either way, he's currently a huge headache for the Republican Party.

Despite the outrage he's generated — and the business he's lost — because of his incendiary comments about Mexican immigrants, Trump is making enough waves in the polls to likely score himself a slot at the first televised GOP primary debate next month.

"He's going to be on that stage — and he's going to create chaos," predicts Gary Segura of the Seattle-based polling firm Latino Decisions.

This version of Total Mail Converter is not registered.

Segura, who also teaches political science at Stanford University, says if Republicans are to be successful in 2016, they must capture 38% to 40% of the Hispanic vote.

Trump's denunciation of Mexico for exporting "rapists" and killers, Segura says, obviously won't help: "The first step when you're in a hole is to stop digging — and Trump is decidedly not in the 'stop digging' camp."

Richard Himelfarb, a political science professor at Hofstra University and host of presidential debates, says Trump's refusal to tone it down could be his undoing.

"Donald Trump is going to keep doubling down on this and will ultimately say something so absurd that even Republicans who agree with him and his stance will have to abandon him," said Himelfarb.

It's "undeniable" that Trump is damaging the party, Himelfarb said — and among the expansive 2016 field, the real estate mogul may be stealing the most thunder from Kentucky Sen. Rand Paul.

Trump "speaks to people who are kind of pissed off and angry and frustrated — and that's Rand Paul's constituency," he said.

The biggest beneficiary of Trump's onslaught could be Democratic frontrunner Hillary Clinton — who is getting something of a reprieve from GOP attacks thanks to the Trump phenomenon of the past month.

Even as liberal critics bash Trump for hard-liner showboating, some in the GOP question his conservative street cred.

Daniel Garza of The LIBRE Initiative — a Koch brothers-backed conservative group that promotes "economic freedom" to Hispanics — scoffs that Trump's a Donny-Come-Lately to right-of-center politics.

"Until recently, Mr. Trump did not present himself as a leader of the conservative movement. In the past he's spoken positively about huge tax increases, government-run health care, higher consumer taxes, and more," Garza wrote in an essay on Facebook.

Some Republican watchers aren't quite ready to hit the panic button.

"In order for Trump to damage the GOP brand with respect to Latinos, he will have to be viewed as a legitimate, viable candidate" — and that hasn't happened yet, says Sirius XM Patriot Radio host Thomas Basile.

Trump may be a celebrity, Basile says, but he hasn't made that critical transition "to being viewed as a leader - or further still, someone who could actually be President of the United States."

Jeb Bush Beware: Trump's Know Nothing Populism Is A Hit With Conservatives In Phoenix // Politicus // Keith Brekhus – July 11, 2015

From a policy standpoint, its hard to take Donald Trump's presidential campaign seriously. Trump's ideas, like for example, building a wall and having Mexico pay for it, are clownishly naive and logistically impractical. Yet for all his ego-stroking, self-congratulatory rhetoric and his absurd policy prescriptions, Donald Trump is striking a chord with frustrated and anxious conservative voters.

This version of Total Mail Converter is not registered.

On Saturday, Trump spoke to an overflow crowd of thousands of supporters at the Phoenix Convention Center. Sure, a few hecklers briefly interrupted the Trump love fest, attempting to unfurl a banner in the midst of the crowd before they were apparently escorted out of the event. However, overall, the large crowd was filled with admirers who boisterously cheered Trump's every pronouncement, no matter how bizarre the words he spoke were.

Not only did Trump attract an enthusiastic crowd to Phoenix, but Saturday morning a Reuters-Ipsos Poll found that Trump was tied with Jeb Bush for first place in the Republican presidential field. Trump of course leveled multiple attacks at Bush during his Phoenix speech. He took the occasion to depict Jeb Bush as stupid, feckless and a weak negotiator who would fold in about two seconds and who "lobbyists push around like a piece of candy."

Trump elicited applause for attacking Jeb Bush, as well as other Republicans, including Arizona Senator John McCain, for being weak. By contrast Trump portrayed himself as a strong leader who would make "the military so strong we'd never have to use it", and he warned that if he is elected "ISIS will be in such trouble." Of course, he didn't offer any specifics, he just implied that his mere presence in the White House would make all of America's enemies cease and desist right before our very eyes.

Trump's speech was the triumph of style over substance, but there can be no denying that his cartoonishly simplistic bombast found an approving audience of conservatives in Phoenix. His Nativist Know Nothing populism conveniently scapegoats illegal immigrants.

However, with the the help of a compelling personal horror story by Jamiel Shaw whose son, Jamiel Shaw the second, was murdered by a person who had entered the country illegally, Trump has the anecdotes to push his narrative. There is no question that Shaw's personal story is both tragic and moving, giving Trump's anti-immigrant message a sympathetic figure to rally behind, that partially softens and obscures the xenophobic nature of Trump's overall message.

While it would be easy for other Republican candidates to dismiss Trump as not a serious candidate, that would be a mistake. The Republican Party has long courted conservative voters by appealing to their base fears, However, now that Donald Trump has amplified the GOP message, Republican leaders, like Dr. Frankenstein in the laboratory, are trying to deal with a monster they helped create.

By calling every Republican politician not named Donald Trump "stupid", Mr. Trump is burning bridges rather than building alliances within the Republican Party. However, Republican leaders may be slow to realize that a lot of conservative voters seem to agree with Trump. Republican politicians have spent years cultivating hatred of government bureaucrats and politicians among their base, encouraging voters to choose a "limited government" Republican over a "big government" Democrat. In their critique, however, they have exposed themselves as politicians to incur the wrath of voters disillusioned with the system the GOP has told them to distrust.

Trump's phony populism has exploited conservative voters' distrust of the GOP mainstream to his political advantage. In the process, he represents a direct threat to Jeb Bush, whose conservative family is too much a part of the political establishment to earn the loyalty of disgruntled conservative voters. Trump's speech took aim at Jeb Bush several times, and at one point he told the crowd:

If you people go with Bush, you're going to lose.

Judging by the crowd's reaction, it was apparent they believed him. Now to be fair, the group of people assembled to hear Trump speak in Phoenix was hardly representative of the general population or even the GOP primary base. Candidate events tend to draw supporters rather than a broad cross-section of the party. Nevertheless, given the size and the enthusiasm of the crowd in Phoenix, and Trump's current strong polling numbers, Jeb Bush and the rest of the GOP field had better beware. In the conservative universe, the Trump bump is starting to look all too real.

This version of Total Mail Converter is not registered.

UNDECLARED

WALKER

Scott Walker Works to Gain Credibility as Official Campaign Begins // NYT // Patrick Healy - July 12, 2015

After listening to Gov. Scott Walker of Wisconsin as he has traveled the country preparing his campaign for president, which officially begins on Monday, admiring voters most often describe him as "authentic," "real" and "approachable," Mr. Walker's advisers say.

Two words these voters do not use about him? "Smart" and "sophisticated."

"Scott is working on that," said Ed Goeas, a veteran Republican pollster and a senior adviser to Mr. Walker. "Look, 'approachable' is worth its weight in gold in politics. 'Smart' is something voters look for in legislators who craft policy. But Scott is preparing hard to talk about every issue."

As Mr. Walker becomes the 15th prominent Republican to enter the 2016 race, the crucial question he must answer is whether he can cross the threshold of credibility so that someone entering a voting booth can imagine him as president, according to several leading Republicans and interviews with regular voters.

While Mr. Walker is ahead in some opinion polls, including for Iowa's first-in-the-nation caucuses, a series of early gaffes alarmed party leaders and donors and led Mr. Walker to begin several months of policy tutorials. The collective hope is that Mr. Walker can avoid what Mr. Goeas and other advisers describe as Sarah Palin's problem — becoming a candidate who is initially popular among Republicans, like the 2008 vice-presidential nominee, but loses luster because of missteps as the campaign goes on.

Mr. Walker is now emerging from his crash course with the aim of reassuring activists and contributors, who have given relatively modest amounts to his political operation so far, that he will no longer sow doubts about himself with comments like comparing pro-union protesters to Islamic State terrorists, refusing to answer a question about evolution or saying he does not know if President Obama is a Christian or if he loves America.

Whether Mr. Walker can demonstrate that he has a command of the challenges facing America, and is big enough for the presidency, will be tested in the coming weeks on the campaign trail and in televised debates.

Gov. Terry E. Branstad, Republican of Iowa, said Mr. Walker had "a lot going for him given that he's a neighboring state governor who has been tried and tested on tough issues." Yet Republican voters in Iowa want to be confident that Mr. Walker will not make political errors that might raise doubts about his capabilities and make Hillary Rodham Clinton look more prepared if she emerges as the Democratic nominee.

"Iowa is a state that rewards candidates who work hard," Mr. Branstad said, "and I think Governor Walker will benefit if he shows he has done the work to be ready to lead."

This version of Total Mail Converter is not registered.

Judd Gregg, a former three-term senator from New Hampshire, noted that Mr. Walker had a good run of events there in the spring, followed by long absences as he focused more on briefings by his advisers. Many Republicans are not sure what to expect from him as he returns on Thursday as part of his campaign kickoff tour.

“If Walker comes across as very credible, he has the political record and the message to do very well in the New Hampshire primary,” Mr. Gregg said. “But again, he has to be credible.”

Concerns about the breadth and depth of Mr. Walker’s knowledge extend to both national security and domestic policy issues.

Two Republicans recalled being at a closed-door event last winter when, they said, Mr. Walker did not articulate a strong answer to a question about Internet neutrality, instead promising to look at the issue. Others questioned his sophistication in boiling down national security challenges to matters of “safety”; he believes people relate to that word, whereas “national security” is an elitist phrase.

And his repeated comments that the most important foreign policy decision of his lifetime was President Ronald Reagan’s firing of air traffic controllers in 1981, because it got the attention of the Soviet Union, was a sign to some Republicans that Mr. Walker, who dropped out of Marquette University and has not traveled widely abroad, has a limited worldview.

“His lack of knowledge in the foreign policy area has been a problem because, well, you want your commander in chief to be confident on those issues,” said Bruce Perlo, chairman of the Grafton County Republican Committee in New Hampshire.

Recognizing the problem, Mr. Walker has joined in hourslong meetings in Washington; Madison, Wis.; and elsewhere for tutorials on the Islamic State, Iran, Russia and military and geopolitical confrontations, as well as human rights abuses, border security and immigration policy, and other issues, advisers said.

He has relied on Republicans such as former Senator Jim Talent of Missouri, who leads Mr. Walker’s national security advisory council, and Andrew Bremberg, his policy director, who previously was a top aide to Senate Majority Leader Mitch McConnell of Kentucky.

In recent months, Mr. Walker has also met or spoken with Prime Ministers Benjamin Netanyahu of Israel (as part of a trip to Israel), David Cameron of England and Stephen Harper of Canada; President Xi Jinping of China; President Toomas Hendrik Ilves of Estonia; retired military leaders such as former Gen. David H. Petraeus and former Gen. Jack Keane; and a number of American and foreign ambassadors.

Aides to Mr. Walker provided this list in response to questions about his briefings; they declined an interview request to Mr. Walker.

Mr. Keane, in an email, said he provided an analysis of global security challenges facing the United States, which he has done for several other candidates from both parties. He said he was not an adviser to any campaign, and he declined to offer an assessment of Mr. Walker’s capabilities.

Pete Peters, a Republican voter in New Hampshire and a Navy veteran, said that the rise of the Islamic State was his foremost concern in the 2016 election, and that he felt far from certain that Mr. Walker has the ability to defeat the terrorists.

This version of Total Mail Converter is not registered.

“I like Walker, but he doesn’t come across like a guy who has thought hard or creatively about the Middle East,” Mr. Peters said.

Mr. Walker does seem to have made some progress: One of the Republicans who was concerned about net neutrality said that, about a month ago, he heard Mr. Walker give a thoughtful and crisp statement about the issue.

“A lot of us are still worried about Walker’s off-the-cuff answers, and about how Walker will handle himself when the real shooting starts in Iowa, when the television attack ads and direct-mail pieces start hitting him,” said the Republican, who leads a prominent national conservative group and is not aligned with any presidential candidate. He spoke on the condition of anonymity to candidly assess Mr. Walker, with whom he has a good relationship.

The policy briefings have cut into time that Mr. Walker might have otherwise devoted to fund-raising events, which his advisers cite as one reason for the relatively modest amount that he and his allies have raised for his political committees in recent months. The dollar amount is expected to be disclosed soon.

But some potential donors have said in recent weeks that Mr. Walker’s busy schedule was not an issue for them; rather, they were taking a wait-and-see approach on Mr. Walker.

Advisers to Mr. Walker emphasized that policy briefings were not the only important way that Mr. Walker has educated himself on the issues. He has also learned by talking to voters about their concerns and observations.

“You had Sarah Palin, who became the vice-presidential nominee and then went away for weeks and made a big deal of going to school, so when she came back it was like, ‘What have you learned?’” Mr. Goeas said. “But with Scott, as he has looked at these issues and thought through these issues, he has also absorbed a great deal from interacting with people.

“The key issue for a lot of them isn’t, ‘Is he smart enough to govern?’ But, ‘Is he tough enough to govern?’” Mr. Goeas added. “And the answer for many Republicans will be yes.”

Scott Walker’s primary strategy: Motorcycles, barbecue and a Winnebago // WaPo // Jenna Johnson – July 11, 2015

Scott Walker plans to spend next week formally launching his presidential campaign — and then visiting five states in six days, a whirlwind trip that includes stops at four shops that sell Harley-Davidson motorcycles.

The Republican governor of Wisconsin is a bit obsessed with Harley-Davidson, a Milwaukee-based company that he likes to plug while on the road. He started riding more than a decade ago while working as the Milwaukee County executive and now owns a 2003 Road King. For a candidate who can sometimes come across as a bit straight-laced and dorky, riding a Harley has helped Walker exude a more laid-back, rough-and-tumble image. He likes to riff on the freedom that comes with a long ride and he has pledged to ride a Harley in New Hampshire and South Carolina. (He knocked out a nearly 40-mile ride in Iowa last month.)

Walker will start the week in the Milwaukee suburbs, signing his state's budget into law on Sunday afternoon and then jumping into the race for president on Monday evening. On Tuesday morning, he's off to Las Vegas to visit the Red Rock Harley-Davidson. On Wednesday, he will be in South Carolina, stopping at the Low Country Harley-Davidson in North Charleston and barbecue joints in Lexington and Mauldin. That night he is making a quick trip to Atlanta. On Thursday, Walker will be in New Hampshire, visiting a diner in Amherst and the Seacoast Harley-Davidson in North Hampton.

This version of Total Mail Converter is not registered.

Then on Friday, Walker is kicking off a three-day tour of Iowa, crossing the entire state twice in a Winnebago. For months, Walker has been heavily focusing on Iowa, home to the first in the nation nominating contest. His aides have said that a key to Walker's success in 2016 is winning Iowa — and already he is leading in early polls.

He starts Friday in Davenport, then heads to the Cedar Rapids Museum of Art and wraps up his first day at his campaign's Iowa headquarters in the Des Moines suburbs. Walker will start Saturday at a grocery store in Council Bluffs, just over the river from Omaha, then visit a GOP office in Sioux City and the Carroll Cycle Center — a motorcycle dealer in western Iowa that sells Harleys. That evening, Walker will give remarks at the Family Leadership Summit at Iowa State University in Ames and finish the day in Haverhill. On Sunday, Walker will stop by an event for a Republican state representative in Cedar Falls and visit Dubuque. He might also sneak in a visit to Plainfield, a tiny town in northeast Iowa where he and his family lived for seven years when he was growing up.

Scott Walker tweet said he's running, but who posted it? // AP – July 11, 2016

Twitter says it's investigating a premature presidential announcement that popped up on Wisconsin Gov. Scott Walker's account Friday evening.

The message, which was quickly deleted, said, "Scott Walker is running for president."

Twitter spokesman Nu Wexler said later, "We're looking into today's issue, and we've determined the Walker team was not at fault."

After the initial tweet, the Walker campaign did not deny responsibility, saying only, "Stay tuned for Governor Walker's announcement on Monday."

Later, Walker press secretary AshLee Strong said, "We're happy Twitter confirmed this wasn't Team Walker's post and are investigating what happened."

It's no secret that Walker will enter the 2016 Republican presidential race in Wisconsin on Monday afternoon. He is set to become the 15th Republican presidential candidate after he confirms his intentions Monday.

Twitter Accidentally Made Scott Walker a Presidential Candidate Ahead of Schedule // ABC News // Jordyn Phelps – July 11, 2015

For a brief time on Friday, Scott Walker became a presidential candidate -- by accident and three days ahead of schedule.

It all started with a tweet from Walker's verified Twitter account that read: "Scott is in. Are you? Join our team today" along with a photo of the Wisconsin governor with the following unmistakable message: "SCOTT WALKER IS RUNNING FOR PRESIDENT."

The only problem: Walker's team didn't send the tweet. And it was soon deleted from his feed.

Twitter is now coming forward to clear Walker's team of any fault and investigating how the tweet was posted in error.

"We're looking into today's issue, and we've determined the Walker team was not at fault," a spokesman for

This version of Total Mail Converter is not registered.

Twitter said in a statement Friday night.

Walker's press secretary AshLee Strong told ABC News in a statement, "We're happy Twitter confirmed this wasn't Team Walker's post and are investigating what happened."

Walker is not expected to officially declare his candidacy -- on purpose -- until Monday evening in Waukesha, Wisconsin, the same place where the Wisconsin governor declared victory following a recall election in 2012.

Soon after the tweet was deleted on Friday, the Walker campaign was steering clear of the errant tweet entirely.

"Stay tuned for Governor Walker's announcement on Monday," Strong told ABC News.

The accidental tweet aside, Walker's team has been making an active push on social media to build interest in Walker's coming announcement, with a social media strategy that included releasing his logo in nine separate pieces over nine days on Instagram.

Walker is not the only presidential hopeful whose candidacy was accidentally stated ahead of his official announcement. Jeb Bush made a slip on his own, saying that he was running for president during a non-campaign event more than a month before he launched his official campaign.

Could union-busting Scott Walker be the next president? // BBC // Gary O'Donoghue – July 11, 2015

As the Republican field for president gets increasingly crowded, one late entry has the possibility of being a strong contender for the nomination. Scott Walker is little known across the US - so why is he a frontrunner?

For those feeling less than inspired by the prospect of another Bush-Clinton face-off for the presidency in 2016, there's one man in particular who has the potential to ruin that scenario.

Meet Scott Kevin Walker - the Republican governor of the Midwest state of Wisconsin who is set to announce his presidential bid on Monday.

Over the past few months, the 47-year-old, Harley-Davidson-riding governor has become something of a poster child for conservatives and come from nowhere in the polls to join former Florida Governor Jeb Bush and Florida Senator Marco Rubio among the top tier of candidates.

Not only has he pleased business groups by pushing through laws dismantling collective bargaining and automatic deduction of union dues, but he has taken a hard line on social issues too, such as abortion, making him attractive to core conservatives who tend to be further to the right.

"He's sort of the one person in the field that can play in both lanes," said Bill McCoshen, a political consultant in Wisconsin who knows Walker well.

"He can be in the establishment lane and he can also be on the anti-establishment side; and you know most people expected Jeb Bush to take the establishment vote and there would be somebody else in the anti-establishment lane - Walker is sort of creating problems for everybody."

This version of Total Mail Converter is not registered.

Republicans also like him because he is a winner. When he took on the unions in Wisconsin, he faced 100,000 angry protestors at the state capitol.

"We hadn't seen anything like that in Madison since the Vietnam War protests," said Jason Stein, a reporter for the Milwaukee Journal Sentinel and author of a book on Walker.

"It was just a sea or a lake of humanity... you had every floor space, practically, covered with people, I mean there were times when you couldn't see the flagstones at all. It was exceptional, it was unprecedented."

Denise Ehron, an administrator at the University of Wisconsin, was one of the many who opposed Walker. Standing in her backyard in the city of Whitewater the anger is still fresh. She says the reforms saw her household income drop by 14%.

"We had just bought a house a couple of years before that so we had a mortgage that we hadn't had before," Ehron said.

"But also just by being union members it became a bad word on campus, and in the town and in the state, and if you said you were a union member, 'Oh, oh you're a public employee? Ooh that's nasty'. Just morale-wise was really hard to take."

Walker faced the protestors down and subsequently won a recall election - no easy feat in a swing state like Wisconsin.

But if his opponents are numerous so are his supporters.

Sitting in a diner next to Marquette University in Milwaukee, Katie Flannigan spreads out her scrapbooks from her student days there.

They are stuffed full of cuttings, leaflets and notes from her time running Walker's campaign for student president. One badge reads "beam me up Scotty".

"Whoever is president has to be human, and he is such a kind person and fair person... sure he looks the part of a politician, but he is not anybody that would say one thing and do another," Flannigan said.

"I would bet my house on that. He's just a good hearted person."

"I think what's changed about him is less hair and he's added country music to his playlist."

Walker failed to win that student election - one of a very few electoral setbacks in his political career. He dropped out of school shortly after. If he became president, it would make him the first leader without a college degree since Harry Truman.

His entry into the crowded Republican presidential field has not been without problems.

This version of Total Mail Converter is not registered.

At a big conservative conference in Washington in February, he sent his communications team into damage-control mode after suggesting he would be able to cope with the threat from the so-called Islamic State, given how he handled 100,000 protestors in Wisconsin.

Governor Walker "was in no way comparing any American citizen to IS," a spokeswoman told reporters in a hurried statement.

Walker then survived a recall election

He has also faltered on foreign affairs more generally - batting questions away on a trip to London when asked his views.

He does appear to be holding up, however, and significantly seems to have the fundraising ability to stay the course.

"The recall in 2012 is the gift that keeps on giving" said Charles Franklin, a professor at Marquette and director of the Marquette Law School poll which has been tracking Walker's appeal.

"The special election allowed him to raise unlimited donations...from over 300,000 donors."

And that, he said, gives Walker "solid potential".

OTHER

GOP primary candidates compete for anti-abortion vote // AP // Bill Barrow – July 11, 2015

Trying to distinguish themselves in front of an important group of social conservative activists, Republican White House hopefuls on Friday used the National Right to Life Convention to share personal stories and detail the abortion restrictions they've helped write into law.

The question now is whether the scramble helps or hinders an anti-abortion movement seeking unity as Republicans look to win back the presidency next November.

First Amendment case brings abortion protesters' rights before Supreme Court

National Right to Life Political Director Karen Cross urged the assembly to "make a decision right now that the issue of life trumps all else."

"There is no such thing as the perfect candidate," she warned.

Carol Tobias, the group's president, argued in an interview that President Barack Obama benefited in both of his national victories from social conservatives who didn't back John McCain in 2008 or Mitt Romney in 2012.

This version of Total Mail Converter is not registered.

“The quickest way to defeat a pro-lifer,” Tobias said, “is to fall in love with your candidate and then get your feelings hurt when they don’t win the nomination.”

The candidates gave repeated nods to those sentiments, praising each other and hammering Democratic favorite Hillary Rodham Clinton, who supports abortion rights. Still, they spent most of their energy asserting their own conservative supremacy on the issue.

An Associated Press-GfK poll conducted in January and February found that 51 percent of Americans think abortion should be legal in all or most cases, while 45 percent think it should be illegal in most or all cases.

Santorum boasted of how he sponsored the federal law that bans certain late-term abortion procedures after initially soft-pedaling his abortion stance because of Pennsylvania’s closely divided electorate.

“You know me; there’s no quit in this dog,” he said. “Go ahead and nominate somebody who’s just going to go along. Then try to convince yourself you’ll make a difference.”

Rick Perry predicted the next president will nominate as many as four Supreme Court justices – who could presumably overturn the 1973 Roe v. Wade ruling that legalized abortion nationally. “If I have the opportunity to put justices on the Supreme Court, they will not be squishy,” the former Texas governor said.

Florida Sen. Marco Rubio explained his abortion opposition as “inseparable from the effort to reclaim the American dream … for every child,” and recalled abortion restrictions he helped pass as speaker of the Florida House of Representatives.

Jeb Bush, whose tenure as Florida governor overlapped Rubio’s speakership, mentioned some of the same laws in a video presentation. He did not physically attend the convention.

Ben Carson, a retired neurosurgeon, has never held elected office, but he blasted abortion providers as “evil.”

Tobias said her group doesn’t wade into primaries in part because it’s hard to find meaningful distinctions between candidates, though she acknowledged the campaigns will find them.

New Jersey Gov. Chris Christie supported abortion rights earlier in his career, something he generally avoids talking about now.

Wisconsin Gov. Scott Walker celebrated passage of a new state ban on most abortions beyond the 20th week of pregnancy. Yet late in his 2014 re-election campaign, he aired an ad in which he affirmed his abortion opposition while emphasizing that Wisconsin law “leaves the final decision to a woman and her doctor.”

South Carolina Sen. Lindsey Graham has sponsored a ban on abortions after 20 weeks. But some conservatives blast him for voting to confirm Obama’s two Supreme Court nominees.

Tobias said those details sometimes matter to abortion opponents, but she maintained that nitpicking is counter-productive.

This version of Total Mail Converter is not registered.

For many anti-abortion voters, she said, choosing a primary candidate is about “trust” and “personal feel” rather than policy. The candidates’ approaches here suggest they understand that.

Rubio and Perry talked about seeing their children on ultrasounds during pregnancy. Carson, a retired neurosurgeon, talked about how he gravitated to pediatric surgery because of how much he values children.

Louisiana Gov. Bobby Jindal talked Thursday night about having to defend his anti-abortion stance in his interviews for medical school.

Santorum tells the story of doctors advising that his daughter, Bella, who suffers from a rare genetic disorder, would not have a good quality of life and could die as an infant. “There is no better way to preach the gospel of life,” Santorum said Friday, than to have school-age Bella “in the White House.”

Public opinion, meanwhile, remains divided.

An Associated Press-GfK poll conducted in January and February found that 51 percent of Americans think abortion should be legal in all or most cases, while 45 percent think it should be illegal in most or all cases.

At NARAL Pro-Choice America, a leading abortion rights advocacy group, Sasha Bruce said that means Republicans “are fighting over a slice of the minority,” putting them at a disadvantage in November.

Tobias countered that among voters who rank abortion as a key issue in deciding on a candidate, “we win a majority of them.” Her movement’s job, she said, is to increase the share of voters who cast their vote “based on the life issue. If we do, we win.”

Bruce said her organization is focused on educating general election voters about the success abortion opponents have had limiting abortion access through state-by-state restrictions. “They aren’t overturning Roe v. Wade, but they’re just chipping away,” she said.

White House contenders Trump, Bush in virtual dead heat: Reuters/Ipsos poll // Reuters // Will Dunham – July 11, 2015

Donald Trump, who became the center of attention in the race for the 2016 Republican U.S. presidential nomination with his denunciation of illegal immigrants from Mexico, has vaulted into a virtual dead heat with Jeb Bush atop the field, a Reuters-Ipsos poll released on Saturday showed.

Trump, a billionaire real estate developer, had the support of 15.8 percent of respondents in the online poll of self-identified Republicans compared to 16.1 percent for Bush, a former Florida governor.

They were followed by New Jersey Governor Chris Christie at 9.5 percent, Kentucky Senator Rand Paul at 8.1 percent, surgeon and author Ben Carson at 7.2 percent and Wisconsin Governor Scott Walker at 5.8 percent.

However, given a choice of three candidates - Bush, Trump or Florida Senator Marco Rubio - Bush had a comfortable lead at 42 percent among the respondents in the Reuters-Ipsos Republican poll, compared to 28.4 percent for Trump and 20 percent for Rubio.

This version of Total Mail Converter is not registered.

In the race for the Democratic presidential nomination, former Secretary of State Hillary Clinton remained in front with the support of 48.3 percent of self-identified Democrats polled, with Vermont Senator Bernie Sanders continuing to inch up, at 22.9 percent, and Vice President Joe Biden, who has not entered the race, at 10.7 percent.

Numerous businesses including NBC Universal, Univision, Macy's, Serta and NASCAR have cut ties with Trump since he accused Mexico, in his June 16 speech announcing his candidacy, of sending rapists and other criminals into the United States. Trump on July 6 added that illegal border-crossers from Mexico are carrying "tremendous infectious disease."

The controversy over Trump's immigration comments has dominated news coverage of the Republican campaign in recent weeks, and he has climbed in the Reuters-Ipsos poll to draw essentially even with Bush. On June 30, the poll had Bush at 16.9 percent and Trump at 12.8 percent.

A hard line against illegal immigration may find a receptive audience in Republican primary voters, with U.S. conservatives often accusing President Barack Obama of doing too little to secure America's border with Mexico.

Trump also has accused Bush of being weak on illegal immigration, bringing Bush's Mexican-born wife into the debate. "If my wife were from Mexico, I think I would have a soft spot for people from Mexico. I can understand that," Trump said in a CNN interview.

Trump has increasingly come under fire from some of his rivals for the Republican nomination including Bush.

"Everybody has a belief that we should control our borders," Bush said last week. "But to make these extraordinarily kind of ugly comments is not reflective of the Republican Party. Trump is wrong on this."

In the Reuters/Ipsos poll of the Republican race, 404 self-identified Republicans age 18 or over were questioned from July 6-10. The poll had a credibility interval, a measure of accuracy, of 5.7 percentage points.

In the Reuters/Ipsos poll of the Democratic race, 504 self-identified Democrats age 18 or over were questioned over the same time period, with a credibility interval of 5.1 percentage points.

Senate Republicans push to punish 'sanctuary cities' // The Hill //Jordan Carney – July 11, 2015

Republicans want to use a largely non-controversial education bill to crack down on so-called "sanctuary cities" in the wake of a San Francisco shooting that garnered national attention.

The recent killing of 32-year old Kathryn Steinle, allegedly shot by an illegal immigrant who had already been deported five times, has sparked a debate over cities that don't carry out all federal immigration laws.

Sen. Ted Cruz (R-Texas), a presidential contender, as well as Sens. Tom Cotton (R-Ark.) and Jeff Sessions (R-Ala.), have filed an amendment to the Every Child Achieves Act, the Senate's overhaul of the Bush-era No Child Left Behind law, that would redirect funding meant for sanctuary cities to state and local governments that comply with federal law.

Sessions accused officials of “deliberately and openly” disregarding federal immigration laws as an “act of defiance."

This version of Total Mail Converter is not registered.

"Congress has an obligation to ensure limited taxpayer dollars are not given to cities and counties who refuse to cooperate with federal law enforcement," he said.

Republican Sen. David Vitter, who is running for governor in Louisiana, has also introduced an amendment cracking down on sanctuary cities to the education bill.

But tying the immigration measure to the education bill, which has so far managed to avoid any political landmines, would likely sink the legislation, which has the strong support of Majority Leader Mitch McConnell (R-Ky.).

The conservative push to punish sanctuary cities comes as congressional Democrats have walked a fine line in the wake of the shooting.

Democrats have pressed for more details, but been careful to not directly blame San Francisco's laws for Steinle's death, and have shown even less appetite for limiting federal funding to the more than 200 sanctuary cities in the United States.

Republicans have sought to raise pressure on Democrats over the issue.

"Reasonable people can and do differ on issues of border security, interior enforcement and the status of illegal immigrants present in our nation," said Cotton. "We should not disagree about the importance of the rule of law."

Other Republicans, including Sen. Rand Paul (Ky.), another 2016 contender, are also rolling out legislation in the wake of the shooting.

Paul is expected to introduce a measure requiring state and local agencies to tell U.S. Immigration and Customs Enforcement (ICE) when they've arrested an illegal agreement. The agencies would also have to hold someone if ICE requests.

Paul's proposal would also tie state and local law enforcement grants to compliance with federal immigration laws, according to his office.

The San Francisco shooting has intensified Republican anger over the administration's policies, with sanctuary cities just the latest issue in a years-long fight over immigration.

Cruz, Vitter, Sessions, along with Republican Sens. Chuck Grassley (Iowa), the chairman of the Judiciary Committee, David Perdue (Ga.), John Cornyn (Texas), Mike Lee (Utah), Thom Tillis (N.C.) and Orrin Hatch (Utah), wrote to Homeland Security Secretary Jeh Johnson criticizing a government program that outlines when an illegal immigrants should be turned over to the federal government.

They said it "requires immigration law officers and agents to ignore plain law and public safety, solely to the benefit of criminal aliens."

They have also challenged President Obama directly, suggesting that by refusing to crackdown on cities that don't comply with federal law he created an environment that made Steinle's death possible.

This version of Total Mail Converter is not registered.

Vitter said that under Obama “dangerous criminals are getting a free pass.”

Cruz, meanwhile, acknowledged that while sanctuary cities are an issue, he added that the “problem is exacerbated” by the Obama administration.

“We deal with the problem that the Obama administration consistently refuses to enforce the laws,” he told Fox Business. “[It] is just not the cities who are defying the law. It’s the federal government.”

The battle over sanctuary cities also comes ahead of a year when Republicans will have to defend 24 Senate seats, including a handful in blue-leaning states.

According to the conservative-leaning Rasmussen Reports, 62 percent of likely voters support the Department of Justice penalizing cities that don’t enforce federal immigration laws.

But the GOP push against sanctuary cities could lead some Republicans into a politically divisive fight on immigration they might hope to avoid.

Adding to the charged debate are GOP presidential candidate Donald Trump's controversial comments about immigration, which garnered pushback from Republican National Committee (RNC) Chairman Reince Priebus, and divided Republicans.

Sen. John McCain (R-Ariz.), who is up for reelection next year, weighed in Friday, saying the “circus” surrounding the immigration debate is hurting his party.

“If the Republican nominee for president does not support comprehensive immigration reform and border security policy, we have no chance of defeating Hillary Clinton and winning the White House in 2016,” he added.

Poll: Jeb, Trump in virtual tie // The Hill // Mark Hensch – July 11, 2015

GOP presidential candidates Jeb Bush and Donald Trump are locked in a virtual tie for the 2016 Republican nomination, according to a Reuters-Ipsos poll released Saturday.

It found that 16.1 percent of self-identified Republicans back Bush, the former governor of Florida.

Trump, a New York business mogul, chases Bush’s lead with 15.8 percent support.

New Jersey Gov. Chris Christie came in third 9.5 percent of possible voters’ backing.

Sen. Rand Paul (R-Ky.) is next at 8.1 percent, followed by retired neurosurgeon Ben Carson at 7.2 percent.

Wisconsin Gov. Scott Walker – widely expected to enter the 2016 field Monday – earned 5.8 percent.

Republican voters’ response changed dramatically when they offered only three contenders from the party’s crowded 2016 presidential field.

This version of Total Mail Converter is not registered.

Bush takes a commanding lead when matched against only Trump and Sen. Marco Rubio (R-Fla.). The former Florida governor nabs 42 percent in that scenario. Trump, meanwhile, gets 28.4 percent and Rubio 20 percent.

Saturday's new sampling discovered that the 2016 Democratic nominating contest is much less competitive.

Former secretary of State Hillary Clinton remains the party's frontrunner with 48.3 percent of self-identified Democrats backing her.

Sen. Bernie Sanders (I-Vt.) is her closest competitor, trailing her at 22.9 percent nationwide.

Vice President Joe Biden – who has not publicly declared his 2016 intentions – then grabs 10.7 percent support.

Saturday's survey sampled 404 self-identified Republicans age 18 or over between Monday and Friday. It has a credibility interval of 5.7 percent.

It also polled 504 self-identified Democrats from the same age demographic during the same window of time. That portion has a credibility interval of 5.1 percent.

Bush and Trump have sparred in recent weeks over border security and illegal immigration.

Trump argued Wednesday that Bush's stance on the issue is inspired by his wife Columba Bush, who was born in Mexico.

"If my wife were from Mexico, I think I would have a soft spot for people from Mexico," Trump told host Anderson Cooper on CNN's "AC360."

"So, if he loves his wife and she is from Mexico, I think it probably has an influence on him."

Bush has countered that Trump's sharp criticism of Hispanic immigrants and Mexico is inflammatory and ignorant.

"Trump is wrong on this," he said after two Independence Day parades on July 4 in New Hampshire.

"I don't think he represents the Republican Party, and his views are way outside the mainstream of what Republicans think," he added before calling Trump's immigration rhetoric "extraordinarily ugly."

Donald Trump continues to rise in recent GOP poll, now almost even with Jeb Bush; Chris Christie polls third // NY Daily News // Denis Slattery – July 11, 2015

Donald Trump's stock is on the rise.

The billionaire blowhard and presidential candidate has surged into a virtual tie with former Florida governor Jeb Bush atop the crowded field of Republican contenders, according to a Reuters-Ipsos poll released Saturday.

Trump had the support of 15.8% of respondents in the online poll of self-identified Republicans compared to 16.1% for Bush.

New Jersey Governor Chris Christie trailed the top two at 9.5%.

The surge comes despite blowback from Trump's recent controversial comments about illegal immigrants from

This version of Total Mail Converter is not registered.

Mexico being “rapists” and drug dealers.

Several companies including NBC, Macy’s and NASCAR have severed ties with the real estate developer.

Trump was set to appear at a rally in Phoenix Saturday where he was expected to double down on his rhetoric.

Jeb Bush still narrowly leads the crowded pack of Republican candidates for President, as he maintains a very slim lead over Trump, with Chris Christie in third.

“He’s a fighter,” said Jamiel Shaw Sr., whose 17-year-old son was gunned down by an undocumented immigrant in Los Angeles in 2008.

Shaw was expected to introduce Trump at the Phoenix rally, which was moved to a larger venue days before the event due to high demand, according to Trump representatives.

“When he said what he said (about Mexico), I thought he was being nice,” Shaw said. “I would have said murderers.”

According to Reuters, 404 self-identified Republicans age 18 or over were questioned from July 6-10 for the latest poll.

The poll had a credibility interval, a measure of accuracy, of 5.7 percentage points.

On June 30, the poll had Bush at 16.9% and Trump at 12.8%.

OTHER 2016 NEWS

OPINIONS/EDITORIALS/BLOGS

Power of the Pocketbook: Women Gaining Influence As Campaign Donors // NPR // Lauren Leatherby - July 12, 2015

Campaign contributions from women have been on a slow but steady rise.

In 1872, Victoria Claflin Woodhull became the first woman to run for president — before women even had the right to vote.

Campaigning as a member of the Equal Rights Party on a platform of women's suffrage and labor reforms, the election came and went without Woodhull receiving any electoral votes, but Woodhull became the first of a small club of women who have run for the United States' highest office.

This version of Total Mail Converter is not registered.

This campaign cycle marks another milestone for women — for the first time, women are vying for the White House in each of the major parties' primaries. Women's voices are also becoming more prominent in campaign finance, particularly for Democrats. That's something that will get new attention over the next several months and with the first campaign finance disclosures set to be released Wednesday.

The Washington Post reported last month that 60 percent of Hillary Clinton's donors are women — a nearly 30 percent increase over Barack Obama's 2012 record, when almost half of Obama's individual donors were women, according to an analysis by the Center for Responsive Politics.

"Women candidates are front and center in a way they never have been before, which is really exciting for women voters and donors and activists," said Jess McIntosh, vice president of communications for EMILY's List, which aims to elect Democratic women to office. "We see in research that if a woman is running in a race, women are more likely to be engaged in that race."

Even before the 2016 presidential cycle, contributions from women to political campaigns had been on a slow but steady rise. The reason is threefold, says Missy Shorey, executive director of Maggie's List, an organization that supports conservative female candidates to run for U.S. Congress: increased efforts to engage women, more women in the workforce and more women are voting.

"When we represent 53 percent of the electorate — the majority — we are clearly going to be more politically active, and one of the forms of being politically active is, of course, donating," Shorey said.

Women's attitudes toward politics are also shifting.

"What we've seen over time is that women have been philanthropic givers, giving to charity in a range of amounts, but they haven't seen politics as a place to invest their dollars," said Debbie Walsh, director of the Center for American Women and Politics at Rutgers University. "There hasn't been a sense that politics is the place where you can make change."

But that sense is changing, Walsh says. Women are beginning to see politics as a way to cause change on the issues they care about. And traditional women's issues like reproductive health, equal pay, child care and family leave aren't the only topics bringing women to the table.

"We're even seeing political issues that don't usually get talked about as women's issues — like raising the minimum wage — get talked about as women's issues, because they disproportionately affect women," McIntosh argued. "I think seeing great female candidates, talking about women's issues in a way that really clearly defines the contrast between the two candidates running, just means that more women than ever are engaged in the process."

That gain in share, however, has not been seen equally from both parties. While the share of money going to Republican presidential candidates from women has remained largely flat, the share of donations to presidential Democratic candidates from women has grown by more than 20 percent since 1992.

Some conservative groups are working to change that.

"When we reach out to women," Shorey said, "we speak about our core issues and talk about why this candidate is going to make a difference. Women like to invest their money knowing it's going to end up doing something, why this woman we're suggesting and have endorsed can win."

This version of Total Mail Converter is not registered.

Maggie's List uses established political data and on-the-ground insights to talk about candidates when reaching out to women, Shorey said.

"We reach out to women that support our ideals, which are fiscal conservatism, less government, more personal responsibility, and stronger national security," she said. "Those are our core issues."

Though women are making gains as a proportion of individual donors for candidates, they still remain underrepresented among political donors as a whole. Women made up only 36 percent of all funds donated during the 2012 presidential election, meaning that men still donate at nearly double the rate of women.

This difference is even more pronounced at the top level. Of the 100 most generous campaign contributors during the 2012 election cycle, only 11 were women, according to the Center for Responsive Politics.

But that's likely to change.

"As you see more women more successful in terms of income and business and as they have more independent wealth and disposable income they can invest," Walsh said, "you'll see more women as donors to campaigns."

MISCELLANEOUS ADDED BY STAFF

TOP NEWS

DOMESTIC

Obamacare Flexes Muscles With New Medicare Payment Plans // NYT // Margot Sanger-Katz – July 11, 2015

For the first time, the Obama administration has deployed an important new power it has under the Affordable Care Act: proposing to pay doctors and hospitals based on the quality of care they provide, regardless of whether they want to be paid that way.

It introduced two such programs this week. One would require all hospitals in 75 metropolitan areas to accept a flat fee for the costs associated with a hip or knee replacement — including the costs of surgery, medications, the joint implant and rehabilitation. And if the quality of the care is not judged to be good, Medicare will take back some of the money it paid. Another program would increase or decrease payments to home health agencies in nine states, depending on how they perform on certain quality measurements.

The Department of Health and Human Services always had the authority to change the amounts it paid for certain services, but before Obamacare, it needed Congress to pass legislation to change the way it paid for them. The agency is asking for public comment on the proposals.

These changes will allow the administration to reshape the Medicare program. The new payment rules, while guided by existing evidence, are still experimental — and are likely to anger Obamacare critics and members of Congress who would prefer to see major changes to Medicare enacted through legislation.

This version of Total Mail Converter is not registered.

The proposal "does raise the question of how much legislative authority can be ceded," Joseph Antos, a scholar at the conservative think tank the American Enterprise Institute, said in an email.

There will most likely be other such programs activated before President Obama leaves office. The administration has pledged that a majority of medical payments will include some measure of "value" by 2018.

The Affordable Care Act set up a new office called the Center for Medicare and Medicaid Innovation. Its mandate was to test new ways of paying for medical care that would improve quality and lower costs. Since the health care law passed, the innovation center has begun dozens of voluntary pilot programs, encouraging interested medical providers to test the new payment types.

But the law also said that if it finds programs that the Medicare actuary said passed those tests, it could make the changes a permanent part of how Medicare pays for care.

Medicare has been testing similar programs for the last few years among hospitals and home health agencies that chose to sign up. What's new about these proposed programs is that providers can't choose whether to participate. Every hospital in the selected markets, which include New York and Miami, will be paid the new way for knee and hip replacements if the surgery proposal is finalized. Every home health agency in the nine selected states will be paid the new way for its services if that proposal goes into effect.

Joshua Seidman, a senior vice president at the consulting firm Avalere Health, said he's been waiting for the administration to start using its power to reshape how Medicare pays doctors, hospitals and other medical services.

"How are they going to expand these programs and scale them? That's the question now," he said. "It's obviously got huge potential to shape how future payment is made."

Voting Rights Legacy of the '60s Heads to Court as North Carolina Law Is Tested // NYT // Erik Eckholm – July 11, 2015

Days after South Carolina confronted its past and lowered the Confederate battle flag, North Carolina will grapple with its present-day rules that determine access to the voting booth.

A federal trial opening in Winston-Salem on Monday is meant to determine whether recent, sweeping changes in the state's election laws discriminate against black voters. These changes were adopted by the Republican-dominated state legislature in 2013, immediately after the United States Supreme Court struck down the heart of the Voting Rights Act of 1965 when it ended a requirement that nine states with histories of discrimination, including North Carolina, get federal approval before altering their election laws.

But the case, as well as one involving a Texas law requiring voters to show a photo ID, could have far wider repercussions, legal experts say — helping to define the scope of voting rights protections across the country in the coming presidential election and beyond.

The contested measures in North Carolina include reduced early voting days, an end to same-day registration and an end to a program to preregister high school students. They are a far cry from the violent intimidation and poll taxes of the Jim Crow era. Still, few issues are more highly charged than voting rights in the old Confederate states, where the murder of civil rights workers and the brutal police attack on Alabama marchers galvanized Congress to pass the 1965 act, and the trial is fanning old emotions.

This version of Total Mail Converter is not registered.

“This is our Selma,” said William J. Barber II, president of the North Carolina N.A.A.C.P., of the election changes in the state. His group brought the lawsuit, alongside the League of Women Voters, a group of college students and the Department of Justice.

The Justice Department and other plaintiffs argue that the discriminatory effect was so clearly intentional that North Carolina should again be required to submit voting proposals for federal approval.

The state’s attorney general, Roy Cooper, responded in a pretrial brief that the plaintiffs are arguing for “the equivalent of election law affirmative action” or for “practices that are favored by political organizations dedicated to maximizing Democratic turnout.”

North Carolina says that the 2013 changes were made to ensure electoral integrity and reduce administrative burdens, and that any effect on minorities is negligible and certainly not illegal.

Litigation over changes in voting rules, as opposed to the redrawing of districts, was uncommon before the Supreme Court blocked the federal preapproval requirement in the case of Shelby County v. Holder; questionable changes were usually halted before they could take effect. Now, though, courts and civil rights groups have been forced to take a new look at the remaining provisions of the voting rights statute.

Like North Carolina, other states have recently revamped their election laws. Texas, for example, put in place a stringent photo ID law, the legality of which is now under consideration by a federal appeals court.

But North Carolina lawmakers passed the broadest set of changes, trimming or eliminating measures that had been adopted over the previous 15 years expressly to bolster electoral participation by minority and younger voters.

In addition to cutting early voting days, to 10 from 17, lawmakers ended the ability to register and cast a vote on the same day, instead restoring a 25-day wait, and abolished a preregistration program for 16- and 17-year-olds. The 2013 law also included a strict photo ID requirement, but it was recently softened and will not be considered in the trial.

Judge Thomas D. Schroeder of Federal District Court will most likely have to define the point at which such measures amount to unconstitutional discrimination under the Voting Rights Act, setting an important precedent on a topic that many legal experts think must eventually be resolved by the Supreme Court.

The plaintiffs in the case, North Carolina N.A.A.C.P. v. McCrory, claim not only that the changes have an illegal discriminatory result but also that they were devised to suppress black and Hispanic voting. The changes “fall with special force on North Carolina’s black citizens,” the Justice Department said in its brief, and “that unlawful result is no accident.”

If intent to discriminate is proved — a tall order — the state will lose. But how to define an illegal discriminatory effect is less settled.

The plaintiffs claim that the North Carolina law violates Section 2 of the Voting Rights Act, which, as amended in 1982, bans policies that result “in a denial or abridgment” of the right to vote based on race and calls for a judgment “based on the totality of circumstances.”

“What is a practice that results in an abridgment?” asked Edward B. Foley, an expert in election law at Moritz

This version of Total Mail Converter is not registered.

College of Law at Ohio State University.

In the limited number of cases so far, federal appeals courts have sharply diverged, “offering diametrically opposite views of how to understand what is now the most important section of the Voting Rights Act,” Mr. Foley said.

Efforts by civil rights groups to win a preliminary injunction against the North Carolina law before the 2014 election were unsuccessful, so its provisions, except for the voter ID requirement, were in effect then. But the two sides offer contrasting versions of what happened in the election.

The plaintiffs will present numerous witnesses who will testify that the new rules deterred them from voting, as well as expert testimony showing broader discriminatory effects, said Donita Judge, a senior lawyer with the Advancement Project, a civil rights group and co-counsel for the plaintiffs.

That blacks are more likely to use early voting, same-day registration and out-of-precinct voting has been well established in past elections. Many black churches, for example, send busloads of voters to the polls after Sunday services, and often used the extra week that is now eliminated. Poorer and less educated on average, blacks may be more likely to miss the deadline for registration or to be confused by changes in their home precinct and voting spots, according to civil rights groups.

While it is impossible to know how many people did not register or vote in 2014 because of the changes, data does show, as one concrete measure, that 11,000 people who registered in North Carolina less than 25 days before Election Day were unable to vote when they could have under previous rules, said Daniel T. Donovan, a lawyer with Kirkland and Ellis, which is also representing the plaintiffs.

North Carolina officials discount these claims of hardship. The contested measures, their brief says, “simply repeal or scale back conveniences on when and how to vote or register to vote; in no respect do they impose additional qualification or barriers.”

The state also points out that the African-American voter turnout in 2014 was higher than it was in 2010, the previous nonpresidential election year. But the civil rights groups note that many factors affect voter turnout in a particular year — 2014 had a hotly contested Senate race — and that the N.A.A.C.P., alarmed by the new rules, engaged in months of intense campaigns to urge African-Americans to register and vote, an effort that cannot be sustained indefinitely.

Of particular interest will be the effort to prove that North Carolina legislators acted intentionally to curb black voting, and the related request by federal officials and the civil rights groups to restore a preapproval requirement for election law changes in North Carolina, under a rarely invoked provision of the Voting Rights Act.

The Justice Department is seeking similar restorations of federal oversight, known as “bail-ins,” in two Texas cases, involving its redistricting plan and its photo ID law.

Proving intentional racial discrimination is difficult, said Justin Levitt, an expert in election law at Loyola Law School in Los Angeles. “That doesn’t mean that they have to prove animus or hatred,” he said in an email, “but they will have to prove that the law was put in place because of (and not merely despite) its impact on minorities.”

If the plaintiffs do establish intentionality, Mr. Levitt said, it will be up to the judge to decide whether reimposing federal preclearance is warranted.

This version of Total Mail Converter is not registered.

INTERNATIONAL

Meeting on Greece Debt Breaks Up With No Deal // NYT // James Kanter – July 11, 2015

A meeting of European finance ministers broke up late Saturday with no agreement on whether Greece should be granted its third bailout since 2010, reflecting deep divides over whether the Athens government can be trusted to repay huge new loans and leaving the Continent hours from what could be a historic rupture.

The finance ministers planned to reconvene on Sunday, just before European national leaders are scheduled to meet in Brussels for what they have said would be a final decision on whether Greece should qualify for a new aid package, a step aimed at determining whether the country can remain in the euro currency union.

The failure by the finance ministers to reach an agreement, after nearly nine hours of talks, belied the optimism that followed the approval early Saturday by the Greek Parliament of a package of pension cuts, higher taxes and other policy changes long sought by Greece's international creditors. In a remarkable turnabout, Prime Minister Alexis Tsipras had pushed the package through the legislature despite having led his country into a referendum six days earlier that overwhelmingly rejected much the same terms.

Despite Greece's capitulation on those terms, many countries came into this weekend's final round of negotiations skeptical of the Tsipras government's commitment to seeing through the changes and putting his country on firmer financial footing — and weary of the constant brinkmanship that has characterized the months of negotiations over Greece's latest crisis.

Instead of working through the night to hammer out a statement on requirements for Greece, as had been expected, the meeting was suddenly called off shortly before midnight, and ministers left without even holding a formal news conference.

"The issue of credibility and trust was discussed, and also of course the financial issues involved," Jeroen Dijsselbloem of the Netherlands, the head of the so-called Eurogroup of ministers, told reporters. "It is still very difficult. but work is still in progress," he said, adding that discussions would continue later Sunday morning.

From the start, it was clear that Mr. Tsipras's gambit had not entirely won over Germany and other countries that have been skeptical about giving a new round of loans to Greece after years in which successive governments in Athens have struggled to carry out changes that creditors have demanded as a condition of the bailouts.

"We will have exceptionally difficult negotiations," Wolfgang Schäuble, the hard-nosed German finance minister, said on Saturday before the meeting. "We won't be able to rely on promises."

His prediction proved accurate, as he and fellow ministers wrangled with little apparent progress, seeking more assurances from Greece that it was committed to changing its ways, and weighing the desires of France and Italy for a deal against the more skeptical stance of Germany and the possibility of outright opposition from Finland.

During their talks, the finance ministers called on their Greek counterpart, Euclid Tsakalotos, to put the package proposed by his government into swift effect to prove its willingness to make deep and lasting changes to the nation's faltering economy. Greece, in turn, continued to seek some assurance that it would win the right to renegotiate the terms of its debt repayment.

This version of Total Mail Converter is not registered.

It was not clear that the finance ministers' meeting on Sunday morning would yield a consensus about how to proceed, increasing the possibility that they would leave final decisions to their national leaders, who are to gather in Brussels in the afternoon.

"I am still hopeful," Pierre Moscovici, the European commissioner for economic affairs, told reporters as he left the Eurogroup meeting.

In an apparent effort to raise the pressure on Greece, some officials earlier in the day were informally passing around a one-page position paper, reportedly drawn up by the German finance ministry as a possible option for the negotiations, saying the Greek proposal fell short and suggesting options that included ideas like having the country leave the eurozone for five years and reapply for membership.

The idea of a break from the euro was not openly discussed at the meeting, according to one of the officials with direct knowledge of the talks, who like others spoke on the condition of anonymity because the discussions were private.

Mr. Schäuble, however, referred repeatedly to a plan drafted by German officials that would require Athens to transfer state assets into a trust fund to pay down its debt in order to stay in the eurozone, according to two people with direct knowledge of the discussions. Mr. Schäuble did not refer explicitly to the idea of a temporary Greek departure from the eurozone, these people said. But the tough approach by the German minister, they said, appeared designed to make clear that he now favors a Greek exit.

The European leaders have set this weekend as a deadline for settling the issue of whether to keep Greece solvent or cut off further aid, a step that would almost certainly result in forcing Athens to abandon the euro.

An exit by Greece would be a blow to Europe's goal of ever-closer integration.

Greece's banks are teetering on insolvency, the government is running out of cash to meet day-to-day obligations, and without an infusion, additional payments to international creditors will be missed in coming weeks.

Experts who reviewed Greece's request for a third bailout program informed Eurogroup ministers that about €74 billion is needed to cover its financing needs for the next three years, according to a person with direct knowledge of the experts' findings. That is far more than the €53.5 billion, or about $59 billion, that Athens has requested.

If loans for Greece are eventually approved, the majority will probably be covered by a new loan from the European Stability Mechanism, the European bailout fund. Other sources could include loans from the International Monetary Fund, funds raised through Greek government revenue and, eventually, new debt issued by Greece.

That discrepancy between what Greece had requested and the new estimate of its bailout needs may have further reinforced the doubts of those who wonder if the Greek government has a handle on its finances and will be able to carry out promised changes.

"Many governments — mine, too — have serious concerns about the commitment of the Greek government," the Dutch state secretary for finance, Eric Wiebes, told reporters in Brussels before Saturday's meeting. "After all, we are discussing a proposal from the Greek government that was fiercely rejected less than a week ago, and that is a serious concern."

This version of Total Mail Converter is not registered.

While no signed bailout deal was expected this weekend, the question is whether Europe will decide to continue negotiating a rescue with Greece, or leave its banks to collapse and its virtually bankrupt government to default. European leaders have said their Sunday evening meeting could be used to reach that decision.

The fear of Greece and its supporters, which include the French government, is that without an agreement to continue negotiations, Greek banks could collapse next week, raising the prospect that the country would quickly have to abandon the euro.

Mr. Moscovici, the European economic affairs commissioner who is a former finance minister of France, said as he entered Saturday's meeting that the "Greek government has made significant gestures." He said the Greek proposals form "a basis for a new program" of loans.

Before the meeting, the finance ministers received assessments of the Tsipras plan by experts representing the creditors.

"The papers of the Greek authorities contain positive elements, issues where clarification is needed, and some issues where the institutions wish to see stronger commitment to reform," said a person with direct knowledge of experts' findings. But this person also warned: "Negotiations will be tough. The chances for a deal are 50-50."

The Eurogroup, with its 19 eurozone finance ministers, has some outspoken critics of Greece, irritated by the Tsipras government's negotiating style and Mr. Tsipras's decision the week before last to break off negotiations and call for the referendum. Mr. Tsipras surprised many in his own country and party on Thursday when he presented a plan containing many of the elements — including austerity measures — that the voters had just rejected by a wide margin.

The creditors now want strong evidence that Greece will honor its latest set of economic promises if it gets the new loans it is seeking, and an agreement to ease the burden of its current debt, which at €317 billion is equivalent to 177 percent of the country's gross domestic product. By that measure, only Japan's debt, at 245 percent, is higher among the world's economies.

Iran Leader Ayatollah Ali Khamenei Calls U.S. 'Embodiment of Arrogance' // WSJ // Asa Fitch & Jay Solomon – July 11, 2015

Iran's Supreme Leader Ayatollah Ali Khamenei called the U.S. the "ultimate embodiment of arrogance" and warned that his nation's opposition to Washington wouldn't end if a nuclear accord is reached between Tehran and world powers in the coming days.

Mr. Khamenei's comments on Saturday again raised questions about whether the 75-year-old cleric fully backed an emerging agreement that calls for Iran to constrain its nuclear program in exchange for a lifting of international sanctions.

Iran Nuclear Talks Extended Until Monday

Tehran's top political leader has consistently railed against the U.S. in the years since Iran's 1979 Islamic revolution. But the timing of his comments, at a critical juncture in the negotiations, pointed to the continued hurdles the Obama administration faces in trying to forge an agreement with Iran.

"The U.S. is the ultimate embodiment of arrogance," Mr. Khamenei told a group of students in Tehran on

This version of Total Mail Converter is not registered.

Saturday in response to a question raised about how to combat the U.S. in the years ahead, according to the supreme leader's official website. "Get ready to continue combating the arrogant power."

The U.S., Iran and five other global powers—the U.K., France, Germany, Russia and China—continued a full day of negotiations in Austria's capital on Saturday in an attempt to reach a final deal.

U.S. Secretary of State John Kerry and his Iranian counterpart, Foreign Minister Javad Zarif, have held 15 straight days of talks in Vienna that have already broken through two diplomatic deadlines, June 30 and July 7. The U.S., Iran and the other negotiating countries have cited Monday as the newest target to complete the talks, and meetings are planned throughout Sunday.

Diplomats said they were making progress on Saturday, but stressed that serious issues still needed to be resolved to reach an elusive final deal.

"Met with @FedericaMog and @JZarif this AM," Mr. Kerry wrote on his official Twitter account on Saturday, referring to Mr. Zarif and Federica Mogherini, the foreign policy chief of the European Union. "Still have difficult issues to resolve."

Senior Iranian officials have accused the U.S. over the past 72 hours of backtracking on commitments it made in previous rounds of the negotiations, on issues ranging from the lifting of United Nations sanctions to the future size of Tehran's nuclear program. American officials have denied the charge.

On Saturday, Iranian President Hasan Rouhani said the U.S. and its negotiating partners were to blame if the diplomacy in Vienna failed.

"In these 22 months, we have spoken to six world powers in a way that if the negotiations don't succeed, the world knows well that Iran has been reasonable and has never left the table," Mr. Rouhani said, according to Tehran's semiofficial state media.

Monday Deadline Looms For Iran Nuclear Talks // AP // Matthew Lee & George Jahn – July 11, 2015

Negotiations over Iran's nuclear program blew past the two-week mark in Vienna on Saturday ahead of a new deadline for a deal, with the United States and Iran both threatening to walk away.

Despite hints of progress since U.S. Secretary of State John Kerry and Iranian Foreign Minister Mohammad Javad Zarif traded accusations of backtracking on Thursday, diplomats said it remained unclear whether negotiators would be able to meet the Monday deadline, the fourth since talks began 15 days ago.

Kerry and Zarif met on Saturday with European Union foreign policy chief Frederica Mogherini and were conferring with other foreign ministers involved. German Foreign Minister Frank Walter Steinmeier and French Foreign Minister Laurent Fabius are both in Vienna. British Foreign Secretary Phillip Hammond was expected later Saturday.

The Chinese and Russian foreign ministers have said they will come to Vienna if a deal appears close.

On Friday, Kerry suggested that some progress had been made, telling reporters that the "atmosphere is very constructive," but stressing that "very difficult issues" remained to be resolved.

This version of Total Mail Converter is not registered.

Those comments came a day after he had declared for the second time in the current round that the negotiations could not be open-ended, warned that the U.S. was prepared to call an end to the talks and challenged Iran to make tough choices to seal a deal.

Zarif responded by accusing the United States and its European partners of backtracking on previous commitments and calling on the U.S. to end its "obsession" with sanctions.

Any deal is meant to clamp long-term and verifiable restrictions on Iranian nuclear programs that are technically adaptable to make weapons in exchange for sanctions relief for Tehran.

Friday's tougher rhetoric mirrored negotiators' frustrations. The current round that was supposed to conclude on June 30, but was extended until July 7, then July 10 and now July 13.

The scope of access to U.N. inspectors monitoring Iran's nuclear program remains a sticking point. The Americans want no restrictions. Iranian officials say unrestricted monitoring could be a cover for Western spying. Diplomats say Iran's negotiators have signaled awillingness to compromise, but hardliners in Iran remain opposed to broad U.N. inspections.

Another unresolved matter is Iran's demand for a U.N. arms embargo to be lifted as part of sanctions relief, a stance supported by Russia and China but opposed by the U.S. and some Europeans.

The sides had hoped to seal a deal before the end of Thursday in Washington to avoid delays in implementing their promises.

By missing that target, the U.S. and Iran now have to wait for a 60-day congressional review period during which President Barack Obama cannot waive sanctions on Iran. Had they reached a deal by Thursday, the review would have been only 30 days.

Iran is unlikely to begin a substantial rollback of its nuclear program until it gets sanctions relief in return.

This version of Total Mail Converter is not registered.

From: "The Washington Post" <email@e.washingtonpost.com>
To: john.podesta@gmail.com
Date: 8/6/2015 12:54:20 AM
Subject: The Daily 202: What to watch in Cleveland

View The Daily 202 on the Web

PowerPost

The Daily 202

Morning intelligence for leaders

Share on Twitter Share on Facebook

These are the 10 candidates scheduled to participate in tonight's Fox News Republican presidential debate. (AP Photos)

BY JAMES HOHMANN

THE BIG IDEA: The two-hour debate on Fox News, which starts at 9 p.m. Eastern, is a pivot point in the Republican nominating contest. Here are nine things I'll be watching:

This version of Total Mail Converter is not registered.

Is the Trump Tornado more like an F1 or an F5?

"I'd prefer no conflict, no infighting," The Donald told The Washington Post, "BUT if they hit me, I'll hit them harder. It's all going to depend on the moment." For a curtain-raiser story by Robert Costa and Philip Rucker, he said he'll "have to feel it out" and "see where everyone else is coming from."

- Trump's own team seems genuinely unsure of what he'll do. "I have no idea what to expect," a senior advisor told ABC's Jonathan Karl. "I'm just as clueless as you about what he'll do."
- In an op-ed for today's Wall Street Journal, Weekly Standard executive editor Fred Barnes (a frequent Fox talking head) urges the moderators to NOT treat Trump like just any other candidate. "At the moment, he is the Republican campaign. And until the disruption in the GOP ranks caused by his entry to the race settles down, he will continue to be," Fred writes. "Up to now, Mr. Trump has escaped explaining his blustery broadsides, dubious claims and flip-flops. He has been treated as a celebrity whose performance is the story. But how, for instance, would he get Mexico to pay for a wall along the U.S. border? What are the provisions of his immigration policy? How would he replace ObamaCare? Is there a serious Trump agenda? His past business dealings also invite questions."
- Chris Wallace, one of the three moderators, was blunt on the air Tuesday night: "We don't want to make it the Donald Trump show, but it is."
- Former RNC Chairman Michael Steele, asked how candidates should respond if Trump attacks them directly, advised no engagement. "Stay in your lane," he told Dan Balz at our pre-debate event in Cleveland last night. "Let Donald Trump go wherever Donald Trump is going to go. Because you can't compete with that. It's all about discipline … Do not get off the ramp and go off into the wilderness somewhere."

How cautious is Jeb Bush?

"The former Florida governor's off-the-cuff style on the campaign trail has earned him favorable reviews from some voters in the early primary states, and he remains easily accessible to reporters who trail him across the country. But those exchanges often lead to long-winded answers that land Bush into verbal cul-de-sacs, making it difficult to steer out," Ed O'Keefe previews . There are already a few examples from this week, including when he told Baptists on Tuesday that he is "not sure we need half a billion dollars for women's health issues."

The Tampa Bay Times got ahold of talking points provided to Jeb's surrogates in Cleveland. The top-line message is, "There are a lot of great talkers in politics, our current president chief among them, and there will certainly be some skilled talkers on the stage

This version of Total Mail Converter is not registered.

Thursday. But Jeb is a doer, his focus will be giving voters a sense that his experience has prepared him to actually get things done rather than just talk about it." The document tells surrogates to say they expect he will get attacked, because he has "momentum," and provides advice on how to downplay expectations: "The last debate Jeb participated in was October 22, 2002 against Bill McBride."

Does John Kasich capitalize after making it on the big stage?

The home state governor will literally be waiting in the wings, standing behind a podium at the edge of the camera shot as the tenth seed. Kasich held a mock debate session at his home in Columbus last week and has been reviewing a five-page memo of possible questions his staff prepared. He previewed his message in New Hampshire on Tuesday, saying that someone who is "bombastic" or "a divider" won't win Ohio, and that no Republican has ever won the presidency without carrying his state. "The only way we win Ohio is with someone who's a uniter," he said, according to the Cleveland Plain Dealer . "People want to know you're a builder; not someone who's going to tear things down." It could set him apart, but the base also might not want to hear it.

How much does Rand Paul embrace his inner dove?

Foreign policy is a major dividing line in the field, and it's a way for the Kentucky senator to set himself apart. He's faded somewhat in the polls and from the national conversation. Part of his problem is that he has alienated many supporters of his father's campaigns. He even signed on to Tom Cotton's controversial Iran letter earlier this year. But campaigning in Iowa over the weekend, he telegraphed that he's going to use U.S. interventionism as a wedge to separate himself from the pack. According to David Weigel, Paul said the debate will be between him and people who "want to blow up the world": He vowed that he will ask his Republican presidential rivals, face to face, whether they "want to always intervene in every civil war around the world."

This version of Total Mail Converter is not registered.

Rand Paul takes batting practice with the Quad-City River Bandits in Davenport, Iowa, last Saturday. (John Schultz/Quad City Times via AP)

Can Scott Walker be a fighter and a nice guy at the same time?

The Wisconsin governor's strategy tonight is to "be the nice guy who ignores everyone else on stage and shares an optimistic vision for the future," Jenna Johnson reports . "But trying to be both the steadfast warrior and the likable guy has at times left Walker fumbling … When questions come up on the campaign trail, Walker often responds with passages from his stump speech or other scripted answers, rarely deviating by even a few words. During a recent summit in Ames, Iowa, for religious social conservatives, an audience member accused the governor of waiting four days to respond to videos critical of Planned Parenthood. Walker launched into his usual response for abortion-related questions — not mentioning that he had forcefully responded to the videos within hours of their release."

Does Ted Cruz come across as a college debater or like he's giving his stump speech?

The Texas senator spent the first part of the week ensconced inside a Capitol Hill townhouse honing the rhetorical and theatrical skills that made him a standout on the college debate circuit. "Our focus is simply conveying the same core message that we convey in every forum, which is that we've seen far too many campaign conservatives who talk a good game on the campaign trail but don't follow through on their commitments," Cruz told Katie Zezima. As a pro, Cruz gets that the more spontaneous he seems the better.

This version of Total Mail Converter is not registered.

Will anyone whiff?

Remember "Obamneycare "? It was the beginning of the end of Tim Pawlenty's presidential campaign. On a Sunday show, the Minnesotan slammed Mitt Romney's Massachusetts health care law. But then in the debate the next day he declined to repeat the charge or really even explain what he meant. But the format, and the number of candidates, does not necessarily mean anyone will bomb.

Christie gets mic'd up for a recent appearance on Fox News' "The Five" (AP Photo/Richard Drew)

Who overperforms in the undercard debate, and does it matter?

The ratings for the 9 p.m. hour will be off the charts, but it will be interesting to know how many tune in at 5 p.m. to see the seven candidates who did not make the top 10. Carly Fiorina is calling it the "happy-hour debate." On the plus side for them, they don't have to engage with Trump. It will be interesting to see if Rick Perry and Lindsey Graham still do, since they've been so willing to in recent weeks.

Can the moderators keep control?

In addition to Wallace, Fox News hosts Bret Baier and Megyn Kelly are asking the questions. They have decided to eliminate opening statements to save time. The New York Times' Ashley Parker got access to some of their planning meetings. She reports that, at an editorial meeting yesterday, there was discussion about whether they could use the actual shot clock buzzer that goes off during Cleveland Cavaliers basketball games, which are played at the same arena, when a candidate's time expires. Baier came up with that idea over dinner Tuesday night at a local bistro, Ashley reports: "I was inspired," he said with a smile, "by a beer."

This version of Total Mail Converter is not registered.

Kelly cited advice that Fox News honcho Roger Ailes regularly gives her: Aim to hit singles, not home runs. "We have very tough, pointed questions for these guys, but I am not trying to hit any home runs," she told the Times. "If we can flesh out some of the issues and some of their character and help the audience have a better feeling for who they are — as men and as candidates — then I've done my job." Finally, watch Yahoo's Katie Couric preview the GOP debate with The Post's Costa and others here .

Megyn Kelly on set in New York. (For The Washington Post)

This version of Total Mail Converter is not registered.

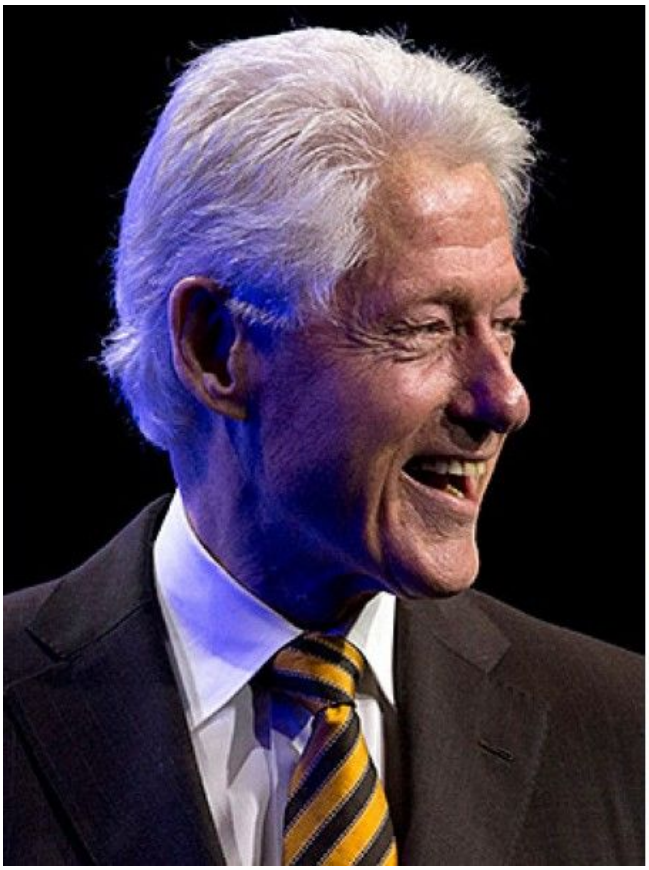
Welcome to The Daily 202, PowerPost 's morning newsletter. Sign up to receive the newsletter.

With contributions by Elise Viebeck .

WHILE YOU WERE SLEEPING:

— The man who threatened Tennessee movie-goers with pepper spray and a hatchet (before he was killed by police) had previously been committed four times to a mental institution and was reported missing by his mother.

— Malaysia announced this morning that there are other plane parts — including a window and some aluminum foil — that have washed up on the French island where a wing was confirmed to belong to Flight MH370.



GET SMART FAST:

1. "Gov. Scott Walker was under criminal investigation in 2011 for misconduct in office — even as he insisted he wasn't — over a proposed real estate deal when he was Milwaukee County executive, according to records filed Wednesday in federal court. The Republican governor — who is running for president — was never charged with a crime, and the investigation was closed two years ago." (Milwaukee Journal Sentinel)
2. Jesse Benton, who heads a super PAC supporting Rand Paul's presidential campaign and is a member of the Paul family by marriage, was indicted by a federal grand jury on charges that he concealed payments made to an Iowa state senator during Ron Paul's 2012 presidential campaign in order to win support, the Justice Department said Wednesday. (Read the story and the full 20-page indictment .)
3. "Planned Parenthood's five clinics in New Hampshire will lose about one-third of their funding, after the state's Executive Council voted to halt their state dollars," per the Washington Examiner .
4. The new woman at the helm of the federal personnel office told senior leaders across government last week that what a woman made before coming to government should not be the basis for setting her pay as a new federal employee. "This breakthrough policy means that if a woman has a relatively low salary because she was raising children — or has been paid less than she's worth outside government for comparable work to a man — that disparity should not be held against her," Lisa Rein explains. "If she's qualified for the job, she should be paid what it's worth.
5. "Last month, Los Angeles city officials cleared the way for Uber to pick up passengers at LAX. But on Wednesday, the City Council voted overwhelmingly to slow down the process and take a closer look at the issues," the LA Times reports.
6. Pope Francis has "advised church leadership to do more to 'take care' of and have

This version of Total Mail Converter is not registered.

'open doors' for Catholics whose marriages have failed, prompting the latest round of speculation — both hopeful and worrying — that he may loosen the church's ancient rules on divorce and remarriage," the Washington Times reports.

7. NASA informed lawmakers yesterday that it is signing a $490 million contract extension with Russia to send Americans into space. "The new contract, running through 2019, means that NASA will continue to depend on Russia to get its astronauts to space even as tensions between Washington and Moscow escalate," The Hill reports.
8. A federal judge ruled this week that Idaho's law banning secret filming of animal abuse at agricultural facilities is unconstitutional, giving animal rights activists across the country hope that the decision will pave the way to overturn similar laws in other states, the AP reports.

POWER PLAYERS IN THE NEWS:

1. During a private telephone conversation in late May, Bill Clinton encouraged Donald Trump's effort to play a larger role in the Republican Party. "Clinton [who apparently initiated the call] sounded curious about Trump's moves toward a presidential bid and told Trump that he was striking a chord with frustrated conservatives and was a rising force on the right," Robert Costa and Anne Gearan report.
2. Bernie Sanders will deliver the convocation at Liberty University on Sept. 14. The democratic socialist, who is Jewish, said he wants to talk about economic inequality at the school founded by the late Jerry Falwell.

This version of Total Mail Converter is not registered.

3. Martin O'Malley teed off on the Democratic National Committee's plan to hold six presidential primary debates, accusing party leaders of "circling the wagons" for Hillary and of endorsing "an exclusive approach to politics" during an appearance in Iowa. (John Wagner)
4. Ted Cruz will campaign in Mississippi next week with Chris McDaniel, who only narrowly lost his GOP primary challenge to Sen. Thad Cochran last year after a runoff.
5. Cruz will also address the Nevada chapter of Americans for Prosperity in Las Vegas on August 14, according to an advisory shared first with The Daily 202.
6. Hillary has scheduled fundraisers in the Hamptons for Aug. 22 and Aug. 30.
7. Citing slow response from the State Department over a number of inquiries related to Hillary's private e-mail use, Senate Judiciary Chairman Charles Grassley (R-Iowa) has placed a hold on an unrelated career foreign service officer nomination, per Colby Itkowitz.
8. Lois Lerner, the former IRS official, once considered opening up an audit into Bristol Palin's compensation from a teen pregnancy charity, per USA Today .
9. The new head of the DEA, Chuck Rosenberg, told reporters yesterday that "heroin is clearly more dangerous than marijuana," clarifying a less definitive statement he made last week, when he said marijuana is "probably not" as dangerous as heroin, according to the Huffington Post .
10. Iowa House Speaker Kraig Paulsen, a Republican, announced he will step down from leadership and not seek reelection after an intense legislative session.
11. Marco Rubio has hired GOP operative Jared Small as a field staffer for his presidential campaign, Sean Sullivan scoops for the 202. Small's company had previously done some work for Titan Strategies, the firm headed by Jesse Benton, the campaign said. Benton, who has been heading a pro-Rand Paul super PAC, has been indicted by a federal grand jury on allegations he broke campaign finance laws in the 2012 campaign as an aide to Ron Paul. Small made a splash in 2014 on Mitch McConnell's campaign as one of the operatives who created the "COME AT ME BRO" signs that were popular on the trail. He'll start on the ground next week.

WAPO HIGHLIGHTS:

— "Two years after scandal, the IRS is still struggling ," by Kelsey Snell: "The Senate Finance Committee on Wednesday released a bipartisan report on the 2013 scandal involving the Internal Revenue Service targeting conservative groups…Much was made about what led to the controversy, but more than two years later, the agency appears no better at handling the growing crush of political nonprofits raising millions of dollars this election season…the IRS is now frozen by a hobbled budget and hostile relationship with the committees that oversee it."

This version of Total Mail Converter is not registered.

— "To press for Iran nuclear deal, Obama invokes Iraq war ," by Steven Mufson and David Nakamura: "While calling the nuclear accord with Iran 'the strongest nonproliferation agreement ever negotiated,' Obama also seemed to turn the vote on the deal into a referendum on the U.S. invasion of Iraq a dozen years ago, a decision he portrayed as the product of a "mind-set characterized by a preference for military action over diplomacy..It was the president's sharpest attack yet on opponents of the Iran nuclear deal, which he sees as a defining achievement amid an often rocky foreign policy record." But despite the administration hard sell, Obama heads into the recess with many undecideds in Congress.

SOCIAL MEDIA SPEED READ:

— ZIGNAL VISUAL: Before Trump vs. After Trump. Our analytics partners at Zignal Labs take a helpful look at how we got to this point ahead of the first debate. They identify June 16 as a turning point in the presidential race. That's the day that Trump announced.

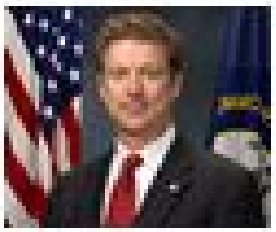
Here's what the presidential chatter looked like from Jan. 1 – June 15: Hillary dominated the field. Bernie was still just your run-of-the-mill democratic socialist senator, and Rand was considered a top-tier contender. There were signs of a Scott Walker surge early in the year, but nobody could anticipate the extent to which he would establish himself in the top tier.

This version of Total Mail Converter is not registered.

Profile List

HILLARY CLINTON

8,774,568



TED CRUZ

4,146,437

JEB BUSH

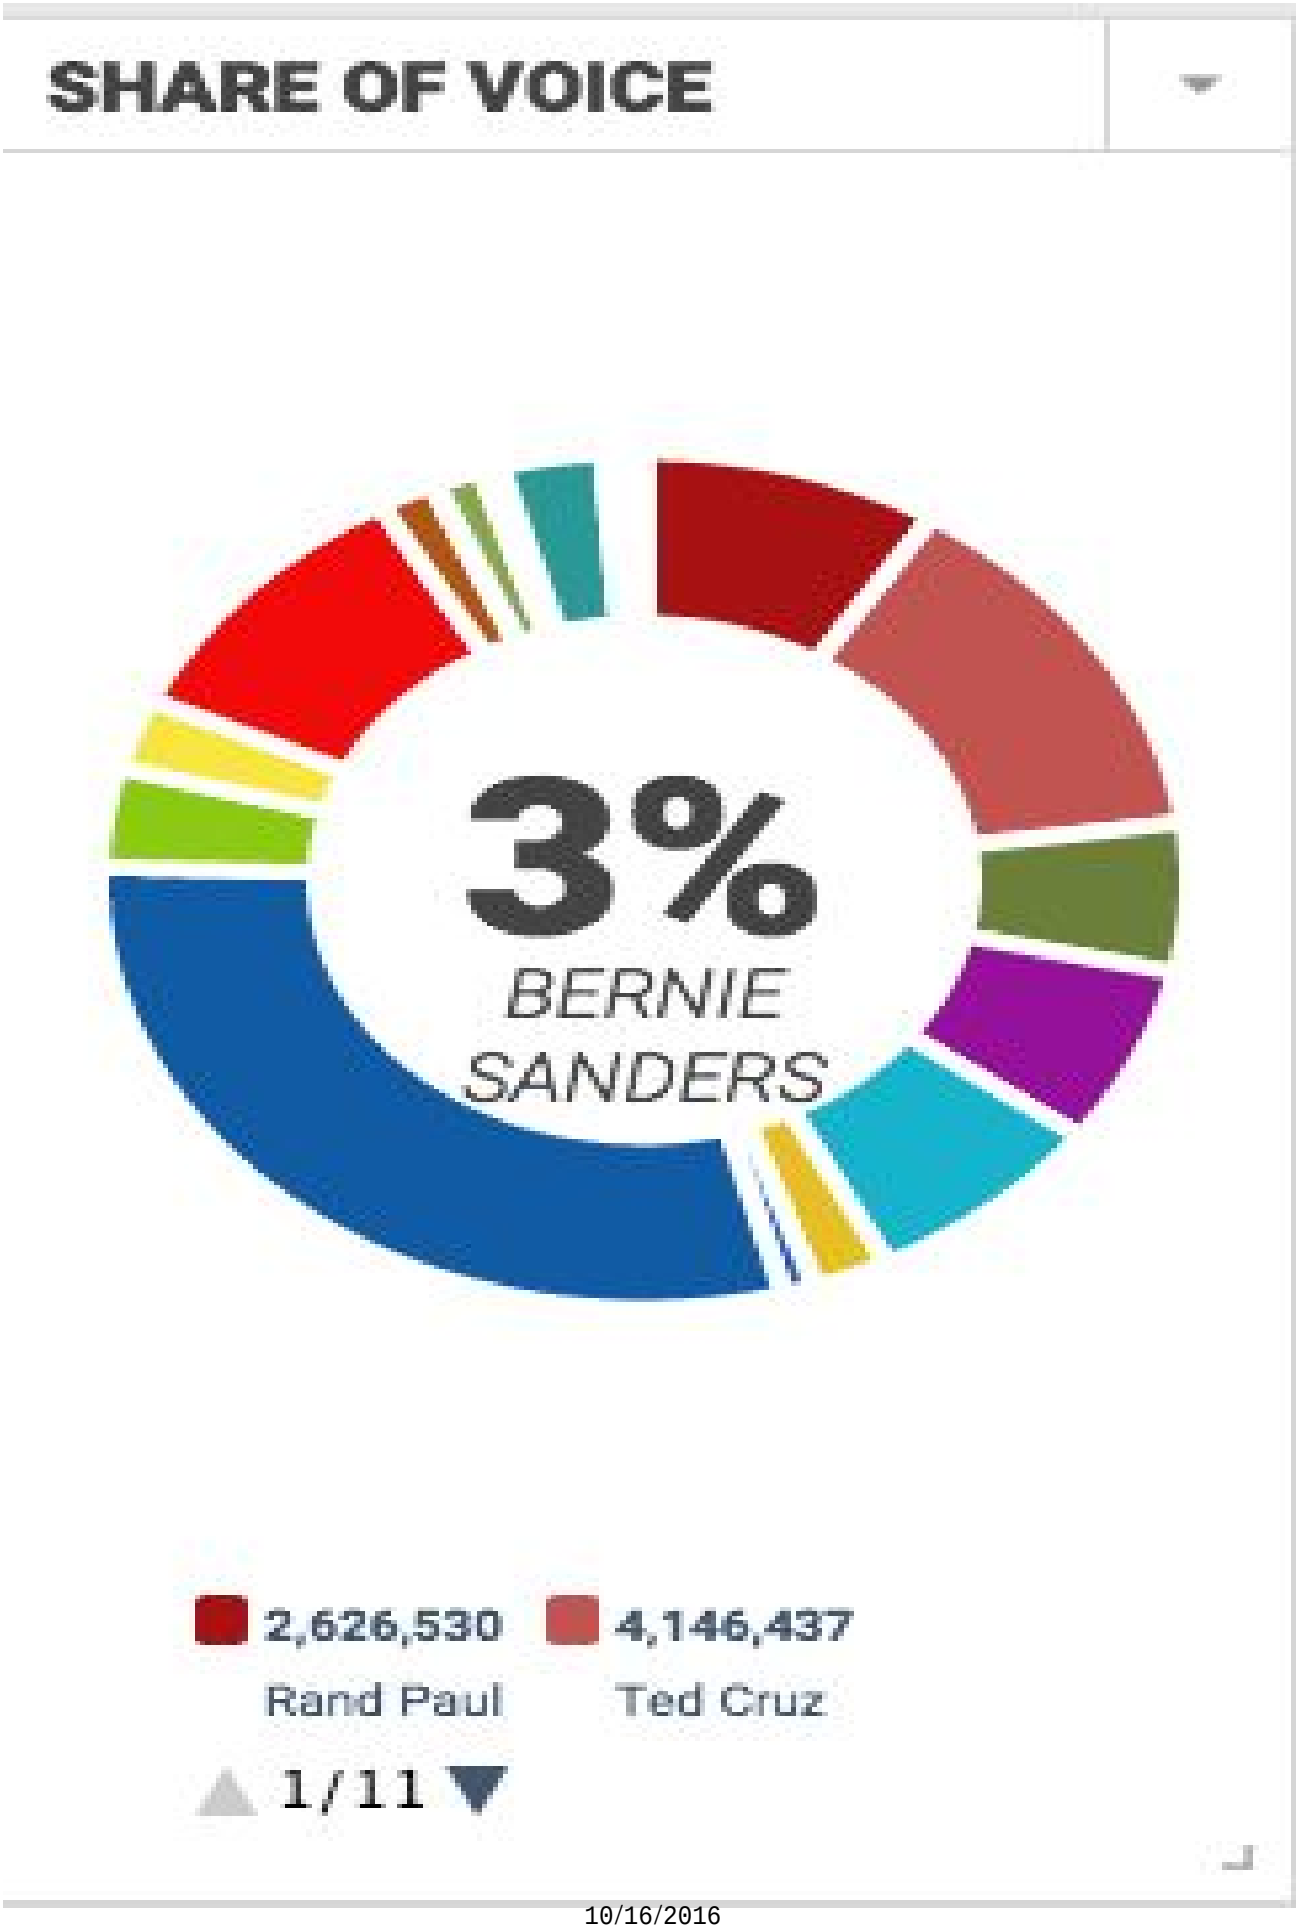
2,971,384

RAND PAUL

2,626,530

SCOTT WALKER

2,198,159



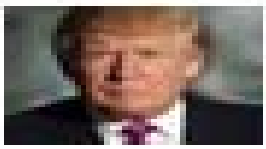
MARCO RUBIO

2,004,005

This version of Total Mail Converter is not registered.

The Democratic race? There really wasn't one through June 15. Clinton, who had a 30 percent share of the overall discussion about 2016, had 10 times the mentions of Sanders online:

This version of Total Mail Converter is not registered.



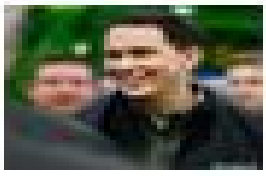
Here's the world since June 16: Obviously, Trump took the race by storm. But the diminishing gap between Sanders and Clinton also tells a story. The armor of inevitability around Clinton clearly has a chink or two, as the coverage and chatter reflects. Cruz continues to ride strong net roots support, while Jeb's establishment chops have kept him in the top tier. We also see strong support for Walker, who formally jumped into the race last month. The early numbers suggest the rest of the field will have a serious enthusiasm and attention gap to overcome if they are going to be considered viable candidates. We're not saying it can't be done (See: John McCain in 2007-'08).

This version of Total Mail Converter is not registered.

Profile List

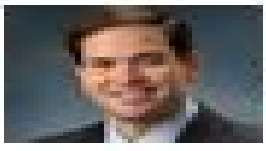
DONALD TRUMP
10,246,545

HILLARY CLINTON
3,261,213

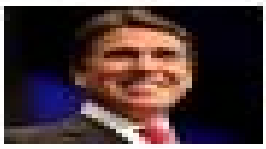


BERNIE SANDERS
2,449,090

TED CRUZ
1,398,008

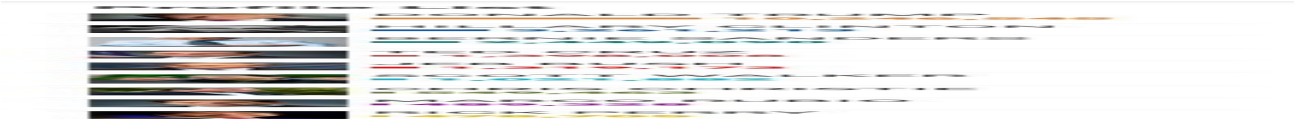


JEB BUSH
1,319,173

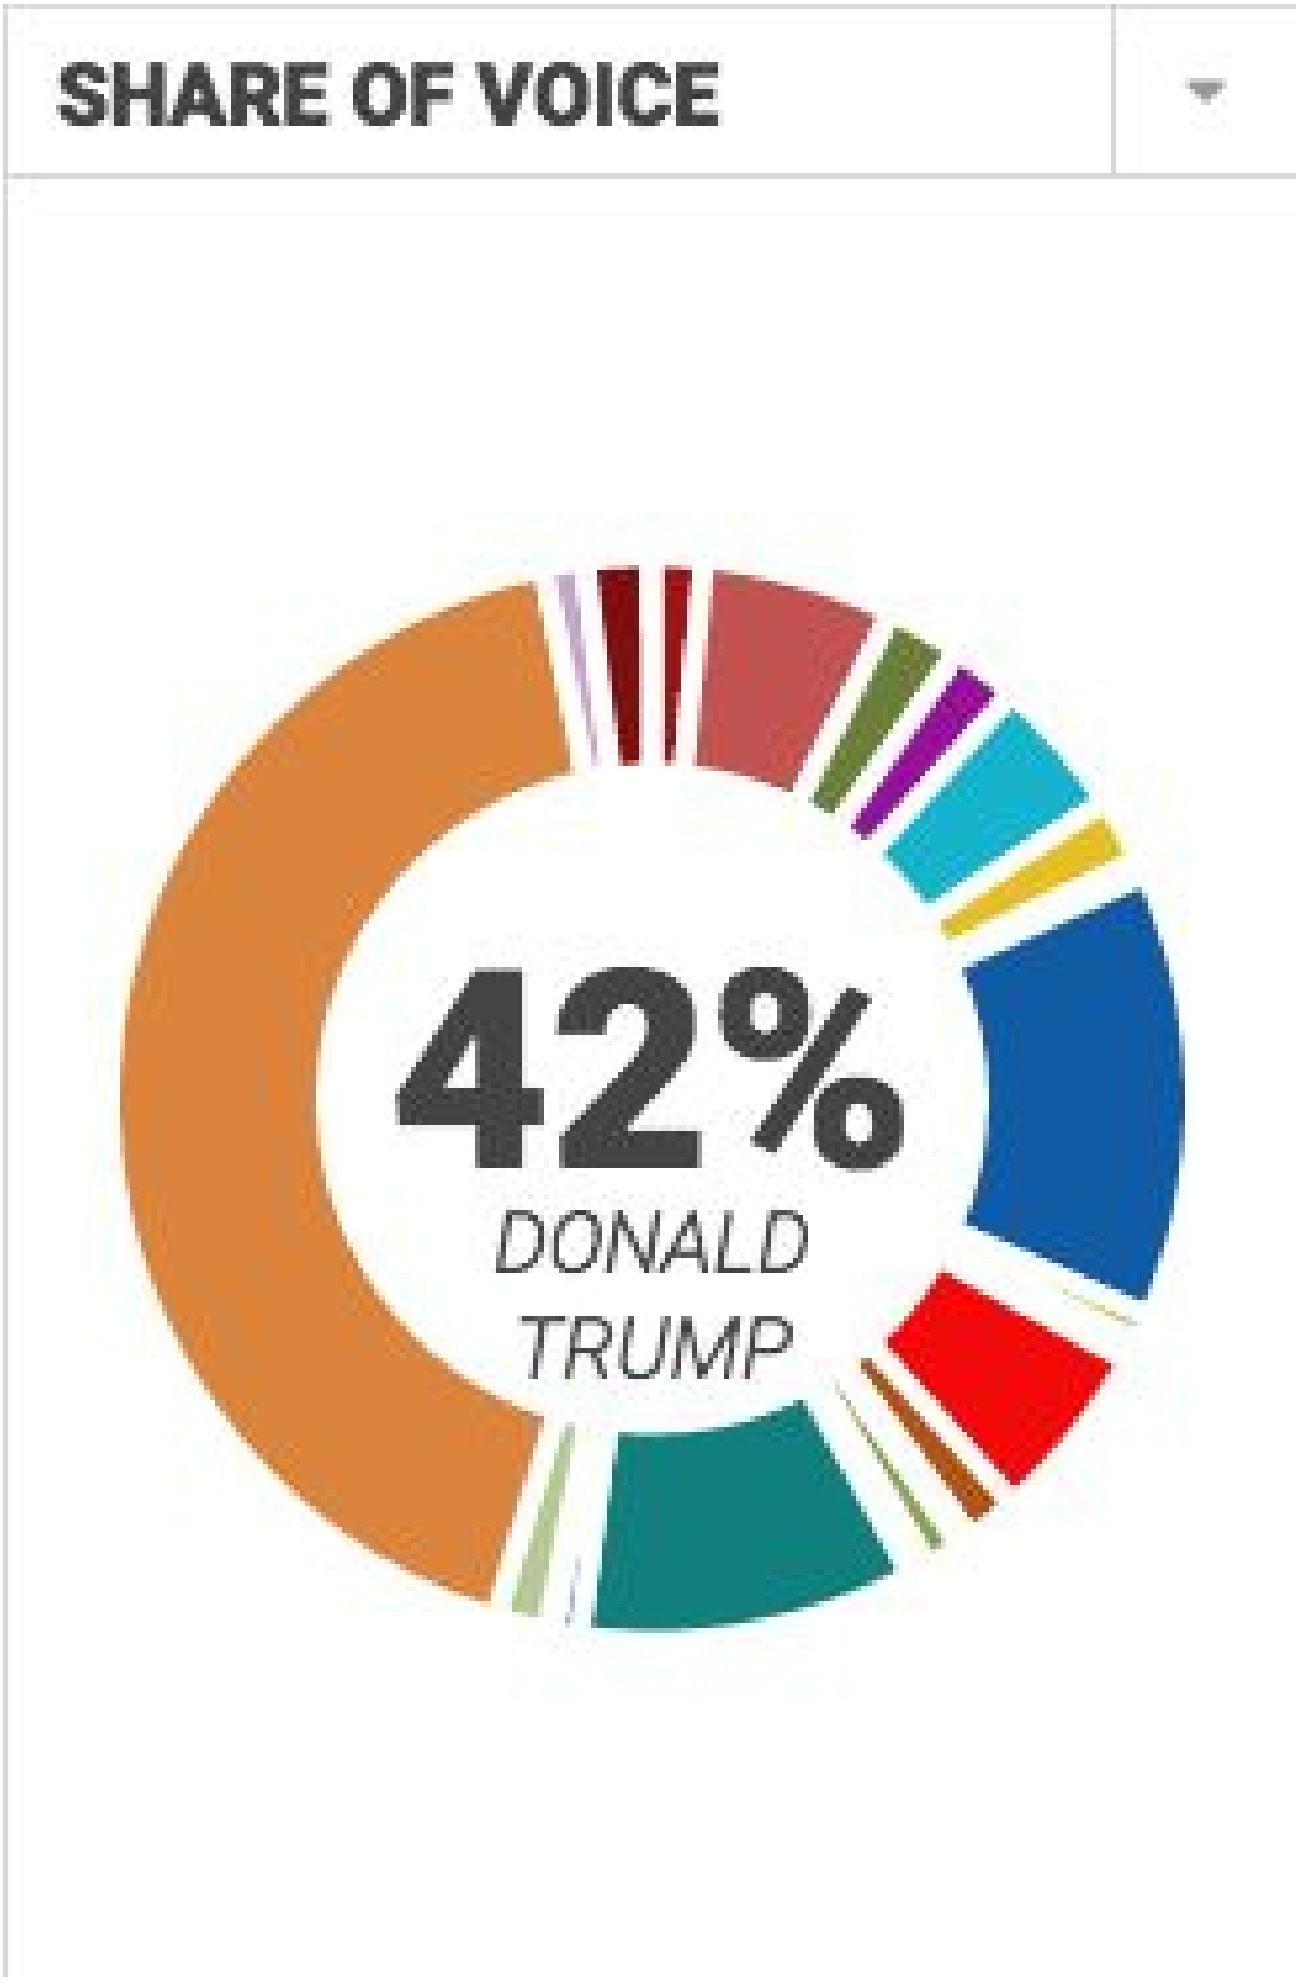


SCOTT WALKER
1,021,882

CHRIS CHRISTIE
549,463



MARCO RUBIO
489,328



RICK PERRY
478,705

This version of Total Mail Converter is not registered.

From the day of his announcement through last night, 42 percent of the conversation about 2016 — across traditional and social media — has been about Trump. That's significantly more than anyone else:

This version of Total Mail Converter is not registered.

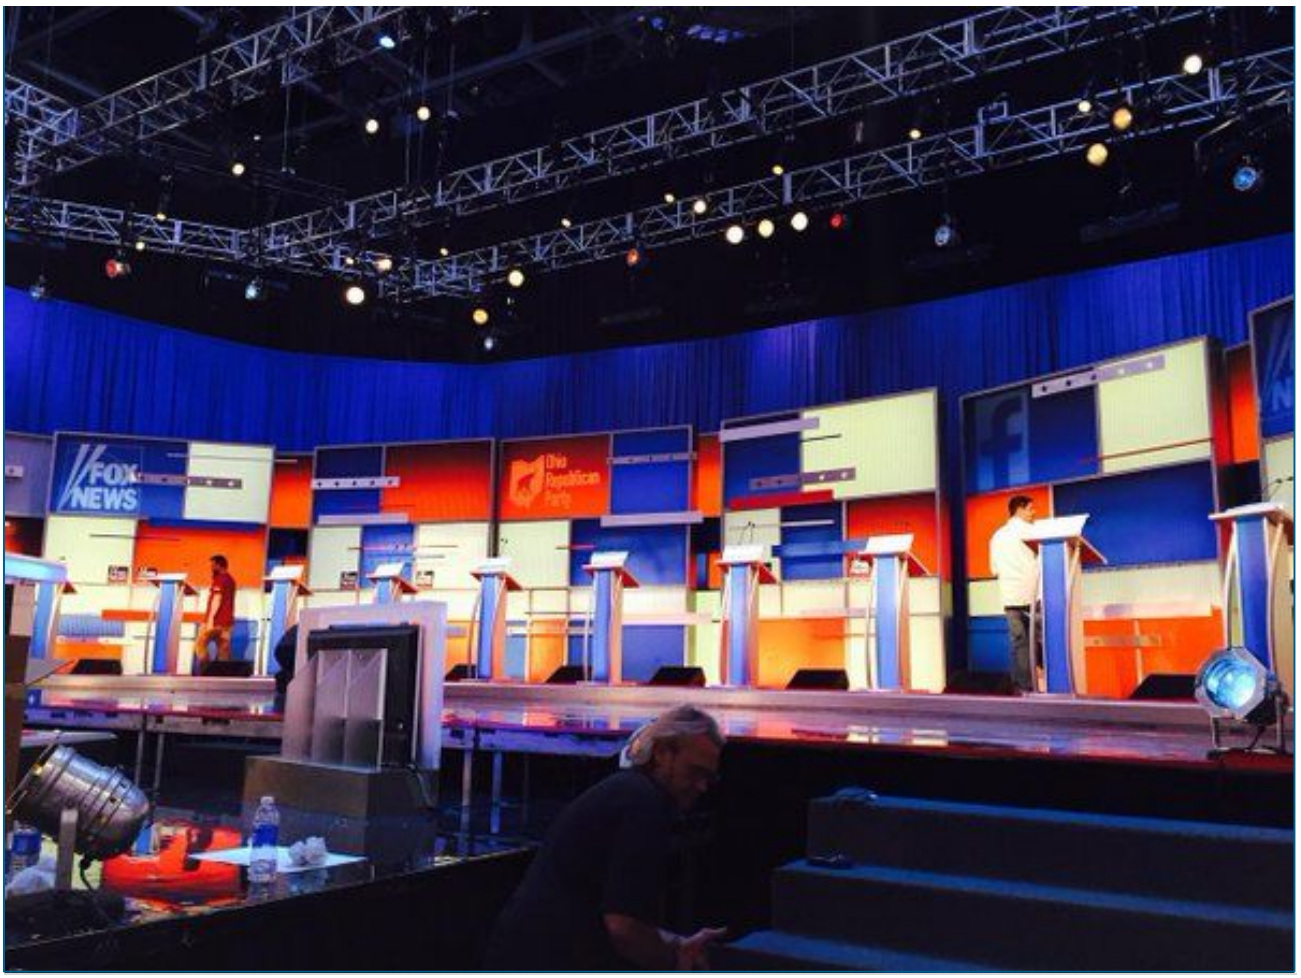
The most talked about political topics on Facebook over the past two months:

This version of Total Mail Converter is not registered.

1. Racial issues
2. Mexico
3. The economy
4. LGBT issues
5. Immigration

Trump is also dominating the 2016 conversation on Facebook. A spokesman for the social network emails over the volume of conversation about each candidate from May 29 through July 28. The chart below shows the number of unique people on Facebook in the U.S. engaging in the conversation about each of the candidates – as well as the number of interactions those people made. Interactions are the total aggregate number of likes, posts, comments and shares made about a particular candidate. The interactions figure includes not only the activity on the candidate's page, but all of the likes, posts, comments and shares about that candidate from throughout the Facebook ecosystem in the U.S.

This version of Total Mail Converter is not registered.



First	Last	Unique People	Interactions
Jeb	Bush	5,339,000	16,197,000
Ben	Carson	2,690,000	11,097,000
Lincoln	Chafee	228,000	330,000
Chris	Christie	2,167,000	4,668,000
Hillary	Clinton	11,799,000	60,640,000
Ted	Cruz	3,431,000	16,628,000
Carly	Fiorina	896,000	2,610,000
Lindsey	Graham	1,500,000	3,473,000
Mike	Huckabee	2,776,000	9,880,000
Bobby	Jindal	2,083,000	4,910,000
John	Kasich	652,000	1,277,000
Martin	O'Malley	541,000	989,000
George	Pataki	273,000	412,000
Rand	Paul	2,539,000	10,867,000
Rick	Perry	2,445,000	7,264,000
Marco	Rubio	1,779,000	5,131,000
Bernie	Sanders	5,476,000	35,130,000
Rick	Santorum	1,511,000	3,105,000
Donald	Trump	26,243,000	135,573,000
Scott	Walker	3,132,000	11,355,000
Jim	Webb	301,000	791,000

–WHAT EVERYONE IS TALKING ABOUT:

Pictures of the day:

Rand Paul campaign manager Chip Englander posted this photo from Cleveland. “Who’s ready to debate??” he tweeted:

This version of Total Mail Converter is not registered.

(@ChipEnglander)

Gwyneth Paltrow joined Sen. Jon Tester (D-Mont.) to voice opposition to a bill that would ban states from requiring GMO labeling. “Thanks for raising awareness,” Tester tweeted at Paltrow:

This version of Total Mail Converter is not registered.

(@SenatorTester)

George W. Bush caused a stir when he showed up for jury duty at a courthouse in Dallas:

(@desiree_bryant)

This version of Total Mail Converter is not registered.

“Proud to be the Rep from @portlandia! ” tweeted Rep. Earl Blumenauer (D-Ore.) during a visit to the show’s set on Wednesday. Here he’s pictured with Portlandia co-creator and co-star Fred Armisen (left, in costume) and director Jonathan Krisel:

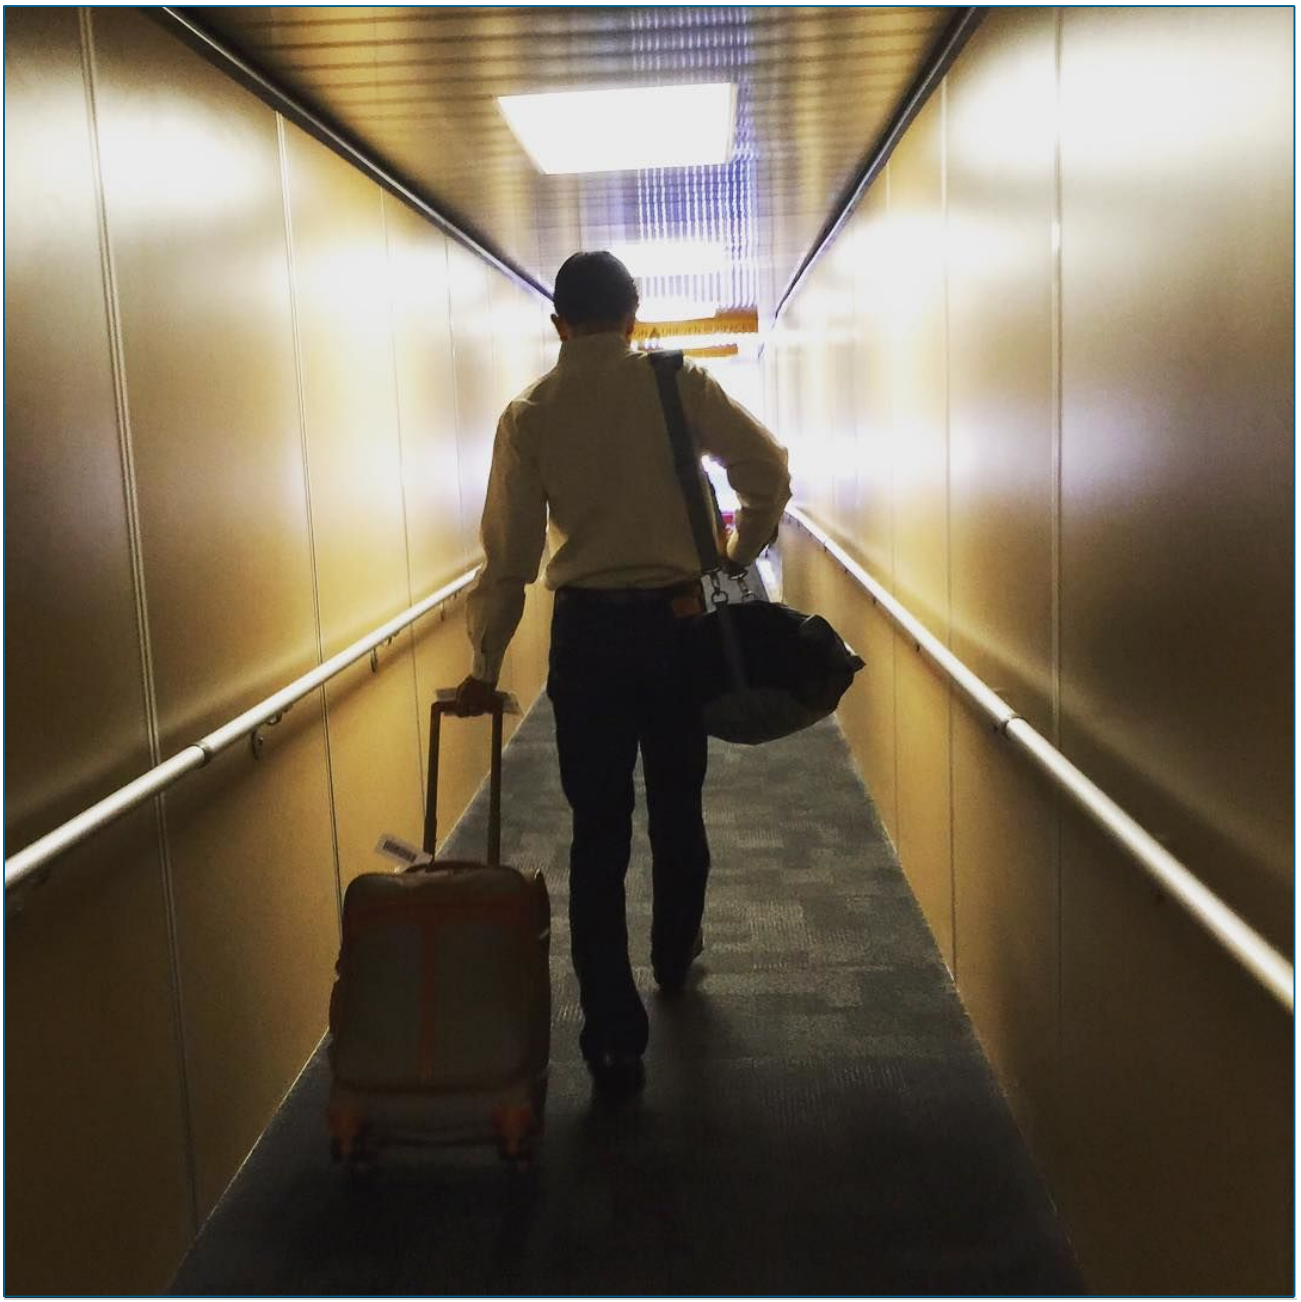
(@repblumenauer)

Tweets of the day:

President Obama hit back at GOP critics of the Iran deal on Twitter:

> Let’s hope @POTUS avoids obviously untrue talking points about the #IranDeal being a choice between a bad deal and war. It isn’t.
>
> — Leader McConnell (@SenateMajLdr) August 5, 2015

> The choice is ultimately between diplomacy and war. Iran’s nuclear program accelerates if Congress kills this deal. https://t.co/nvBeO1Omko
>
> — President Obama (@POTUS) August 5, 2015



> Mr. President, Americans deserve to know the details about the secret side deals. #IranDeal
> — Rep. Steve Scalise (@SteveScalise) August 5, 2015

This version of Total Mail Converter is not registered.

> Important detail – there are no secret deals. My staff can brief you on any question about any part of the deal. https://t.co/UO0B5xCOPh — President Obama (@POTUS) August 5, 2015

Instagrams of the day:

Candidates shared what they were up to prior to the debate. Bobby Jindal boarded a flight:

(bobbyjindal)

Marco Rubio spoke at a rally (after entering through the kitchen):

This version of Total Mail Converter is not registered.

(marcorubiofla)

And Rick Perry ate dinner with staff at Cleveland's Mallorca Restaurant:

This version of Total Mail Converter is not registered.

(millertimeintx)

GOOD READS FROM ELSEWHERE:

— Dallas Morning News, "Texas voter ID law discriminates against minorities, 5th circuit rules": "A federal appeals court ruled Wednesday that Texas' voter ID law has a 'discriminatory' effect on minorities. The ruling was a victory, albeit not a sweeping one, for President Barack Obama and minority rights groups. A three-judge panel of the 5th Circuit Court of Appeals in New Orleans ruled that the Texas law, passed in 2011, violates part of the federal Voting Rights Act. The appellate panel, however, did not accept last year's ruling by a federal judge in Texas that the voter ID law is tantamount to an illegal poll tax."

— BuzzFeed, "Trump cuts ties to operative over Facebook racism ," by Andrew Kaczinski, Christopher Massie, Ilan Ben-Meir: "Donald Trump's presidential campaign ended its relationship with an Arizona-based politico Tuesday evening after BuzzFeed News asked about Islamophobic Facebook posts he wrote and racially charged Facebook posts about Barack and Michelle Obama…Asked by BuzzFeed News about Aaron Borders, who identified himself on various social media profiles and his LinkedIn as Trump's Arizona state director, the Trump campaign originally falsely denied that he had any connection to the campaign."

This version of Total Mail Converter is not registered.

— Bloomberg Politics, "How Ivanka Trump Courts the Opposite of Controversy," by Emily Greenhouse: "Ivanka positions herself as Donald's biggest fan. She is, it must be said, a terrific asset. The June day that Donald launched his presidential campaign, Ivanka introduced him in the tower that bears the family name: a prim white dress set before a lineup of American flags, her hair swept back, with golden light beaming down. The effect was of something like a halo…Ivanka has found a way to glide over her father's shock-jock tactics, and take only from his celebrity what she wants."

— Wall Street Journal, "How Jeb Bush Spent His Years on Wall Street, " by Justin Baer: "For more than seven years, nearly the length of his two gubernatorial terms, Mr. Bush…spent as much as half of his working hours advising Lehman and later Barclays, which bought the collapsed investment bank's U.S. business. He wasn't an employee of the firms, said people familiar with the matter, but was paid to attend meetings, dinners and conferences where he spoke to clients and bank executives on such subjects as health care, education, immigration and energy—matters he has started taking up this year with voters. Mr. Bush earned about $1.3 million a year at Lehman and some $2 million from Barclays, his campaign said."

BUZZING AT THE CAPITOL

— Politico, "Iranian side deals spark lingering bipartisan concern ," by Burgess Everett: "The top Democrat and Republican on the Senate Foreign Relations Committee left a 90-minute briefing with the International Atomic Energy Agency director unsatisfied by attempts to allay their concerns over Iran's two side agreements with international inspectors. Though Chairman Bob Corker (R-Tenn.) has been deeply skeptical of President Barack Obama's nuclear agreement with Iran and appears to be a 'no' vote, doubts from the ranking member Ben Cardin (D-Md.) are cause for concern for the White House."

— The Hill, "IRS mismanaged Tea Party groups, Senate report finds ," by Bernie Becker: "The IRS severely mismanaged the applications of Tea Party groups seeking tax-exempt status, a long-awaited and bipartisan Senate report said Wednesday. But Republicans and Democrats on the Senate Finance Committee couldn't find common ground on perhaps the central IRS issues of the last 27 months: whether the agency intentionally targeted conservative groups because of their politics, and whether there was White House or Treasury involvement. The new report did find that Lois Lerner, the central figure in the controversy, 'failed to adequately manage' her staff that were processing the tax-exempt applications."

This version of Total Mail Converter is not registered.

— Roll Call, "Marine had two loaded guns, 114 live rounds outside Capitol, police say," by Hannah Hess: "The Marine Corps congressional fellow arrested Tuesday on Capitol grounds was carrying two loaded guns, 114 rounds of live ammunition, a military ballistic vest and two knives in his car, court documents state. Following an arraignment, he appears headed for a new assignment, off the Hill. Gunnery Sgt. Peter James Boby pleaded not guilty Wednesday to three misdemeanor charges in D.C. Superior Court. His wrists and ankles were shackled during the brief arraignment."

— Politico, "Boeing, GE cut off donations to Ex-Im foes ," by Anna Palmer and Jeremy Herb: "When House Majority Leader Kevin McCarthy headlined a fundraiser in early June, the room was packed with defense industry lobbyists, but reps from one megacontractor were missing — Boeing. Not only was Boeing absent at that fundraiser, the contractor has cut off all political contributions to the No. 2 House Republican over his support for killing the Export-Import Bank, which facilitates billions of dollars in low-interest loans to U.S. exporters like Boeing."

— SNEAK PEEK: Today, Sen. Tim Kaine (D-Va.) will speak this morning at an event for the libertarian Cato Institute on the fight against ISIL. This Saturday, August 8, marks one year since the U.S. launched military operations against the Islamic State of Iraq and the Levant. Kaine, a member of the Senate Foreign Relations and Armed Services Committees, has spent the past 12 months pushing for Congress to pass a new Authorization for Use of Military Force against ISIL.

Kaine will decry the fact that a year has gone by without a meaningful debate or vote on the U.S. mission. "We are about to go on a one-month adjournment with the nation at war," he will say, according to excerpts shared with The Daily 202. "Although vested with the sole power to declare war by Article I of the Constitution, Congress has refused a meaningful debate or vote on the war against the Islamic State. A Congress quick to criticize any executive action by the President has nevertheless encouraged him to carry out an unauthorized war."

"A debate in Congress by the people's elected representatives and a vote to authorize the most solemn act of war is how we tell our troops that what they're doing, what they're risking their lives for has purpose, has meaning, and has the support of the American people," he will say. Otherwise, we're asking them to risk their lives without even bothering to discuss whether the mission is something we support. Can there be anything, anything more immoral than that – to order troops to risk their lives in support of the military mission that we're are unwilling even to discuss? One year in, our servicemembers are doing their jobs but they're still waiting on us to do ours." Watch the livestream here at 9 a.m.

This version of Total Mail Converter is not registered.

HOT ON THE LEFT

Trump staffer caught sharing racist memes on Facebook. From the Daily Beast : "Days after Donald Trump's campaign fired a staffer for racist Facebook posts, including one in which the staffer referred to Al Sharpton's daughter as the n-word, The Daily Beast discovered another Trump staffer sharing racist memes on Facebook. Brad Nagel is listed as a senior political adviser for Trump's presidential exploratory committee in Iowa. Nagel has few entries but during the 2012 election, he posted several racist memes making fun of President Obama that are popular on the far-right … Twice in 2012, Nagel associated the Obama administration with Nazism."

HOT ON THE RIGHT

FBI: Middle Eastern men intimidating U.S. military families in Colorado, Wyoming. From Denver's CBS4 : "An alert has been issued by the FBI to all law enforcement agencies in Colorado and Wyoming involving U.S. military families and concerns about who may be watching them. The alert says Middle Eastern men are approaching families of U.S. military members at their homes in Colorado and Wyoming … In one case last May the wife of a military member was approached in front of her home by two Middle Eastern males. The men stated that she was the wife of a U.S. interrogator. When she denied their claims, the men laughed. The two men left the area in a dark-colored, four-door sedan with two other Middle Eastern males in the vehicle."

DAYBOOK:

— Both chambers of Congress are now in recess.

–What's happening today on the campaign trail: Besides the Fox News debate, Martin O'Malley, Jim Webb, Bernie Sanders and Lincoln Chafee will speak to the Iowa Federation of Labor in Altoona, Iowa.

–At the White House: President Obama will participate in a video conference marking the

This version of Total Mail Converter is not registered.

50th anniversary of the Voting Rights Act.

QUOTE OF THE DAY: "I just don't consider him a factor," former Colorado congressman Tom Tancredo said of Rick Santorum, whom he endorsed in 2012. "I don't even go to his Web site or anything like that. He's like several others in the race who just don't matter. On the Democratic side, he's like what's his name — Mahoney, from Maryland?"

NEWS YOU CAN USE IF YOU LIVE IN D.C.:

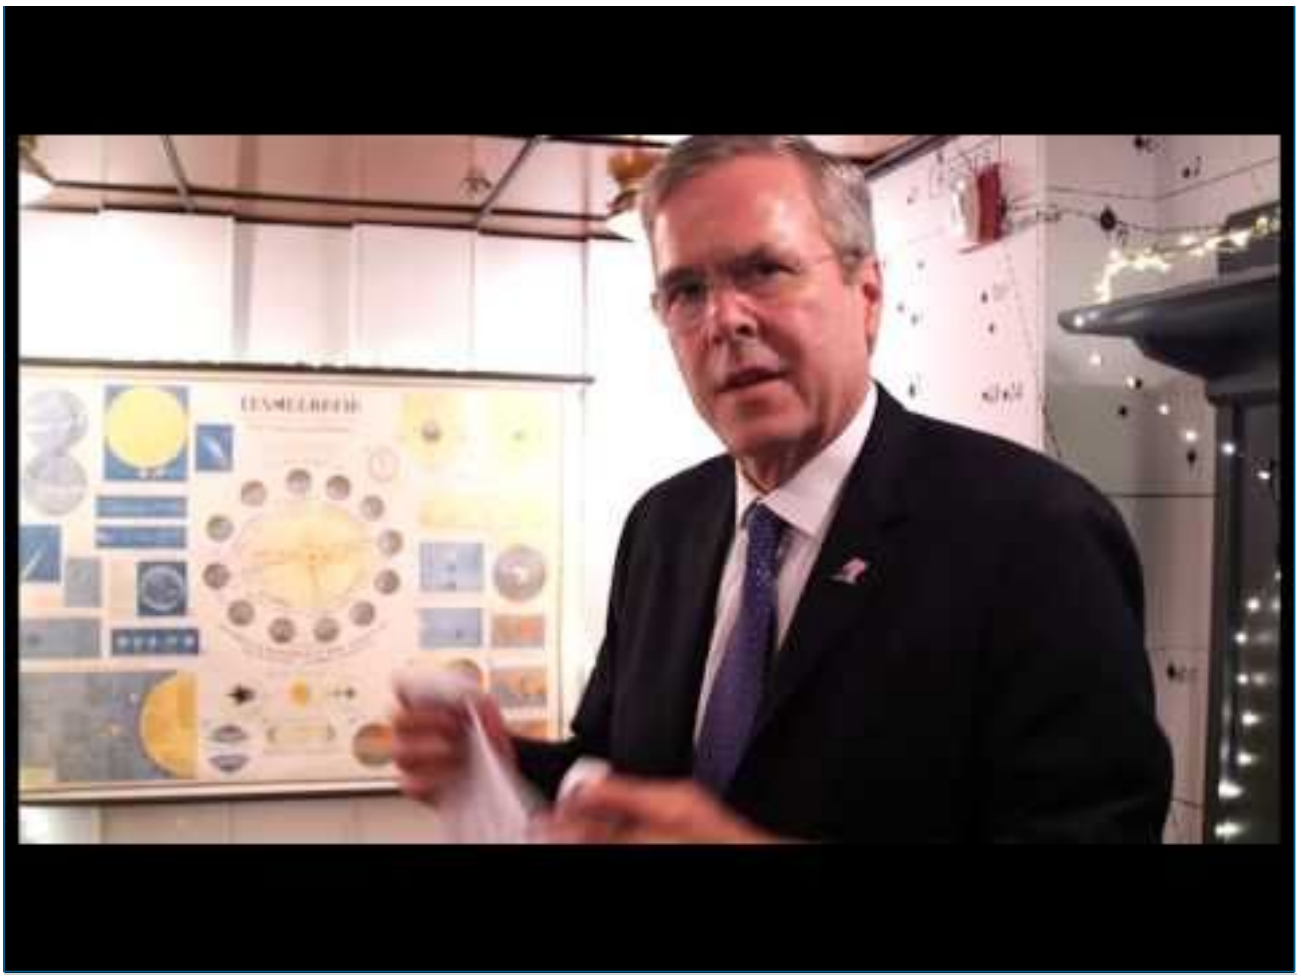
— An "incoming storm looks like a major rain producer, starting in earnest tonight and likely to continue well into the day Friday," forecasts the Capital Weather Gang. "It should drench the region with more than an inch in the cards. At least it knocks down the temperatures and has the good sense to get out of town in time for the weekend."

— Metro said normal service is back on the Red Line. But problems still remain — and are expected to last through the morning rush hour — on the Blue, Orange and Silver lines after a train went off the tracks at the Smithsonian stop. The derailment is causing no trains to run on those three lines between the Federal Center and McPherson Square stations.

— The Nationals lost to the Arizona Diamondbacks, 11-4.

VIDEOS OF THE DAY:

Jimmy Fallon ran through the pros and cons of watching the Republican debate:



This version of Total Mail Converter is not registered.

(The Tonight Show Starring Jimmy Fallon)

Jeb Bush checked out a tank top from his new, self-proclaimed “Jeb swag store” :

This version of Total Mail Converter is not registered.

(Jeb Bush)

Bonus details: The store sells a $75 guacamole bowl (available elsewhere for $35.99), a t-shirt referring to George H.W. Bush as “the greatest man I’ve ever known,” and the aforementioned tank top depicting Jeb in the 1970s, sold with this description: “He may be a clean-cut grandfather now, but back in the ’70s, Jeb had a sideburn-mustache combo that would make Burt Reynolds blush. Wear this tank on South Beach to make sure he doesn’t forget it.” No surprise, the Democratic National Committee quickly trolled Bush with their own version of the store .

The Weekly Standard pointed out that Hillary Clinton put on a bit of a Southern accent during an interview with the chairman of the South Carolina Democratic party. Here is the magazine’s edit of the strongest examples, with the intensity of the accent ranked by number of cowboy boots:

This version of Total Mail Converter is not registered.

(The Weekly Standard)

You received this e-mail because you are registered on washingtonpost.com . We respect your privacy . If you believe that this e-mail has been sent to you in error, or you no longer wish to receive this newsletter, click here . Contact us for help.

©2015 The Washington Post | 1150 15th St NW, Washington, DC 20071

The Washington Post

This version of Total Mail Converter is not registered.

From: "S. Daniel Abraham Center for Middle East Peace" <info@centerpeace.org>
To: podesta@law.georgetown.edu
Date: 11/5/2015 8:26:35 AM
Subject: News Update - November 5

S. DANIEL ABRAHAM
CENTER FOR MIDDLE EAST PEACE

Israel and the Middle East News Update

Thursday, November 5

Click here for a printer-friendly version.

Headlines:

- PM Media Advisor: 'Obama Feeding Nest of Anti-Semitism'
- U.S. Officials: Israel Requesting $5 Billion in Annual Defense Aid
- U.S. Officials Believe ISIS Planted Bomb on Russian Plane
- Court Postpones Demolition of Illegal Synagogue Fearing Revenge Attacks
- Israeli Intelligence: Relations w/ PA Damaged, Any Quiet Will Be Short-term
- PA Claims Israel Harvesting Organs of Dead Palestinians
- PLO Threatens to End Recognition of Israel
- Opposition, Government Unite Against EU Settlement Labeling Plans

Commentary:

- Forward: "How I'd Reaffirm Unbreakable Bond w/ Israel—and Bibi"
  - By Hilary Clinton, Running for Democratic Nomination for President
- Yedioth Ahronoth: "This Is Not Criticism, This Is Incitement"
  - By Ben-Dror Yemini, Israeli Journalist and Contributor, Yedioth Ahronoth

---

Arutz Sheva

PM Media Advisor: 'Obama Feeding Nest of Anti-Semitism'

Appointed Wednesday as Head of Public Diplomacy and Media at the Prime Minister's Office, Dr. Ran Baratz quickly came under fire for controversial comments mocking Rivlin for "marginality" and lacking importance. But, Baratz appears to have also focused his "satire" on a number of elected officials across the political spectrum - at home and abroad. "[US] President Obama is not ignorant," Baratz wrote in August. "He must know he's feeding a years-long nest of anti-Semitism, which blames American Jews for dragging the United States into wars." In another post, Baratz derided U.S. Secretary of State for linking the Israeli-Palestinian conflict to Islamic State, asserting that "to Kerry's credit, no other Miss America could have said it better."
See also, "Netanyahu's New Spokesman Accused Obama of Anti-Semitism" (Ha'aretz)

This version of Total Mail Converter is not registered.

Times of Israel

U.S. Officials: Israel Requesting $5 Billion in Annual Defense Aid

Israel is asking the United States for $5 billion in annual defense aid for a decade, beginning in 2017, US congressional sources told Reuters on Wednesday. The request — a total of $50 billion — is a significant increase from Israel's current aid package, which stands at close to $3 billion per year. The sources estimated that the White House and Israel would ultimately agree on a sum between $4 billion and $5 billion. The sources stressed that the negotiations were still in the early stages.

See also, "US-Israel Defense Cooperation Goes Both Ways, Pentagon Says" (Jerusalem Post)

CNN

U.S. Officials Believe ISIS Planted Bomb on Russian Plane

The latest U.S. intelligence suggests that the crash of a Russian passenger jet in the Sinai over the weekend was most likely caused by a bomb on the plane planted by ISIS or an ISIS affiliate, according to a U.S. official familiar with the matter. But the official stressed a formal conclusion has not been reached by the U.S. intelligence community. "There is a definite feeling it was an explosive device planted in luggage or somewhere on the plane.

See also, "Egypt Says 'No Evidence' Russian Plane Was Downed by Bomb" (Times of Israel)

See also, "U.S. Intel Suggests ISIS Bomb Most Likely Caused Russian Plane Crash in Egypt" (Jerusalem Post)

Ha'aretz

Court Postpones Demolition of Illegal Synagogue

The High Court of Justice on Wednesday postponed the demolition of an illegally-built synagogue in Givat Ze'ev, northwest of Jerusalem, for two weeks. The demolition had been scheduled for Thursday. The postponement was requested by the Jerusalem police, who feared that demolition of the synagogue would lead to revenge attacks and a further escalation of violence in the area of the capital. Graffiti reading "You don't destroy a synagogue, we want a Jewish state," was spray-painted on a wall of the court building in Jerusalem early Wednesday morning.

See also, "Hundreds Protesting Planned Demolition at Synagogue" (Ynet News)

Ha'aretz

Israeli Intelligence: Ties w/ PA Damaged, Quiet to Be Short-term

Israel's intelligence branches are seeing a gradual decline in the intensity of the Palestinian terror wave, which despite continual stabbings has failed to ignite the wider public in the West Bank. Some of the worrying trends noted at the beginning of the confrontation—spillover to Arab Israelis and escalation along the Gaza border—have meanwhile been halted. Still, intelligence officials have told the political leadership in recent days that even if relative quiet is achieved, it will be very hard to restore relations with the Palestinian Authority (PA) to where they were before the autumn outbreak. Intelligence agencies agree that the internal situation in the PA—weakening of President Mahmoud Abbas' status, the emerging battle for his succession, and the sense of the PA's diplomatic ineffectiveness — will not allow for a long-term calm in the territories, even if the violence subsides.

This version of Total Mail Converter is not registered.

Times of Israel

PA Claims Israel Harvesting Organs of Dead Palestinians

The Palestinian Authority's UN representative claimed Israel is harvesting the organs of dead Palestinians, leading Israel's envoy to accuse the PA of spreading a blood libel. In a letter to the UN secretary general, ambassador Riyad Mansour protested Israel's "persistent aggression against the Palestinian people" over the past month of unrest and what he called its "insistence on use of violent force and oppressive measures." He then claimed that bodies of Palestinians killed by Israeli security forces "were returned with missing corneas and other organs, further confirming past reports about organ harvesting by the occupying power."
See also, "Israel Blasts Palestinian After Accusations of Organ-Harvesting" (NBC News)

Times of Israel

PLO Threatens to End Recognition of Israel

The Palestine Liberation Organization is threatening to withdraw recognition of Israel, its most senior peace negotiator told an Arab newspaper on Thursday. Saeb Erekat, who recently took over as secretary-general of the PLO, is quoted by Al-Quds al-Arabi as saying that a decision on reversing recognition of Israel - which was enshrined in a 1993 exchange of letters between the respective Israeli and Palestinian leaders at the time, Yitzhak Rabin and Yasser Arafat - will be made after PA President Mahmoud Abbas completes a round of consultations with Arab leaders this month.
See also, "PLO to Urge Abbas to Redefine Ties with Israel" (Ha'aretz)

Ynet News

Opposition, Gov't Unite Against EU Settlement Labeling Plans

The European Union's new guidelines regarding the marking of products manufactured in Israeli settlements in the Palestinian territories, prompting leaders from both sides of the political isle to unite in their condemnation. In a meeting between British Ambassador David Quarrey and Knesset Opposition Leader Isaac Herzog, the latter attempted to explain why the EU's upcoming guidelines will be harmful. Marking the products is a prize Europe will give to terrorism, Herzog said, and is a move that won't contribute at all to solving the conflict. He added that the move would economically hurt thousands of Palestinians who are employed in factories in the West Bank.
See also, "Israel Launches Loud Campaign Against EU Settlement Labeling" (i24 News)

Forward – November 4, 2015

How I'd Reaffirm Unbreakable Bond with Israel—and Netanyahu

By Hilary Clinton

We have recently marked the 20th anniversary of the assassination of then Israeli prime minister Yitzhak Rabin, a good friend, a courageous warrior and a great statesman. This somber anniversary, and Prime Minister Benjamin Netanyahu's visit to Washington on November 9, is an opportunity to reaffirm the unbreakable bonds of friendship and unity between the people and governments of the United States and Israel.

The alliance between our two nations transcends politics. It is and should always be a commitment that unites us, not a wedge that divides us.

Ever since President Truman waited only 11 minutes to recognize the new nation of Israel in 1948, Americans have believed that Israel is more than a country — it's a dream nurtured for generations and made real by men and women who refused to bow to the toughest odds.

This version of Total Mail Converter is not registered.

My first visit to Israel, in December 1981, sparked an enduring emotional connection for me — to the land and its people — and admiration for how Israelis have built a thriving democracy in a region full of adversaries and autocrats. I was so impressed with the Israeli approach to early childhood education and to helping parents become their children's first teachers that I worked to bring the Home Instruction for Parents of Preschool Youngsters (commonly known by its acronym, HIPPY) to Arkansas. Over the past 30 years, I've worked with Israelis of all stripes and made dear friends like the Rabins and many others inside and outside of government.

On that first trip, Bill and I fell in love with Jerusalem as we walked the ancient streets of the Old City. Even amid all the history and traditions, it was a city pulsing with life and energy. I am appalled that those same streets are now filled with terrorism and fear. We now hear of daily stabbings and shootings of innocent civilians — teenagers, parents and senior citizens. Israelis have to look over their shoulders during everyday tasks, like carrying groceries and waiting for the bus. Some American citizens are among the victims, including Richard Lakin, a teacher and advocate who spent years working for tolerance and understanding.

This violence must not be allowed to continue. It needs to stop immediately, and Israelis and Palestinians must move back toward the path of peaceful reconciliation. All parties and the international community should condemn any political and religious leader who stokes tensions with irresponsible rhetoric. Many of us have seen the video of a cleric encouraging worshippers to stab Jews as he waves a knife in the air. This incitement needs to end, period.

I have stood with Israel my entire career. As a senator, I fought to get Magen David Adom accepted to the International Red Cross when other nations tried to exclude the organization. I wrote and co-sponsored bills that isolated terror groups, and pushed to crack down on incitement in Palestinian textbooks and schools. As secretary of state, I requested more assistance for Israel every year, and supported the lifesaving Iron Dome rocket defense system. I defended Israel from isolation and attacks at the United Nations and other international settings, including opposing the biased Goldstone report.

On behalf of President Obama, I convened Netanyahu and Palestinian Authority President Mahmoud Abbas for three sessions of face-to-face peace talks, the last time that's ever happened. And in 2012 I led negotiations for a cease-fire in Gaza to stop Hamas rockets from raining down on Israeli homes and communities.

As president, I will continue this fight.

I am deeply committed to Israel's future as a secure and democratic Jewish state, and just as convinced that the only way to guarantee that outcome is through diplomacy. And while no solution can be imposed from outside, I believe the United States has a responsibility to help bring Israelis and Palestinians to the table and to encourage the difficult but necessary decisions that will lead to peace. As president I will never stop working to advance the goal of two states for two peoples living in peace, security and dignity.

I will do everything I can to enhance our strategic partnership and strengthen America's security commitment to Israel, ensuring that it always has the qualitative military edge to defend itself. That includes immediately dispatching a delegation of the Joint Chiefs of Staff to meet with senior Israeli commanders. I would also invite the Israeli prime minister to the White House in my first month in office.

This version of Total Mail Converter is not registered.

The dangers facing both our nations in the Middle East require bold and united responses. We must remain committed to preventing Iran from ever acquiring a nuclear weapon, and to vigorously enforcing the new nuclear agreement. I would move to step up our partnership to confront Iran and its proxies across the region, and make sure dangerous Russian and Iranian weapons don't end up in Hezbollah's hands or threaten Israel. I also will combat growing efforts to isolate Israel internationally and to undermine its future as a Jewish state, including the Boycott, Divestment and Sanctions movement. I've spoken out against BDS in the United States and at the U.N., and will continue to do so.

For me, fighting for Israel isn't just about policy — it's a personal commitment to the friendship between our peoples and our vision for peace and security.

Hillary Clinton is running for the Democratic nomination for president.

Yedioth Ahronoth – November 5, 2015

This Is Not Criticism, This Is Incitement

By Ben-Dror Yemini

People who want to take a bulldozer to the High Court of Justice, people who think that Judge Uzi Fogelman should join the Joint List—are conducting a campaign that is wholly incitement. Not criticism. Incitement. The Jewish state in general, and the High Court of Justice specifically, are not exempt from criticism. Their rulings are themselves filled with disagreement. One judge criticizes the other. Legal periodicals print critical articles. So it is in the world and so it is in Israel. But the remarks made by MK Motti Yogev crossed all the red lines.

The extreme right wing is not alone. The left wing too and this includes prominent leaders and activists of non-governmental organizations funded by the EU, demonstrated against rulings relating to the demolition of Bedouin homes. They did not read the rulings. They understand nothing about the issue. Their ideological affiliation made them stupid. Yogev learned from them. But the left wing's incitement, not just of the extreme left wing, does not justify incitement by the right wing.

Words can lead to actions. The majority of the rabbis and leaders of the right wing have internalized this. But not all of them. Yogev belongs to a minority that continues as if nothing has happened. The tight security that Fogelman now needs and the graffiti on the wall of the Supreme Court are the outcome of the atmosphere that Yogev heads. Because if an MK, an officer in reserves, leads the incitement, then others will shift to taking action. This does not stay in the social media. Incitement in the first act leads to writing on the wall in the second act and to violence in the third act.

Both Naftali Bennett and Ayelet Shaked condemned Yogev. Their condemnation was important. The problem is that in order to create a threat and in order for someone to resort to violence—there is no need for masses. If one out of the hundreds of Yogev's supporters—just one— takes seriously the call to take a bulldozer to the Supreme Court, Israel is liable to suffer another tragedy that will remind us all of what happened here exactly two decades ago. Let it not be said that a Jew will not lift a hand against a Jewish judge. That's what we thought once. And we know what happened.

The delay in demolishing terrorists' homes and the ruling on demolishing the synagogue are not a matter of left wing or right wing, and are unrelated to the matter of judicial activism, which it is fair to criticize. In the first case, this is because of procedure. Every on-duty judge would have made the exact same decision. In the second case, the court has not yet been established that can authorize construction on private land.

This version of Total Mail Converter is not registered.

Judges are human beings. It is no secret that Ayala Procaccia was on one edge of the political spectrum and that the late Edmond Levy was on the other edge. Miriam Naor and Elyakim Rubinstein don't belong to either edge. Their rulings show that they belong to a moderate school of thought.

Naor, here and there, has issued rulings that were harshly critical of the activism of some of her colleagues. The right wing should be proud of her. And as for Rubinstein, there is nothing to add. He has earned heaps of contempt from some left wing writers. If the appointment of judges were in in the hands of right wing politicians, we can assume that both would have been appointed. And both of them, of all people, spoke this past week against the ganging up on the court. We should pay attention to them.

Ben-Dror Yemini is an Israeli journalist and contributor to Yedioth Ahronoth.

S. Daniel Abraham Center for Middle East Peace
633 Pennsylvania Ave. NW, 5th Floor, Washington, DC 20004
www.centerpeace.org

2015 S. Daniel Abraham Center for Middle East Peace, All rights reserved.
YOU ARE RECEIVING THIS EMAIL BECAUSE YOU SIGNED UP FOR OUR NEWS UPDATES.

unsubscribe from this list update subscription preferences

This version of Total Mail Converter is not registered.

From: "Ruth Greenspan Bell" <Ruth.Bell@wilsoncenter.org>
To: "Ruth Greenspan Bell" <ruthgreenspanbell@gmail.com>
Date: 11/20/2015 8:49:07 AM
Subject: Constructive progress in addressing the multifaceted challenge of climate warming

Countries have made constructive progress in addressing the multifaceted challenge of climate warming in the four years since Barry Blechman, Micah Ziegler and I first starting writing about lessons from the weapons negotiations. Here (and copied below) you will find the next chapter published at Foreign Affairs, as the world heads toward the Paris COP. https://www.foreignaffairs.com/articles/2015-11-19/turning-down-heat

Ruth Greenspan Bell
Public Policy Scholar, Woodrow Wilson International Center for Scholars
Research Associate, Center for Decision Sciences, Columbia Business School Visiting Scholar, Environmental Law Institute
Phone: WWC: 202-691 4097
U.S. Mobile: +1 202 361 2409

Turning Down the Heat

Progress in the Fight Against Climate Change

By Ruth Greenspan Bell and Barry M. Blechman

This week, at a meeting of the Organization for Economic Cooperation and Development in Paris, the United States, Japan, and several other nations reached an agreement that will restrict financing for overseas coal projects. The deal will limit investment in the dirtiest, coal-fired power plants but will allow some continued investment in more efficient coal technology. Japan is one of the major sources of finance for the coal industry, so the agreement is an important moment in the effort to reduce global emissions.

This move, along with recent bilateral agreements the United States has reached with China and India, signals a significant strategic development in the process of tackling climate change, a process that has so far made only glacial progress. Until recently, countries mostly focused their efforts on cooperating within the United Nations Framework Convention on Climate Change. The sheer number of issues before the UNFCCC, however, and the involvement of 196 parties in the negotiations have made it difficult to make progress toward greenhouse gas reductions. Increasingly, however, the United States has shifted toward supplementing its engagement at the UNFCCC with opportunistic deals cut with individual partners that focus on discrete issues where progress is feasible. This has been a much more effective strategy, and one that offers the best hope of averting the worst impacts of a changing climate.

COLD WAR LESSONS

Four years ago, in the pages of Foreign Affairs, we argued that the process of reducing global emissions was too dependent on the UNFCCC. UNFCCC negotiations involve more issues than most multinational talks, including weaning whole economies off fossil fuels, protecting disappearing forests, and saving the small island states that are likely to be underwater within a few decades. Making decisions in the UNFCCC is difficult because 196 parties are at the table—polluters, victims, and everyone in between—all of which officially wield equal weight. As a result, unsurprisingly, parties have found it difficult to conclude comprehensive agreements, and the world has made little progress in controlling greenhouse gas emissions.

This version of Total Mail Converter is not registered.

Progress, we argued, could be made by unbundling the many issues contained in the UNFCCC process, following the example of the negotiations that gradually curbed the nuclear arms race. In the 1950s, countries tried to negotiate "general and complete disarmament" in the UN General Assembly, to little avail. But they later changed their approach by tackling discrete issues separately and by diversifying their negotiating arenas, expanding discussions beyond the UN to regional configurations and bilateral meetings. This resulted in a series of often opportunistic treaties, crafted when circumstances allowed, that solved particular parts of the weapons puzzle. The enactment and ultimate success of these treaties helped open the door to more such agreements, especially by developing mutual trust among nations that were then more willing to make further commitments.

The most important bilateral arrangements were, of course, those between the United States and the Soviet Union. They managed to establish communications channels and protocols to avoid accidental disaster. Long negotiations led to substantial joint reductions of their stocks of operational nuclear weapons. And the relations established during those decades of conversations allowed the two countries to act quickly to contain nuclear weapons when the Soviet Union dissolved.

KHAM / REUTERS

Residents collect fish at a drought-affected lake in Bac Ninh province, outside Hanoi, Vietnam, October, 2015.

This version of Total Mail Converter is not registered.

Surveying the disheartening responses to climate change back in 2011, we argued that a deeper understanding of this history of the nuclear talks might help negotiators be more creative today in addressing the looming disaster of climate change. Fortunately, the administration of U.S. President Barack Obama is now showing some of this required creativity. As it continues to work toward comprehensive agreements at the UNFCCC, the Obama administration has also struck compromises elsewhere on discrete issues that supplement and in some cases catalyze the ongoing UNFCCC efforts. It has also reached bilateral deals with key partners, finding areas where mutual interests align, just as the superpowers did during the Cold War .

For instance, in November 2014, two of the biggest emitters, the United States and China, reached a climate deal with very specific commitments. The United States will cut its 2005 level of carbon emissions by 26 to 28 percent before 2025; China will peak its carbon emissions by 2030 and will aim to get 20 percent of its energy from zero-emission sources by the same year. By doing so, China implicitly chose to take public responsibility for its emissions.

The United States has also made progress in bilateral discussions with India. It has followed a different approach, but one that is once again based on overlapping mutual interests. India's commitment to reducing its emissions is limited (although it has agreed to cut its emissions intensity 33 to 35 percent below 2005 levels). But it is amenable to working with the United States toward the objective of fueling its development with clean energy. In September 2015, the two countries signed memorandums of understanding that will help them collaborate on mechanisms to finance clean energy projects in India and on methods to commercialize innovative off-grid clean energy solutions. And India has expressed a commitment to reduce hydrofluorocarbons, which have a large impact on global warming.

Successful U.S.-Japanese negotiations over limiting export finance for overseas coal projects are the latest in this sequence. Once again, negotiators made progress through bilateral discussions of discrete issues. And once the United States and Japan reached a compromise, other countries followed, albeit with some further changes. Not only did the deal bring two key countries together on a significant issue, but, as Lisa Friedman of ClimateWire reported, it was also "aimed at influencing other members of the OECD," who this week agreed on common rules to phase out coal financing for export credit agencies. In this way, limited bilateral deals can build momentum for further agreements.

BUILDING MOMENTUM

The latest round of UNFCCC negotiations will take place in Paris in a few weeks. Even the UNFCCC has been influenced by a new realism about how agreement can take place among disparate nations with a variety of development objectives and many differences in their systems of governance.

This version of Total Mail Converter is not registered.

BENOIT TESSIER / REUTERS

The logo of the upcoming COP21 Climate Change Conference on a Nissan LEAF electric car in Boulogne-Billancourt, near Paris, France, November, 2015.

The framework for this agreement is a series of commitments, or Intended Nationally Determined Contributions, by individual countries to reduce their emissions. Critics argue that this makes it much harder to compare national efforts, as each country's plans can be quite different in their approach and their goals. And it is true that the system lacks the neatness of joint general pledges to somehow hold warming to, for example, two degrees Celsius. But countries are at least making considered assessments of their individual capabilities and very specific commitments. Once commitments for curbing greenhouse gas emissions have been recorded, the countries that make them can work together so that each pledge, and the actions required to achieve it, is scrutinized, successfully resolved, and eventually tightened. In this respect, at least, the Paris talks will be a success, although there may be more disagreements on other major issues.

During the nuclear arms race, progress toward reducing nuclear dangers often followed events that sparked popular concern. Alarm over the renewed Cold War of the early 1980s, for example, led to the "Freeze Movement," which called on the United States and the Soviet Union to adopt a mutual freeze on the testing, production, and deployment of nuclear weapons. The movement's influence on the 1982 elections in turn contributed to the decision of U.S. President Ronald Reagan to abandon his opposition to arms control policies and to negotiate treaties with the Soviet Union that banned an entire class of nuclear weapons.

This version of Total Mail Converter is not registered.

Similarly, the growing evidence today that climate change is happening—and that it has direct impacts on people's lives, from more ferocious storms to the rising incidence of tropical diseases in northern climes—is causing a generational change in attitudes toward the seriousness of the problem and the need to take action now. Increasingly, individuals are changing their own behavior, by, for instance, installing solar panels on their homes and purchasing electric and hybrid automobiles. Local and provincial governments are taking more measures to reduce emissions, from Chicago's green roof projects to British Columbia's carbon tax. In the end, the problems of a changing climate will be solved only by the active involvement of the citizens of the world. The bilateral deals orchestrated over the last year by the United States and some of the world's major emitters are a good way to begin.

This version of Total Mail Converter is not registered.

From: "Burns Strider" <burns.strider@americanbridge.org>
To: CTRFriendsFamily <CTRFriendsFamily@americanbridge.org>
Date: 7/27/2014 8:43:47 AM
Subject: Correct The Record Sunday July 27, 2014 Roundup

Correct The Record Sunday July 27, 2014 Roundup:

Headlines:

Boston Globe: "Hillary Clinton speaks of need for political compromise"

"Former Secretary of State Hillary Clinton issued an appeal for political compromise Saturday at a financial advisers' conference in Boston, crediting business-minded Republicans with helping end the 2013 government shutdown that she said had tarnished the United States' image abroad."

Boston Herald: "Clinton makes splash at Boston convention, raps partisanship"

"Former Secretary of State Hillary Clinton preached bipartisanship, plugged her book, avoided talk of a 2016 White House run, and even joked about her role as the last-minute fill-in speaker for former President George W. Bush during a convention in Boston yesterday."

Boston Globe: "Hillary Clinton meets fans at Seekonk Sam's Club"

"Against a backdrop of stacked paper towels and water bottle packs in an aisle at a Sam's Club, former US secretary of state Hillary Clinton greeted nearly 1,000 people Saturday during a book signing at the retail warehouse for her memoir, 'Hard Choices.'"

RealClearPolitics: "'Ready for Hillary' in Northeast Pennsylvania"

"McNulty is clear about who Scranton will endorse in a primary race between Clinton and Vice President Joe Biden, who also grew up in the city: 'Sorry, sir, with all due respect, this is Hillary Country.'"

Politico: "Hillary Clinton addresses 'vision,' realities"

This version of Total Mail Converter is not registered.

"Hillary Clinton said in an interview airing Sunday that voters sometimes look for 'a vision that people can hang onto,' but that must be based in the realities of getting results in Washington."

CNN blog: Fareed Zakaria GPS: "Clinton: Settlement policy my biggest complaint with Israeli government"

"The continuing settlements, which have been denounced by successive American administrations on both sides of the aisle, are clearly a terrible signal to send if, at the same time, you claim you're looking for a two-state solution."

Mediaite: "Fareed Zakaria to Hillary Clinton: What Happened to the Reset with Russia?"

"CNN's Fareed Zakaria asked former Secretary of State Hillary Clinton Sunday morning if, as she claimed in her book, the "reset" with Russia worked initially, when exactly did it stop working?"

Wall Street Journal blog: Washington Wire: "Clinton to Europe: Loosen Russia's Energy Grip"

"Former Secretary of State Hillary Clinton called on European nations to become less dependent on Russian energy supplies and impose stronger sanctions on their Eastern neighbor."

Wall Street Journal blog: Washington Wire: "Clinton: Any Enrichment by Iran Could Trigger Arms Race"

"Former Secretary of State Hillary Clinton said Sunday that any Iranian uranium enrichment could trigger a nuclear-arms race in the Middle East."

The Daily Independent (Ashland, Kentucky): "Bill Clinton coming to eastern Kentucky to stump for Grimes"

"Former President Bill Clinton will join Grimes on Aug. 6 for a campaign rally in eastern Kentucky, according to a campaign official who would provide no further details."

CNN: "CNN Poll: Romney tops Obama but loses to Clinton"

"If a rematch of the 2012 presidential election were held today, GOP nominee Mitt Romney would top President Barack Obama in the popular vote, according to a new national survey. But a CNN/ORC International poll also indicates that if Romney changes his mind and runs again for the White House, Hillary Clinton would best him by double digits in a hypothetical showdown."

New York Post: "How a 'weird' Chelsea Clinton is getting in on the family business"

"Yet for all this talk from a lifelong public person about her recent decision to become a public person, Chelsea Clinton, now 34, remains an enigma."

This version of Total Mail Converter is not registered.

Articles:

Boston Globe: "Hillary Clinton speaks of need for political compromise"

By Jim O'Sullivan

July 26, 2014

Former Secretary of State Hillary Clinton issued an appeal for political compromise Saturday at a financial advisers' conference in Boston, crediting business-minded Republicans with helping end the 2013 government shutdown that she said had tarnished the United States' image abroad.

Clinton, widely discussed as a presidential front-runner in 2016, repeatedly decried what she portrayed as ideological extremism in Washington, invoking the presidencies of Ronald Reagan and her husband, Bill Clinton, as eras of bipartisan accommodation.

"American voters should make it very clear that we will not vote for someone who says proudly he or she will go to Washington and never compromise," Clinton said.

"We're not even coming together to solve the emergency problems. We're having a big fight about what to do down on our border, with the tens of thousands of youngsters that are there," Clinton said, referring to the crisis of migrant children on the US-Mexico border.

Touring behind her new memoir, "Hard Choices," Clinton addressed the Ameriprise Financial conference at the Boston Convention and Exhibition Center as a substitute for former President George W. Bush, who had canceled his appearance due to knee surgery.

"The last time a Clinton replaced a Bush, things turned out pretty well," Clinton quipped.

Much of her prepared remarks were devoted to American competitiveness with China and what she called the growing threat of Russia under Vladimir Putin.

But Clinton also repeatedly jabbed at populist themes that another frequently mentioned potential presidential candidate, Massachusetts Senator Elizabeth Warren, often voices in her own speeches. Warren has repeatedly said that she is not running for president.

"We have the feeling growing in our country that the deck is stacked against the middle class, and those fighting to get into the middle class," Clinton said, adding that the country is hobbled by "rising inequality, growth that hasn't really picked up yet, and the feeling that many Americans now have that somehow the system seems rigged against them."

During a question-and-answer session with Ameriprise Financial CEO James Cracchiolo, Clinton said right-leaning corporate leaders had helped fortify GOP congressional leadership in October 2013 to end a two-week government shutdown.

"People I knew, on boards, in executive suites, were calling Republicans they supported – they're conservative, that's where their political viewpoint rests -- and saying, 'What are you guys thinking?' And it was the business community, Jim, that pulled us back from the brink."

This version of Total Mail Converter is not registered.

"Support those people. Support the people who are still able to make a deal," she said.

Clinton has taken criticism for the paid speeches she has made since stepping down as the nation's top diplomat after President Obama's first term.

Later on Saturday, she visited the Sam's Club in Seekonk for a book-signing.

Boston Herald: "Clinton makes splash at Boston convention, raps partisanship"

By Chris Cassidy and Laurel J. Sweet

July 27, 2014

Former Secretary of State Hillary Clinton preached bipartisanship, plugged her book, avoided talk of a 2016 White House run, and even joked about her role as the last-minute fill-in speaker for former President George W. Bush during a convention in Boston yesterday.

"The last time a Clinton replaced a Bush, things worked out pretty well," Clinton told the crowd.

Bush had to cancel his appearance at the three-day Ameriprise Financial conference at the Boston Convention & Exhibition Center because of an injured knee.

In a 50-minute appearance, Clinton — his hired replacement — warned that America's image at home and abroad is being tarnished by never-ending bipartisan wrangling in Washington, according to several attendees of the event, which was heavily secured and closed to the press.

Clinton contrasted today's grim atmosphere of conflict and gridlock on Capitol Hill with the 1990s, when President Bill Clinton and House Speaker Newt Gingrich fought publicly all day long, but at least privately negotiated at night.

"She said, 'Don't be voting or pouring money into someone that's going to go into Washington and say, 'I'm not going to compromise. I'm going to have staunch ideas,'" said attendee Nancia Dalimonte. "Because nothing's going to change. Nothing's going to get done."

"She talked about compromise," a Republican conventioneer from Washington, D.C., said, declining to give his name, citing the strict confidentiality rules of the event. "She just talked about how both Reagan and Bill were able to work with the other party, and obviously that's not happening today."

He added: "I'm not a fan of hers. I'm on the other side, but I was reasonably impressed."

Clinton's message of political harmony could serve her well with independent voters if she runs in 2016, said one political pundit.

"Independents are fed up with the excessive partisanship," said Marc Landy of Boston College. "She hasn't got a clue about how to improve the level of bipartisanship, but might as well talk about it. Why not?"

The speech by Clinton — who declined to speak to a reporter as she left the building — drew generally warm reviews from the largely conservative crowd.

This version of Total Mail Converter is not registered.

"As a registered Republican I was a little concerned when President Bush canceled," said conventioneer David Lowe. "I was pleasantly surprised and impressed."

"People were pretty uptight about her because she's polarizing," said Craig Hanson of Wisconsin of the announcement that Clinton would replace Bush.

"But I thought she was great."

Joe Castillo, a professional sand artist and finalist on the hit NBC show "America's Got Talent," was one of Clinton's opening acts at the event.

Castillo said Clinton "started talking right away about economics. She talked about people paying their fair share."

The applause from the crowd of financial advisers was, he said, "warm, but not overly enthusiastic."

Boston Globe: "Hillary Clinton meets fans at Seekonk Sam's Club"

By Oliver Ortega

July 27, 2014

Against a backdrop of stacked paper towels and water bottle packs in an aisle at a Sam's Club, former US secretary of state Hillary Clinton greeted nearly 1,000 people Saturday during a book signing at the retail warehouse for her memoir, "Hard Choices."

Some even spent the night in the parking lot so they could be first to enter the store when it opened at 7 a.m. and line up for a signed copy and a few seconds with Clinton, widely discussed as a front-runner for the next presidential election.

"I wanted her to see that she met probably the first woman president," said Sherry Tomasso, referring to her 9-year-old granddaughter, Kyllei Shelton, who came with her to the signing. The Rehoboth residents arrived at the store at midnight with folding chairs, blankets, and snacks to brave the chilly night.

Clinton came out to raucous applause and cheering. Outside, some in the rear of the line also voiced their enthusiasm when Clinton aides periodically came out to thank them for coming and to reassure them that they would get to see the former first lady and US senator.

"Run, Hilary, run," one woman chanted.

"I have so much respect for her," said Diane Bergeron of Malden, who came to the store at 5 a.m. and left with a gleeful smile and a signed book clutched to her chest.

"She has my vote, and I'm going to campaign for her, which I never do, but I will for her," said Lynn Vandenburgh of Plymouth.

Vandenburgh said she was exhausted and could barely remember the short chat she had with Clinton, but that having Clinton's hand on top of hers for a few seconds made it “all worth it.”

This version of Total Mail Converter is not registered.

Until just before 4 p.m., when the event was scheduled to end, the line stretched from the back of the store to the parking lot. Store employees handed out water and snacks throughout the day.

A bus belonging to the Ready for Hillary Super PAC was stationed outside the store, and about 600 people signed up to volunteer or receive information, according to the group’s communications director, Seth Bringman.

Some at the store said they were surprised at the choice of venue.

“I thought they had evacuated Sam’s Club when I saw the line in the parking lot,” said Helena Gernold of East Providence, R.I.,who was shopping there. “This is like a warehouse. You would expect like a Barnes & Noble.”

Abigale Sanft, an 18-year-old from Taunton, said the location was strange but that she did not think it affected attendance.

“What really matters is that she came to the area,” Sanft said. “People are here anyway.”

Security was tight, with dozens of State Police, Seekonk police, and Secret Service agents restricting access to Clinton and checking the perimeter.

Several aisles were cordoned off so people could not cut in without being screened. The store’s café was closed and the space was used to give out wristbands, for which people either had to buy a book or bring their own for signing.

Dianna Gee, a spokeswoman for Sam’s Club, said the store has hosted book signings for a variety of authors over the past few years. A few weeks ago, Clinton held one in Arkansas at a Walmart, the company that owns Sam’s Club.

Clinton has been promoting her book across the country since June. Last week she stopped in Cambridge.

In its first week, “Hard Choices” sold 86,000 copies, though book sales had plunged to 10,000 by last week, according to Nielsen BookScan. A new book attacking Clinton, Ed Klein’s “Blood Feud: The Clintons vs. the Obamas,” has outsold it for three weeks in a row.

RealClearPolitics: “'Ready for Hillary' in Northeast Pennsylvania”

By Salena Zito

July 27, 2014

Evie McNulty and her husband, Jim, have been there from the beginning.

She is Lackawanna County's recorder and he is Scranton's former mayor. Despite serving only one term in the 1980s, he is credited with starting the renaissance of the former industrial city; he enjoys popularity and stature as the city's unofficial ambassador, the kind of popularity you can't get in public office.

This version of Total Mail Converter is not registered.

Charming, smart, folksy, beloved and, above all, very connected, they are the Democratic Party's powerhouses in Northeast Pennsylvania.

Arguably, their support and network is more valuable to a Democrat in a primary or general election than anything that state party chairman Jim Burn could deliver to a presidential candidate.

Six years ago last month, Evie wept on her couch in Scranton as then-Sen. Hillary Clinton, D-N.Y., took to the stage at the National Building Museum in Washington — where supporters had lined up around the block for hours — and told the cheering crowd of mostly women and families, “Well, this isn't exactly the party I'd planned, but I sure like the company.”

It marked a spectacular end to arguably the longest presidential primary race in modern American political history.

Clinton started the campaign in 2007 slightly blindsided by a freshman senator from Illinois, who barely had a year under his belt in Washington.

She was even more blindsided by the loss of support in Washington — from the Teddy Kennedys of the political world who were legends, as well as from the “fresh” Washingtonians such as Sen. Claire McCaskill, D-Mo. Their endorsements of Sen. Barack Obama instead of Clinton were a sharp slap in the face to the former first lady.

In late 2007 and early 2008, Clinton stumbled out of the gate; she was too rigid, too strident, failed to reach out to the progressive activists who make or break low-turnout caucus contests and, above all, was way over-handled by her advisers and staff.

“They did not let Hillary be Hillary,” said McNulty from her home, and you could hear her husband in the background agreeing.

When Clinton reached the Midwest and South, especially the primary races in Ohio and Texas, she shed her handlers and began to hit her stride, according to McNulty. “By the time she hit her home state of Pennsylvania, she had her groove on, she connected, she relaxed, she was herself, and that is the Hillary Clinton I know and love.”

To the McNultys, Hillary Rodham Clinton is one of them — a daughter of Scranton, where generations of the Rodham family worked at the lace factory, where she was baptized and spent summers, and where her brothers still own a cabin.

McNulty is clear about who Scranton will endorse in a primary race between Clinton and Vice President Joe Biden, who also grew up in the city: “Sorry, sir, with all due respect, this is Hillary Country.”

McNulty defends Clinton's rocky rollout of her book tour, during which she was criticized for remarks that seemed out of touch with working-class voters and with the populist movement percolating outside Washington in both political parties. That movement is building incredible momentum against all things elite and big — big banks, big government, big money.

“They should have called me, I would tell her to just be herself,” she said.

Today, McNulty spends her time collecting names, phone numbers and email addresses for Clinton's next presidential campaign. The county row officer, who has won every election since 1998 by overwhelming majorities, really wants only one thing in return.

“Every year we try to get Hillary to come and speak to our Society of Irish Women dinner but she has been unable to because, when she was senator, they had their parade in New York, and she had her hands full when she was running for president, then she was so busy when she was secretary of State,” said McNulty, one of three Pennsylvania women elected to the Democratic National Committee.

“God, I wish we could, I wish we could,” she said excitedly of getting Clinton to speak at the next St. Patrick's Day dinner in Scranton.

This version of Total Mail Converter is not registered.

Clearly, she is “Ready for Hillary,” as the pre-2016 bumper stickers and buttons declare.

Politico: “Hillary Clinton addresses ‘vision,’ realities”

By Katie Glueck

July 26, 2014, 12:19 p.m. EDT

Hillary Clinton said in an interview airing Sunday that voters sometimes look for “a vision that people can hang onto,” but that must be based in the realities of getting results in Washington.

The former secretary of state and possible Democratic 2016 frontrunner offered those remarks on CNN’s “Fareed Zakaria GPS,” set to air for the full hour on Sunday. She dismissed the notion that a Washington “insider” would have a tougher time securing the presidential nomination.

“I think that we, perhaps, go through periods where what we want and what we need is a vision that people can hang onto,” she said, according to a transcript provided ahead of the show. “But it needs to be rooted in the hard work of getting anything done in Washington. And I think the next election will be based around the economy, around people’s standard of living, around what’s happening to the middle class in America.”

Clinton, who has been traveling the country and internationally to promote her memoir of her time at the State Department, “Hard Choices,” has generated much speculation about what overarching message a presidential campaign of hers would offer.

“And whoever runs is going to have to speak candidly and come up with a set of recommendations that the American people believe would be in their interest, so that you have an election not about a candidate, but you have an election about an agenda,” she said.

When Zakaria noted that the last several Democratic presidents have backgrounds primarily outside of Washington — including her own husband, former President Bill Clinton — Clinton replied that every election is unique.

“It starts with where we are in the country at this time, with what Americans are thinking, feeling and hoping,” she said. “And it proceeds from there. And it’s always about the future. So whether you’ve been in office a day or you’ve been in office 20 years, you have to come to any campaign with as clear an understanding as you can get of where the country is and where you wish it to be.”

Clinton, in other interviews and in her book, has also appeared to create some space from the Obama administration on foreign policy matters including Syria and Russia.

Asked about what she learned from her vote to authorize military action in Iraq while she was in the Senate — an issue that took a major toll on her presidential primary campaign in 2008 — she again seemed to signal distance from the office of the presidency.

“Well, I learned to be far more skeptical of what I’m told by presidents, no matter who the presidents are, and also to be much more cautious, always, in any action or vote that could lead to the use of American military power and most particularly what we call boots on the ground.”

This version of Total Mail Converter is not registered.

CNN blog: Fareed Zakaria GPS: "Clinton: Settlement policy my biggest complaint with Israeli government"

[Transcript]

July 27, 2014, 12:53 a.m. EDT

[Fareed speaks with former Secretary of State Hillary Clinton about unrest in the Middle East. Watch the full interview on "Fareed Zakaria GPS," this Sunday at 10 a.m. and 1 p.m. ET on CNN.]

Martin Indyk has just resigned as the kind of sherpa of the peace process. And he says that the immediate trigger, in his view – there were many – was the fact that the Palestinians looked at the Israeli continued settlement activity...

Right.

…and said these guys are not serious, we're never going to be able to get a state...

Right.

…look at what they're doing.

This is my biggest complaint with the Israeli government. I'm a strong supporter of Israel, a strong supporter of their right to defend themselves. But the continuing settlements, which have been denounced by successive American administrations on both sides of the aisle, are clearly a terrible signal to send if, at the same time, you claim you're looking for a two-state solution.

Mediaite: "Fareed Zakaria to Hillary Clinton: What Happened to the Reset with Russia?"

By Evan McMurry

July 27, 2014, 10:48 a.m. EDT

CNN's Fareed Zakaria asked former Secretary of State Hillary Clinton Sunday morning if, as she claimed in her book, the "reset" with Russia worked initially, when exactly did it stop working?

"I was among the most skeptical of Putin during the time that I was there, in part because I thought he had never given up on his vision of bringing mother Russia back to the forefront," Clinton said. "So when he announced in the fall of 2011 that he would be changing positions with Medvedev, I knew that he would be more difficult to deal with. He had been always the power behind Medvedev, but he had given Medvedev a lot of independence to make the reset a success."

"I saw that firsthand with respect to the parliamentary elections in Russia, because they were filled with irregularities and Russian people poured out into the streets to protest, and I, as secretary of state, said the Russians deserved better," Clinton continued. "Putin attacked me personally because is he very worried about any kind of internal dissent."

Clinton reiterated her call for a stronger response from Europe.

This version of Total Mail Converter is not registered.

"If the United States and Europe don't present a united front, I think Putin's the kind of man who will go as far as he can get away with," Clinton said. "I think he is still smart enough and cautious enough to be pushed back, but there has to be a push in order to make that happen."

Watch the clip below, via CNN:

[VIDEO]

Wall Street Journal blog: Washington Wire: "Clinton to Europe: Loosen Russia's Energy Grip"

By Amy Harder

July 27, 2014, 10:53 a.m. EDT

Former Secretary of State Hillary Clinton called on European nations to become less dependent on Russian energy supplies and impose stronger sanctions on their Eastern neighbor.

"They need to understand they must stand up to [Russian President] Vladimir Putin," Mrs. Clinton said on CNN in an interview with Fareed Zakaria. "The reluctance has to do with European dependence on energy from Russia."

Mrs. Clinton said that while she was Secretary of State during the first term of the Obama administration, she told European nations then that they need to diversify their energy supplies. As secretary, she created in 2011 the department's Bureau of Energy Resources, a roughly 100-person office that seeks to further diplomacy through energy security.

"Russia doesn't have that many markets," Mrs. Clinton said. "They're also dependent upon European markets. I think Europeans can go much further on sanctions and should do so as quickly as possible."

Mrs. Clinton, who is considered the top potential Democratic candidate for president in 2016, said the downing of the Malaysian Airlines 3786.KU -2.22% airplane justifies stronger sanctions on Russia.

"If there were any doubt it should be gone by now that Vladimir Putin certainly indirectly threw his support of the insurgents in Eastern Ukraine and… bears responsibility for what happened with the shoot-down of the airplane," Mrs. Clinton said. "So therefore we have to up these sanctions."

About 34% of the European Union's natural-gas imports come from Russia, and several European nations are much more heavily dependent, including six that get all of their gas from Russia, according to a U.S. Congressional Research Service report released in August 2013. Ukraine relies on Russia for 70% of its natural-gas supply, and it's a key transit country for Russian gas headed to more than a dozen other European nations.

This dependence has led to some wariness among European officials and businesses over aggressively backing sanctions, since it could end up hurting European firms and the economy.

Earlier this month, Mr. Obama announced another round of sanctions that targets, among others, three major Russian energy companies: the state-controlled Rosneft, Russia's biggest oil producer; OAO Novatek, the second-biggest gas company; and OAO Gazprombank, the bank connected with the country's gas-export monopoly.

This version of Total Mail Converter is not registered.

Wall Street Journal blog: Washington Wire: "Clinton: Any Enrichment by Iran Could Trigger Arms Race"

By Amy Harder

July 27, 2014, 11:31 a.m. EDT

Former Secretary of State Hillary Clinton said Sunday that any Iranian uranium enrichment could trigger a nuclear-arms race in the Middle East.

"I believe strongly that it's really important for there to be so little enrichment or no enrichment at least for a long period of time because I do think any enrichment will trigger an arms race in the Middle East," Mrs. Clinton said on CNN in an interview with Fareed Zakaria.

As secretary of state, Mrs. Clinton led the Obama administration's efforts to get international sanctions imposed on Iran, including its oil sector, in 2012. Mrs. Clinton stepped down in early 2013 and is now considered a top potential presidential candidate for 2016, though she has declined to yet say whether she is running.

Earlier this month, Iran and six world powers, including the U.S., agreed to extend negotiations over Tehran's nuclear-enrichment program for four more months to reach a comprehensive deal.

Iran agreed to take further measures to curtail the most advanced parts of its nuclear program. It will accelerate the conversion of its 20% enriched uranium into fuel for its research reactor, U.S. officials said. That move will make the material significantly harder to reconvert into a form that can be used for a nuclear weapon, they said.

The Daily Independent (Ashland, Kentucky): "Bill Clinton coming to eastern Kentucky to stump for Grimes"

By Ronnie Ellis

July 26, 2014

GLASGOW — Democrat Alison Lundergan Grimes is again calling in the "Big Dog" in her quest to unseat five-term Republican U.S. Sen. Mitch McConnell.

Former President Bill Clinton will join Grimes on Aug. 6 for a campaign rally in eastern Kentucky, according to a campaign official who would provide no further details.

But given the efforts by the McConnell campaign to tie Grimes to the environmental policies of President Barack Obama, and the declining fortunes of the eastern Kentucky coal economy, it's probably a safe bet the event will take place somewhere in the coal fields of southeastern Kentucky.

It will be the second visit to Kentucky this year by Clinton on Grimes' behalf, but probably not the last. Clinton is a close friend with Grimes' father, Jerry Lundergan, and he has known Grimes since she was a teenager.

This version of Total Mail Converter is not registered.

In February Clinton spoke to about 1,000 Grimes supporters in Louisville, endorsing the jobs plan Grimes touts in her campaign and focusing on the economic issues Grimes wishes to use against McConnell.

That was Clinton's first campaign appearance in the 2014 election cycle, indicating the importance he attaches to the effort to defeat McConnell, the Republican Senate Minority Leader who has been Obama's major nemesis in Congress.

Clinton also appeared in a video endorsing Grimes which was broadcast at Grimes' formal campaign kickoff last summer in Lexington at the Carrick House, owned by Lundergan.

Unlike Obama, Clinton and his wife, Hillary, the former U.S. Secretary of State who is widely regarded as the 2016 Democratic front-runner for president, remain popular in Kentucky. Bill Clinton was the last Democrat to carry Kentucky – twice – in a presidential election and Hillary Clinton defeated Obama in the 2008 Kentucky presidential primary by a wide margin. Lundergan managed Hillary Clinton's 2008 Kentucky primary campaign.

"We are humbled by President Clinton's continued commitment to our campaign and the hardworking people of Kentucky," Jonathan Hurst, Grimes' campaign manager, said Saturday.

"The President shares Alison's vision for a strong middle class and his support in electing Alison, a champion for working families, to the U.S. Senate is invaluable," Hurst said.

Grimes has run successive television ads hitting McConnell on traditional Democratic working-class themes: Medicare and blue collar jobs.

Since McConnell gave a controversial answer to Edmund Shelby, Editor of the Beattyville Enterprise, saying local job development wasn't the job of a U.S. Senator but that of the state commerce cabinet, Grimes has highlighted the issue at every opportunity.

Clinton won his first term on similar issues when the internal theme of his 1992 campaign was, "It's the economy, stupid." He's also known as an effective advocate for Democratic policies. Clinton clearly boosted Obama's re-election fortunes with a speech at the 2012 Democratic National Convention after which Obama dubbed the former president as "explainer in chief."

No doubt Grimes is hoping Clinton can do the same for her in the coal fields, once a Democratic strong hold but increasingly inimical to Obama and national Democrats.

In the primary, Grimes won coal-producing counties easily against an undistinguished Democratic primary field, but she under performed in those counties when measured against her statewide average vote totals. On the other hand, McConnell outperformed his statewide totals in the same counties.

McConnell accuses Obama of waging "a war on coal," though most industry experts blame the high cost of mining eastern Kentucky coal and market forces such as cheap natural gas as primary reasons for eastern Kentucky coal's decline.

He also tells voters he could become the Senate Majority Leader if the GOP wins control of the Senate this year as many think may happen and it would be foolish for Kentucky voters to exchange a Senate leader for a "back bencher" freshman.

Clinton is likely to address all those issues in his visit.

The announcement comes just a week before the annual Fancy Farm Picnic in far western Kentucky where Grimes and McConnell will share the same stage for the first time. Excitement over a Clinton visit can't hurt the enthusiasm of Grimes' supporters at that event, either.

Most publicly released independent polls continue to show the race tight, some with Grimes and others with McConnell leading. But all of them have the race within the margin of error.

This version of Total Mail Converter is not registered.

CNN: "CNN Poll: Romney tops Obama but loses to Clinton"

[No Writer Mentioned]

July 27, 2014, 8:29 a.m. EDT

If a rematch of the 2012 presidential election were held today, GOP nominee Mitt Romney would top President Barack Obama in the popular vote, according to a new national survey.

But a CNN/ORC International poll also indicates that if Romney changes his mind and runs again for the White House, Hillary Clinton would best him by double digits in a hypothetical showdown.

The survey, released Sunday morning, also suggests that more Americans see Clinton as a strong and capable leader than those who feel the same way about Obama. But Clinton's numbers on five personal characteristics have slightly edged down the past few months.

And the poll points to a jump the past month in support among Republicans for New Jersey Gov. Chris Christie and Texas Gov. Rick Perry.

How Romney fares

According to the poll, if the 2012 election were somehow held again, Romney would capture 53% of the popular vote, with the President at 44%. Obama beat Romney 51%-47% in the popular vote in the 2012 contest. And he won the all-important Electoral College by a wider margin, 332 electoral votes to Romney's 206.

Last November, an ABC News/Washington Post survey indicated that if the 2012 election were held again, Romney would have had a 49%-45% edge over Obama in the popular vote.

Romney has said numerous times that he won't run for the White House again. But what if things changed and he ended up as the GOP nominee in 2016? The CNN poll indicates that 55% of Americans would support Clinton, with Romney at 42%.

"Politically speaking, there is an interesting group of people who would not vote for Obama but would pick Clinton over Romney," said CNN Polling Director Keating Holland. "It turns out that nearly seven in ten of them are women, and 56% are Independents."

The CNN poll – just like almost every national and state survey preceding it – indicates that the former secretary of state remains the overwhelming frontrunner for the Democratic nomination. Clinton is seriously considering a second White House run.

Two-thirds of Democrats and independents who lean toward the party say they would most likely support Clinton for the presidential nomination. One in ten say they'd back freshman Sen. Elizabeth Warren of Massachusetts, a super star among liberals. And eight percent support Vice President Joe Biden. That's a slight swap from last year, when Biden stood at 12% and Warren at 7% in CNN polling.

Like Clinton, Biden is mulling another presidential bid, while Warren has said numerous times that she's not running in 2016.

Did book tour hurt Clinton?

This version of Total Mail Converter is not registered.

The poll was conducted more than a month into Clinton's book tour for her new memoir "Hard Choices."

Did Clinton's well publicized book tour – including her controversial remarks that she and her husband Bill Clinton were "dead broke" when they left the White House in 2001 – hurt her standing with the public?

The number who say that Clinton shares their values dropped from 56% in March to 51% now, and the number who say she cares about people edged down from 56% to 53% in the same time period.

"But it's tough to tell whether Clinton's remarks were the reason for any change that might have happened. The number who believe that Clinton agrees with them on issue and can manage the government effectively also dropped, and those are not qualities that you would expect to be affected by any concerns over Clinton's wealth," said Holland. "The more likely explanation is that the book tour hurt Clinton - if it did so - not because of any specific comments that she made but because more Americans now view her as an active candidate for the White House."

GOP field all knotted up, but big jumps for Christie and Perry

The poll also indicates the race for the 2016 GOP nomination remains a wide open contest with no obvious frontrunner among the potential Republican White House hopefuls.

Thirteen percent of Republicans and independents who lean towards the GOP say they'd likely back Christie, with Sen. Rand Paul of Kentucky and former Arkansas Gov. Mike Huckabee, a 2008 Republican presidential candidate, each at 12%. Perry – who ran for the White House last time around – and Rep. Paul Ryan of Wisconsin – the 2012 GOP vice presidential nominee – are both at 11%.

Christie and Perry have each jumped five percentage points from CNN's last Republican nomination poll, which was conducted in June.

Former Florida Gov. Jeb Bush and Sen. Ted Cruz of Texas are both at 8%, with Sen. Marco Rubio of Florida at 6%, Gov. Scott Walker of Wisconsin at 5% and former Sen. Rick Santorum of Pennsylvania, who battled Romney deep into the 2012 GOP primary calendar, at 3%.

Turnout key in midterms

The poll's release comes with 100 days to go until November's elections. And the biggest question surrounding this year's midterms is how many people will turn out to vote.

The answer is crucial, because a smaller, more typical midterm electorate should favor the Republican Party. That's because single women, and younger and minority voters, who are big supporters of Democrats in presidential election years, tend to cast ballots in smaller numbers in the midterms.

That's the problem facing Democrats this November, as they try to hold onto their 55-45 majority in the Senate (53 Democrats and two independents who caucus with the party). The party is defending 21 of the 36 seats up this year, with half of those Democratic-held seats in red or purple states. In the House, the Democrats need to pick up an extremely challenging 17 Republican held seats to win back the majority from the GOP.

The new CNN poll illustrates the turnout problem for the Democrats.

In the generic ballot question, the Democrats have a four percentage point 48%-44% edge over the Republicans among registered voters. The generic ballot asks respondents to choose between a Democrat or Republican in their congressional district without identifying the candidates.

But when looking only at those who say they voted in the 2010 midterms – when the GOP won back the House thanks to a historic 63-seat pick up and narrowed the Democrats' control of the Senate – Republicans hold a two-point 48%-46% margin.

This version of Total Mail Converter is not registered.

The poll was conducted for CNN by ORC International from July 18-20, with 1,012 adult Americans questioned by telephone. The survey's overall sampling error is plus or minus three percentage points.

New York Post: "How a 'weird' Chelsea Clinton is getting in on the family business"

By Maureen Callahan

July 26, 2014, 11:35 p.m. EDT

In 2012, four years after sort-of-stumping-but-not-really for her mother's presidential campaign, Chelsea Clinton sat down for a lengthy, laudatory profile for Vogue. "Historically, I deliberately tried to lead a private life in the public eye," she said. "And now I am trying to lead a purposefully public life."

Last April, Clinton told Fast Company magazine much the same thing. As she also did with NBC's Brian Williams, who interviewed Clinton after she was hired by the network as a "special correspondent" — albeit one with no journalism experience. Her starting salary: $600,000 a year.

"For most of my life I did deliberately lead a private life and inadvertently led a public life," Clinton said. She was now ready to do us the favor of stepping into the spotlight, prodded by her late grandmother. "[She told me] that being Chelsea Clinton had happened to me, and that I had a responsibility to do something with that asset and opportunity," she told Williams.

Yet for all this talk from a lifelong public person about her recent decision to become a public person, Chelsea Clinton, now 34, remains an enigma. She is the Derek Jeter of the political world, adept at talking coherently while saying nothing. Who she is, what drives her, what she believes in — aside from her family's political primacy — is unknown.

Chelsea has held a series of jobs with sketchy descriptions, her accomplishments vague. She depicts herself as just another New Yorker, going to SoulCycle, taking the train, going to the movies every Sunday — yet she demands a level of obeisance any true New Yorker would find laughable.

"This is my gracious challenge with her," NBC producer Jay Kernis told Vogue. "People in television constantly interrupt each other. But when you are with Chelsea, you really need to allow her to finish. She is not used to being interrupted that way."

She is also, it turns out, not necessarily the future of the Democratic Party. As Daniel Halper reveals in a curiously overlooked chapter from his new book, "Clinton, Inc.: The Audacious Rebuilding of a Political Machine" (Broadside Books), Chelsea is, for good and for ill, very much like her parents.

"The whole way she's approached her emergence," one Clinton aide told Halper, "has been very self-laudatory and kind of selfish."

Another close observer put it more succinctly: "She's weird."

'Nothing seems very authentic'

Chelsea Clinton was born on Feb. 27, 1980, the only child of then-Arkansas Gov. Bill Clinton and his wife, Hillary. From a very early age, her parents trained her to survive the worst of politics.

This version of Total Mail Converter is not registered.

When she was 6 years old, Bill and Hillary sat her down and tried to explain how campaigning worked: Mainly, lots of people would say awful things about her dad.

“Bill said terrible things about himself,” Hillary wrote in “It Takes a Village.” “Like how he was really mean to people and didn’t try to help them.”

Their daughter burst into tears, but the Clintons kept going, saying vile things about themselves — not stopping until Chelsea learned to stop crying.

She was an awkward adolescent when her father was inaugurated in 1993, and her parents insisted that the press leave Chelsea alone. “I really find it hilarious when they make fun of me,” Bill told People magazine weeks after winning the election. “But I think you gotta be pretty insensitive to make fun of an adolescent child . . . We really work hard on making sure that Chelsea doesn’t let other people define her sense of her own self-worth.”

According to Halper’s book, the Clintons overcompensated. She was known among staff as “the royal child,” because she often got whatever she wanted. “If she would ask for something and [her parents] said ‘no,’ she would go behind their backs and go to staff and ask staff to do stuff,” one associate told Halper. “How do you say no to her? She’s the boss’ kid.”

Chelsea, described by Halper as “tip-to-tail her daddy’s little girl,” was devastated by the Lewinsky scandal. When Bill finally confessed to Hillary, she punished him by forcing him to tell all to his teenage daughter. When he learned she read the Starr Report online, he wept.

Aides and associates told Halper that Chelsea’s guilt-ridden parents have since given her everything she asks for — including money for the four-bedroom, 61/2 bath apartment on East 26th Street that she and husband Marc Mezvinsky purchased in 2013 for $10.5 million.

“When you screw a young White House staffer,” a close Clinton source told Halper, “or whatever they did, you’re paying the price for the rest of your life. When your daughter wants to buy a $10 million apartment, the question isn’t, ‘Are you crazy?’ It’s, ‘Where do I wire the money?’”

Such an unusual life, in some ways insulated and in others grotesquely transparent, has contributed to Chelsea’s high-class aimlessness. In 2001, she graduated from Stanford with a degree in history, then got a master’s in international relations from Oxford, and then got a master’s in public health at Columbia. Yet she’s never worked in any of those fields, instead taking vague consulting jobs with six-figure salaries. She’s regarded by many in ClintonWorld as an over-educated dilettante with no practical life experience.

“It bothers the s— out of me that everyone thinks she’s the greatest thing since sliced bread,” one ex-Clinton associate told Halper. “She’s never had a [real] job. She’s been in college for 12 years.”

A friend of Paul Begala’s tells Halper that the longtime Clinton aide and defender actively dislikes Chelsea and thinks her vanilla, good-girl persona is an act.

“Nothing seems very authentic,” another source tells Halper. When Chelsea was campaigning with her mother in 2008, giving speeches and taking audience questions at various stops, she behaved as though she were still that insulated 13-year-old: No questions from the media were taken, not even from a 9-year-old girl reporting for Scholastic.

Her question: Would Bill be a good “First Man”?

“I’m sorry,” Chelsea told the girl. “I don’t talk to the press — and that applies to you, unfortunately — even though I think you’re cute.”

‘Stay here — you’re not a Clinton’

This version of Total Mail Converter is not registered.

Cheslea's distaste for the media did not stop her from looking for a job in the media. "She was basically shopping herself to networks, trying to get the best deal," an ex-Clinton staffer told Halper. "It's just kind of gross."

In 2011, she was hired by NBC News, naively positioning herself as someone whose "Making a Difference" pieces would make a difference — as if that's not the very definition of good journalism. Her fuzzy subjects and anodyne approach were savaged in the press.

Calendar:

Sec. Clinton's upcoming appearances as reported online. Not an official schedule.

· July 29 – Saratoga Springs, NY: Sec. Clinton makes "Hard Choices" book tour stop at Northshire Bookstore (Glens Falls Post-Star)

· August 9 – Water Mill, NY: Sec. Clinton fundraises for the Clinton Foundation at the home of George and Joan Hornig (WSJ)

· August 28 – San Francisco, CA: Sec. Clinton keynotes Nexenta's OpenSDx Summit (BusinessWire)

· September 4 – Las Vegas, NV: Sec. Clinton speaks at the National Clean Energy Summit (Solar Novis Today)

· October 2 – Miami Beach, FL: Sec. Clinton keynotes the CREW Network Convention & Marketplace (CREW Network)

· October 13 – Las Vegas, NV: Sec. Clinton keynotes the UNLV Foundation Annual Dinner (UNLV)

· ~ October 13-16 – San Francisco, CA: Sec. Clinton keynotes salesforce.com Dreamforce conference (salesforce.com)

· December 4 – Boston, MA: Sec. Clinton speaks at the Massachusetts Conference for Women (MCFW)

This version of Total Mail Converter is not registered.

From: "The Washington Post" <email@e.washingtonpost.com>
To: john.podesta@gmail.com
Date: 11/10/2015 1:12:49 AM
Subject: The Daily 202: David Vitter is in trouble

View The Daily 202 on the Web

PowerPost

The Daily 202

Morning intelligence for leaders

Share on Twitter Share on Facebook

David Vitter is in trouble

This version of Total Mail Converter is not registered.

David Vitter leaves the Senate floor (Reuters/Gary Cameron)

BY JAMES HOHMANN

THE BIG IDEA:

— The Louisiana governor's race is becoming a referendum on David Vitter, not Barack Obama, and that's a race that Vitter can't win.

With the runoff just 11 days away, public polls put the Republican senator down anywhere from 11 points to 20 points. Early voting has already started.

Now under heavy fire on TV for his participation in a prostitution ring, something he admitted only elliptically to in 2007, Vitter is up today with a television ad that shows him sitting with his wife and kids around a kitchen table.

"Fifteen years ago, I failed my family but found forgiveness and love," the senior senator says to camera. "I learned that our falls aren't what define us, but rather how we get up, accept responsibility and earn redemption. Now Louisiana has fallen on hard times … And as your governor, I'll get up every day to fight for you." Watch :

This version of Total Mail Converter is not registered.

This comes in response to Democrat John Bel Edwards going on the air over the weekend with the most provocative attack ad of the year. A female narrator notes that Edwards served as an Army Ranger in the 82nd Airborne Division before noting that Vitter missed a 2001 House vote honoring 28 slain soldiers at roughly the same time that he took a call on his cell phone from the D.C. Madam. “David Vitter chose prostitutes over patriots,” a female narrator says. “Now the choice is yours.” Watch :

Vitter got just 23 percent in last month’s jungle primary. [In Louisiana, all the candidates square off on the same ballot and then the top two finishers face each other in a runoff a few weeks later.] Republican Lt. Gov. Jay Dardenne, one of Vitter’s opponents, endorsed the Democrat last week. The other Republican in the race, Scott Angelle, has refused to endorse Vitter and kept a low profile.

Funny: The initial title for the Vitter ad was “Hard Times.” After getting mocked on social media because of the connotations, the campaign changed it on YouTube to “Difficult Times.”

Can Vitter overcome this? Did the hooker attack go too far? Vitter is underwater, viewed more unfavorably than favorably. The redemption play is part of a broader strategy to increase his positives. He needs to get more Republicans to like him in order to win. Comparing the ad to Jack Conway's Aqua Buddha spot against Rand Paul, Republicans call it desperate. Democrats say you can't rest on your lead in a red state like Louisiana and argue that there's a lot of questions Vitter has still never answered about the scandal.

This version of Total Mail Converter is not registered.

To be sure, Vitter has a clear path to victory in the deep-red Pelican State, which hasn't elected a Democrat statewide since 2008. The president remains toxically unpopular in the state (his approval rating is in the low 30s). While Edwards acknowledges voting for Obama, it's a much harder sell to tie him to Obama than it was with Mary Landrieu in last year's Senate race.

One reason Landrieu got crushed so badly last year was that her bottom fell out with whites, especially pro-life Catholics. Exit polls showed that one in five white voters supported her reelection. Edwards, who opposes abortion rights, has been faring well among these voters in the polls. About a third of the electorate could be African-American, which gives Democrats a natural base to build from.

Outgoing Gov. Bobby Jindal is not popular back home, which in theory makes him a drag on Vitter, but it is widely known inside the state just how much the two guys despise each other. That makes it hard for Dems to link them.

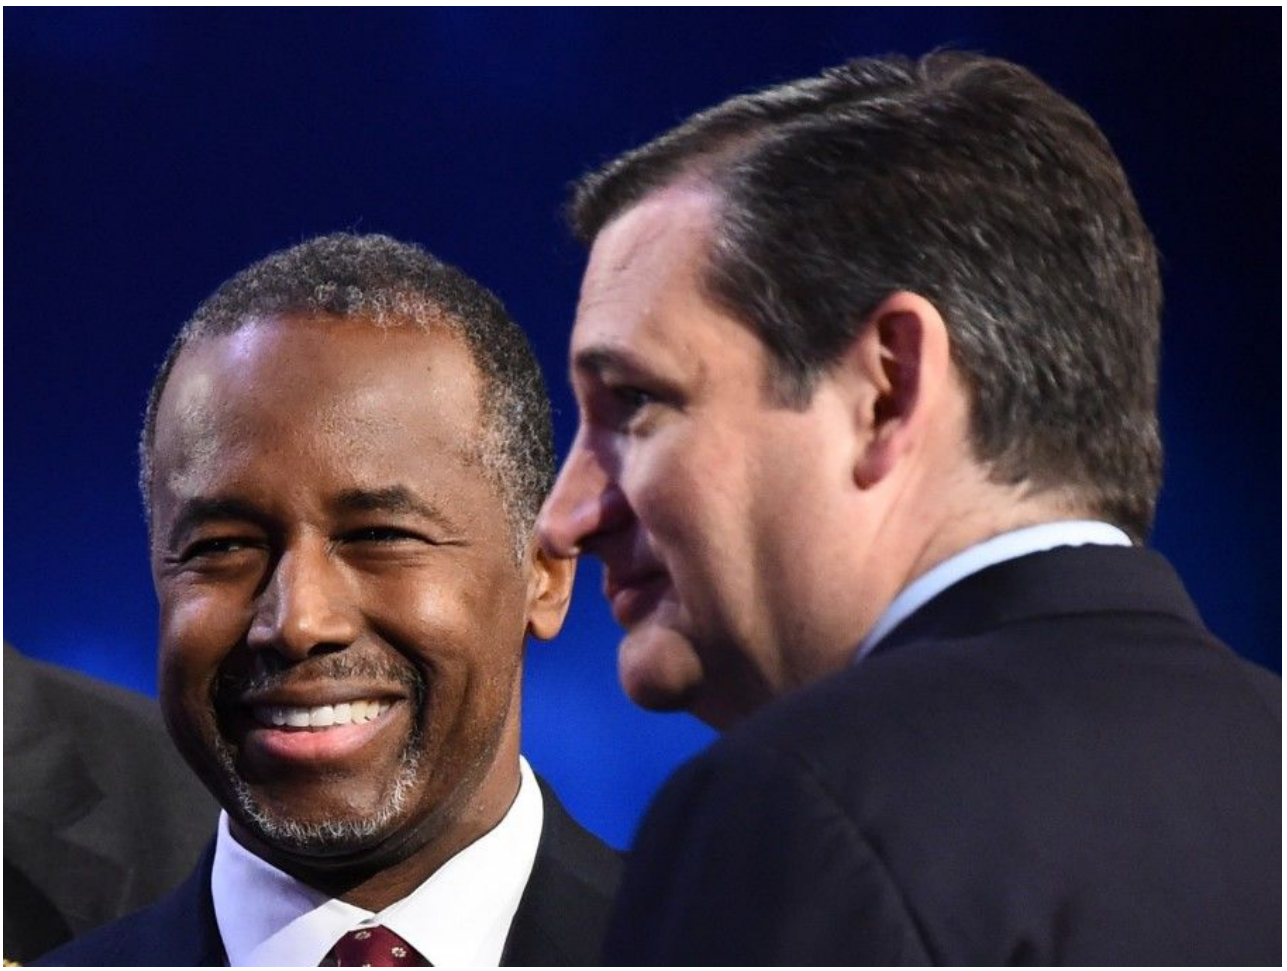
We should still be a little bit cautious about handicapping. The polls were wrong ahead of last week's off-year election in Kentucky. Not a single survey showed Republican Matt Bevin in the lead, yet he won by 9 points. Larry Sabato's outfit, the University of Virginia's Center for Politics , moved the contest yesterday from Leans Republican to Toss-Up. Louisiana State University plays Ole Miss, on the road, at 3:30 the Saturday of the runoff, which could dampen turnout.

A debate tonight could be pivotal. Edwards and Vitter will go at each other mano a mano for the first time. "I believe the gloves will be off," Edwards told the New Orleans Advocate. "It will be entertaining for a lot of folks." You can watch a livestream of the 7 p.m. Central/8 p.m. Eastern debate here .

If Vitter loses next week, there is buzz among Republicans in Louisiana and Washington that he would NOT run for reelection to the Senate in 2016. A loss in the gubernatorial contest would open him up to a serious GOP challenger, and it would be much harder to hit up the donors who have spent this year funding his campaign. Vitter only had $26,216 in his federal campaign account at the end of September.

This version of Total Mail Converter is not registered.

Democratic candidate for governor John Bel Edwards, left, speaks after Republican Lt. Gov. Jay Dardenne, right, announced his endorsement of Edwards last Thursday in Baton Rouge. Dardenne, who ran fourth in the primary, chose Edwards over David Vitter. (AP Photo/Melinda Deslatte)



Welcome to The Daily 202, PowerPost 's morning newsletter. Sign up to receive the newsletter.

With contributions from Michael Smith .

WHILE YOU WERE SLEEPING:

— A federal appeals court ruled last night against President Obama's executive order to shield roughly 5 million illegal immigrants from deportation. The U.S. Appeals Court for the 5th Circuit of New Orleans blocked implementation of Obama's action to allow children who entered the U.S. illegally to stay, and to permit immigrant parents of U.S. citizens to apply for work permits. Immigration advocates hope the administration will appeal quickly to the Supreme Court, in time for a June ruling. (David Nakamura)

This version of Total Mail Converter is not registered.

Ben Carson at the last debate (Robyn Beck/AFP/Getty Images)

–Ben Carson remains the most popular candidate among Republicans, despite persistent questions about his statements, a new Washington Post/ABC News poll reveals this morning. Seventy-one percent of Republicans view Carson favorably, as do 50 percent of Americans. He's followed by Donald Trump, who posted a 68 percent favorability rating among GOPers. But Carson's edge is in how intensely he is liked by GOP voters — 39 percent have a "strongly favorably" view of him compared to 26 percent for Trump. The poll was conducted last Wednesday through Sunday, meaning it didn't capture the tail end of the furor surrounding Carson's biography. Marco Rubio is the only other GOP candidate not underwater with all Americans in terms of how much they like him — 41 to 37 percent. See the toplines here .

This version of Total Mail Converter is not registered.

House Rules Committee Chairman Pete Sessions is among those endorsing Jeb Bush today. (AP Photo/J. Scott Applewhite)

— Jeb Bush rolling out a list of more than 100 Texas endorsements: Among those on the leadership team that the campaign is unveiling this morning are energy billionaire T. Boone Pickens and Dallas developer Ross Perot Jr. On the elected side: Rep. Kay Granger of Fort Worth, Rep. Pete Sessions of Dallas and state House Speaker Joe Straus. Recall that Jeb's son, George P., was elected Land Commissioner last year and his brother, George W., was a two-term governor. The Bush name clearly still commands some degree of loyalty. See the full list here . Watch a pre-debate web video here .

— Coincidentally, Donald Trump announced last night that Katrina Pierson, who unsuccessfully challenged Sessions in a GOP primary last year, will be his new national spokeswoman.

GET SMART FAST:

1. The NSA's bulk collection of phone records was halted three weeks before it was set to expire after a federal district court judge ruled that it is most likely unconstitutional. (Spencer S. Hsu)
2. The University of Missouri's president resigned and the school's chancellor will step down at the end of the year in response to allegations that administrators failed to address issues of racism on campus. The football team's threat to boycott the rest of its season forced the move. (Susan Svrluga)
3. The U.S. high school dropout rate has fallen from 1 million students in 2008 to about 750,000 in 2012. (Emma Brown)

This version of Total Mail Converter is not registered.

4. Chipotle will reopen dozens of locations in the Pacific Northwest after no E.coli bacteria was found in any of the Mexican restaurants thought to be the source of the outbreak that made 40 people ill. (Oregonian)
5. University of Virginia's Phi Kappa Psi fraternity filed a $25 million lawsuit against Rolling Stone magazine over its discredited and retracted story about a gang rape at its house. (T. Rees Shapiro)
6. Russian athletes allegedly used a government-sponsored doping program to improve their results in competition. Some of the country's performances in the 2012 London Olympics are being called into question. (Dave Sheinin and Will Hobson)
7. Two American government contractors were among five killed by a Jordanian police officer who opened fire at a U.S.-backed training center in Amman. (Taylor Luck and William Booth)
8. A 12-member team of House Democrats, after a 10-month review of potential reforms to help revitalize their caucus, decided not to recommend term limits for committee chairs or other changes to the seniority system, largely because such moves would take power away from the Congressional Black Caucus. (Paul Kane)
9. The Supreme Court ruled that a Texas police officer cannot be held liable for fatally shooting a fleeing suspect in a high-speed chase, even though the officer's supervisor ordered him not to shoot. (Robert Barnes)
10. A California state senator introduced legislation to eliminate statutes of limitation for rape cases. (Los Angeles Times)
11. The Navy launched another test missile from a submarine off the coast of Southern California, two days after the first missile launch resulted in UFO conspiracy theories. (LAT)
12. Comcast told 200,000 of its customers to reset their account passwords after the cable giant discovered the subscribers' information was being sold on the black market. (USA Today)
13. SeaWorld is ending its theatrical killer whale show and will replace it with one focused on the animal's natural behavior. (San Diego Union-Tribune)
14. The amount of carbon dioxide in the world's air is now 43 percent higher than pre-industrial levels. (Joby Warrick)

This version of Total Mail Converter is not registered.

Haze shrouds the Musi River as vehicles drive across the Ampera Bridge. Indonesia's forest fires have catapulted the southeast Asian nation to the top of the rankings of the world's worst global warming offenders, with daily emissions exceeding those of China on at least 14 days in the past two months. (Dimas Ardian/Bloomberg)

POWER PLAYERS IN THE NEWS:

1. President Obama will not make special accommodations to allow convicted Israeli spy Jonathan Pollard to travel back to Israel after he is released next week from prison. (Karen DeYoung)
2. Lindsey Graham's first TV ad , running in New Hampshire, stars John McCain saying that the South Carolina senator is the only candidate "prepared to be a commander-in-chief." (Watch)
3. Scott Walker teamed up with Jeb Bush at an event in Waukesha to tout school choice and met privately with Marco Rubio on the sidelines of a fundraiser. The Wisconsin governor said he has no current plans to endorse. (Ed O'Keefe)
4. Donald Trump floated the idea of boycotting Starbucks because of frustration among some social conservatives that the coffee chain's holiday-themed cups lack snowflakes and overt Christmas-themed images. (AP)
5. Rep. Mo Brooks endorsed Ted Cruz and will chair his campaign in Alabama.
6. George Pataki and Jim Gilmore missed the filing deadlines to appear on the Alabama and Arkansas ballots, a sign that they're not actually running real campaigns.

This version of Total Mail Converter is not registered.

Chris Christie in Des Moines on Oct. 31 (Reuters/Brian C. Frank)

Finally, Chris Christie used his veto power to block a string of bills passed by the overwhelmingly Democratic legislature, offending the NAACP, the ACLU and the casino industry all in the same day:

- He vetoed a gun-control bill, which Gabby Giffords lobbied for, designed to prevent convicted domestic abusers from possessing firearms. (Star-Ledger)
- He vetoed a bill allowing early voting and automatically registering people to vote when applying for a driver's license ("motor voter") or other forms of state ID. (Philadelphia Inquirer)
- He rejected an Atlantic City aid package, which would have allowed casinos to suspend $210 million in property taxes. (WSJ)

A Quinnipiac poll out this morning shows Christie snags just 8 percent among New Jersey Republicans in the presidential horserace, placing him 4th among GOP presidential contenders. (Trump leads the pack). And by a 28-point margin, Jersey voters overall want their governor to drop out of the presidential contest.

— THE FOURTH GOP DEBATE IS TONIGHT – The undercard is at 7 p.m. (and lasts one hour) and the main debate starts at 9 p.m. (and lasts two hours). Quick debate preview—

Do facts still matter? Will candidates get away with just making stuff up again? Raising the curtain on tonight's debate in Milwaukee, Jenna Johnson and David A. Fahrenthold note that the outsider candidates are copying Donald Trump in shamelessly and constantly fibbing. "As Trump has become the defining character of this Republican presidential primary contest, the race itself has seemed to take on elements of his personality — in particular, his aggressive, seemingly shameless rejection of the idea that he has ever been wrong. The influence is especially strong in Carly Fiorina and Ben Carson, the two other political outsiders, who have risen in Trump's slipstream. All three will be onstage Tuesday evening for the fourth televised GOP debate. As with Trump, some of these outsiders' most memorable debate moments have come when they uttered statements that turned out to be exaggerated or untrue. And, like Trump, they have played to a distrustful electorate by criticizing the fact-checkers and refusing to acknowledge that any facts were wrong." The story has some great examples.

This version of Total Mail Converter is not registered.

Coming attractions – The New York Times reports that Bush allies, including the super PAC, are threatening to go nuclear on Rubio. Shockingly, one of the issues they might attack him on is abortion. "The cash-rich group aiding Jeb Bush's White House run has filmed a provocative video casting his rival Rubio as ultimately unelectable because of his hard-line stand against abortion," Maggie Haberman and Michael Barbaro report. "That group, which has raised more than $100 million, has asked voters in New Hampshire how they feel about Mr. Rubio's skipping important votes in the Senate. And the group's chief strategist has boasted of his willingness to spend as much as $20 million to damage Rubio's reputation and halt his sudden ascent in the polls, according to three people told of the claim. Seething with anger and alarmed over Rubio's rise, aides to Bush and his allies are privately threatening a wave of scathing attacks on his former protégé in the coming weeks, in a sign of just how anxious they have become about the state of Bush's candidacy."

Rubio campaign manager Terry Sullivan quickly capitalized on the story by e-mailing their fundraising list:

This version of Total Mail Converter is not registered.

iPad 10:56 PM 16%

Inbox (1607)

From: MarcoRubio.com Terry Sullivan Hide

To: Sarah

This is a Joyful Campaign???

Today at 10:45 PM

marcorubio

A NEW AMERICAN CENTURY

Sarah,

A story just broke tonight in the New York Times that revealed Jeb Bush's Super PAC's Plan to attack Marco. They write:

> "The group's chief strategist has boasted of his willingness to spend as much as $20 million to damage Mr. Rubio's reputation and halt his sudden ascent in the polls"

You read that right. Jeb's plan is to spend $20 million dollars to "damage Mr. Rubio's reputation." Not just talk about how they differ on the issues but to actively try to destroy Marco's reputation. And they're bragging about that? How is that the kind of "joyful" campaign that Jeb claimed he wanted to run?!?!

Our campaign is preparing to fight back, but without your immediate support with a donation of $25 or more by clicking right here right now it won't be sufficient.

Jeb Bush helped raise $100 million for this Super PAC. They will outspend us. That's just a fact. Marco didn't inherit a national network of wealthy, well-connected donors.

WAPO HIGHLIGHTS:

Roberts leaves his mark – "Chief Justice favors some when assigning court's major decisions," by Robert Barnes: "John Roberts is a stickler for evenly distributing the workload of the Supreme Court, but he plays favorites among his eight colleagues when assigning the court's most important decisions. Not surprisingly, Roberts calls his own number more than anyone else's and assigns the second-highest number to Anthony

This version of Total Mail Converter is not registered.

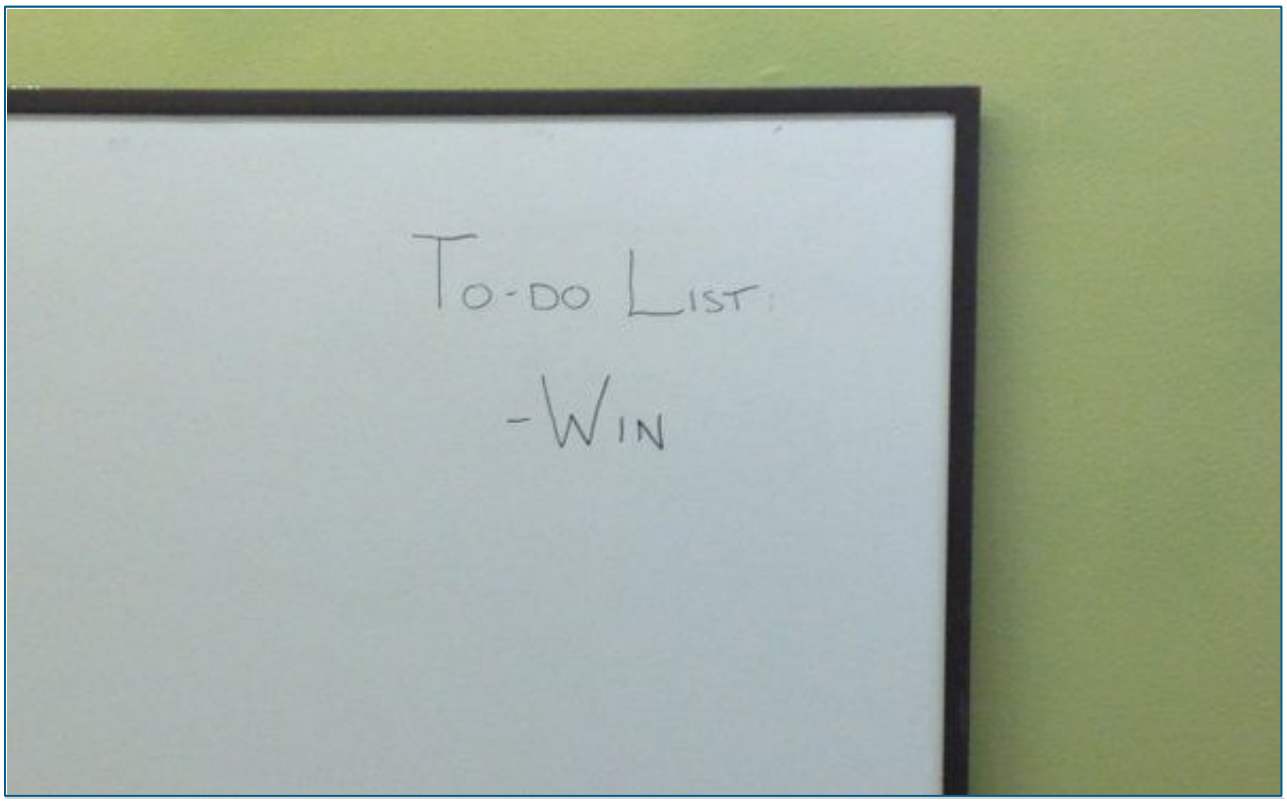
Kennedy, the pivotal justice on the ideologically divided court, according to a new study by Harvard law professor Richard J. Lazarus. On the other hand, Roberts has never assigned Sonia Sotomayor the court's opinion in a major case in her six terms on the court, Lazarus found, an omission that he wrote 'could be a bit portentous.' In looking broadly at the chief justice's 10 years on the job, Lazarus found that Roberts hesitates in assigning big decisions to the court's most conservative and liberal members — Antonin Scalia and Clarence Thomas on the right, and Sotomayor and Ruth Bader Ginsburg on the left."

— "Obama and Netanyahu stress 'shared interests' at White House meeting ," by Steven Mufson and Ruth Eglash: "President Obama and Benjamin Netanyahu met at the White House on Monday, and each said to the other what he most wanted to hear: Netanyahu declared that he still believes in a two-state road to peace, and Obama declared that he remains devoted to Israel's security and nailing down a new military aid package. In a meeting that lasted just over two hours, the two sought to move beyond their rhetorical combat earlier in the year over the Iran nuclear deal. This was the 16th meeting between the two leaders since Obama became president, and it was their first conversation since July, when Obama called Netanyahu to announce the Iran nuclear deal hours after Netanyahu had called it a 'mistake of historic proportions.'"

— "Kentucky's newly insured worry about their health under next governor ," by Amy Goldstein: "It was in Pikeville, Kentucky that Mindy Fleming handed a wad of tissues to Tiffany Coleman when she arrived, sleepless and frantic, with no health insurance and a daughter suffering a 103-degree fever and mysterious pain. An hour later, Coleman had a WellCare card that paid for hospital tests, which found that 4-year-old Alexsis had an unusual bladder problem. Such one-by-one life changes are the ground-level stakes ushered in by the election last week of businessman Matt Bevin as Kentucky's next governor. The second Republican elected to the office in 48 years, he wrapped his campaign around a pledge to dismantle Kynect, the state's response to the federal health-care law. If he follows through, the Bluegrass State would go from being perhaps the nation's premier ACA success story to the first to undo the law's results, razing a state insurance exchange and reversing its considerable expansion of Medicaid."

SOCIAL MEDIA SPEED READ

Curated by Elise Viebeck (@eliseviebeck)



— ZIGNAL VISUAL: Trump and Carson have dominated the chatter in the two weeks since the CNBC debate. Carson has struggled at times under the media klieg lights, while Trump has lost some of the media interest that he had during the summer. And then there's Ted Cruz, who continues to be at the back of the pack when it comes to mentions on television by the mainstream media but remains very strong on social media. Among all GOP presidential candidates, Cruz had just 6 percent of total broadcast mentions but 12 percent of social media mentions. The relative social media strength belies Cruz's outside popularity with the grassroots. His challenge will be turning that online enthusiasm into votes.

This version of Total Mail Converter is not registered.

–Pictures of the day:

Jeb! posted this photo of a to-do list from his Iowa field office:

(@JebBush)

Hillary Clinton supporters packed the halls of the New Hampshire state capitol in Concord as she filed to get on the state's primary ballot :

This version of Total Mail Converter is not registered.

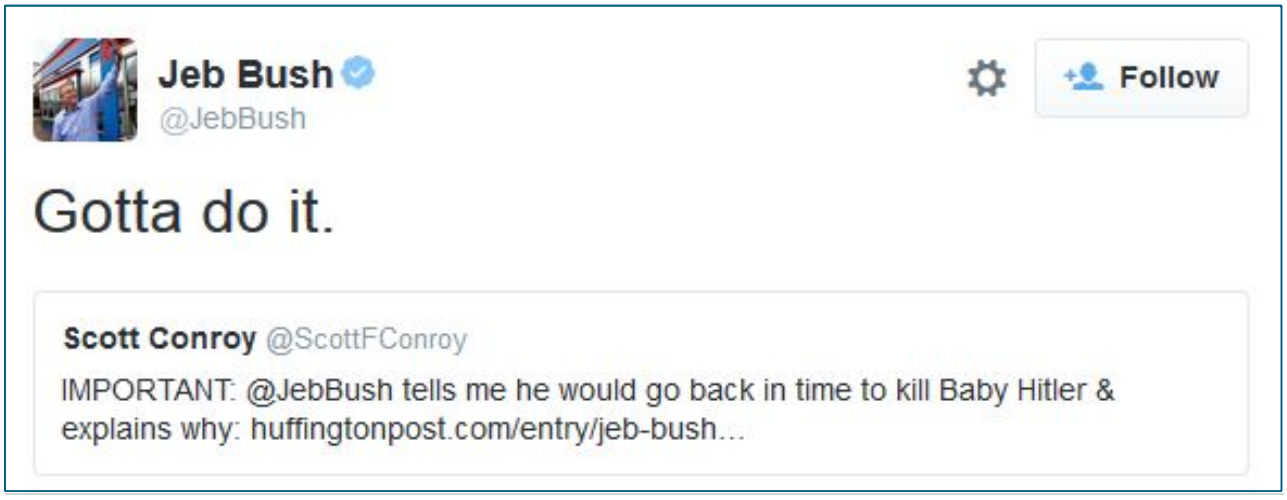
(@McClainJulie)

Rick Santorum is apparently sick ahead of tonight's GOP debate. "If Michael Jordan can have his NBA Finals Flu Game, then I can have my Laryngitis Presidential Debate," he tweeted:

This version of Total Mail Converter is not registered.

(@RickSantorum)

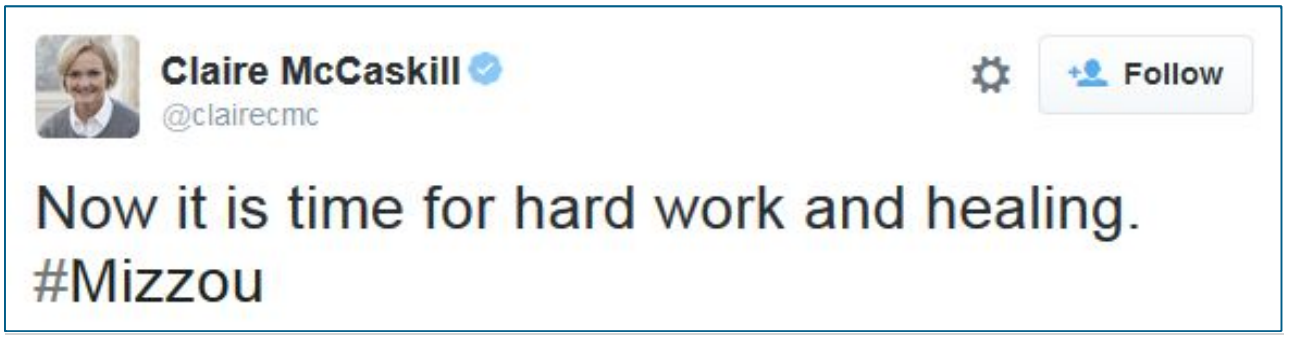
Donald Trump attracted a huge crowd for a rally in Springfield, Ill.:



This version of Total Mail Converter is not registered.

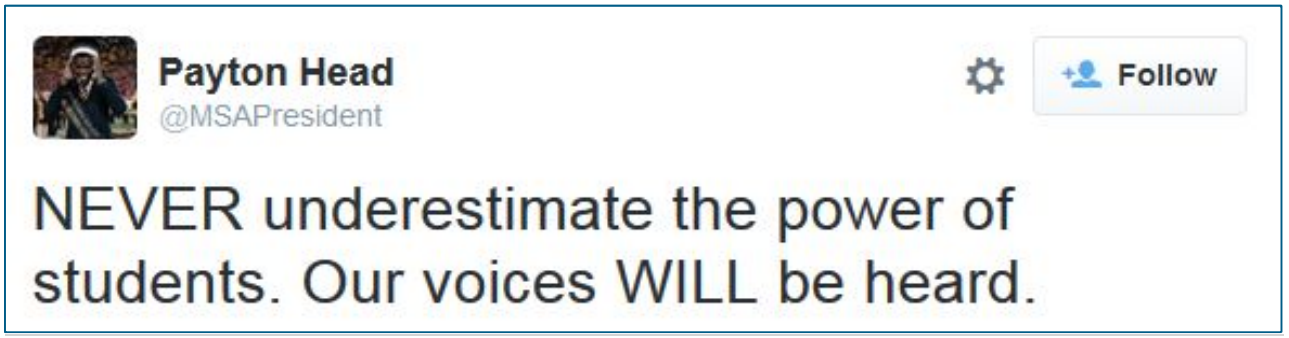
(@wpjenna)

–Tweets of the day:



Not a joke. The Huffington Post asked Jeb: Would you kill Hitler if you could go back in time and murder him as a child? Prudently, the ex-governor noted that there might be a lot of unintended consequences by going back in time to alter history. But he said the answer is still yes.

(@JebBush)



Sen. Claire McCaskill (D-Mo.) called for “healing” at the University of Missouri after President Tim Wolfe’s resignation:

This version of Total Mail Converter is not registered.

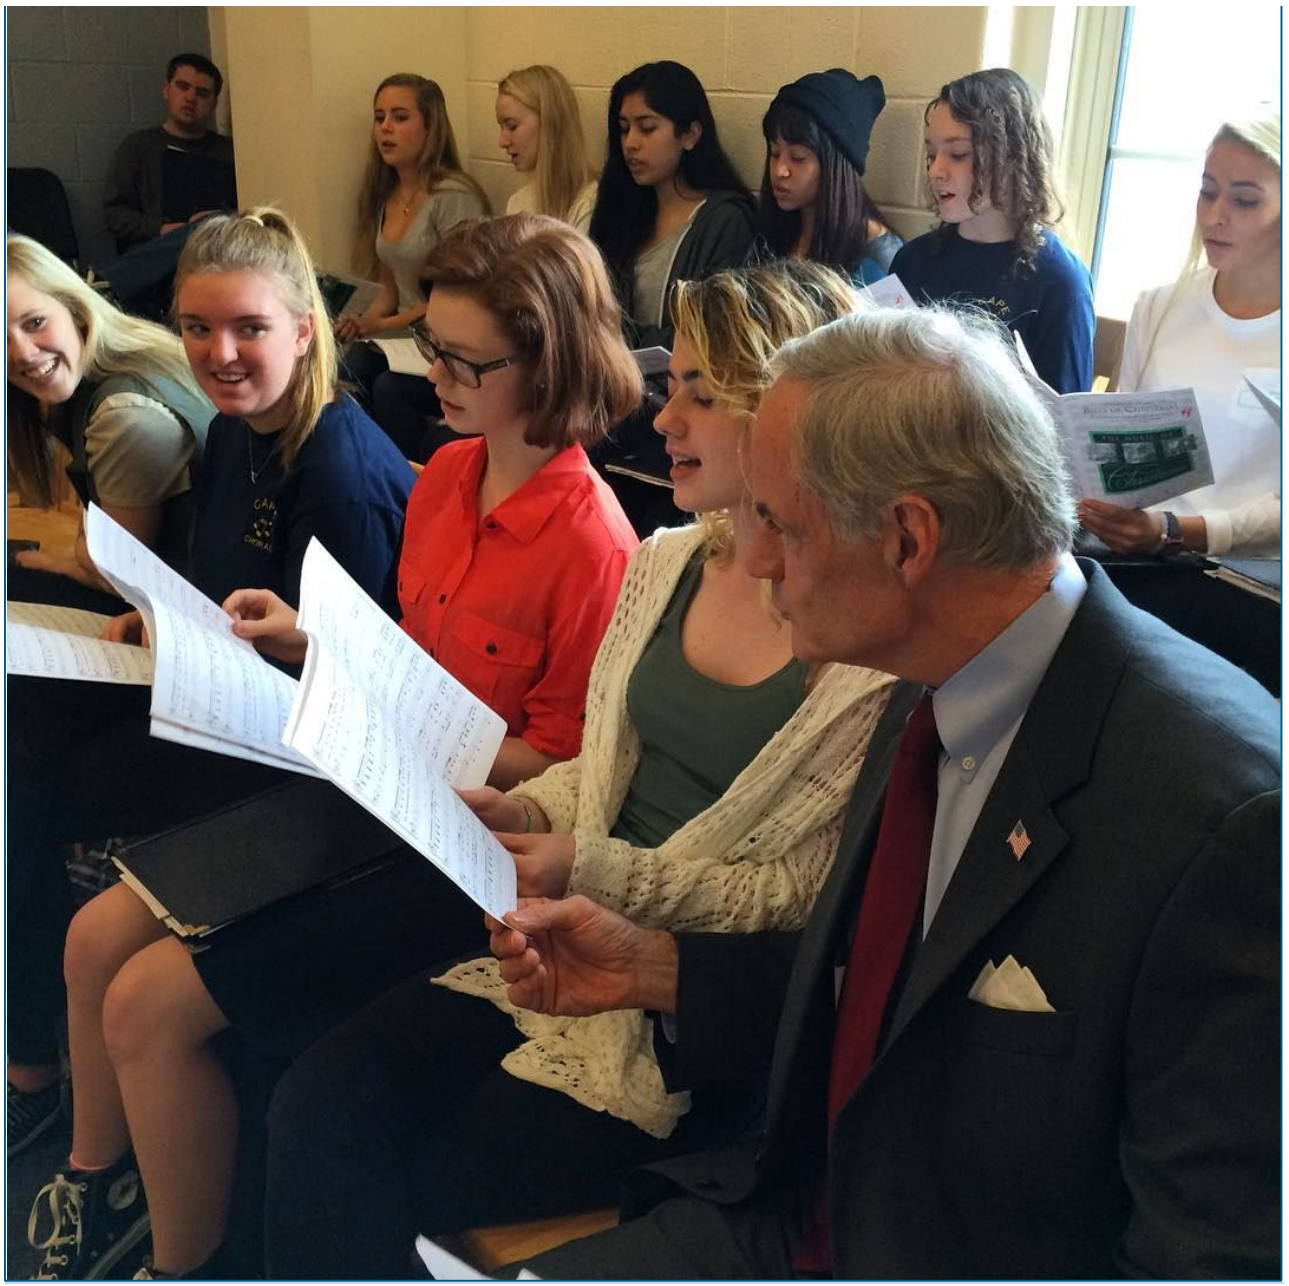
(@clairecmc)

Mizzou Student Body President Payton Head praised his fellow students for their activism:

(@MSAPresident)

Rep. Ed Royce (R-Calif.) celebrated his 30th wedding anniversary:

This version of Total Mail Converter is not registered.



(@RepEdRoyce)

–Instagrams of the day:

Sen. Tom Carper (D-Del.) joined a music class at Cape Henlopen High School in Lewes, Del.:

This version of Total Mail Converter is not registered.

(senatorcarper)

Rep. Ann Wagner (R-Mo.) shared this photo from a duck blind in St. Charles:

This version of Total Mail Converter is not registered.

(repannwagner)

GOOD READS FROM ELSEWHERE:

— New York Times, "Cuban peers dispute Ted Cruz's father's story of fighting for Castro," by Jason Horowitz: "Ted Cruz has said, all he wanted to do was 'fight for liberty' — a yearning that he says was first kindled when he heard his father's tales of fighting as a rebel leader in Cuba in the 1950s, throwing firebombs, running guns and surviving torture. … The elder Mr. Cruz, 76, recalls a vivid moment at a watershed 1956 battle in Santiago de Cuba, when he was with a hero of the revolution, Frank País, just hours before he was killed in combat. In fact, Mr. País was killed seven months later and in a different place and manner. In interviews, Rafael Cruz's former comrades and friends disputed his description of his role in the Cuban resistance. He was a teenager who wrote on walls and marched in the streets, they said — not a rebel leader running guns or blowing up buildings."

This version of Total Mail Converter is not registered.

— New York Times, "Classified report on the CIA's secret prisons is caught in limbo," By Mark Mazzetti and Matt Apuzzo: "A Senate security officer stepped out of the December chill last year and delivered envelopes marked 'Top Secret' to the Pentagon, the C.I.A., the State Department and the Justice Department. Inside each packet was a disc containing a 6,700-page classified report on the C.I.A.'s secret prison program and a letter from Dianne Feinstein, urging officials to read the report. Today, those discs sit untouched in vaults across Washington, still in their original envelopes. The F.B.I. has not retrieved a copy held for it in the Justice Department's safe. … Nearly a year after the Senate released a declassified 500-page summary of the report, the fate of the entire document remains in limbo … the Justice Department has prohibited officials from the government agencies that possess it from even opening the report." They don't want it to become a FOIA-able record…

— Wall Street Journal, "China's soft power exposed: More than a dozen U.S. radio stations turn out to be Beijing mouthpieces," by L. Gordon Crovitz: "American radio listeners might have been surprised last year to hear a news account explaining how pro-democracy protests in Hong Kong 'failed without the support of the people of Hong Kong.' In fact, a large percentage of local residents joined the demonstrations until they were forcibly suppressed under orders from Beijing. Listeners would have been less surprised if the stations had disclosed that the communist government in Beijing controls their content. More than a dozen stations across the U.S. are among a total of 33 globally that operate covertly, with Beijing hiding behind front men. Last week it came to light that Beijing's state-run China Radio International secretly owns 60% of a U.S. company, G&E Studio, which leases stations and airtime in Washington, Philadelphia, Boston and San Francisco, among other cities. … The U.S. government apparently didn't suspect a thing, but the FCC and Justice Department have both now opened investigations."

— Politico, "FBI steps up interviews in Clinton email probe ," by Rachael Bade: "The FBI's recent moves suggest that its inquiry could have evolved from the preliminary fact-finding stage that the agency launches when it receives a credible referral, according to former FBI and DOJ officials … the FBI around early October requested documents from a company involved in the server arrangement after Clinton left State. It also interviewed a former high-ranking policy official at State about the contents of top Clinton aides' emails … Confirmation of the interview and document requests is the first public indication that the agency is moving ahead with its inquiry – and possibly expanding it."

This version of Total Mail Converter is not registered.

HOT ON THE LEFT

Ted Cruz: An atheist 'isn't fit to be' president. From the Huffington Post : Cruz said that he believes anyone who wants to be president must fear God and pray daily. Speaking at the National Religious Liberties Conference in Iowa, Cruz spoke about the persecution of Christians in the U.S. and around the world: "Any president who doesn't begin every day on his knees isn't fit to be commander-in-chief of this country."

HOT ON THE RIGHT

Group: Christians face Middle East purge within a decade. From Fox News : "The dwindling Christian population of the Middle East could vanish completely within a decade unless the global community intervenes, say alarmed aid groups who note that followers of the Bible are being killed, driven from their land or forced to renounce their faith at an unprecedented pace … 'It's an answer that depends on the response of the world,' [said] Edward Clancy, director of outreach for the United Kingdom-based Aid to the Church in Need. 'What response is there going to be toward us if we act?'"

DAYBOOK:

–What's happening today on the campaign trail: Fox Business Network and the Wall Street Journal host the Republican primary debate in Milwaukee. The undercard is at 7 p.m. Eastern and the main event is at 9 p.m. Watch the livestream on FoxBusiness.com. Hillary Clinton campaigns in Derry and Hanover, N.H. Bernie Sanders joines a contract workers strike outside the Capitol.

–On the Hill: The Senate meets at 10 a.m. to resume work on H.R. 2029, the military construction and VA appropriations bill. Later, the chamber is expected to deliver a veto-proof majority on the amended National Defense Authorization Act. The House is in recess. The Republican governor of Iowa, Terry Branstad, and the Democratic Governor of Delaware, Jack Markell are appearing at an event at the Mayflower from 10 a.m. to noon today to call on all the presidential candidates to make elevating the teaching profession the most important education priority in 2016. The governors are helping to launching a new national campaign called TeachStrong, an effort in early primary states and general election swing states to bring together teachers unions and education reformers.

This version of Total Mail Converter is not registered.

–At the White House: President Obama meets with Secretary of Defense Ash Carter. Vice President Biden delivers remarks at an "It's On Us" anti-domestic violence event at Clemson University in South Carolina. Later, Biden holds an "It's On Us" roundtable with students from Morehouse College and Spelman College in Atlanta.

QUOTE OF THE DAY: "Pal, you ain't seen nothing yet." — Mike Huckabee mocks Ben Carson for complaining that he's being scrutinized unfairly

NEWS YOU CAN USE IF YOU LIVE IN D.C.:

— Heavier rains are likely to be off to our east today, but light showers will hang with us in the District for much of the day. "Veterans Day is a Yankee Doodle dandy with a breeze that keeps the flags aflutter but temps are warm enough to keep it pleasant," the Capital Weather Gang forecasts. "Light showers on Thursday are much quicker to get out of our hair. The only drenching this weekend is from the sunshine. The trade off is cooler temps, but perfectly fall-like."

ABC 7 meteorologist Alex Liggitt is the bearer of some bad news:

(@ABC7Alex)

— Metro's new series of rail cars has design flaws, including loose seats and inadequate door bolts, causing the $2 billion project to be delayed by more than three months. (Paul Duggan)

— Virginia wasted $21 million in 2014 on Medicaid benefits for people who no longer qualified, and even allowed people with no income to receive money without

This version of Total Mail Converter is not registered.

trouble. (Laura Vozzella)

— Parking tickets and traffic fines accounted for between 13 and 16 percent of D.C.'s total general fund between 2005 and 2014. (Perry Stein)

— This might make you cry –> "Expecting van of 16, pastor got horrific call ," by Matt Zapotosky, Lynh Bui and Arelis R. Hernandez: "The pastor opened his Bible, preparing to preach to the two dozen faithful on hand. His cellphone rang. And before he had a chance to speak, he had to listen — to someone from the local children's hospital telling him that some of his missing congregants were arriving for medical attention. The worshipers traveling by church van from Georgia Avenue in the District would not make it. A pickup truck had slammed into the van carrying 16 to the Sunday evening service. The crash exploded into fiery wreckage about four miles from the church on Kenilworth Avenue in Prince George's County. Four died, and 13 were injured, including a woman who was eight months pregnant and lost the fetus. 'It was worse than anything I could've thought,' said Santos Jimenez, pastor of the Iglesia Ministerio de Dios Unidos. 'I'm not a man who cries. I'm strong. But I haven't stopped.'"

VIDEOS OF THE DAY:

A Democratic candidate for governor of West Virginia got pulled over by a police officer for going 54 in a 40 zone. During the ensuing back-and-forth, he called the cop a "total lunatic." Then he says, "I want you to explain it to your boss." Read the story from the Charleston Gazette-Mail here . Watch the 90-second dashcam video from 2014:

This version of Total Mail Converter is not registered.

The Senate Republican Conference produced a video of GOP senators who served in uniform thanking other veterans for their service ahead of Veterans Day. Included are Arizona's John McCain, Kansas' Pat Roberts, Georgia's Johnny Isakson, Idaho's Mike Enzi, Alaska's Dan Sullivan, Arkansas' Tom Cotton and Iowa's Joni Ernst:

This version of Total Mail Converter is not registered.

Video of President Obama and Prime Minister Netanyahu in front of the cameras in the Oval Office:

This version of Total Mail Converter is not registered.

(The White House)

Trump spoke with press right after his SNL performance ("I loved it," he told a TMZ camera man of the dancing):

(TMZ)

Just how close is the 2016 election? Not close, BuzzFeed argues:

This version of Total Mail Converter is not registered.

(BuzzFeedVideo)

You are receiving this e-mail because you signed up for the The Daily 202 newsletter or were registered on washingtonpost.com or were invited as a VIP. For additional free newsletters or to manage your newsletters, click here .

We respect your privacy . If you believe that this e-mail has been sent to you in error, or you no longer wish to receive e-mail from The Washington Post, click here . Contact us for help.

©2015 The Washington Post | 1150 15th St NW, Washington, DC 20071

The Washington Post

This version of Total Mail Converter is not registered.

From:	"Joe Biden" <info@barackobama.com>
To:	"John Podesta" <john.podesta@gmail.com>
Date:	1/20/2011 2:08:24 PM
Subject:	Promises Kept

John --

It was two years ago today that Barack and I were sworn in, and I remember what he said like it was this morning:

"The challenges we face are real, they are serious, and they are many. They will not be met easily or in a short span of time. But know this, America: They will be met."

Even then, we knew it would take time. We knew it would be hard. And we knew we would sometimes make mistakes.

But we did not lose sight of what we came to do.

Together, we took on difficult issues that had been put off for decades. And some say we have accomplished more in two years than any administration since Roosevelt's.

Take it from me, that's something you should take to heart -- because none of it would have been possible without your hard work.

But the job's not done.

I am reminded of that every time I travel to the small towns in Pennsylvania, Iowa, New Mexico -- all over -- and on the weekends I get home to Delaware. I meet folks who are still struggling, who want to know when the recovery will start to turn things around for their family.

These people are why we can't quit.

And moving forward with this new Congress, we will need to defend what we've achieved together as aggressively as we pursue the goals that remain.

I believe in the power of public service because I've seen what it has done throughout our country's history to combat social and economic injustice. And I am proud to say it's a story that continues in the remarkable progress we've made in the past two years. To tell it, Organizing for America has written Promises Kept.

Take a look at the Promises Kept report of all the work we've done in two years -- you can download a copy or have a few sent to you to share with friends.

There's a whole lot to be proud of.

Of course, the big ones come to mind first: historic health insurance reform, which is reining in the insurance companies and helping control the cost of care for millions of Americans; Wall Street reform, which put in place the toughest consumer protections ever; and the end of combat operations in Iraq, which brought more than 100,000 troops home.

And there is so much more you've helped achieve that is right now improving lives across the country:

-- We passed the Recovery Act, which saved and created more than 3 million jobs, provided the largest middle-class tax cut in a generation, and made landmark investments in clean energy, infrastructure, and education.

-- We made critical investments in General Motors and Chrysler, saving tens of thousands of jobs -- and perhaps the companies -- and spurring a rebirth of the American car industry.

-- We wrote into law student loan reform and credit card reform, which ended the worst abuses of the banking industries and are making lending fair for American families.

-- We put two new Supreme Court justices on the bench -- Sonia Sotomayor and Elena Kagan, who bring rich and diverse experience to the Court.

-- We have begun to reset America's relationship with the international community, from the ratification of a new START nuclear arms treaty with Russia to tough new sanctions on Iran to strengthening our long-term partnership with a unified Iraq.

-- And we finally repealed "Don't Ask, Don't Tell," which was the right thing to do -- not only because it makes our military stronger at a time when it needs to be the strongest, but because we are seeking that military might with an abiding sense of justice.

Telling the story of the past two years will be critical to the fights ahead. And it's not just the story of this president or this White House -- it's your story.

And it is literally proof that the organizing you do on the ground -- the conversations you have with your friends and neighbors -- is working.

Now, I'm not going to say the last two years were easy -- and I won't tell you the fights ahead are going to get any easier.

But I didn't sign up for a cake walk. And I'm pretty sure you didn't either.

We're here to move our country forward. We're here to lay a new foundation for this country -- for our economy, for our politics, and for our children's and grandchildren's futures.

This version of Total Mail Converter is not registered.

And, as Barack says, what we will be able to accomplish together is in your hands.

It's how hard we all work, and how well we all tell this story.

Take a few minutes to read Promises Kept -- and let's keep moving:

http://my.barackobama.com/PromisesKept

Thanks for everything,

Joe

Paid for by Organizing for America, a project of the Democratic National Committee -- 430 South Capitol Street SE, Washington, D.C. 20003. This communication is not authorized by any candidate or candidate's committee.

This email was sent to: john.podesta@gmail.com

Change Email Address | Unsubscribe

This version of Total Mail Converter is not registered.

From:	"Sandler, Herbert" <hms@sandlerfoundation.org>
To:	"John Podesta" <john.podesta@gmail.com>
Date:	3/31/2014 3:59:19 PM
Subject:	dinner at 6:30pm at my apartment

Dinner at 6:30 at the apartment at 1750 Taylor Street, on Russian Hill, between Broadway and Green

John, it's possible that Steve and Susan will be still at the office, which, as you know is very close to BARDT. I suggest you call Susan on her cell (415)4201338 or Steve, on his cell,(925)3833853, when you leave Berkeley and, if they'll still be there, arrange to meet them in their lobby and Susan will drive you to the apartment. Alternatively, grab a cab at the Hyatt Regency. If a problem, call me and I'll pick you up

This version of Total Mail Converter is not registered.

From: "Gene Karpinski, League of Conservation Voters" <josh_hicks@lcv.org>
To: john.podesta@gmail.com
Date: 10/17/2012 9:49:57 AM
Subject: Quick Election Update: 20 days to go!

LEAGUE OF CONSERVATION VOTERS

Dear John,

You and I have always known that this election was going to be close. And as we enter into the final critical days, the race to the White House and the battle for the Senate remain dangerously tight. As we saw again in last night's debate, the stakes couldn't be higher.

Thanks to your generous support, LCV's campaign team is in full gear in key battlegrounds across the country. We now have 24 full-time organizers deployed in 11 states and we are mobilizing thousands of LCV members to volunteer between now and Election Day. No slowing down until we cross the finish line.

The Washington Post put out a great piece this week highlighting the central role LCV is playing in key races across the country: League of Conservation Voters Spends Heavily on 2012 Campaign. And as you'll see from the update below, environmental champions across the country are counting on us to help close the gap in tight races.

With 20 days until this critical election, LCV Victory Fund is still $350,000 shy of raising the resources we need to run our targeted campaigns at full scale, and any additional support you are able to lend will be very well spent!

With deep appreciation,

Gene

LCV Launches Ad Campaign in Arizona

With a month to go until Election Day, the Arizona Senate race has emerged as a surprisingly competitive race. The Cook Report moved it to a "toss-up" race and the Real Clear Politics average of public polling shows Dr. Richard Carmona only 2.3 points behind Rep. Jeff Flake. The contrast of these two candidates' positions on our issues is as clear as it is in any race, with Rep. Flake earning a dismal 9% lifetime score from LCV.

We just can't let this rare opportunity to elect an environmental champion from Arizona pass us by. This week LCV and Majority PAC launched a new $470,000 television ad campaign against former mining lobbyist and Congressman Jeff Flake for sponsoring legislation that most Arizonans are emphatically against: allowing mining for radioactive uranium near the Grand Canyon and Colorado River, threatening the drinking water of 25 million Americans. The ad, "Dangerous," will air in the Phoenix media market and will run through October 24th. To view the ad, please click here .

LCV turns up the heat on the Flat Earth Five

With your support, LCV launched a new $200,000 television ad campaign against "Flat Earth Five" member Rep. Ann Marie Buerkle (NY-24) for her extreme environmental voting record, and for denying the existence of climate change, which she has called a "myth." The ad, "Support," is airing in the Syracuse media market and will run through October 23rd. To view the ad, please click here .

We also launched a clever billboard campaign targeting each of the members of the "Flat Earth Five" campaign to highlight their extreme, anti-science views on climate change. The billboards , which will stay up in all five Congressional districts through Election Day, are part of LCV's campaign against Rep. Dan Benishek (MI-01), Rep. Ann Marie Buerkle (NY-24), Rep. Dan Lungren (CA-07), Rep. Francisco Canseco (TX-23), and Rep. Joe Walsh (IL-08).

More information about the Flat Earth Five can be found at http://www.lcv.org/flatearthfive .

Join us in New York to honor Robert Redford

We hope you will join us at the League of Conservation Voters' annual New York Dinner on Wednesday, October 24th at Hilton Hotel in New York City. We are thrilled to present the Lifetime Achievement Award to Robert Redford for his exemplary leadership to protect the environment and will also hear from New York Senator Chuck Schumer. It is sure to be a great evening! You can purchase tickets at www.lcv.org/NYDinner or contact Jenna Ebert at (202) 454-4583 or jenna_ebert@lcv.org if you have any questions.

This version of Total Mail Converter is not registered.

GiveGreen*: Because not all money is "green"

With only 20 days to go until Election Day, now is the time to donate as generously as you can to pro-environment political candidates. For environmental voters like yourself, the best giving strategy is to "bundle" your contributions with contributions from others who share your environmental values. Bundling through LCV Action Fund's GiveGreen magnifies the power of your contribution by calling attention to the environmental values that drive you to support the candidate in the first place. LCV Action Fund has already raised and contributed nearly $2 million in support of environmental candidates this cycle. Visit www.givegreen.com today to support LCV Action Fund's featured environmental champions.

Paid for by League of Conservation Voters, www.lcv.org , and not authorized by any candidate or candidate's committee.

Update Your Profile
To Unsubscribe Click Here

1920 L Street, NW Suite 800
Washington, DC 20036
202-785-8683

POWERED BY blackbaud
nonprofit software

This version of Total Mail Converter is not registered.

From:	"Alexandria Phillips" <aphillips@hillaryclinton.com>
To:	"Alexandria Phillips" <aphillips@hillaryclinton.com>
Date:	6/12/2015 12:06:11 AM
Subject:	H4A News Clips 6.12.15
Attachments:	6.12.15 H4A News Clips.docx

H4A News Clips

June 12, 2015

LAST NIGHTS EVENING NEWS

There was no 2016 coverage on any network news program. Instead, news networks continued their coverage of the escaped prisoners. They also discussed new developments related to ISIS and the Middle East, including the US soldier who was killed, as well as U.S. strategy in the region.

LAST NIGHTS EVENING NEWS..... 1

SOCIAL MEDIA..... 4

Hilary Rosen (6/11/15, 9:13 am) - on the @usairways shuttle to NYC. Not a #HillaryClinton staffer in sight. #CheapTranspoIsANewThing..... 5

Buzzfeed News (6/11/15, 9:52 am) - JUST IN: @CNBC reporting that @rupertmurdoch is preparing to step down as CEO from 21st Century Fox http://www.cnbc.com/id/102730161 5

Eli Stokols (6/11/15, 10:10 am) - Jeb say s absent fathers "limit the possibility of young people to live lives of purpose and meaning."..... 5

Benjy Sarlin (6/11/15, 10:17 am) - Asked Jeb Bush about 1995 book bemoaning lack of "shame" towards single motherhood. He said he'd "evolved" but restated importance of issue..... 5

WSJ (6/11/15, 4:08 pm) - Breaking: Twitter CEO Dick Costolo is stepping down July 1 http://wsj.com 5

Bernie Sanders (6/11/15, 5:01 pm) - It's time to declare once and for all: #BlackLiv esMatter — on the streets and on the job. Read my piece in @Medium: http://bernie.to/dream 5

David Drucker (6/11/15, 5:30 pm) - .@tedcruz tells @hughhewitt that his super PACs hav e BANKED $37 million, Interview broadcast this evening..... 5

LAUNCH PREVIEW STORIES..... 5

Story of Hillary Clinton's Mother Forms Emotional Core of Campaign // NYT // Amy Chozick - June 12, 2015 5

Hillary Clinton Plans to Show Her Roots in Rally Speech // WSJ // Laura Meckler – June 11, 2015.. 8

With stories of mother's struggle, Clinton seeks reintroduction in first major campaign speech // AP // Lisa Lerer & Ken Thomas..... 9

Clinton's launch speech to focus on her mother's life // Politico // Annie Karni – June 11, 2015..... 11

Inside the relaunch of Hillary Clinton // Politico Magazine // Glenn Thrush - June 12, 2015 13

Hillary Clinton: "It is your time" // VOX // Jonathan Allen – June 11, 2015 15

Why is Hillary Clinton running for president? She'll answer that at a New York rally // LA Times // Evan Halper – June 11, 2015..... 16

Clinton plans personal kick-off speech, but Democrats want aggressive agenda // WaPo // Philip Rucker & Anne Gearan – June 11, 2015 18

Hillary's rally and rationale: More Rodham, less Clinton // CNN // Jeff Zeleny & Dan Merica – June 11, 2015 21

Hillary Clinton Will Ev oke Roosevelt and Try to Ease Fears on Trust in New York Speech // NYT // Amy Chozick – June 11, 2015 23

This version of Total Mail Converter is not registered.

Hillary Clinton Plans to Re-Introduce Herself to Voters // CBS News // Stephanie Condon – June 11, 2015 26

Hillary Clinton gets personal // MSNBC // Alex Seitz-Wald – June 11, 2015..... 27

Hillary Clinton Will Push Personal Story at Campaign Launch // TIME // Sam Frizell – June 11, 2015 30

At Launch Rally, Hillary Clinton to Tell Americans 'It Is Your Time' // Bloomberg News // Jennifer Epstein – June 11, 2015 31

Hillary Relaunch to Have 'Airport Style Security' // The Weekly Standard // Daniel Halper..... 34

HRC NATIONAL COVERAGE..... 35

Hillary Clinton and Wishful-Thinking Politics // NYT // Brendan Nyhan – June 11, 2015..... 35

Virginia Is Latest Front in Democrats' Voting Rights Battle // NYT // Maggie Haberman – June 11, 2015 36

These 9 words prove that Bill Clinton still doesn't get it on the Clinton Foundation // WaPo // Chris Cillizza – June 11, 2015 37

She won't back down. Or go away. // WaPo // Kent Babb – June 11, 2015..... 38

Clinton's Donor Dominance Not Absolute // WSJ // Peter Nicholas & Laura Meckler – June 11, 2015 45

Inside Hillary's house-party strategy // Politico // Annie Karni – June 11, 2015..... 47

The Real Felony: Denying Prisoners the Right to Vote // The Daily Beast // Barrett Holmes Pitner – June 12, 2015 50

Hillary Rally Vs. the Gun Show at Iowa State Fair // The Weekly Standard // Jeryl Bier – June 11, 2015 52

Hillary Clinton's Truth-O-Meter record // Politifact // Lauren // Carroll – June 11, 2015..... 53

Change she can believe in: Clinton bets voters want more of the same, only better // LA Times // David Lauter – June 11, 2015 55

Hillary Clinton's big bet: Stress toughness, tenacity, Democratic agenda // LA Times // David Lauter – June 11, 2015 59

Centrist Dems wary of Hillary's move to the left // The Hill // Alexander Bolton – June 11, 2015... 62

Hillary Clinton's Economic Inequality Whisperer // National Journal // Eric Garcia – June 12, 2015 64

THE LEGACY TRAP // National Journal // Ronald Brownstein – June 12, 2015..... 66

POLITICAL INSIDERS POLL // National Journal // Sarah Mimms – June 12, 2015..... 68

What Hillary Clinton Can Learn from Michelle Kwan's Figure Skating Career // The New Republic // Elspeth Reeve – June 11, 2015..... 70

With boost from Clinton, efforts to expand v oting access advance // MSNBC // Zachary Toth – June 11, 2015 71

De Blasio say s he will not endorse Hillary Clinton until she clearly opposes Trans-Pacific Partnership // NY Daily News / / Jennifer Fermino – June 11, 2015..... 73

Dem operative Woodhouse says NYT retracted charges of illegality in Clinton email story // Politifact // Jon Greenberg – June 11, 2015 75

Bill Clinton's Labor Secretary Urges Hillary Clinton to Oppose TPP at Kickoff // The Observer // Jullian Jorgensen – June 11, 2015..... 77

Bill Clinton brushes aside foundation criticism // CNN // Dan Merica – June 11, 2015..... 78

'Conversation' with Hillary Clinton? That'll be $2,700 // Daily Mail // AFP - June 12 2015..... 80

Duggan's power now rivals Putin, Bill Clinton jokes // Detroit News Washington Bureau – June 11, 2015 82

Speech inflation: Why Bill Clinton, George W. Bush, and others get massive speaking fees // Fortune // Ben Geier – June 11, 2015 83

Clinton rally coincides with gun show at fairgounds // The Des Moines Register // Josh Hafner – June 11, 2015 84

Hillary Clinton Supports Women's Rights, Gay Rights in "Living History " Instagram Video // E! Entertainment – June 11, 2015 86

Lady Gaga and Tony Bennett to sing for Hillary // NY Post // Emily Smith – June 9, 2015..... 86

This version of Total Mail Converter is not registered.

Quote Of The Day // The Skimm – June 11, 2015..... 87

OTHER DEMOCRATS NATIONAL COVERAGE..... 87

O'MALLEY..... 87

O'Malley: I haven't seen video of pool party brutality // CNN // Alexandra Jaffe & Betsy Klein – June 11, 2015 87

O'Malley touts progressive values, experience, results // Quad City Times // James Lynch – June 11, 2015 88

SANDERS..... 89

Bernie Sanders Demands Hillary Clinton Take Trade Stance 'Right Now' // NYT // Alan Rappeport – June 11, 2015 89

Rival Challenges Clinton to Say Where She Stands on Trade // AP // Ken Thomas – June 11, 2015 90

Bernie Sanders insists his momentum is no fluke // Politico // Jonathan Topaz – June 10, 2015... 91

Bernie Sanders: Hillary Clinton's Silence on Trade Deal 'Offensive' // Bloomberg // Sahil Kapur – June 11, 2015 93

Sanders Explains Obama's Biggest Mistake And What Clinton Is Doing Wrong // Buzzfeed // Evan McMorris-Santoro – June 11, 2015..... 95

Bernie Sanders hires Elizabeth Warren 'draft' director for progressive campaign // The Guardian // Ben Jacobs – June 11, 2015 97

Youth Unemployment and Dr. King's Dream // Medium // Bernie Sanders – June 11, 2015..... 98

Sanders hires key Iowa staff members // The Quad City Times // Ed Tibbetts – June 11, 2015.... 100

Sanders pushes paid vacation legislation // Burlington Free Press // Nicole Gaudiano – June 11, 2015 101

OTHER..... 102

Bayh won't seek Indiana Senate seat // The Hill // Jonathan Easley – June 11, 2015..... 102

GOP..... 103

BUSH..... 103

Wall Street lining up for Jeb Bush campaign fundraiser in New York // WaPo // Matea Gold – June 11, 2015 103

Jeb Bush's legally nonexistent campaign has had a lot of problems // WaPo // Max Ehrenfreund – June 11, 2015 104

In Europe, Jeb Bush sounds like Barack Obama // Politico // Eli Stokols – June 11, 2015..... 105

Sean Hannity scores first Jeb Bush interview // Politico // Hadas Gold – June 11, 2015..... 107

Jeb Bush: 'Putin has changed' since brother George saw his 'soul' // CNN // Tom LoBianco & Dana Bash – June 11, 2015 108

Jeb Bush says view on unwed births 'hasn't changed at all' // MSNBC // Benjy Sarlin – June 11, 2015 111

Jeb Hated Easy Divorce. So Did Hillary. // The Daily Beast // Betsy Woodruff – June 11, 2015.... 112

RUBIO..... 114

Marco Rubio, like a lot of Americans, is terrible with money // WaPo // Jonnelle Marte – June 11, 2015 114

Rubio And Five U.S. Congressmen Voted For Florida's 'Scarlet Letter' Adoption Bill // HuffPo // Laura Bassett – June 11, 2015 116

Is the GOP heartland ready to embrace Marco Rubio? // LA Times // Lisa Mascaro – June 11, 2015 117

Liberals defend Marco Rubio against blistering New York Times attacks // Fox News – June 11, 2015 120

PAUL..... 121

How Rand Paul Has Already Changed the 2016 Race // TIME // Joe Klein – June 11, 2015..... 121

Rand Paul Signs on to Amendment Barring Ground Troops Against ISIS // Bloomberg // David Weigel – June 11, 2015 122

WALKER..... 123

This version of Total Mail Converter is not registered.

Scott Walker Says Supporters Have Suggested Walker-Rubio 2016 Ticket // Bloomberg // John McCormick – June 11, 2015 123

CRUZ 125

Ted Cruz under fire for Tennessee campaign chairman // Politico // Adam Lerner – June 11, 2015 125

Ted Cruz fights GOP approach on Obamacare subsidies // Politico // Manu Raju – June 11, 2015 126

Cruz ramps up attack on ObamaCare // The Hill // Sarah Ferris – June 11, 2015 127

CHRISTIE 128

Chris Christie Lays Out Education Plan // NYT // Nick Corasaniti – June 11, 2015 128

Top Chris Christie Aide Goes to His Political Action Committee // NYT // Maggie Haberman – June 11, 2015 130

Christie: Debt-free college is 'wrong' // Politico // Allie Grasgreen – June 11, 2015 131

Christie slams rival for 'scaring' voters // The Des Moines Register // Jennifer Jacobs – June 11, 2015 131

GRAHAM 132

Sen. Mark Kirk calls Lindsey Graham a 'bro with no ho' // Politico // Nick Gass – June 11, 2015 ... 132

Lindsey Graham Introduces Abortion Bill // RealClearPolitics // Andrew Desiderio – June 11, 2015 133

SANTORUM 134

Rick Santorum, moderate Republican? // CNN // Alexandra Jaffe – June 11, 2015 134

Rick Santorum Says Economic 'Stagnation' Will Help Him Win in 2016 // Bloomberg News // Mark Niquette – June 11, 2015 136

Rick Santorum signs ATR tax pledge // The Washington Times // David Sherfinski – June 11, 2015 136

KASICH 137

Is John Kasich Too Cranky To Be President? // NBC News // Perry Bacon – June 11, 2015 137

CARSON 139

Ben Carson doesn't want to talk about 'the gay issue' // MSNBC // Adam Howard – June 11, 2015 139

Ben Carson's hot mess of a campaign: A predictably dysfunctional mish-mash of fire-breathing rhetoric and insane policy ideas // Salon // Simon Maloy – June 11, 2015 140

Ben Carson: 'The people are frustrated — they're waking up' // The Washington Times // David Sherfinski – June 11, 2015 141

FIORINA 142

Fiorina's campaign-trail attacks leave out her own ties to Clinton // LA Times // Joseph Tanfani – June 11, 2015 142

Carly Fiorina blasts media focus on her Hillary Clinton trolling // The Washington Examiner // Ashe Schow – June 11, 2015 144

OTHER 145

Fox News Adds G.O.P. Candidate Forum Amid Criticism of Debate Plans // NYT // Maggie Haberman 145

The Koch brothers and the Republican Party go to war — with each other // Yahoo News // Jon Ward – June 11, 2015 145

'16 At 30 Thousand // NBC // Carrie Dann & Andrew Rafferty – June 11, ... 152

2015 152

With Clinton bound for Sioux City , GOP piles on // Sioux City Journal // Bret Hayworth – June 11, 2015 153

Republicans release anti-Hillary Clinton ad ahead of her Charleston visit next week // The Post & Carrier // Schuyler Kropf – June 11, 2015 153

Romney Hosting GOP Hopefuls at Utah Retreat // RealClearPolitics // Courtney Such – June 11, 2015 154

TOP NEWS 155

This version of Total Mail Converter is not registered.

DOMESTIC..... 155

Trade Fight Goes to the Wire // WSJ // Siobhan Hughes, Kristina Peterson & William Mauldin – June 11, 2015 155

Democrats block cyber bill, leaving measure in limbo // Politico // Tal Kopan – June 11, 2015.... 158

Dennis Hastert pleads not guilty on all counts // CNN // Chris Frates, Bill Kirkos and Tom LoBianco – June 11, 2015 160

INTERNATIONAL..... 161

Obama Looks at Adding Bases and Troops in Iraq, to Fight ISIS // NYT //Peter Baker, Helene Cooper & Michael r. Gordon – June 11, 2015 161

OPINIONS/EDITORIALS/BLOGS..... 164

Republicans must stop derailing the Benghazi committee // WaPo // Elijah Cummings – June 11, 2015 164

The Battle for the 2016 Middle Ground // WSJ // Daniel Arbess – June 11, 2015..... 166

How Bill Clinton and Teneo duped the State Dept. ethics dummies // Leader & Times // Dick Morris – June 11, 2015 167

SOCIAL MEDIA

Hilary Rosen (6/11/15, 9:13 am) - on the @usairways shuttle to NYC. Not a #HillaryClinton staffer in sight. #CheapTranspoIsANewThing

Buzzfeed News (6/11/15, 9:52 am) - JUST IN: @CNBC reporting that @rupertmurdoch is preparing to step down as CEO from 21st Century Fox http://www.cnbc.com/id/102730161

Eli Stokols (6/11/15, 10:10 am) - Jeb says absent fathers "limit the possibility of young people to live lives of purpose and meaning."

Benjy Sarlin (6/11/15, 10:17 am) - Asked Jeb Bush about 1995 book bemoaning lack of "shame" towards single motherhood. He said he'd "evolved" but restated importance of issue

WSJ (6/11/15, 4:08 pm) - Breaking: Twitter CEO Dick Costolo is stepping down July 1 http://wsj.com

Bernie Sanders (6/11/15, 5:01 pm) - It's time to declare once and for all: #BlackLivesMatter — on the streets and on the job. Read my piece in @Medium: http://bernie.to/dream

David Drucker (6/11/15, 5:30 pm) - .@tedcruz tells @hughhewitt that his super PACs have BANKED $37 million, Interview broadcast this evening.

LAUNCH PREVIEW STORIES

Story of Hillary Clinton's Mother Forms Emotional Core of Campaign // NYT // Amy Chozick - June 12, 2015

Dorothy Howell was 8 years old when her parents sent her away. It was 1927. Her mother and father, who fought violently in the Chicago boardinghouse where the family lived, divorced. Neither was willing to take care of Dorothy or her little sister.

This version of Total Mail Converter is not registered.

So they put the girls on a train to California to live with their grandparents. It did not go well. Her grandmother favored black Victorian dresses and punished the girls for inexplicable infractions, like playing in the yard. (Dorothy was not allowed to leave her room for a year, other than for school, after she went trick-or-treating one Halloween.)

Unable to bear it, Dorothy left her grandparents' home at 14, and became a housekeeper for $3 a week, always hoping to return to Chicago and reconnect with her mother. But when she finally did, a few years later, her mother spurned her again.

It took a long time for Hillary Rodham Clinton to fully understand the story of her mother's devastating childhood. But now, four years after her death, Dorothy's story is forming the emotional foundation of her daughter's campaign for president, and will be a central theme in her big kickoff speech on Saturday.

Sharing that story is a shift for Mrs. Clinton, who in her 2008 campaign was fiercely protective of her mother's privacy and eager to project an image of strength as she sought to become the first female commander in chief. And in this campaign, her mother's story may help address one of Mrs. Clinton's central challenges: convincing voters who feel they already know everything about her that there is, indeed, more to know, and that she is motivated by more than ambition.

"I think for Hillary it's about learning, and her mother's story is just one of the big motivators of who she is," said Ann Lewis, a former senior adviser to Mrs. Clinton. "She couldn't go back and do more for her mother, but she could do more for other children who need protection or who need a better chance."

At the rally on Saturday on New York's Roosevelt Island, the biggest public event so far of her 2016 campaign, Mrs. Clinton will explain how her mother's experience shaped her life and inspired her to be an advocate for children and families at the Children's Defense Fund, and as a first lady, senator and secretary of state.

Given the closeness of their relationship, it is striking that Mrs. Rodham has been such a limited part of Mrs. Clinton's biography.

Dorothy Rodham and her husband, Hugh, moved to Little Rock, Ark., in 1987 to help Mrs. Clinton take care of Chelsea when she was working full time as a lawyer at Rose Law Firm. After Mr. Rodham died in 1993, Mrs. Rodham spent more time at the White House, accompanying the first lady and Chelsea on trips to India, China, Paris and Hawaii. She avoided the spotlight but enjoyed her time in Washington, with movie nights, trips to the zoo and margaritas at the Cactus Cantina.

At the 1996 convention, Mrs. Rodham vouched for her son-in-law, saying in a brief video, "Everybody knows there is only one person in the world who can really tell the truth about a man, and that's his mother-in-law."

But she also berated Mr. Clinton in the midst of the Monica Lewinsky scandal and encouraged Mrs. Clinton to forge her own political career, said several people who worked in the White House at the time.

After Mrs. Clinton was elected to the Senate from New York in 2000, Mrs. Rodham moved to Washington to be closer to her daughter. At one point, mother and daughter shared a two-bedroom apartment while the Clintons' townhouse in Northwest Washington was being renovated to make a larger, private space to accommodate Mrs. Rodham. "Hillary would get home after a long day in the Senate and they'd just sit there and talk about their days," said Patti Solis Doyle, who worked for Mrs. Clinton from 1991 until 2008 and was campaign manager for much of her first presidential run.

This version of Total Mail Converter is not registered.

When she was secretary of state, Mrs. Clinton would return from a trip and plop down on the couch with her mom to hear about the latest twist in “Dancing With the Stars,” her mother’s favorite television show.

Mrs. Clinton plans to spend time talking about her mother in a series of campaign events in early nominating states next week. She wants to highlight not only her mother’s background, but also the people, like teachers, who were kind to Dorothy as a child as a way to pivot to Mrs. Clinton’s philosophy that government and communities need to do their part to lift the middle class.

In her 2014 book, “Hard Choices,” Mrs. Clinton described how one teacher in elementary school, realizing that Dorothy was too poor to buy milk at lunchtime, would buy two cartons herself every day and then say, “Dorothy, I can’t drink this other carton of milk. Would you like it?’ ” The woman who hired her as a teenage housekeeper took an interest in her, urging her to finish high school and giving her clothes. Mrs. Clinton has said these seemingly small gestures showed her mother the presence of goodness in the world, and later made her a caring mother and grandmother.

Talking so extensively about Mrs. Rodham signals an evolution for Mrs. Clinton, from a deeply private, reluctant politician to a 67-year-old candidate who, according to her friends and aides, is running the campaign she wants to run. Mrs. Clinton has spent weeks writing Saturday’s speech, with the help of Dan Schwerin, a longtime aide and director of speechwriting for the campaign.

A sympathetic tale of her mother’s struggles could help Mrs. Clinton convince a struggling middle class that she understands their problems, aides said. A CNN poll released on June 2 showed that 47 percent of voters thought that Mrs. Clinton “cares about people like you,” down from 53 percent last July. Mrs. Clinton’s campaign aides have publicly shrugged off such polls as evidence that voters distrust Washington and politics in general, but privately they are strategizing about how to reframe the conversation.

The idea of incorporating Mrs. Rodham’s story was floated during the 2008 Democratic primaries, when Mrs. Clinton’s advisers tested how Dorothy Rodham resonated with focus groups in Iowa; the response was overwhelmingly positive. But back then Mrs. Clinton was uneasy talking about her mother.

“It would be uncomfortable for any of us to talk about the struggles of any of our family members in such a public way, especially when your family members are living,” Ms. Doyle said. “And Dorothy was a very private person.”

Mrs. Clinton was also fiercely private. When her husband first ran for president in 1992, Mrs. Clinton vehemently shielded Chelsea and her parents from the spotlight. She lost her temper when aides proposed a video of Chelsea, to show that Bill Clinton was a good family man, to be broadcast at the 1992 Democratic National Convention.

Mrs. Rodham died in 2011 at the age of 92. Her daughter has said that one of her mother’s heartbreaks was that she was never able to attend college. After she graduated from high school in California, her mother lured her back to Chicago with a promise that her new husband would pay for tuition. Dorothy dreamed of attending Northwestern University. But it turned out that her mother had lied, and actually wanted her back in Chicago only as a housekeeper. Eventually she found secretarial work.

“I’d hoped so hard that my mother would love me that I had to take the chance and find out,” Mrs. Rodham once said. “When she didn’t, I had nowhere else to go.”

Hillary Clinton Plans to Show Her Roots in Rally Speech // WSJ // Laura Meckler – June 11, 2015

This version of Total Mail Converter is not registered.

Hillary Clinton plans to show how her policy prescriptions are rooted in her family's personal history during the first rally of her presidential campaign, on Saturday.

Mrs. Clinton's speech, to supporters gathering on New York City's Roosevelt Island, will portray her as a fighter who learned to navigate life's challenges from her mother, who was abandoned by her own parents but went on to create a stable, middle-class upbringing for her children.

Aides said Mrs. Clinton will cite her mother's example in explaining that all children need someone in their corner. The story of Mrs. Clinton's mother is meant to address what campaign aides say is the central question in the election-which candidate voters can count on to fight for them.

"She's not a quitter, and you can count on her to grind it out and get the job done," said Jennifer Palmieri, the Clinton campaign communications director, said of Mrs. Clinton. "We think it's important people understand where that conviction comes from."

Mrs. Clinton will use Saturday's rally, before an expected crowd of thousands, in a sense to reintroduce herself to voters. After a long period in public life, Mrs. Clinton is known for controversies ranging from the so-called Whitewater scandal, an Arkansas land deal gone bad, during her husband's terms in the White House to recent issues surrounding her use of a personal email account and server for her government work as secretary of state. Mrs. Clinton will focus on other aspects of her biography-such as her work as a young lawyer on behalf of children-to show that she consistently fights for those needing help.

On Thursday, the Republican National Committee released a TV ad ahead of the Saturday speech saying that Mrs. Clinton has lost public trust. "Hillary Clinton's latest campaign reset won't change a thing," RNC Chairman Reince Priebus said in a statement. "Most people don't think she's trustworthy, and she's still out-of-touch with everyday Americans."

From New York, she'll travel to Iowa for a house party to be simulcast across the state and an organizing event in Des Moines. Visits to the other early voting states of New Hampshire, South Carolina and Nevada will follow.The Saturday rally marks a new phase of Mrs. Clinton's presidential campaign. A candidate for two months, Mrs. Clinton so far has appeared at small events, such as round table policy discussions. For the first time in the race, Mrs. Clinton's husband, former President Bill Clinton, and their daughter, Chelsea, will appear with her on stage.

Each day of next week will have a biographical theme, Ms. Palmieri said. The campaign is also producing a biographical video highlighting Mrs. Clinton's work, starting with her advocacy for children as a young attorney.

Aides said that Mrs. Clinton's approach in reintroducing herself to voters will address concerns expressed in some polls that voters don't find her honest and trustworthy. "We think the question on voters' minds is who can you trust to fight for you?" Ms. Palmieri said.

No new policy details are expected in Saturday's speech, though Mrs. Clinton will mention many of her priorities if elected. They include addressing college affordability and wage stagnation and expanding early childhood education, all topics she's mentioned on the campaign trail already.

So far, Mrs. Clinton has expansively discussed her views on social policy such as immigration, voting rights and gay rights, but she offered few details of her economic plan, such as how to approach Wall Street regulation, how much to raise the minimum wage and whether she would advance a pending Pacific rim trade deal.

This version of Total Mail Converter is not registered.

Aides said Saturday's speech was the not the right venue to flesh out policy details and that more policy details will come in speeches beginning next month.

Despite Mrs. Clinton's long experience in the public eye, her advisers say many people still don't know important parts of her personal history, including the story of her mother, Dorothy Rodham.

Mrs. Rodham's parents divorced, and neither one wanted their two daughters, Mrs. Clinton wrote in her book "Hard Choices," where said her mother's childhood had been marked by "trauma and abandonment."

The Rodham girls were sent to live with grandparents, who Mrs. Clinton described as severe and unloving. After high school, young Dorothy Rodham moved to Chicago in hopes of reconnecting with her mother but was spurned again.

Mrs. Clinton wrote that she learned from her mother to face adversity through perseverance and to "never quit."

With stories of mother's struggle, Clinton seeks reintroduction in first major campaign speech // AP // Lisa Lerer & Ken Thomas

Hillary Rodham Clinton, one of the best-known figures in American politics, will seek to reintroduce herself to voters on Saturday by telling the story of her mother's childhood struggles, pitching her 2016 presidential campaign as a fight on behalf of such everyday Americans.

In the first major speech of her bid for the Democratic nomination, Clinton plans to pay tribute to the hard work of Americans who she'll argue helped the country emerge from the Great Recession, saying they deserve to be rewarded for their sacrifices.

"It is your time," Clinton will say, according to aides who described the speech she'll deliver from New York City's Roosevelt Island.

While Republicans have already spent months seeking to make the 2016 election a referendum on Clinton, her speech aims to present the decision facing voters as more than just an assessment of her career as a former first lady, New York senator and secretary of state.

Instead, her campaign wants to cast the race as a choice about the economic future of the middle class. Among her campaign aides, Clinton refers to the election as a "job interview" and the question before voters as a "hiring decision."

"We think the question is: Can I count on you to be that person who is going to fight for me?" said Jennifer Palmieri, the Clinton campaign's communications director. The speech, Palmieri said, will showcase Clinton's differences with a large, and what she will describe as a monolithic, Republican presidential field.

Her remarks also represent an effort by her campaign to cast off the shadow of scandal that has dogged her over the past several months. Clinton has seen her personal approval ratings drop amid questions about her wealth, use of a private email account and server as secretary of state, and the financial dealings of her family charity.

The emphasis on her late mother, Dorothy Rodham, is a change in course from Clinton's failed White House bid in 2008, when her campaign focused on her experience and toughness, presenting her as an American version of the late British Prime Minister Margaret Thatcher.

This version of Total Mail Converter is not registered.

Rodham died in 2011 after a life that has been described as Dickensian. Abandoned at a young age by her parents, she was sent as an 8-year-old with her 3-year-old sister on a four-day journey to live with strict, unloving grandparents in California. At the age of 14, she left their house to work for three dollars per week as a mother's helper.

She eventually arrived in Chicago, where she married Hugh Rodham, a traveling salesman, and raised Clinton and her two brothers. In her nearly four decades of public life, Clinton has often cited her mother as an inspiration, recounting how she pushed her daughter to stand-up for herself. One of her earliest memories, Clinton has said, is her mother telling her to challenge a neighborhood bully.

"I said, just go out there and show them you're not afraid," Rodham said in a rare 2004 interview with Oprah Winfrey. "And if she does hit you again, which she kept doing, hit her back."

While Rodham largely stayed out of the public eye, Clinton has long credited her mother with giving her a love of learning and a sense of compassion. "She has empathy for other people's unfortunate circumstances," Rodham said of her daughter in a 2007 campaign ad. "I've always admired that because that isn't always true of people."

Clinton will be joined by her husband, former president Bill Clinton, and daughter, Chelsea, at Saturday's rally, marking the first time the family has been seen together in public since Clinton announced her intention to again run for the White House in early April.

After the speech, she'll embark on a tour of early voting states, with events focused on her relationship with her mother, work as a young lawyer on behalf of poor children, and her father's background as a veteran and small businessman.

In the coming weeks, her campaign will begin rolling out specific policy initiatives on issues including college affordability, jobs and the economy. Those policies, campaign aides argue, will help build Democratic enthusiasm for her bid, despite the lack of a serious primary challenge.

"They're a great organizing tool," said Marlon Marshall, Clinton's head of early state strategy.

Clinton's launch speech to focus on her mother's life // Politico // Annie Karni – June 11, 2015

After nearly two and a half decades in the glare of the public spotlight, Hillary Clinton will reintroduce herself on Saturday by highlighting her personal journey marked heavily by the deprivations faced by her own mother.

Starting with the story of her mother's abusive and traumatic childhood, Clinton will explain the role her family played in making her an advocate for other people, campaign officials told POLITICO, previewing the highly touted speech on New York's Roosevelt Island that will set the tone for the rest of her campaign. (Chelsea and Bill Clinton will attend, but Bill Clinton will have no speaking role.)

That personal focus will be driven home by the release, shortly afterwards, of a biographical video about Clinton's career as a fighter for the middle-class, dating back to her work for the Children's Defense Fund after graduating from law school.

While Clinton has often spoken in recent months about her pride in becoming a grandmother, it is another matriarch, Dorothy Rodham, who will be the binding theme in her remarks Saturday.

This version of Total Mail Converter is not registered.

Dorothy Rodham's dysfunctional and abusive parents shipped her off to live with her grandparents in California when she was 8. But the grandparents proved no more capable of caring for a young child. By age 14, Rodham had fled from her grandparents home to live with a family working as a housekeeper earning $3 a week.

It was there that Rodham for the first time saw what a functional family acted like, Clinton will say. And it is her mother's surrogate family, she will say, who first motivated her to be a champion for everyday Americans who need an outside advocate to help them achieve a better life.

"Her story is wanting to be an advocate for other people. Where does it all come from? That's where it all comes from," said communications director Jennifer Palmieri, referring to Dorothy Rodham's story. "We think that's an important thing for people to understand. Some people know it, we think a lot of people don't."

In her memoir, "Living History," Clinton wrote of her mother's tragic childhood: "I thought often of my own mother's neglect and mistreatment at the hands of her parents and grandparents, and how other caring adults filled the emotional void to help her." That is the theme she will strike Saturday.

It's been decades since Clinton lived a life that could be relatable to any of the voters she seeks to represent. Hillary and Bill Clinton together earned more than $30 million since 2014 alone, according to a recent financial disclosure.

But the focus on her mother's childhood and her own middle-class upbringing in suburban Chicago allows Clinton to draw on personal stories relatable to the "everyday Americans" she seeks to represent.

She is also expected to strike an economic populist message in explaining her vision for the country. She will state that prosperity should not be reserved for CEOs and hedge fund managers, but should be available to everyday Americans, according to campaign officials.

Her message to middle-class families struggling to make it: "It is your time."

Clinton is not expected to roll out and detailed policy proposals in the speech, which campaign officials described as the "foundational document" of her campaign. Those detailed policy proposals will begin to be rolled out in July, with her platform on student loans, and continue into the fall.

But Clinton will outline some of the fights she wants to take on, including: college affordability, early childhood education, national security and wages, Palmieri said.

And she will say frame the race as a clear choice for Americans, between Clinton's ideas and the Republicans' top-down economic policies, like lower taxes for the rich and fewer regulations for corporations. On social policies, she will frame the Republican field as out of touch with where the country has moved.

"The question of the campaign is, who is the candidate in the race who understands what my life is like, what the problems are, has solutions and is going to hang in and fight for me everyday and get things done," Palmieri said. "There's not any candidate that's better qualified than her to be that fighter for people."

Clinton, Palmieri said, is still in the process of editing her own speech, and has spent a lot of time figuring out how best to frame her first big-picture pitch to voters.

This version of Total Mail Converter is not registered.

Campaign officials said despite the fact that Clinton has been on the national stage for over two decades, it was important to her and to them to tell her family story again.

“We’re starting from scratch here,” Palmieri said. “We’re going through all the paces and explaining why you’re motivated to have been an advocate in the first place. we think it’s an important part of the process.”

Wonk Warrior

Inside the relaunch of Hillary Clinton // Politico Magazine // Glenn Thrush - June 12, 2015

Hillary Clinton hasn’t always been a profile in political courage, but she’s had her moments. One of them came in late December 2006, a month before Clinton announced her first run for the presidency, as she huddled with her team to discuss policy proposals to differentiate her from two rivals flanking her on the left, Barack Obama and John Edwards.

The conversation, which included former Clinton White House aides like Gene Sperling and Neera Tanden, who still have the candidate’s ear today, bogged down on the biggest, nastiest policy fight of her life, health care. Several of Clinton’s top advisers, the ’90s debacle fresh in everyone’s mind, counseled her to avoid proposing an individual mandate, the politically unpopular requirement that the uninsured buy insurance or face penalties.

When it came to the widely unpopular individual mandate, however, she was adamant about plowing ahead, according to a former aide who related the story.

“If I run for president, I’m going to run on universal health care,” Clinton told the group—and authorized attacks on her Democratic opponent Obama for opposing a mandate (he would eventually embrace it as president, much to Clinton’s amusement).

“What’s the point of running if I’m not going to run on universal health care?” she asked her team.

Eight years later, on the eve of Clinton’s formal campaign kickoff in New York this weekend, the “what’s the point of running?” question looms over the presumptive Democratic front-runner and her campaign. Over the past few months, even some of Clinton’s most fervent and loyal supporters have fretted to me, over and over, that she hasn’t yet articulated a compelling rationale for her second race for the White House beyond the sense that it’s finally her turn and her political view that she’s facing a relatively weak Republican field.

Clinton is no Teddy Kennedy, who suffered the most infamous case of lockjaw in political history when asked why he wanted to be president during the 1980 campaign; Her problem is that she’s far more interested in the how than the why of the presidency, and views her greatest assets as a willingness to engage all participants in a debate and a workmanlike capacity to hammer out policy solutions.

Clinton’s big speech will be a rare opportunity to change that narrative. It will be held at New York’s Roosevelt Island—a none-to-subtle signal that she’s aligning herself with FDR, the boldest of Democratic presidents and the one who established the deepest personal connection with voters—something Clinton has struggled to do throughout her three-decade career. And she’ll do so with a broad progressive agenda, her advisers told me, studded with policy proposals to be unveiled in greater depth in a series of speeches this summer, starting with an ambitious plan to cut student debt and lower tuition and a program to coax corporations into paying their workers more. Clinton’s staff believes this is where the campaign will be won or lost—it will signal to voters, and to ideologically driven Obama donors, that she’s every bit as committed to their cause as Elizabeth Warren or Bernie Sanders—or the Hillary Clinton of 1993 for that matter.

This version of Total Mail Converter is not registered.

This isn't some pro forma exercise for Clinton, who started her professional career working on child welfare programs and sits, poolside, with briefing books when she's on vacation. Policy is what Hillary Clinton lives for, and her team is committed to portray her as a wonk warrior, which has the added virtue of being true. In 2008, the candidate emphasized her inevitability and her toughness (she was obsessed with the idea that male voters would view a woman as a weak potential commander-in-chief), but for 2016, she's building her strategy around a series of domestic policy rollouts.

How she's doing this is equally telling: Advisers told me it was an elaborate, even West Wing-style policy process, with concentric circles of advisers and pollsters who are cooking up a comprehensive economic policy, some of which will be for public consumption, some of which will be employed if she's elected. Over the past year, Clinton has quietly met with a rotating—and sharp-elbowed—cast of Democratic economic experts, pollsters, staffers and advocates to craft a just-so economic program to attack wage stagnation and economic inequality. The very explicit goal has been political: to invent a program for Clinton that captures the popular imagination—and, to no small extent, redefines a candidate with a trustworthiness problem.

"We're talking about three- and four-hour meetings, briefing papers, weeks of back-and-forth," says Clinton's communications director Jennifer Palmieri, who says the candidate will unveil pieces of her agenda, one by one, in a series of events starting in July and stretching to the fall. "This is the foundational work of the election. She's a wonk. This is stuff she loves to do."

What's emerging—and her staff maintains she's made no big decisions on the stickiest subjects, such as whether to propose tax increases and Wall Street regulation—are classic Clinton thread-the-needle proposals, albeit with a slightly sharper needle, pointing unmistakably to the left.

Nobel Laureate Joseph Stiglitz had a one-on-one meeting with Clinton last December to discuss his aggressive progressive agenda, pushing for deep tax cuts against the wealthy and pay cuts for CEOs. She already knew the subject inside out, he told me, and probed him for details on how some of his proposals could be implemented. Like most of the economists and advocates she's met with recently, Stiglitz left satisfied he'd gotten a fair hearing, but with no concrete commitment.

"I would be surprised at this point that she would want to make it clear where she is going on the specifics, so I wouldn't expect to hear that from her anytime soon," said Stiglitz, who worked on Bill Clinton's economic team—then went on to become one of the country's most influential champions of economic equality. "My sense was that she was very responsive to the overall agenda. … It's important for her to get elected, but we want to make sure that she understands that we have to deal with the failure of the system overall, and not just make small changes."

The goal, according to a dozen people close to the process who spoke to POLITICO, is to find the "sweet spot"—bold solutions that aren't too bold. She has tasked her small in-house policy team led by former State Department aide Jake Sullivan with a pragmatic mission: Attack the biggest problems—higher education debt, a tax system that encourages short-term gain over long-tern investments, out-of-control CEO pay, crumbling infrastructure, the non-job-security "gig" economy, women's pay equity—in a way that satisfies a restive left wing of the party. But do it without needlessly alienating general election voters, or potential donors.

"She wants to do just enough," is how one New York-based Clinton donor who speaks to both Clintons regularly put it.

***

As important—and complex—as the health care debate was seven years ago when Clinton last ran for president, it's dwarfed today by the sheer magnitude of the structural problems in the American economy, a sapping of dynamism and middle-income purchasing power that has given consumers (and voters) a permanent sense of the blahs, even as big banks and corporations book record profits.

This version of Total Mail Converter is not registered.

Hillary Clinton: "It is your time" // VOX // Jonathan Allen – June 11, 2015

Trying to shed an image of elitism, Hillary Clinton will deliver a concise message for the masses during her first big campaign rally Saturday: "It is your time."

The 2016 Democratic presidential frontrunner is scheduled to speak at Four Freedoms Park on New York's Roosevelt Island, a site that offers the symbolism of linking herself to Franklin Roosevelt, the well-to-do president whose New Deal social programs provided work and financial security for Americans during and after the Great Depression.

The Clinton campaign on Thursday released a basic sketch of the themes of her speech, which is being billed as the formal announcement of a campaign that began two months ago. Since then, she has focused on raising money and meeting with voters in small groups in early primary states.

Now Clinton is ready to articulate her motivation for seeking the presidency, her vision for the country, and the contrast she will draw with her Republican rivals for the job, according to her campaign. The last point, which will be driven by a populist argument that Republican policies benefit those in the top economic strata, connects to Clinton's main theme: She wants to be the champion for what she calls "everyday Americans."

Her mother's example

She will also lean heavily on the story of her late mother to explain her rationale for public service and seeking the presidency, a choice that appears to reflect her desire to talk more about her personal life — and about her gender — in this campaign than she did in her failed 2008 bid.

"She is a well-known figure, but when you're asking the American people to support you as president, even if it is for the second time, there is no skipping of steps. If you want to understand Hillary Clinton, and what has motivated her career of fighting for kids and families, her mother is a big part of the story," Clinton campaign communications director Jennifer Palmieri said in a statement. "The example she learned from her mother's story is critical to knowing what motivated Hillary Clinton to first get involved in public service, and why people can count on her to fight for them and their families now."

Her campaign also revealed that she will use a video to show biographical highlights of her career.

Clinton advisers have said the speech will provide the basic architecture for specific policies she intends to detail over the course of the summer, but her campaign did not offer any insight into what exactly she will say about her platform on Saturday.

Why is Hillary Clinton running for president? She'll answer that at a New York rally // LA Times // Evan Halper – June 11, 2015

llary Rodham Clinton will forcefully lay out her motivation for running for president during a major rally in New York on Saturday, campaign officials say, drawing from her personal story to frame the theme of a White House run that some Democrats worry has lacked in inspiration.

In her formal announcement speech at Four Freedoms Park, on a small city island named after Franklin D.

This version of Total Mail Converter is not registered.

Roosevelt, Clinton will talk about how the tough childhood experiences of her mother drove her to enter public service. She will seek to dispel the notion that she is running because it is her turn to inherit the Democratic nomination and offer instead a personal, detailed biographical sketch that campaign advisors say will make a compelling case for why the White House is her calling.

The speech will be Clinton's most expansive since she announced her candidacy in April, and it provides an opportunity to reboot a campaign that is way ahead in the polls but has yet to spark the kind of enthusiasm among the grass roots that twice carried Barack Obama to victory. Advisors have been working on the address for weeks. They are seeking to replicate for Clinton the kind of response Obama triggered with his 2007 kickoff address in Springfield, Ill., where he presented himself as an agent of change and hope.

"This is an important foundational moment for the campaign," said Jennifer Palmieri, Clinton's communications director. "If she wins, this is how she will govern. ... She has been working on this for a while."

The absence of any formidable opponent has allowed Clinton to run a cautious campaign, sticking to boilerplate Democratic issues and mostly avoiding answering questions from the media. Campaign officials say her approach will change as she moves into this new phase of her run. The roundtables with handpicked audiences will soon be accompanied on the calendar by larger, unscripted events such as town halls and news conferences.

But like everything else in the Clinton campaign, Saturday's speech will be carefully crafted. The setting is notable for its associations with Clinton's own background. New York was where she launched her political career, serving the state as a U.S. senator. Roosevelt Island is, of course, named for the architect of the New Deal, and Clinton's messaging – if not her actual policy proposals – borrows heavily from the time.

"She will talk about the principles behind FDR's policies that continue to be true to the Democratic Party," Palmieri said. "He is someone that she has admired and been inspired by."

Some parts of the speech that campaign officials previewed Thursday, in fact, could just as easily have come from Vermont Sen. Bernie Sanders, the self-described democratic socialist who is also running for the nomination, albeit as a major underdog to Clinton. She will say that hedge fund managers and bankers need to take more responsibility for the welfare of the country, ostensibly by contributing more of their earnings to government. She will herald "everyday Americans" for making sacrifices that mended the national economy and proclaim it is their turn to be rewarded, announcing, "It is your time."

Clinton will be accompanied in New York by her husband, former President Clinton, and their daughter, Chelsea. It will be the first time the family has appeared together at a campaign event since Clinton announced her run.

The candidate was notably absent from another major family event this week, the annual gathering of the Clinton Global Initiative in Denver. It's part of the family's foundation, which has been a source of relentless negative press for Clinton of late, as reporters investigate the millions of dollars in donations it received from foreigners with business interests in America while she was secretary of State.

Hillary Clinton attacks Republicans over voting restrictions

Saturday's rally will be followed by a whirlwind of events in early caucus and primary states. Clinton will be in Iowa by nightfall on Saturday, in New Hampshire on Monday and then off to campaign events in South Carolina and Nevada by the middle of next week. Clinton will tease some of the big policy proposals the campaign will unveil over the summer.

Whether the speech will live up to the billing of campaign officials as an event that will give voters a personal connection to Clinton remains to be seen – many of the proclamations Clinton intends to make in it seem a mere amplification of points she has been raising already in more intimate settings.

This version of Total Mail Converter is not registered.

But the goal is to supplant what voters may think they know about Clinton's personal story with a more textured portrait to which they can relate and find inspiration in.

"People know she is a fighter who does not quit and hangs in there," Palmieri said. "It is important that they understand where this comes from. ... She has been on the national stage for a long time, but we think there is a lot to fill in. When you are asking people to put their faith in you to be their president, it is a big ask."

Clinton will talk in detail about her mother, the late Dorothy Rodham, who was abandoned as a child, sent to California to live with harsh and unloving grandparents, and found redemption in her early teen years through the kindness of an employer who provided cheap room and board and encouraged her to finish high school.

"Clinton will discuss how her mother shaped the person she is today and why she could not duck away from this fight," said a preview from the campaign. Clinton will attribute her "fighter's instinct" to her mother, according to the campaign, as well as her belief that "everyone needs a champion."

The speech will be accompanied by a major social media push, centered on a video the campaign is producing about the "fights Hillary Clinton has taken on during her career."

Clinton plans personal kick-off speech, but Democrats want aggressive agenda // WaPo // Philip Rucker & Anne Gearan – June 11, 2015

Democratic activists have been hungry for their presidential front-runner to articulate a detailed and aggressive path forward on issues ranging from the economy to the environment to gay rights.

Hillary Rodham Clinton will begin her effort to meet those expectations on Saturday when she formally kicks off her 2016 campaign with a major speech in New York City.

At an outdoor rally on Roosevelt Island, Clinton will cloak her candidacy in the symbolism of Franklin Delano Roosevelt and the New Deal as she offers her rationale for running and her vision for a more activist federal government.

But Clinton is not planning to offer specific policy prescriptions — at least not yet. Instead, her advisers said Thursday, she will speak about her upbringing as the daughter of a woman who was abandoned as a child and why she sees herself as an advocate for those left behind in a fast-changing economy. She also intends to draw contrasts with Republicans, portraying them as champions of corporations and the super-rich.

"It's a big speech, but it's not the venue to do a lot of specifics on individual pieces of policy," said Jennifer Palmieri, the Clinton campaign's communications director. "The speech is the cornerstone of the campaign — that's how she looks at this. It's the foundation from which you run the rest of the campaign, and if she is elected president it's the foundation of how you govern."

"She can't just be a tribune of the Democrats," said Robert Reich, a liberal economist who served as labor secretary in former president Bill Clinton's administration. "It would be useful for her to make a very strong economic statement about why inequality is eating away at our economy, our democracy and the moral fabric of the country."

This version of Total Mail Converter is not registered.

Clinton's speech comes amid an intense debate on Capitol Hill over an Obama-backed trade bill that has divided Democrats. Clinton, who as secretary of state was involved in negotiating the trade deal, so far has been careful not to take a position — much to the chagrin of labor unions and liberal leaders, who are pressuring her to oppose it.

New York Mayor Bill de Blasio (D) — who was campaign manager on Clinton's 2000 Senate run but has not yet endorsed his former boss — said he wants to see her make "a very clear statement that this trade deal should be opposed and should be stopped."

Otherwise, De Blasio suggested, she could jeopardize the support of working-class voters in places like Ohio and Pennsylvania who were central to her 2008 campaign. "I think it's very important that she speak up and say there will be no more NAFTA's," he said, referring to the controversial North American Free Trade Agreement of the 1990s.

It is unclear whether Clinton intends to mention trade. Her campaign aides previewed a markedly personal address framed around the wrenching story of her late mother, Dorothy Rodham, who was abandoned and mistreated as a child and whom Clinton has credited with giving her lessons of hope and perseverance.

The heavy emphasis on Clinton's personal story is part of a rebranding strategy to humanize a candidate who sometimes comes across as chilly and aloof. Her husband, Bill, and their daughter, Chelsea, plan to appear with her on Roosevelt Island — their first appearance of the campaign.

Shortly after the speech, Clinton's campaign will release a biographical video that casts the candidate as a fighter and advocate, dating to the earliest days of her adult life.

"The speech is about her — what I think is the diagnosis of the problems in the country, this is my vision of where I want to take the country, here are my solutions," Palmieri said.

Clinton's solutions, however, will not come until later this summer and fall when she gives a series of policy speeches.

Across the Democratic coalition, expectations for Saturday's event vary. Behind the scenes, environmentalists have been pressing Clinton aides to ensure she prioritizes global warming in her remarks and signal she would be more aggressive than Obama in tackling greenhouse gas emissions.

"We believe this speech is a great opportunity for her to make crystal clear that she cares deeply about addressing climate change and will make it a top priority throughout her campaign," said Tiernan Sittenfeld, senior vice president for government affairs at League of Conservation Voters.

Gay rights activists hope Clinton champions priorities beyond legalizing same-sex marriage, such as passing comprehensive federal non-discrimination legislation.

"It would benefit her and it would certainly benefit members of our community to see her dedicate herself and be on the record about her commitment to a more inclusive America for all of its people," said Fred Sainz, a vice president at the Human Rights Campaign.

This version of Total Mail Converter is not registered.

Meanwhile, economic progressives, many of whom tried unsuccessfully to draft Sen. Elizabeth Warren (D-Mass.) into the race, want to see Clinton address economic inequality with specific solutions. Will she call for busting up the big banks? Raising taxes on the wealthiest Americans? Closing the carried interest tax loophole that benefits hedge fund managers? Tougher anti-trust regulations?

“I would love to see some specifics — expanding Social Security, debt-free college, holding Wall Street accountable,” said Charles Chamberlain, executive director of Democracy for America, an advocacy group that grew out of former Vermont governor Howard Dean’s 2004 presidential campaign. “But I don’t want to make it sound like there’s a menu and she just needs to go down and check the boxes. The key is we want to see a real fighter out there.”

Some activists likened it to the president’s annual “State of the Union” address, in which each interest group hopes the speech touches on its priorities. But many acknowledged, as American Federation of Teachers president Randi Weingarten put it, that the speech will be about “values and aspiration” rather than a policy agenda.

“As always happens with anything involving the Clintons, people spend a lot of time thinking about what are they going to do, what are they going to say, but as important a speech as it is, this is one speech,” said Weingarten, who is a Clinton ally, although AFT has not yet made its endorsement.

Matt Bennett, a veteran of past Democratic presidential campaigns, said Clinton is smart to put off her policy plans. Otherwise, she would give her opponents targets.

“She’s being bombarded with people seeking space in her speech for their wool and mohair subsidies or their piece of the action, but we think it would be unwise for her to go too deep into the details,” said Bennett, a senior vice president at Third Way. “She will be pecked to death by ducks for the next 18 months if she does that.”

In the first two months of her campaign, Clinton has given important speeches on three policy matters — immigration, criminal justice and voting rights. But she has said relatively little about the issue many Democrats see as shaping the 2016 election: the structure of the economy.

“She’s got to take this on,” Reich said. “She said when she launched her campaign that ‘the deck is still stacked in favor of those at the top.’ She’s got to tell us what she’s going to do to un-stack the deck.”

Hillary's rally and rationale: More Rodham, less Clinton // CNN // Jeff Zeleny & Dan Merica – June 11, 2015

When Hillary Clinton sweeps onto the stage Saturday for the first major rally of her campaign, she will set aside her family's presidential legacy and concentrate on a chapter of her life she rarely speaks about: the Depression-era story of her mother, Dorothy Rodham.

As she seeks to present herself as a candidate who will fight for the middle class, aides say Clinton will turn to lessons learned from her mother, who was abandoned by her parents as a child and was forced to bring herself up. She will argue that her Rodham roots have made her the person she is today, a subtle concession the power of the Clinton legacy alone will not carry her into the White House.

"She is a well-known figure but when you're asking the American people to support you as president, even if it is for the second time, there is no skipping of steps," said Jennifer Palmieri, the campaign's communications director. "If you want to understand Hillary Clinton, and what has motivated her career of fighting for kids and families, her mother is a big part of the story."

This version of Total Mail Converter is not registered.

The rally on Saturday at Roosevelt Island in New York, which will be awash in symbolism of Franklin and Eleanor Roosevelt, offers a moment for Clinton to reset her candidacy. She intends to offer a more expansive rationale for why she believes she should be president, an argument that some Democrats believe she and her campaign have failed to clearly articulate.

That was among the conversations at a dinner Clinton attended early last week at the home of Sen. Dianne Feinstein in Washington, where several other Democratic women senators gathered for an intimate discussion about her candidacy.

They urged Clinton to present herself as more of a fighter, participants said, who is passionate about improving the plight of everyday Americans.

Two months after she launched her candidacy, Clinton remains in command of the Democratic nominating fight. Yet she has struggled to rally excitement among some liberals in her party.

It's an open question whether there will be enough substance to satisfy critics who have said Clinton has been short on specifics, particularly on trade and other liberal priorities.

While the calls for Sen. Elizabeth Warren to enter the race have cooled, the long lines of Democrats waiting to see Sen. Bernie Sanders on the campaign trail underscore that she cannot take anything for granted.

The opening chapter of her second presidential bid has been far rockier than she and her advisers expected, more than a dozen Democrats close to the campaign told CNN this week. She enters the summer facing far more questions about her long-term prospects than when she first jumped into the race.

A CNN/ORC poll last week found that 57% of Americans thought Clinton was not honest and trustworthy, which was up from 49% in March. And less than half of people feel she cares about people like them, 47%, which is down from 53% last July.

Campaign aides familiar with the speech on Saturday say Clinton's chief goal will be to outline her rationale for running, providing voters with a reason to elect her and responding to those who have said her run is based on nothing more than inevitability.

The entire day will focus on Clinton, aides said. Although both Bill and Chelsea Clinton will attend -- the first time either will appear at a campaign event -- they will not be the focus and will likely not speak.

The speech will be centered around the story of Rodham, aides said, far more than the legacy of Clinton.

"The example she learned from her mother's story is critical to knowing what motivated Hillary Clinton to first get involved in public service," Palmieri said on Thursday. "And why people can count on her to fight for them and their families now."

Clinton's speech will not be a detailed policy rollout. Instead, the former secretary of state will preview a list of critical policy issues, aides said, but will wait until later in the summer to outline the details of each policy proposal.

Aides said that Clinton's speech will be a mix of her biography and vision, with the former first lady arguing that the guiding principle in her campaign will be how America's families are doing, not those at the top. Clinton will repeatedly use the phrase "it is your time," aides said, to hammer home that Americans who help bring the country back from recession now deserve to enjoy the benefits.

This version of Total Mail Converter is not registered.

Campaign aides are producing a biographical video documenting different points in Clinton's career, including her work as a lawyer for the Children's Defense Fund. The Clinton campaign used Hillary Clinton's Twitter account to tease the video that is expected to be released after Saturday's rally.

And Clinton's speech, of course, will not be without partisan politics. Aides said she will argue Republicans are a repeat of their predecessors and will ensure voters that she will offer a clear choice in 2016.

While the first two months of her candidacy have been intentionally downsized -- small roundtable conversations over big rallies -- Clinton has spent considerable time appearing before small groups of donors.

Clinton has personally headlined 37 fundraisers in 13 states. It is likely, given the attendance of each event, that more than $16 million has been raised from Clinton-headlined fundraisers. Her top aides and operatives have headlined dozens more.

Clinton aides have said they hope to raise $100 million by the end of 2015.

In the weeks after her campaign kickoff, CNN has learned, Clinton will headline four more fundraisers in California, three in Massachusetts and one in Indiana, Minnesota, Missouri, Illinois, Pennsylvania, New York and New Hampshire. Before June 30, the final day of the first fundraising deadline, Clinton will have personally headlined over 50 fundraisers.

"She has to raise a lot of money," said former ambassador Edward Romero, who hosted a Clinton fundraiser in New Mexico earlier this month. "Every candidate has that pressure."

Hillary Clinton Will Evoke Roosevelt and Try to Ease Fears on Trust in New York Speech // NYT // Amy Chozick – June 11, 2015

Hillary Rodham Clinton, at a major outdoor rally planned for Saturday, will directly address concerns that have emerged in the early weeks of her candidacy, telling voters they can trust her to fight for the middle class and stressing that she cares about their problems, several people briefed on her plans say.

The speech, at an event shaping up to be the most ambitious public gathering undertaken by the campaign since Mrs. Clinton began her quest for the White House in April, will be shaped by symbolism as she seeks to make the case for why she should be president.

It will be held in New York City on an island named for Franklin D. Roosevelt, in the shadow of diverse middle-class neighborhoods, as Mrs. Clinton tries to evoke the legacy of the New Deal and lay out her vision for a federal government substantially engaged in lifting American families that feel economically insecure and increasingly left behind.

Mrs. Clinton has yet to put forth a clear rationale for her candidacy since announcing in a brief online video that she would run for the Democratic nomination.

This version of Total Mail Converter is not registered.

“She has to articulate an authentic, compelling rationale for her candidacy, a cause and vision that is larger than her own ambitions,” said David Axelrod, a former senior adviser to President Obama.

But the large outdoor event, complete with a marching band and a space for an overflow crowd to watch the speech on giant monitors, must also counteract some signs of decline in Mrs. Clinton’s personal appeal, with polls showing that a growing number of Americans do not trust her or think she understands their lives.

A CNN poll released June 2 showed that 57 percent of Americans thought that Mrs. Clinton was not honest and trustworthy, up from 49 percent in March, and that 47 percent of voters thought that Mrs. Clinton “cares about people like you,” down from 53 percent last July. Publicly, Mrs. Clinton’s campaign aides have shrugged off such polls as evidence that voters distrust Washington and politics in general. Privately, they are strategizing about how to reframe the conversation.

Rather than defend attacks on Mrs. Clinton’s trustworthiness regarding her use of a private email address at the State Department while she was secretary of state or foreign donations to her family’s philanthropy, the campaign will seek to turn the trust issue on its head. “But who do you trust more to fight for you when they get in the Oval Office?” the Democratic strategist, Steve Elmendorf, said, repeating a line often used by Mrs. Clinton’s senior advisers.

The campaign will try to turn another one of Mrs. Clinton’s challenges, her tendency to incite strong and divisive reactions from people, to her advantage, emphasizing her perceived toughness. Her campaign chairman, John D. Podesta, often refers to Mrs. Clinton as a “tenacious fighter,” a theme that will echo throughout the speech and her campaign.

Mrs. Clinton’s husband, former President Bill Clinton, and daughter, Chelsea, will appear with her at the rally, the first time the family will make a joint campaign appearance since Mrs. Clinton became a candidate.

Saturday’s event will signal the end of the first phase of Mrs. Clinton’s campaign, which mainly featured the former first lady holding round-table discussions with small groups of voters. Mrs. Clinton has said that she has learned a lot from those meetings, but they could come across as scripted and lacking in energy, especially as one rival, Senator Bernie Sanders of Vermont, has already drawn large crowds. In the coming weeks, Mrs. Clinton will present more specific policies, speak to larger audiences and appear at town hall gatherings.

The staging of Saturday’s event has been meticulous. Huma Abedin, a longtime aide to Mrs. Clinton and vice chairwoman of the campaign, and Greg Hale, an Arkansas-based consultant who has handled events for the Clintons for years, have taken a lead on planning. Jim Margolis, the news media consultant behind both of Mr. Obama’s inaugurations, and Mandy Grunwald, the longtime Clinton adviser who helped choreograph the appearance of Mr. Clinton and his family at the 1992 Democratic National Convention in New York, have also been involved.

For weeks, aides weighed various locations. Rather than choosing Iowa or New Hampshire, they settled on New York, where Mrs. Clinton served as a senator and where a friendly crowd of supporters was simple enough to summon.

Looking at a map of New York, aides in the campaign’s Downtown Brooklyn headquarters settled on Roosevelt Island, the 2-mile-by-800-foot strip of land on the East River between Manhattan and Queens. The event is open to the public, and the campaign has received several thousand requests to attend, though the forecast of scattered thunderstorms could affect turnout.

The campaign angered some island residents after a community day for children had to be rescheduled. Others have grumbled that the national news media has, in terms of accessibility, compared Roosevelt Island to the nearby jail complex of Rikers Island. (Roosevelt Island is reachable via public transportation as well as a tram that has in the past stalled, leaving passengers suspended over the murky brown waters of the East River.)

This version of Total Mail Converter is not registered.

Mrs. Clinton will deliver the speech at Four Freedoms Park, a memorial with a grassy tree-lined mall, named after the four tenets that Roosevelt presented in his 1941 State of the Union address: freedom of speech and worship, and freedom from want and fear.

She has defined her campaign as taking on “four fights,” including strengthening the economy, helping families and communities, getting unaccountable money out of politics and protecting the country from foreign threats.

She is expected to evoke Roosevelt’s policies to reiterate her belief that government is needed to help lift wages, create jobs, make college and health care more affordable, and rebuild antiquated infrastructure.

“It’s important for the campaign to demonstrate the sense of energy and excitement,” the Democratic pollster Geoff Garin said. But what is more important, he added, “is laying out an agenda that makes people feel that Hillary Clinton will be a fighter for them.”

Mrs. Clinton’s message will reflect the Democratic Party’s leftward shift and stand in sharp contrast to the new covenant of personal responsibility that Mr. Clinton preached when he announced his candidacy in 1991 at the Old Statehouse in Little Rock, Ark.

“Government’s responsibility is to create more opportunity,” Mr. Clinton said in that speech. “The people’s responsibility is to make the most of it.”

Dan Schwerin, a policy adviser to Mrs. Clinton, is among the aides who have helped her shape her speech. Mrs. Clinton has already tested many of the main themes, including a populist critique of Wall Street excesses. She has called for equal pay for women, an overhaul of the criminal justice system and voting rights policies that would make the process easier for young people and minorities.

Framing all of this with the pomp and celebration of an official announcement speech can serve not just as an introduction for a candidate (or in Mrs. Clinton’s case, a reintroduction), but also as a crucial chance to counteract negative opinions more than a year before a general election.

In 2000, Vice President Al Gore’s campaign tried to reposition his wooden and cerebral demeanor as an advantage against the more affable George W. Bush.

“At the end of the day, with critical decisions impacting your family, do you want someone you know is smart or not?” was how Chris Lehane, an adviser to Mr. Gore, summed up the strategy. Or, in shorthand: “You date Bush and marry Gore.”

With Chelsea nearby, Mrs. Clinton will remind voters about her years as a working mother, her experience working for the Children’s Defense Fund in the 1970s and her record of as an advocate for women and children as a first lady, senator and secretary of state. The campaign also has a biographical video in the works.

“You can become a caricature of how the press has determined who you are,” said Thomas R. Nides, a friend and adviser who worked for Mrs. Clinton at the State Department. “But the good news about Hillary Clinton is that she has a long history of who she is and what she stands for.”

This version of Total Mail Converter is not registered.

Hillary Clinton Plans to Re-Introduce Herself to Voters // CBS News // Stephanie Condon – June 11, 2015

After decades in the spotlight, Hillary Clinton this Saturday will use her first major address as a 2016 presidential candidate to re-introduce herself to voters, explaining how her personal story has driven her career aims of helping children and middle class families.

Since launching her 2016 bid for the Democratic nomination in April, Clinton has held small events in key voting states. This Saturday's speech and rally at Four Freedoms Park in New York City marks the next phase of her campaign, according to a campaign official. Four key elements will comprise Clinton's speech: her motivations, who she's fighting for, her vision for the nation and a comparison between her vision and the GOP vision.

The undergirding concept behind the whole speech is her personal story, the Clinton campaign said. Clinton, of course, heads into the 2016 race as one of the most well-known presidential candidates ever, after serving as secretary of state, a U.S. senator, the first lady of the United States and the first lady of Arkansas. Still, the campaign says, her personal story explains Clinton's drive to be a champion for everyday Americans.

"She is a well-known figure, but when you're asking the American people to support you as president, even if it is for the second time, there is no skipping of steps," Jennifer Palmieri, the Hillary for America communications director, told CBS News in a statement.

That story starts with Hillary Clinton's mother, Dorothy Rodham. In her memoir Hard Choices, Clinton wrote, "No one had a bigger influence on my life or did more to shape the person I became" than her mother. Dorothy Rodham's childhood was "marked by trauma and abandonment," Clinton wrote, noting that her mother was on her own and working as a housekeeper and nanny by age 14. In spite of the challenges she faced, Dorothy Rodham told her daughter she thrived in life because of the help of others.

In her speech, according to a campaign official, Clinton will share that story and talk about how she adopted a fighter's instinct from her mother. She'll also explain how her mother's reliance on the help of others shaped her belief that everyone needs a champion. That belief drove her career in public service.

To further share her story, Clinton's campaign is producing a biographical video, expected to be rolled out in the days after Saturday's event. It will highlight Clinton's work as an advocate for children and families, dating back to her work as a young lawyer for the Children's Defense Fund.

Meanwhile, as Clinton readies her message for Saturday, Republicans are ratcheting up their own efforts to frame Clinton's campaign. The Republican National Committee is releasing a new ad, called "Wrong for America," as part of its larger #StopHillary campaign.

The ad is airing on cable in Washington, D.C. and New York City starting Friday. The new effort also includes a targeted digital push in the key states of Iowa, Nevada, New Hampshire and South Carolina, in conjunction with Clinton's upcoming campaign stops.

Hillary Clinton gets personal // MSNBC // Alex Seitz-Wald – June 11, 2015

Hillary Clinton will lay out a personal rationale for her second attempt at the presidency Saturday in a major campaign rally to be held at a party honoring Frank Delano Roosevelt in New York City.

This version of Total Mail Converter is not registered.

The former secretary of state soft-launched her White House bid April 12 in a video posted online. But Saturday's rally will mark the beginning a full-fledged presidential campaign after eight weeks of a low-key ramp-up.

In the presence of a giant bust of FDR on an island named after the former president between Manhattan and Queens, Clinton will offer her most expansive remarks yet on why she's running for president.

Thousands are expected, with tickets to the event no long available on Clinton's campaign website. Bill and Hillary Clinton will be on hand, but are not expected to speak. Those who make onto Roosevelt Island or watch on TV from home will see a very different Clinton than the one who lost the 2008 Democratic primary. Whereas Clinton was seen as impersonal and bloodless then, she now says the chief motivation of her public life is her mother. Whereas Clinton was seen as moderate and cautious then, she will now embrace a president who remade the country in a more progressive image.

It shows that as the Democratic Party has moved left on social issues and both parties have become more populist, Clinton is finally catching up, said Bob Shrum, a former Clinton White House aide. "Maybe it's left compared to the era of triangulation, but the era of triangulation over and is not where the party is or where the country is, as she discovered in 2008," he said.

Times have changed and with even Republicans discussing income inequality, Clinton is demonstrating she gets it. "I think she's sending a very clear signal," said Shrum.

That comes from a personal place, she will say. On Saturday, Clinton will say that her mother's brutal childhood is what motivated her to get into public service and work as an advocate of women and children, the campaign official said. Her mother's story will be the foundation of her rationale for running for president.

As a child, Dorothy Rodham was abandoned by her parents and sent to live with strict relatives. Not able to bare it anymore, she ran away at 14 and worked as a housekeeper for a kind-hearted woman who took her in and showed her what parenting should look like.

That trauma and resilience, Clinton has said, taught her and how to be tough and made her want to help people in difficult circumstances. "No one had a bigger influence on my life or did more to shape the person I became," Clinton wrote in her 2014 autobiography "Hard Choices."

Clinton's mother will likely emerge as a recurring motif of the campaign. Immediately following her kick-off in New York City, Clinton will travel to Iowa and then New Hampshire, South Carolina, and Nevada, and is likely to discuss her mother there, too.

"If you want to understand Hillary Clinton, and what has motivated her career of fighting for kids and families, her mother is a big part of the story," said Jennifer Palmieri, the Clinton campaign's communications director.

In an attempt to reintroduce her to voters – or introduce her for the first time to millennials, a critical voting bloc that missed most of the 1990s – the campaign has produced a biographical video covering Clinton's lengthy career, the official added. It starts with her work at the Children's Defense Fund, just after she left Yale Law School, and continues through her time at the State Department. It will be unveiled in the coming days.

The rest of her speech will strike a decidedly populist economic tone, the official said. And she'll preview policy ideas that will be rolled out in more detail later this summer.

This version of Total Mail Converter is not registered.

And Clinton will take on Republicans. Instead of addressing the Democrats running against her for the party's nomination, she'll look clear past them to the hypothetical GOP nominee she would face next year if she wins the primary. She'll frame the election as a choice between her economic ideas and those of the Republicans.

Likely to go unmentioned are Former Gov. Martin O'Malley, Sen. Bernie Sanders, and former Gov. Lincoln Chafee, who have all mentioned Clinton in their presidential announcements.

Like many good presidential kick-offs, Clinton's launch will be about symbolism as well as substance. Barack Obama chose the place where Abraham Lincoln gave his "House Divided" speech. Former Gov. Martin O'Malley and Sen. Bernie Sanders announced at outdoor rallies in the cities where they once were mayor. Rick Perry last week launched his run in front of a cargo plane he flew in the Air Force.

Clinton chose a park honoring FDR in the state where she served as senator for eight years, a choice campaign officials say is meant to invoke Roosevelt's legacy.

"She could have chosen anywhere to make her announcement," said Felicia Wong, the President of the Roosevelt Institute, a progressive think tank dedicated to carrying on the legacy of Franklin and Eleanor Roosevelt. "By choosing this venue, she and her team have put themselves squarely in the legacy and the spirit of Franklin Roosevelt, who re-wrote the rules of the 20th century."

Roosevelt is credited with creating the modern welfare state, saving the economy from collapse, taking on entrenched wealthy interests, and defeating an expansionist, totalitarian foreign power. At the same time, he built the modern Democratic Party and the values that would emerge at its core to this day.

Clinton has long seen Eleanor Roosevelt, a fellow first lady, as a role model and last year spoke admiringly about Teddy Roosevelt, saying she devoured Ken Burns' expansive documentary series on the family.

The kick-off comes at time when Clinton is trying to win over restive progressives. Tying herself to Roosevelt is a smart move, says New York-based Democratic strategist Hank Sheinkopf. "It is very much aimed to the left," said Sheinkopf. "She needs to get rid of everybody who's pestering her on her left, and one of the best ways to get rid of them is to invoke Franklin Roosevelt."

New York City Mayor Bill de Blasio, a leader of the national progressive movement, will notably not attend the rally, his office has said. Clinton and de Blasio are longtime friends and he managed her Senate campaign in 2000. So far, however, de Blasio has declined to endorse Clinton's presidential bid.

Sheinkopf thinks de Blasio is playing hard to get in order to amp up the value of his endorsement down the road. Comparing de Blasio to "artillery" when it comes to defending her left flank, Sheinkopf said it's too soon: "De Blasio is less needed now and more more needed later. Why do you want to use a howitzer now, when frankly when you can use much lighter weapons?"

Her embrace of Roosevelt and progressive ideas is about more than the primary, however. She'll need the so-called Obama coalition to turn out for her in a general election if she makes it there, and these are the issues they care about. "With the increasing polarization of the country, the fact is the key to winning these election is turning out your base," said Shrum, who has held senior roles in Democratic campaigns.

Still, Clinton has not yet weighed in on a few top issue for liberals. The House will vote Friday on a Trade Promotion Authority bill, which labor unions and others are fighting tooth and nail. That will have to wait until sometime after her kick-off.

This version of Total Mail Converter is not registered.

Hillary Clinton Will Push Personal Story at Campaign Launch // TIME // Sam Frizell – June 11, 2015

For Hillary Clinton, this campaign is personal.

When the democratic presidential candidate holds her much hyped rally on Saturday in New York City, her team said Thursday, she will emphasize her own history, discussing her family, her mother and her upbringing as a central part of her rationale for running for President.

The speech will build on many of the tropes that Clinton has developed throughout the first two months of the campaign, as she uses her past to talk about income inequality and building stronger families. Much of her remarks will also center on her domestic and economic vision for the country.

Clinton will in particular talk about her mother, Dorothy Rodham, who was abandoned by her parents and worked as a secretary before marrying Clinton's father, Hugh Rodham.

"If you want to understand Hillary Clinton, and what has motivated her career of fighting for kids and families, her mother is a big part of the story," Jennifer Palmieri, the campaign's director of communications, said in an email to reporters. "The example she learned from her mother's story is critical to knowing what motivated Hillary Clinton to first get involved in public service, and why people can count on her to fight for them and their families now."

In 2007 and 2008, Clinton ran as a determined and businesslike candidate whose unofficial campaign slogan was "ready on Day One," turning off some voters who found her difficult to relate to and distant. This time, Clinton has taken an entirely different, speaking frequently about her granddaughter, Charlotte, her father's drapery business and her mother.

Her website prominently displays photos of her as a baby and during her younger days with Bill Clinton. On Thursday, her newly minted Instagram feed featured a photo of her as a toddler riding a tricycle with the caption "Pedal to the metal. #tbt"

Clinton's team is marking Saturday as official the start of her full-blown campaign, though she announced her candidacy in mid-April and has been holding small events in the four early primary states of Iowa, New Hampshire, South Carolina and Nevada over the past nine weeks. During those months she largely insulated herself from the media while holding carefully controlled roundtable conversations with voters.

She will deliver her speech on Roosevelt Island in New York's East River, a narrow four-mile-long residential haven with views of midtown Manhattan and Queens. Saturday's event will be the first large rally of Clinton's 2016 campaign.

Since joining the race and reentering partisan politics, Clinton's favorability among voters has dropped. According to a CNN poll published last week, 57% of Americans view her as dishonest and trustworthy, up from 49% in March. Clinton's campaign will be resting their hopes on her personal story reinvigorating voters over the course of the campaign.

"There's still a lot of things people don't know about her," said Celinda Lake, a Democratic strategist unaffiliated with Clinton's campaign. "The fact she came from Republican family, that she's a person of faith. Her long history working for women and children... I think these numbers will pick up particularly among independent women as they get to know and see her better."

This version of Total Mail Converter is not registered.

On Saturday, the campaign said, Clinton will discuss the lessons she learned from her mother and will return to some of the populist tones she has struck so far: that prosperity has to reach more than just the super rich, and be about everyday Americans and families—the ones that she has been meeting with on the campaign trail.

Clinton will roll out major policy proposals throughout the summer, but she has talked frequently about income inequality and criminal justice reform, and laid out specific ideas about expanding voter participation and immigration.

At Launch Rally, Hillary Clinton to Tell Americans 'It Is Your Time' // Bloomberg News // Jennifer Epstein – June 11, 2015

Hillary Clinton has spent the past two months reintroducing herself to voters with carefully controlled campaign stops and minimal interaction with the media.

On Saturday, she'll initiate the next phase of her presidential candidacy with her first campaign rally, where she'll discuss oft-omitted pieces of her personal story and tell the country why she's best suited to be the next occupant of the Oval Office. She'll discuss what motivates her, who she is fighting for, her vision for the country and what the choices are for voters in the 2016 election, Clinton officials said Thursday.

The rally, slated for late morning at Four Freedoms Park on New York's Roosevelt Island—a tribute to Franklin Delano Roosevelt and, to a lesser extent, Eleanor Roosevelt—won't be heavy on policy details, but it will kick off a summer that will be full of economic proposals, including Clinton's views on the minimum wage, Wall Street regulation and student debt.

"She's begun to lay an important foundation on which to build the next phase of her campaign."

Clinton's economic positions will be progressive without leaning as far left those of Vermont Senator Bernie Sanders, a self-identified socialist who in many polls is running a distant second to her for the Democratic presidential nomination. And they'll draw on the principle of fairness that drove FDR's presidency.

"It is your time," she will tell the people who her campaign has chosen to call everyday Americans, arguing that America's success is measured not by how those at the top are doing but how the rest of the country is doing. Prosperity is for every American, she will say, not just for CEOs and hedge fund managers.

Clinton will also argue that the election will leave voters with a clear choice between what her aides see as Republicans' top-down economic policies and out-of-date social view, and her own views, which they say hinge on fairness and justice for all.

Clinton shied away from her personal story throughout her 2008 campaign but has chosen, this time, to use her own experiences from long before she stepped foot in the White House or the State Department. It's a way to connect with voters whose biographical knowledge of Clinton is limited to her years as first lady and secretary of state, and doesn't trace back to her middle class beginnings in the Chicago suburbs or the roots of her indomitable spirit.

Clinton's life story from her parents' influence onward, her supporters argue, is critical to convincing voters that she is the right person to lead the country.

This version of Total Mail Converter is not registered.

“She is a well-known figure but when you're asking the American people to support you as president, even if it is for the second time, there is no skipping of steps,” Clinton communications director Jennifer Palmieri said.

The first two months of Clinton’s campaign started laying the groundwork for her reintroduction to the American people and the methodical campaign that she and her team have planned for the next 17 months.

“Voters are seeing her not as secretary of state, not as first lady, not as Bill Clinton’s wife, not as a surrogate for President Obama but as Hillary Clinton, the 2016 candidate who is looking for their vote and their confidence to be their next commander-in-chief,” said Democratic strategist Maria Cardona, who advised Clinton’s first presidential campaign.

During the first phase of her campaign, Clinton was "putting one foot in front of the next very methodically," said Bill Galston, a domestic policy adviser in Bill Clinton's White House. "She is not trying to force herself to be someone she’s not. She’s not Barack Obama. She's not her husband."

Clinton's close ties to the last two Democratic presidents can make it difficult to differentiate her from them, but she's widely seen as more disciplined than her husband and more interested in engaging in politics than the current president. Clinton has suggested on the campaign trail that she could do better than Obama at working with Republicans and Democrats in Congress and, Galston said, "she has some skills that [Obama] lacks and those skills in these polarized times are pretty damn important."

Much of Clinton’s focus on Saturday and as she travels next week to Iowa, New Hampshire, South Carolina and Nevada, will be on one important figure in the candidate’s life: her mother, Dorothy Rodham, who suffered multiple rounds of “trauma and abandonment” as a child, as Clinton wrote in her 2014 memoir Hard Choices, but experienced enough acts of kindness to persist through the hardships she faced.

“Mom measured her own life by how much she was able to help us and serve others,” Clinton wrote, and Rodham taught her daughter: “Never rest on your laurels. Never quit. Never stop working to make the world a better place. That’s our unfinished business.”

From her mother’s example, Clinton learned that every child needs someone fighting for him or her—a belief that has pulled her through her career, beginning with her work as a young lawyer for the Children’s Defense Fund.

“If you want to understand Hillary Clinton, and what has motivated her career of fighting for kids and families, her mother is a big part of the story,” Palmieri said. “The example she learned from her mother's story is critical to knowing what motivated Hillary Clinton to first get involved in public service, and why people can count on her to fight for them and their families now."

The shift to a focus on Clinton's personal story—which will also include the campaign's release of a biographical video about Clinton in the coming days—comes after an initial active avoidance of focusing too much on the larger-than-life candidate.

"One thing that struck me from the start as exactly right was to have this election not be about her but about everyday Americans," said Geoff Garin, Clinton's 2008 pollster. "She’s begun to lay an important foundation on which to build the next phase of her campaign."

Americans, he added, "want their elected officials to be in touch with them and to have a personal understanding of what they’re going through. She's demonstrated a commitment to doing that and I think she’ll be a better candidate as a result of it."

This version of Total Mail Converter is not registered.

Hillary Relaunch to Have 'Airport Style Security' // The Weekly Standard // Daniel Halper

Security will be tight at Hillary Clinton's re-launch in New York City. It will mimic "airport style security," according to an email from the campaign to people who have registered for the event.

"We can't wait to see you on Saturday at the Hillary for America official launch event -- we're so excited that you're going to be a part of this day! Here's some information you'll need ahead of time," reads the email describing Saturday's event.

When and Where

- Saturday, June 13th doors open at 9:30 a.m. - 1:00 p.m.

- FDR Four Freedoms Park, Roosevelt Island, NY

What to bring

- Your printed ticket -- the confirmation email you received when you registered for the event, you can also use your phone to show your ticket. Children under the age of 13 do not need a ticket to enter the event.

- Small personal cameras and cell phones will be permitted.

- Guests are encouraged to bring water in standard-sized, clear plastic bottles, as there will be a limited supply at the event.

What not to bring

- There will be airport style security. Items that will NOT BE permitted include food, liquids other than water, large bags, large purses, backpacks, strollers, umbrellas, noise makers, bullhorns, posters, signs, pets other than licensed service animals, sharp objects, or weapons.

What to expect

- Limited cell service on Roosevelt Island.

- The event is standing only -- seating will be provided for ADA guests.

- Food is not permitted in the park, so make sure to have breakfast before you arrive.

- Be prepared for a hot summer day; sunglasses, sunscreen, and comfortable shoes are highly encouraged.

How to get to Four Freedoms Park

The best way to get to the park is by public transportation -- parking on the island will be extremely limited.

- Subway: Take the F Train to the Roosevelt Island stop. Follow signs to Four Freedoms Park.

- Tram: From Manhattan: Get on the tram at 59th Street & Second Avenue Station. Travel time to Roosevelt Island is 4-5 minutes, with trams departing every 10 minutes. Exit at Tramway Station on Roosevelt Island. Follow signs to Four Freedoms Park.

This version of Total Mail Converter is not registered.

- Bus: From Queensboro Plaza overpass, take stairway down north side to corner of Crescent and Bridge Plaza North. Take the Q102 Queens Surface bus to Roosevelt Island. Follow signs to Four Freedoms Park.

We want to accommodate as many ADA guests as possible, so if you know that you will need assistance on-site, please contact ADAseating@hillaryclinton.com to make necessary arrangements. ADA guests are welcome to bring one guest with them into the ADA section.

This is going to be a great event and we're thrilled to have you -- one of our best supporters -- there as we launch into the next phase of this campaign.

Thanks,

Hillary for America

HRC NATIONAL COVERAGE

Hillary Clinton and Wishful-Thinking Politics // NYT // Brendan Nyhan – June 11, 2015

Hillary Clinton's campaign took a beating among some pundits this week for telling the truth: She's going to employ a strategy focused on a narrow set of the most competitive states.

In other words, she's running as a modern presidential candidate.

Mrs. Clinton's statement is what's called a Kinsley gaffe — taking its name from Michael Kinsley, a journalist who said a gaffe is something true that a politician isn't supposed to say. By conceding the obvious, she revealed the disjunction between the politics we say we want and the kind we actually have.

In reality, her approach is far less different from those of recent candidates than it might appear. No presidential candidate — including Mrs. Clinton's husband, whose strategy was compared to hers — competes in every state. The reason is the Electoral College, a winner-take-all system that rewards candidates who focus almost exclusively on closely contested states.

The difference is in which states she will target. The electoral map has changed since 1992, when the legacy of the old one-party South helped her husband win a number of Southern states that are now out of reach for Democrats. As a result, the targeting strategy that worked for her husband would not succeed today despite wishful thinking that she could, for instance, win Kentucky.

Most troubling to some observers, though, was the way that Mrs. Clinton's strategy dispensed with the pretense that she would create unity and consensus by running to the center. The uncomfortable reality is that presidents don't magically unite us, especially in our highly polarized era. With the public closely divided between the two parties, successful politicians have to mobilize their base to win.

Consider recent history. The last three presidents — Bill Clinton, George W. Bush and Barack Obama — were all elected after promising to transcend partisanship. All failed in that aim after learning some hard lessons about how Washington actually works. Mr. Bush and Mr. Obama then ran re-election campaigns focused on turning out their core supporters — the same model Mrs. Clinton plans to adopt.

This version of Total Mail Converter is not registered.

Presidential candidates should still try to speak to all Americans. But we shouldn't pretend that pleasing words from Mrs. Clinton are going to bring back the politics of 1952 or even 1992 — that era is gone and it's not coming back.

Virginia Is Latest Front in Democrats' Voting Rights Battle // NYT // Maggie Haberman – June 11, 2015

Democrats allied with Hillary Rodham Clinton have filed a voting rights lawsuit in Virginia, the third time they have done so in a crucial presidential battleground state in the last two months.

The suit, like the others, was filed by Marc Elias, a Democratic election lawyer whose clients include Mrs. Clinton's presidential campaign and four of the party's major national committees.

Mrs. Clinton is not a party to any of the lawsuits, but her campaign aides have expressed supported for the two earlier suits, in Ohio and Wisconsin.

The Virginia lawsuit is part of a broader effort by Democrats to try to roll back voting laws that have been passed in nearly two dozen states since 2010. Many of the laws were passed in states where Republican governors and legislatures rose to power after the Tea Party wave.

The Virginia action, described by the California-based election law expert Richard L. Hasen on his website, Election Law Blog, is primarily based on the state's voter identification law. The plaintiffs — which include the Virginia Democratic Party — argue the law will suppress turnout, particularly among blacks and Hispanics, the poor and college students.

Republicans have argued that the spate of new laws were important added protections against election fraud. They dismiss the Democratic lawsuits as publicity stunts to energize minority voters in support of Democratic candidates.

These 9 words prove that Bill Clinton still doesn't get it on the Clinton Foundation // WaPo // Chris Cillizza – June 11, 2015

Bill Clinton sat for an interview with Bloomberg News on Wednesday to talk about, among other things, the controversy surrounding the Clinton Foundation and his wife's 2016 presidential bid. And, in the course of that conversation, he let loose with this stunner: "Has anybody proved that we did anything objectionable? No."

Um, what?

This is the latest in a string of statements by the former president that suggest he still doesn't grasp why the Clinton Foundation questions continue to swirl and, because of that lack of understanding, remains unable to effectively parry them. Let's go through the problems with Clinton's answer.

First, there's little doubt that some of the donations accepted by the Clinton Foundation have been viewed as objectionable by lots and lots of people. To cite one example: Allowing the Qatar Supreme 2022 Committee, organized to lure the World Cup to the nation, to serve as the main sponsor for a 2013 Clinton Global Initiative event. Qatar has been tied to not only allegations of wide-scale bribery of FIFA to acquire the games but is also the subject of widespread humanitarian concerns regarding the number of deaths related to the construction of the soccer stadiums to host the World Cup in 2022.

This version of Total Mail Converter is not registered.

So, on its face, the claim that no one has come forward to object to certain donations/donors is just not right.

Then there is the fact that Clinton's answer on the foundation seems to be based on the idea that he and his wife are operating in a legal sphere for the next two years. They're not. They're living in the world of politics -- and the rules of that world are far different than those of a court of law.

Clinton's argument boils down to the idea of a burden of proof. As in, if there's something truly objectionable in what the foundation has done, then someone should prove it. Legally speaking, Clinton's right. If you think he or the foundation broke some sort of law, then you should need to provide conclusive evidence of when, where, why, what and how.

But of course, what we are mostly talking about when it comes to the Clinton Foundation is the gray area between contributions made by donors and decisions made by the foundation that benefited those people. Proving that sort of quid pro quo in a legal setting is virtually impossible barring a smoking gun -- like an e-mail that says: "Mr. X gave $300,000. Let's fund his project now."

In politics, however, gray areas can be exploited to great advantage by your political opponents. Raising questions about the timing between donations to the Clinton Foundation and decisions made that lined the pockets of those donors is totally within the bounds of acceptable -- and effective -- negative messaging. Republicans don't need to prove that the Clinton Foundation did anything untoward. The burden of proof that there was no wrongdoing lies with the Clinton Foundation.

That reality clearly annoys Bill Clinton, and somewhat understandably. After all, the Clinton Foundation is a massive operation and, as Bill likes to point out, does lots and lots of work that has nothing to do with politics. "Do I have the most comprehensive disclosure of any presidential foundation? Yes," Clinton said in that same Bloomberg interview. "Is our -- our disclosures more extensive than most private foundations? Yes, they are, having nothing to do with politics." (Sidebar: It's not clear that Clinton's claim about the foundation's disclosure policies is totally accurate.)

Here's the problem for Bill: No other foundation in the world is run by a former president and a former secretary of state who also happens to be the de facto Democratic presidential nominee in 2016. That fact means that the Clinton Foundation isn't like any other foundation in the world -- and therefore, how all of those other foundations treat disclosure is sort of immaterial.

It's also worth noting here that the successes of the Clinton Foundation in terms of raising money are built on the prominence and political influence of Bill and Hillary Clinton. There are lots and lots of organizations out there that have been far less successful doing what the Clinton Foundation does simply because they lack messengers like Bill and Hillary. And so, when that prominence also subjects the Clinton Foundation to heightened scrutiny, that's the sort of thing that comes with the territory.

Bill Clinton needs to understand that no matter how beneficent he believes the Clinton Foundation is, it's now a major part of the broader political conversation regarding Hillary Clinton's 2016 campaign. (If you need evidence of that politicization of the foundation, witness the furor over donations to it by ABC newsman George Stephanopoulos.)

He may not like it, but good politicians -- and Bill Clinton is definitely one of those -- deal with the world as it is, not how they want it to be. He has yet to do that.

This version of Total Mail Converter is not registered.

She won't back down. Or go away. // WaPo // Kent Babb – June 11, 2015

Hillary Rodham Clinton looked into their eyes, her voice dropping. "I have to confess," she said, and the group surrounding her in this little makeshift room leaned in.

Usually the atrium at PS/IS 41 in Brooklyn is a community area, kids' voices echoing off the tile walls. On this Wednesday in April, it was a political proving ground: Clinton alongside Chirlane McCray, the first lady of New York City, to promote a campaign that encourages parents to talk or sing to their children.

Clinton was just days away from launching a second run for the White House, determined to win what she lost in spectacular fashion in 2008.

But her won't-back-down resolve — the quality that could make her America's first female president if it doesn't sabotage her first — was nowhere in sight as she sat at a table with about a half-dozen parents and educators, nodding at their stories.

This was a chance, in a carefully controlled setting, to project the warmer, more intimate persona she would be unveiling in Iowa and New Hampshire. She may have gotten her first campaign for the Democratic nomination wrong, but now she was planning to get it right.

So here she was, in a neighborhood dominated by public housing projects, trying to connect not as President Obama's first secretary of state, or an ex-U.S. senator, or the former first lady of the United States — though her audience was acutely aware that she'd been all those things. Nor did she want to be seen as a $200,000-per-speech megastar who was driven in a private van to a public school where nearly all 525 students qualify for free or reduced lunch.

Clinton was presenting herself as a mother, just like those gathered around the table with her. And maybe if she said it often enough — believed it hard enough — voters would see her as she likes to see herself.

And, anyway, about that confession: She can't sing a lick. Years ago, Clinton told the group, amid laughter, that she would rock young Chelsea to sleep by singing her favorite song, "Moon River." Her daughter was less than appreciative, her tiny finger pressing into her mother's lips.

"No sing, Mommy," Clinton recalled Chelsea saying, some of the child's first words. Clinton was a young mother then and is a 67-year-old grandmother now, and my, how fast the time goes. The parents nodded.

Clinton was grooving now, comfortable and in command, offering a tender version of herself in a place where no one would challenge her about her e-mail accounts, or the attack on the U.S. diplomatic compound in Benghazi, Libya, or the ugly political fights of the past four decades. Where no one would bring up the psychological Kevlar she wears into every room, the unyielding mind-set that has defined her since she was a child and still fuels her now.

"She will not give up when she knows she's right," says Sara Ehrman, a friend and confidante of Clinton's since the 1970s. "She will not give up. And it is admirable — and annoying."

Or as Clinton put it in a 2012 e-mail to a State Department colleague bracing to testify on Benghazi before the

This version of Total Mail Converter is not registered.

Senate Foreign Relations Committee: “Well, what doesn’t kill you, makes you stronger (as I have rationalized for years), so just survive and you’ll have triumphed.”

Fifteen miles from Chicago, jets descended over the northern suburbs into O’Hare International Airport. It was the early 1950s, and a 4-year-old girl danced alone in her family’s back yard, reaching for the rumbling sky.

This is one of young Hillary’s earliest memories, recounted decades later in her first memoir, “Living History.” She declined to be interviewed for this article, but in her book she remembers her mother, Dorothy, asking her why she wasn’t playing with other kids in Park Ridge, the suburb where the Rodhams lived.

Hillary started to cry. The problem was a girl named Suzy. Suzy was bigger, meaner, used to roughhousing with her older brothers, Hillary told her mother. She was afraid of her.

“Go back out there,” Dorothy Rodham ordered her oldest child and only daughter, nudging her out the door. Dorothy reminded her that if Suzy bullied her, she had her mother’s permission to punch back. “You have to stand up for yourself. There’s no room in this house for cowards.”

Though Dorothy deferred always to her opinionated, domineering husband, Hugh, she was perhaps the household’s strongest soul. She had spent her own childhood mostly alone, taking care of her sister when their parents left them alone for days. Dorothy was 8 when her parents put her on a train in Illinois bound for California, shuffled off to live with relatives who weren’t any more caring.

Dorothy’s grandmother once confined her to a year in her room for the sin of celebrating Halloween. She left at age 14 to work full time, as a $3-per-week housekeeper and nanny for a family that actually seemed to love one another.

Years later, Dorothy watched from behind a curtain as Hillary marched out to confront Suzy. The bully backed down, and Hillary raced home to announce her victory: “I can play with the boys now!”

Hillary began defying the limits imposed on girls in that era. She dreamed of becoming an astronaut or a baseball player and ran unsuccessfully for student government president at Maine South High. When she later applied to law school at Harvard and Yale, a well-known professor told her at a cocktail party that Harvard didn’t need more women, Hillary’s final nudge toward Yale.

Still, Hillary sometimes harbored self-doubt. She was a freshman at Wellesley College, an all-girls school near Boston, when her first math and French grades came back. They weren’t A’s. She called home, holding back tears. Hugh Rodham told her to come on back to Illinois. Dorothy, who had never felt in control of her own life, said no such thing. She had been offered no opportunities; she wasn’t going to let her only daughter give up on hers.

“I realized,” Clinton would later write, “that I really couldn’t go home again.”

They stopped twice in Virginia and again in Tennessee. The question was always the same: “Are you sure?” And the answer was always yes, so they kept driving.

Hillary had moved to Washington after graduating from Yale Law School, where she had met a bright and charismatic student named Bill Clinton. She worked as a staff attorney for the Children’s Defense Fund, then for the House committee investigating Watergate. Home during those years had been Ehrman’s Capitol Hill townhouse, where the roommates often talked about the future. Hillary’s ambition was among the most popular topics.

This version of Total Mail Converter is not registered.

“She wanted a job. She wanted a life. She wanted to be recognized for what she was qualified to do,” Ehrman recalls.

Now, as they drove south, Ehrman was trying to talk her friend out of a decision that contradicted all that: Hillary wanted to join Bill in Arkansas, where he was a law professor with lofty ambitions of his own. Ehrman agreed to drive her because it gave Ehrman time to talk Hillary out of it. “Are you crazy?” she asked during one of their stops, telling her friend that she was throwing her future away. Hillary's determination, Ehrman learned, also came with a frustrating side.

They arrived in Fayetteville, Hillary taking her first steps toward a new life that would eventually make her one of the most powerful — and most controversial — women in the world. Ehrman, still certain her friend was making a terrible mistake, sat in her car and cried.

Hillary married Bill in 1975 but refused to take on Clinton’s last name, raising eyebrows in conservative Arkansas. When Bill ran for governor in 1978, advisers urged her to rethink such a trivial matter, but the fact was, this wasn’t trivial to her. Hillary, who would go on to be the first female partner at Rose Law Firm, wouldn’t be talked out of flying to New York a month before Chelsea was born to make a presentation alongside board members of the Arkansas Children’s Hospital — and she wouldn’t be talked out of this.

“I was still me,” she wrote in “Living History.”

“She has always done what she thinks is the right thing,” says Sheila Bronfman, a longtime friend from Arkansas. “And she lives with her choices.”

Then Bill, seeking a second term as governor, lost to a Republican challenger named Frank White, and advisers put some of the blame on Hillary’s refusal to be a genteel Southern wife. When Bill announced he would seek the office again in 1982, his wife began calling herself Hillary Rodham Clinton — a notable compromise.

Winning, she realized, was more important. A few months later, Bill retook the Governor’s Mansion in a landslide.

She stood alone sometimes looking out a White House window, watching as the tourists strolled by. Years of fighting had helped Bill Clinton become America’s 42nd president, but it had left Hillary with more enemies than allies.

She spent her first two years in Washington in the center of bare-knuckle exchanges: with media organizations, with Republicans, within her husband’s administration — no battle too small.

“I’m used to winning, and I intend to win on my own terms,” she once said to Diane Blair, one of her closest friends, according to a collection of Blair’s notes archived at the University of Arkansas.

Hillary had demanded her own 20-person staff and West Wing offices, unprecedented for a first lady, and was charged with running point on a task force to reform the country’s health-care system. She conducted many of the initial proceedings in secret, eventually leading to a lawsuit. The initiative died a painful death; she was lampooned and attacked, and she found herself unable to ignore barbs that grew increasingly personal.

This version of Total Mail Converter is not registered.

During the dawn of the 24-hour news cycle, no topic was off limits. The Clintons' marriage was dissected as a union not of love but shared ambitions; she was depicted as a ruthless woman who craved power. Her approval rating dipped to 44 percent, and at a 1994 tobacco rally in Kentucky, a Hillary effigy was burned.

When she felt bullied, as she had been so many years earlier in Park Ridge, she wanted to punch back. "As always," Blair once wrote in her journal, "she thinks the only answer to anything is to go on the offensive."

But more often she found herself in a defensive crouch, walling herself off from her attackers, always seeking control.

Blair suggested she could spare herself headaches by being friendlier to the press and dabbling in fewer political decisions.

"I know how to compromise, I have compromised," Blair wrote that Hillary told her during a phone call. "I gave up my name, got contact lenses, but I'm not going to try to pretend to be somebody that I'm not."

During the months before the Fourth World Conference on Women in 1995, she insisted on traveling to the Beijing event — a move that had the potential to offend the Chinese. When Democrats balked and the White House hesitated, she threatened to board a commercial flight and attend anyway, not as first lady but as a private American.

The administration relented, and she delivered the conference's signature speech. "Human rights are women's rights," she told the gathering, "and women's rights are human rights."

When Hillary returned to Washington, it was as a global champion of feminism and, perhaps, a future politician herself. For kicks, Blair sometimes sent articles to her about the nation's readiness for its first female president.

Then, in 1998, two years into his second term, Bill Clinton admitted to having an affair with a White House intern named Monica Lewinsky. The scandal led to impeachment and to the spectacle of Hillary, who had once dismissed questions about her marriage by declaring that she wasn't "some little woman standing by my man," doing exactly that.

Although preserving her marriage confounded some feminists, Hillary's approval rating soared to 67 percent in December 1998, the highest it has been before or since. Her husband survived impeachment, and Hillary survived public humiliation and endless speculation about whether she remained married out of love, ambition, or a combination of both.

The Clintons had just six months left in the White House in 2000 when Hillary learned that her beloved friend Blair, who had been battling lung cancer, was dying. Hillary visited her in Arkansas, asking Blair how "Senator Hillary Clinton" sounded. Blair squeezed Hillary's hand and whispered, "Don't ever give up on yourself or what you believe in."

Hillary, Bill and Chelsea Clinton leave the White House for a Thanksgiving getaway at Camp David in 1997. (Frank Johnston/The Washington Post) Sen. Hillary Clinton is joined by Bill, Chelsea and her mother, Dorothy Rodham, on June 7, 2008, at the National Building Museum in Washington as she concedes the Democratic presidential nomination to Sen. Barack Obama. (Richard A. Lipski/The Washington Post)

Hillary Clinton looked into their eyes, her voice dropping. "This is very personal for me," the senator from New

This version of Total Mail Converter is not registered.

York told a small group of undecided voters in a Portsmouth, N.H., cafe in January 2008.

Her voice cracked with emotion. Clinton's campaign for president was foundering. Another history-seeking Democrat, Sen. Barack Obama of Illinois, had won the Iowa caucuses, and polls showed him with a double-digit lead over Clinton on the day before the New Hampshire primary.

A woman asked how Clinton did it — how, after all she had been through, she remained so upbeat. Clinton paused, tears welling in her eyes. "I see what's happening," she said. "And we have to reverse it."

She had, until that point, been scripted and cautious, intent on projecting the gravitas of a commander in chief. Voters struggled to connect, and the campaign appeared adrift, beset by bickering and leaks that Clinton seemed unable to control.

Then, whether it was authenticity or a Hail Mary by a desperate campaign, Clinton went off the familiar script. Her voice softened. "I just don't want to see us fall backwards," she said. "You know?"

The next day, she erased Obama's lead and won New Hampshire, though Obama's historic momentum would be too much to overcome. Portsmouth, though, was more meaningful than one primary win. "I found my footing," Clinton wrote in "Hard Choices," her second memoir, "and my voice."

She refused to concede to Obama, even when it was clear she couldn't win. And by the end of her campaign, 18 million people had voted to nominate a woman for president of the United States.

When the time finally came to withdraw, an 89-year-old woman wearing green entered the atrium of Washington's National Building Museum to listen to Clinton's concession speech. "When you're knocked down," Clinton told hundreds of supporters, "get right back up and never listen to anyone who says you can't or shouldn't go on."

The woman in green applauded, and Clinton continued.

"Although we weren't able to shatter that highest, hardest glass ceiling this time, thanks to you, it's got about 18 million cracks in it," she said as Dorothy Rodham watched from a few feet away.

Clinton exits after delivering the keynote address April 29 at the David N. Dinkins Leadership and Public Policy Forum at Columbia University in New York City. (Kevin Hagen/Getty Images)

Ablack van traveled out of New York last month and into the heart of America, through Pennsylvania, Ohio and Indiana, stopping at one point in Joliet, Ill., about 40 miles from the Chicago suburb where a mother once nudged her daughter outside to confront her tormentor.

The last of Dorothy's fight had left her in 2011 as Hillary Clinton held her dying mother's hand. For the first time, she would have to take on all those Suzys alone, no one but herself to push her out the door.

Clinton, who visited 112 countries in four years as secretary of state, announced her second run for the White House on a Sunday in mid-April, and Hillary haters cracked their knuckles. Her motives will again be scrutinized, and so, of course, will her marriage. Can she go the distance, avoiding the traps and attacks, including the self-inflicted ones? And what if she wins — making her, at 69, not just the first woman but the second-oldest president to assume office?

This version of Total Mail Converter is not registered.

Clinton in 1985 wearing her inaugural-ball gown after Bill Clinton was reelected as governor of Arkansas. (Associated Press)

“I’m aware I may not be the youngest candidate in this race,” Clinton told Democrats in South Carolina in May. “But I have one big advantage: I’ve been coloring my hair for years. You’re not going to see me turn white in the White House. And you’re also not going to see me shrink from a fight.”

The day after her announcement video posted online, Clinton surrendered catered meals, private jets and prized privacy for stops at Chipotle, a converted van and unpredictable encounters with strangers.

On a Tuesday in Iowa, seven vehicles passed grain silos, taking Exit 63 toward a community college in the rural town of Monticello. A small crowd waited outside to see which Hillary Clinton would emerge from the back seat: the defiant but locked-in former first lady, the controlled and locked-down secretary of state — or some new version of a candidate everyone thinks they know.

The van pulled up inside a loading area, and Clinton stepped out and waved. Then a door opened, the same as it did more than six decades earlier in Park Ridge, and she walked through it.

Clinton’s Donor Dominance Not Absolute // WSJ // Peter Nicholas & Laura Meckler – June 11, 2015

Hillary Clinton appears to be winning over the lion’s share of elite fundraisers who powered President Barack Obama’s 2012 campaign, another sign of her dominant position in the Democratic primary. But enough unease about her candidacy has materialized to give fuel to one of Mrs. Clinton’s rivals, Martin O’Malley.

A Wall Street Journal survey of many of the top Obama fundraisers found that some are backing other candidates or weighing their options. Interviews with donors also found that Mr. O’Malley, a former Maryland governor, is making an aggressive push to win their allegiance.

Mr. O’Malley, who himself was an Obama fundraising “bundler,” has deep ties to the Obama campaign finance apparatus and has won sympathetic hearings or outright support from several of the people who helped pay for the $1.1 billion Obama re-election campaign.

Even a modest level of fundraising support could be enough to propel Mr. O’Malley through Iowa and New Hampshire, states that hold the first nominating contests and whose advertising markets are less expensive than those of Florida and many other states that vote later.

Of 72 top Obama fundraisers from 2012 whose preferences could be learned through interviews, campaign statements or invitations to fundraising events, about three in four back Mrs. Clinton. The rest support someone else, remain undecided or are sitting out the race for personal or other reasons.

A handful of Mrs. Clinton’s backers said they are prepared to switch allegiances or to fund more than one Democratic candidate. Kerman Maddox, a partner at a public-affairs firm in Los Angeles, said that at a comparable point in the 2008 race he was raising money and organizing events for then-Sen. Obama. This time, he is considering his options after being approached by both Mrs. Clinton’s campaign and Mr. O’Malley’s.

This version of Total Mail Converter is not registered.

"The energy and enthusiasm of 2008 was so infectious, you had to get involved, and that really doesn't exist so far in 2016," said Mr. Maddox. This cycle "so far is underwhelming to me."

But Mrs. Clinton has the bulk of the fundraisers in her camp, including some boldface names and power brokers who raised millions for Mr. Obama, such as Vogue magazine editor Anna Wintour, longtime Hollywood executive Jeffrey Katzenberg and movie producer Harvey Weinstein.

In 2012, 249 people raised at least $500,000 each for Mr. Obama's campaign. Of them, at least 25 now serve as U.S. ambassadors or in other posts that bar political work. The Journal determined the intentions of 72 of the rest.

Of the 72 people, 54, or 75%, said they were committed to raising money for Mrs. Clinton. Six said they had chosen another candidate or were leaning toward one. Four were undecided.

Eight people said they were sitting out the election for personal or other reasons.

Mrs. Clinton and her husband have assembled their own network of fundraisers through decades of campaigning, and a super PAC backing her is raising money as well. Politics is a game of addition, though, and locking in the Obama network would strengthen her hand both in the primary and general election. Moreover, any defections from Mrs. Clinton are noteworthy, because she is perceived as the overwhelming front-runner.

Mrs. Clinton is devoting considerable time to raising money. On Wednesday, she attended three fundraising events, in Massachusetts and Rhode Island. Aides said her aim is to raise $100 million this year to spend during the Democratic primaries.

"We are in a competitive primary, and Hillary Clinton is working to earn the support of Americans across the country," said Josh Schwerin, a campaign spokesman.

Andrew Weinstein, one of the top 2012 Obama bundlers, said he backs Mrs. Clinton because "she's the best chance to preserve the progress that this president has made. She's the LeBron James of the Democratic field: She's going to be impossible to beat in a primary in 2016, and very, very formidable in a general election."

Interviews suggest Mr. O'Malley has the potential to pry loose some of Mrs. Clinton's support, aided by his links to the Obama fundraising team. Mr. O'Malley raised more than a half-million dollars for Mr. Obama in 2012, when he was governor. His campaign's national finance director, Michael Kurtz, served as a Midwest finance director for the president's 2012 campaign.

Mr. O'Malley is scheduled to attend a June 22 fundraising reception in Los Angeles co-hosted by Dixon Slingerland, an invitation shows. Mr. Slingerland raised more than $500,000 for Mr. Obama in 2012. Calls to Mr. Slingerland seeking comment weren't returned.

Doug Goldman, another top Obama bundler, said he has met privately with Mr. O'Malley and is leaning toward supporting him. "Thus far, this race is not going in the right direction for Hillary," Mr. Goldman said. "That's opening the door for others, including Martin O'Malley. The situation is causing me to consider the need to provide support elsewhere."

Bill Hyers, Mr. O'Malley's senior strategist, said it is possible for the former governor to do well in Iowa with a small budget, perhaps $5 million or $6 million. "Iowa's a cheap state," he said.

This version of Total Mail Converter is not registered.

Interviews with former Obama fundraisers found little sign of outreach from the other declared Democratic candidates, Vermont Sen. Bernie Sanders and former Rhode Island Gov. Lincoln Chafee.

George Tsunis, a New York-based hotel executive, is backing Mrs. Clinton but said he would switch to Vice President Joe Biden should he enter the race.

Some fundraisers say they want another option in case Mrs. Clinton stumbles. Ken Solomon, who was Southern California finance chairman for Mr. Obama in 2012, said he was inclined to raise money for Mr. O'Malley as well as for Mrs. Clinton. The party must protect itself in case the leading candidate should falter, Mr. Solomon said.

"We can't be left without a Plan B," he said.

Inside Hillary's house-party strategy // Politico // Annie Karni – June 11, 2015

Since declaring her candidacy in April, Hillary Clinton has spent much of her time attending house parties. Two months and over 30 fundraisers later, Clinton has raised only a relatively modest $13 million or so from the events, according to a POLITICO analysis.

For the hours she has invested meeting donors face to face, Clinton's does not seem like a cost-effective strategy — $13 million, after all, sounds like one very good week for former Florida Gov. Jeb Bush, who has been running his campaign out of his super PAC and is expected to raise somewhere in the vicinity of $100 million in the first quarter. And it's a departure from her strategy last time around, when Clinton hauled in $36 million in the first three months of her 2008 presidential bid.

But Clinton's gamble is that while collecting relatively small checks from relatively small groups — the maximum is $2,700 per head and the average party attracts about 120 people — she is also harvesting something else: goodwill, in a business sense, among a cohort of early donors whose feeling of personal connection to Clinton and her campaign are expected to pay dividends down the line.

"This was a very unique opportunity, because she's only raising primary money, and when the campaign gets geared up and she starts raising general election money, events will have to be bigger," said Tom Nides, a longtime Clinton donor. "It's hard and she's got a lot of stamina. But it was an investment in the future."

Clinton's "ramp-up" period, as her campaign calls it, ends Saturday with her big kick-off rally. During the two month ramp-up stretch, the roughly 60 donors who hosted her earliest fundraisers have acted like early stage VCs investing in a new start-up. And they are expected to be valuable to her beyond writing one big check.

A review of the first-wave hosts shows a varied group made up of billionaire hedge fund managers and real estate honchos, personal injury lawyers, professors, film producers, ambassadors — even the original tiger mom.

They represent longtime Friends of Bill with ties to the Clinton Foundation, former bundlers for President Obama, and individuals getting involved in presidential politics for the first time. They live in cities across the country, from New York City to San Francisco to Houston. Many of them are women. Because of high demand to host and a tight schedule, some who have never met before have been paired together by the campaign as co-hosts.

Among the group are those mega-wealthy usual suspects who have backed the Clintons in the past. They include philanthropist Susie Tompkins Buell, the co-founder of Esprit and a close Clinton friend; banker Steve Rattner, who served as Obama's car czar; billionaires Cheryl and Haim Saban, the chairman of Univision; billion venture capitalist J.B. Pritzker, media mogul Fred Eychaner; hedge fund manager and Chelsea Clinton's former boss Marc Lasry; and billionaire environmentalist Tom Steyer — all longtime supporters who over the years have also donated millions to the Clinton Foundation.

This version of Total Mail Converter is not registered.

Two ambassadors are on the list: Elizabeth Bagley, who bundled $100,000 for Clinton during her last run and who has given over $1 million to the Clinton Foundation, and Ed Romero, who was appointed Ambassador to Spain by Bill Clinton.

But the early host group also includes faces new to Clinton world. Former Obama bundlers like Frank White and John Morgan, hosted events in Washington, D.C. and Orlando. Another new addition to a Hillaryland: Eileen Donahue, who chaired the National Women for Obama Finance Committee in 2008.

The list includes supporters who have never been deeply involved in political fundraising before, like music producer LA Reid and his wife, Erica, whose Manhattan event attracted pop star Beyonce and singer Meghan Trainor. In Atlanta, A.J. and Judy Johnson hosted an event for Clinton on May 28, part of their first foray into hosting events at the presidential level. Jonathan Davis, the founder of a Boston real estate firm, and his wife, Margot, hosted Clinton at their Chestnut Hill home on Wednesday —one of their first political fundraisers.

"I have never done a fundraiser for her, or for presidential candidates before," said Yale Law professor Judith Resnik, who co-hosted a New Haven event for Clinton last week after some of Clinton's former classmates from Yale Law School reached out and asked her to. Her co-host at the event, she said, was Amy Chua, law professor and best-selling author of "The Battle Hymn of the Tiger Mother," another newer addition to Clinton's coterie of supporters.

"Having a grown-up woman in charge of the U.S. would not only be great for the country but for the globe," said Resnik. "I'm completely enthusiastic and delighted to help."

Resnik is not the only supporter motivated by electing the country's first female president. While Clinton has not been stressing the historic nature of her run in public events so far, the early stage fundraisers include many women who want to be in on the ground floor as Clinton gives it her last go.

Silda Wall Spitzer, the former first lady of New York, hosted a "conversation with Hillary Clinton" billed as a women's-only fundraiser. At the Women's National Democratic Club in Washington, D.C., Clinton's hosts were Claire Lucas and Judy Dlugacz, founders of a cruise line targeting gay women. Laura Ricketts, a co-owner of the Chicago Cubs, has previously served as a top LGBT bundler for Obama. She co-hosted a house party for Clinton in Chicago last month.

Another faction of the early-investor group are elected officials, like Reps. Grace Meng and Joe Crowley of Queens, who co-hosted an event in Queens on June 1, and are valuable because they can mobilize their constituencies to get involved with the campaign down the line.

"I've been a Hillary supporter since day one," said Crowley, who recalled Clinton staying over at his home in Queens during her listening tour when she ran for Senate. California Sen. Barbara Boxer also co-hosted an event with television producer Steven Bochco and his wife, Dayna.

Some of the hosts proactively reached out to the campaign offering to help, others were connected by mutual acquaintances, and others were asked by the campaign to help.

Hillary Clinton speaks as J.B. Pritzker looks on at the Economic Club of Chicago on Oct. 8, 2014.

This version of Total Mail Converter is not registered.

"I know people who couldn't get on the schedule," said Jacobs, a prominent New York Democrat and Clinton fundraiser who hosted the former Secretary of State at his Long Island home on June 1. "I've been advocating to do an early fundraiser for a long time. I let them know a long time ago, I mean way longer ago than since she announced. I was chomping at the bit."

The average house party, so far, has been limited to about 120 attendees. At those events, Clinton typically delivers remarks for about 20 minutes, and then circulates, spending some one-on-one time and taking a photo with every attendee. She's been known to linger longer than scheduled, taking her time.

All in all, hers is a big pitch for some small checks — and the cheapest way Democratic donors have been able to get real face time with a top-tier presidential candidate since Barack Obama's early fundraising events in 2007.

As the campaign heats up over the coming months, the small house parties at low prices will be slowly phased out and replaced with larger, lower-dollar events to attract bigger crowds, according to a campaign official.

But the investments Clinton is expecting from her early stage donors is emotional capital, which will be used to spread much-needed enthusiasm among a broader set of donors who can be hit up for money multiple times over the next 18 months.

"This decision will pay enormous benefits to the campaign long term," said Nides. "There's a multiplier effect."

The Real Felony: Denying Prisoners the Right to Vote // The Daily Beast // Barrett Holmes Pitner – June 12, 2015

Of course ex-felons should have their voting rights restored. But let's go further: There's no good reason to deny prisoners the franchise.

Recently, Hillary Clinton dramatically put voting rights back on the national agenda with an audacious call to register every American citizen when he or she turns 18. Voter ID laws are not new issues in our politics, but Clinton's full-throated appeal felt serious and sincere: Perhaps we will finally tackle the perverse voter disenfranchisement of minorities and the poor that still persists throughout this country.

But I'll go her one better. If Hillary is serious about social justice and equality, I hope she does not overlook one nearly voiceless population that needs to be included in this debate: ex-convicts returning home from prison, and, yes, even incarcerated prisoners.

The United States has the most prisoners of any developed country in the world, and it has the largest total prison population of any nation. Period. America's prison population has increased 800 percent since 1980, and much of the increase is due to harsher punishments for non-violent crimes. As a result, more than 1.57 million inmates are behind bars in federal, state, and county prisons and jails at any one time. And when you consider the estimated 12 million Americans who cycle through county jails for periods of less than a year, the total number of Americans behind bars can jump to an estimated 2.4 million.

When you factor in released inmates who are barred from voting due to felony convictions, the number of voter-disenfranchised Americans grows to an estimated 5.85 million, or 2.5 percent of the nation's voting population, according to a recent report by The Sentencing Project.

This version of Total Mail Converter is not registered.

Additionally, since America consists of a patchwork of laws varying from state to state regarding the voting rights of convicted felons, many felons who have the opportunity to vote are simply unaware or are unable to overcome the bureaucratic hurdles that would allow them to vote, and as a result they become de facto disenfranchised.

Some states allow felons to vote if they are on probation, but not if they are on parole. In Tennessee a felon's voting rights can be revoked if he is late on child support payments.

According to Myrna Pérez, deputy director of the Brennan Center's Democracy Program, "There are some states where it does not matter what you did, how long ago it was, how young you were, etc. If you have a felony conviction in the past you have lost your right to vote permanently, unless the governor specifically decides that he or she wants to pardon you."

Yet finding various creative ways to keep certain Americans off the voting rolls has not been adopted by all of America. Vermont and Maine have both bucked the trend of voter disenfranchisement and allow inmates to vote.

In fact, Vermont's 1793 Constitution stipulates that residents can lose their right to vote only if convicted of voter fraud.

Vermont and Maine have both bucked the trend of voter disenfranchisement and allow inmates to vote.

So to the Republicans such as New Jersey Governor Chris Christie who have already scoffed at Clinton's voter expansion proposal for fear that it would create voter fraud, and would inevitably deride the expansion of voting rights to felons and inmates, the State of Vermont successfully handled this issue more than two centuries ago.

At a national level, one of the biggest questions regarding inmates voting is what voting precinct these votes fall in. Many prisons are located in rural areas that are represented by Republicans at the state and national level, and as African-Americans make up a disproportionate size of the prison population, many conservative areas would be less inclined to open voting to a demographic that leans heavily Democratic.

The logical extension would be that we allow prisoners to vote absentee ballot from their known address at the time of conviction, or the address they intend to return to upon release, and not for the one where their detention facility is located.

The debate on extending voting rights to inmates and convicts is more than just an individual rights or social justice issue. It makes sense from a public policy and law enforcement perspective too. Voting has been shown to have a rehabilitative effect that can reduce recidivism and thereby, crime, and save governments millions of dollars. Recidivism has been shown to drop by at least 10 percent when voting has been extended to ex-felons.

"It is important for voting rights to be extended to those that are incarcerated so that they can remain connected to the communities that they will ultimately return to," said Laurin Hodge, the president and executive director of Mission Launch, a non-profit that works to reacclimatize the previously incarcerated into civil society. "Ultimately prison should be about rehabilitation and not ongoing punishment."

Additionally, even for those with life sentences or on death row, the act of voting can have an impact that reverberates throughout their communities back home.

It is becoming more apparent that voting is a responsibility that needs to be fostered, and many people develop the voting habit from observing previous generations. Voting builds stronger communities of people who are more likely to participate in the democratic process. Similarly, inmates who are able to vote will feel more connected and invested in their communities, and can set a positive example to the outside world while they are behind bars.

This version of Total Mail Converter is not registered.

It may be easy to discredit how informed inmates may be, but data are emerging showing that “informed” voters by and large vote along party lines and are not as well versed on the issues as we would like to believe. And we need not forget that prisoners have plenty of spare time, and are one of the few demographics that could leisurely read two newspapers a day and still find time to watch the evening news.

The argument for keeping the incarcerated and the newly released off the voting rolls is based on an archaic punitive disciplinary structure that we need to move beyond. Maintaining an electoral process that actively works to disenfranchise nearly 3 percent of eligible voters is a structure that no democratic nation should support.

Hillary Rally Vs. the Gun Show at Iowa State Fair // The Weekly Standard // Jeryl Bier – June 11, 2015

Hillary Clinton will certainly have supporters at Sunday's rally in Des Moines at the Iowa State Fairgrounds, but could face some stiff competition from another event: the final day of a three-day gun show. The show is one of six being held during 2015 at the fairgrounds, and one of more than a dozen put on around Iowa during the year by the show's promoter, Trade Show Productions:

The gun show is located in one of the fairground's 24 venues, the William C. Knapp Building. The Clinton campaign does not specify the venue for Sunday's rally, but a 2007 rally for Mrs. Clinton on her first run for president was held at one of the fairground's outdoor staging areas. According to CBS News, that event featured "an elaborate stage of hay bales, American flags and even a fireworks show at the conclusion."

Last summer, Mrs. Clinton had some harsh words for Second Amendment supporters, saying (via The Hill):

“We cannot let a minority of people, and that’s what it is, it is a minority of people, hold a view point that terrorizes the majority of people,” Clinton said during a CNN town-hall event.

It is unlikely Mrs. Clinton will address gun control Sunday, and not simply because of the proximity of the gun show. The second-time candidate has been hesitant so far in 2015 to articulate many specific policy proposals, and The Hill even speculated that muting her support of gun control measures could benefit Mrs. Clinton in the general election:

The extent to which Clinton embraces gun control in her White House bid remains to be seen.

While an emphasis on guns could help Clinton win over the left, it could prove to be a liability in several battleground states that could decide the presidential election.

For the first time in decades, a majority of Americans say it is more important to protect gun rights than it is to limit gun ownership, according to a December poll from the Pew Research Center.

The same Pew poll found that a slight majority of women now believe owning a handgun can protect them from becoming victims of crime.

The gun show is not the only event competing with the Clinton relaunch rally. The Iowa State Fairgrounds schedule shows that a flea market is also running Sunday concurrently with the rally. If Mrs. Clinton intends to continue to make her appeal to be the "champion" of Everyday Americans, plenty of them should be on hand this weekend in Des Moines.

This version of Total Mail Converter is not registered.

Hillary Clinton's Truth-O-Meter record // Politifact // Lauren // Carroll – June 11, 2015

Hillary Clinton formally announced her 2016 presidential campaign with a video in April, and she's been on the trail since -- but she's courting media attention with a major launch event on June 12 at New York City's Roosevelt Island, a site that invokes the legacy of its namesake, President Franklin D. Roosevelt.

The former secretary of state is slated to deliver a speech to a large audience, a contrast with her recent series of small, roundtable-style events that she's held in the early caucus and primary states of Iowa and New Hampshire.

We've fact-checked Clinton more than 100 times since we began operations in 2007 -- a period that stretches back to her first presidential campaign. So far during the 2016 campaign, we've checked nine of her claims.

Clinton, wife of former President Bill Clinton, is also a former Democratic senator from New York. Her Truth-O-Meter record over the past eight years includes 34 Trues, 19 Mostly Trues, 23 Half Trues, 18 Mostly Falses, 11 Falses and Two Pants on Fires.

We'll continue to watch Clinton's campaign closely looking for facts to check, but for now, here are some of the most interesting fact-checks in our Hillary Clinton file.

2016

Most recently, we looked into several claims from a speech in which Clinton called for an expansion of voting rights. Clinton attacked what she described as efforts to restrict voting by Republican governors who also are potential presidential candidates. She singled out former Florida Gov. Jeb Bush, New Jersey Gov. Chris Christie, former Texas Gov. Rick Perry and Wisconsin Gov. Scott Walker. PolitiFact looked into specific claims related to these four governors and found that her attack lines were largely accurate but could have used some additional context. We gave her four Mostly Trues.

Meanwhile, at a campaign event in Iowa, Clinton tried to show that she understands the struggles of undocumented immigrants by saying that "all my grandparents" immigrated to America. We found that not all of Hillary Clinton's grandparents were immigrants -- in fact, only one was. (Buzzfeed fact-checked it first.) So we rated that claim False.

Also in Iowa, she lamented that "hedge fund managers themselves make more and pay less in taxes than nurses and truck drivers." Looking at the amount paid, we found that fund managers were paying multi-million-dollar tax bills to the IRS, compared to an above-average example of a nurse paying $15,700. Even her intended point -- that hedge fund managers pay a lower tax rate -- isn't clearly accurate. We gave that claim a False.

Earlier claims

Before her campaign launch, we looked into Clinton's claim that she "fully complied with every rule" while exclusively using private email while secretary of state. We couldn't put this claim on the Truth-O-Meter because too much remains unknown. Still, we interviewed several experts on government transparency and records preservation. They said a lawyer might be able to put together a case that Clinton "complied" with the rules governing federal employee email use -- but they added that her actions are still hard to defend. (Read the full report.)

This version of Total Mail Converter is not registered.

In 2014, while on a publicity tour for her book Hard Choices, Clinton said that she and her husband "came out of the White House not only dead broke, but in debt." It's possible that the Clintons' liabilities exceeded their assets when Bill's term ended in 2001, but they were able to muster a cash down payment of $855,000 and secure a $1.995 million mortgage. Additionally, in the months following their departure from the White House, Bill Clinton regularly took in speaking fees of at least $125,000, and Hillary Clinton received $2.84 million in book royalties. We rated that claim Mostly False.

In an interview, Clinton said the number of jobs created and people lifted out of poverty during Bill Clinton's presidency was "a hundred times" what it was under President Ronald Reagan. Clinton's record on these issues does outpace Reagan's, but the differences were not like night and day, as her phrasing claims. We rated this claim False.

Many Republicans have criticized Clinton's actions before, during and after the deadly 2012 attack on an American diplomatic compound in Benghazi. In Clinton's testimony before Congress, regarding the motivation behind the attack, she asked rhetorically, "At this point, what difference does it make?" The question became an oft-quoted sound bite, so we decided to lay out the full quote in context.

Her 2008 campaign

In a 2008 foreign policy speech, Clinton reminisced about her days as first lady and a trip to Tuzla, Bosnia, that she made in March 1996. She said, "I remember landing under sniper fire." But that's not what happened, as demonstrated by CBS News video that shows Clinton arriving on the tarmac under no visible duress, and greeting a child who offers her a copy of a poem. We rated the claim Pants on Fire.

Perhaps the strangest claim from Clinton's first campaign was that "A ham and cheese sandwich on one slice of bread is the responsibility of the USDA ... But a ham and cheese sandwich on two slices of bread is the responsibility of the Food and Drug Administration." A USDA undersecretary told PolitiFact that Clinton's description of sandwich regulations is accurate -- and that the rule "defies logic." We rated her claim True.

Change she can believe in: Clinton bets voters want more of the same, only better // LA Times // David Lauter – June 11, 2015

the heart of Hillary Rodham Clinton's strategy for winning the presidency lies a basic assumption about the public's desire for political change.

History says that after eight years of a presidency, Americans typically want something different. Elections in which one party seeks a third term in the White House tend to be tough slogs. Indeed, as Clinton prepares for the first major rally of her campaign on Saturday in New York, Americans by about 2 to 1 say the country is headed down the "wrong track."

But what sort of change do Americans want?

Republican candidates, from former Florida Gov. Jeb Bush in the party's center to Sen. Ted Cruz of Texas on its right, are betting that voters want a major shift toward conservatism.

This version of Total Mail Converter is not registered.

Clinton, the overwhelming favorite to win the Democratic nomination, has made a different calculation. Her advisors believe that a significant share of those who say the country is on the wrong track feel that Republican policies would only make matters worse.

On the big issues, voters favor President Obama's values and priorities, Democratic strategists say. What they want is to see that agenda implemented more effectively.

That's why, while Clinton plans to roll out policy proposals this summer, some of which will differ from or go beyond Obama's, the more crucial pitch will be about her ability to govern.

As she told supporters at a recent speech in South Carolina: “I do know how hard this job I'm seeking is. I've seen it up close and personal. You're not gonna catch me wondering what it's like. Instead, I'm spending my time planning for what I will do for you when I get there.”

“You're also not going to see me shrink from a fight,” she added. “I think you know by now I don't quit.”

That emphasis on Clinton's toughness and tenacity aims to reach voters who say in polls and focus groups that they supported Obama but have grown disappointed about how much he's been able to accomplish. It addresses a major concern for Democrats, but also poses some risks.

The concern could be seen at a focus group a few weeks before last fall's midterm election, as an African American woman, the mother of a 7-year-old girl, sighed slightly as she gave her opinion of the man she had twice backed for president.

“I would say he seems depressed,” she said of Obama. “I really don't feel he's had the opportunity to do the things that he is capable of doing because different parties are holding him back.”

That's a view that strategists in both parties continue to see frequently.

“Most people don't blame the president,” said Democratic pollster Mark Mellman. “But they do wish more had gotten done.”

The first big risk for Clinton in trying to turn that sentiment to her advantage is the possibility that Republicans have better gauged the public mood.

“An overwhelming majority of Americans want to see a new set of policies from their next president, not a continuation of the same failed ones,” said Republican National Committee spokesman Michael Short.

A second pitfall is that highlighting Clinton's skill at political combat could worsen a problem that Obama famously poked when the two opposed each other in 2008: “You're likable enough, Hillary,” he dismissively quipped during a debate.

On the first concern, public polls offer considerable evidence for the Democrats' view, with one major caveat about the role of government.

This version of Total Mail Converter is not registered.

The RNC's Short points to polls showing that Americans want the next president to “change direction” from Obama's policies. When asked about specific issues, however, rather than Obama in general, the needle swings in the other direction.

Asked, for example, whether the government should do more to address the growing income gap between the very rich and everyone else, Americans supported more government action by 57% to 39% in a recent CBS/New York Times poll. Even larger majorities favored a hike in the minimum wage — which all the current GOP candidates oppose — plus higher taxes on millionaires and government-mandated paid family leave.

On social issues, numerous polls have shown the public growing more liberal across the board. Most notably, surveys find that by roughly 60% to 40%, the public favors marriage rights for same-sex couples, which the Republican candidates oppose with varying degrees of fervor.

Half of Americans in a recent poll by the nonpartisan Pew Research Center said they believe that the earth's climate is warming largely as a result of human activity such as burning fossil fuels, the position espoused by nearly all Democratic elected officials. Only about 1 in 4 said that no solid evidence proves the climate is warming, the position taken by most Republican hopefuls.

By 72% to 27% in a Pew survey last week, the public said that immigrants in the country illegally should be allowed to stay. That majority favoring what conservatives denounce as “amnesty” included 42% who supported allowing the immigrants to seek citizenship, as Clinton advocates, and 26% who favored permanent residency without citizenship, Bush's position.

But while the majority of Americans agree with Democrats on those specific issues, Republicans stay competitive largely because of the deep, abiding skepticism and frustration about government voiced by a majority of Americans, most notably non-college-educated whites.

In a sharply divided nation, a majority of Americans agree with Democrats on specific goals, but a crucial swing bloc mistrusts the ability of either party to get much done or to make the nation's economic system work on their behalf.

That's where touting Clinton's experience and reputation for political shrewdness could pay off, Democratic strategists believe.

At the same time, campaign officials seem resigned to the reality that the negative side of how the public sees her probably won't change.

Unlike most presidential hopefuls, Clinton has the luxury of not having to introduce herself to the public or get over the hurdle of having people see her as a plausible candidate. The flip side of that, however, is that she enters the race with many Americans already opposed to her.

As she has moved back into the political arena from her days as secretary of State, the percentage of Americans who see Clinton unfavorably has risen. Amid controversy over her use of a private email server when she headed the State Department and questions about the motivations of donors to the Clinton Foundation, the share who see her as honest and trustworthy has declined.

This version of Total Mail Converter is not registered.

Democratic strategists insist that's a manageable problem. “It's an issue,” said one strategist with long-standing ties to both Clinton and former President Clinton. “But it's not the only thing.”

“We did a poll just before the 1992 election, and only about one-third of people said Bill was honest and trustworthy, but they elected him anyway,” he said, speaking anonymously to avoid straining ties with the Clintons.

Ironically, one factor helping Clinton is the partisanship that has stalled large parts of Obama's agenda. As Democrats see Clinton under attack, polls show they have started to circle the wagons, dismissing the criticisms as political sniping from the other side. A recent Des Moines Register/Bloomberg Politics poll of Democrats likely to vote in Iowa's caucuses, for example, found that 7 in 10 thought the Clintons were getting a “bad rap” on the controversies.

America's partisan lines have hardened dramatically during the George W. Bush and Obama presidencies, notes Alan Abramowitz, a political science professor at Emory University in Atlanta and an expert on U.S. elections. Because of that, the Clinton campaign's main task is to keep Democrats motivated to vote while reaching out to a relatively small slice of voters who are truly up for grabs, including those disappointed by the achievements of the last eight years.

“It's almost certainly a close election,” Abramowitz said. “The partisan divide is so strong. There's less room for movement.”

Hillary Clinton's big bet: Stress toughness, tenacity, Democratic agenda // LA Times // David Lauter – June 11, 2015

At the heart of Hillary Rodham Clinton’s strategy for winning the presidency lies a basic assumption about the public’s desire for political change.

History says that after eight years of a presidency, Americans typically want something different. Elections in which one party seeks a third term in the White House “tend to be toss-ups” at best, said Alan Abramowitz, political science professor at Emory University.

As Clinton prepares for the first major rally of her campaign, Saturday in New York, Americans by about 2-1 say the country is headed down the “wrong track.”

But what sort of change do Americans want?

Republican candidates, from former Florida Gov. Jeb Bush in the party’s center to Sen. Ted Cruz of Texas on its right, are betting that voters want a major shift toward conservatism.

On the big issues, voters favor President Obama’s values and priorities, Democratic strategists say. What they want is to see that agenda implemented more effectively. Clinton, the overwhelming favorite to win the Democratic nomination, has made a different calculation. Her advisors believe that a significant share of those who say the country is on the wrong track feel that Republican policies would only make matters worse.

That’s why, while Clinton plans to roll out policy proposals this summer, some of which will differ from or go beyond Obama’s, the more crucial pitch will be about her ability to govern.

This version of Total Mail Converter is not registered.

As she told supporters at a recent speech in South Carolina: “I do know how hard this job I’m seeking is. I’ve seen it up close and personal. You’re not going to catch me wondering what it’s like. Instead, I’m spending my time planning for what I will do for you when I get there.

“You’re also not going to see me shrink from a fight,” she added. “I think you know by now I don’t quit.”

That emphasis on Clinton’s toughness and tenacity aims to reach voters who say in polls and focus groups that they supported Obama, but have grown disappointed. It addresses a major concern for Democrats, but also poses some risks.

The concern could be seen at a focus group a few weeks before last fall’s midterm election as an African American woman, mother of a 7-year-old girl, sighed slightly as she gave her opinion of the man she had twice backed for president.

“I would say he seems depressed,” she said of Obama. “I really don’t feel he’s had the opportunity to do the things that he is capable of doing because different parties are holding him back.”

That’s a view that strategists in both parties continue to see frequently.

“Most people don’t blame the president,” said Democratic pollster Mark Mellman, “but they do wish more had gotten done.”

“An overwhelming majority of Americans want to see a new set of policies from their next president, not a continuation of the same failed ones,” said Republican National Committee spokesman Michael Short.The first big risk for Clinton in trying to turn that sentiment to her advantage is the possibility that Republicans have better gauged the public mood.

A second pitfall is that highlighting Clinton’s skill at political combat could worsen a problem that Obama famously poked when the two opposed each other in 2008: “You’re likable enough, Hillary,” he dismissively quipped during a debate.

On the first concern, public polls so far offer considerable evidence for the Democrats’ view, with one major caveat about the role of government.

Short points to polls showing that Americans want the next president to “change direction” from Obama’s policies. When asked about specific issues, however, rather than Obama in general, the needle swings in the other direction.

Asked, for example, whether the government should do more to address the growing income gap between the very rich and everyone else, Americans supported more government action by 57%-39% in a recent CBS/New York Times poll. Even larger majorities favored an increase in the minimum wage, which all the current Republican candidates oppose; higher taxes on millionaires; and government-mandated paid family leave.

On social issues, numerous polls have shown the public growing more liberal across the board. Most notably, surveys find that by roughly 60%-40%, the public favors marriage rights for same-sex couples, which the GOP candidates oppose with varying degrees of fervor.

This version of Total Mail Converter is not registered.

Half of Americans in a recent poll by the nonpartisan Pew Research Center said they believe that the Earth's climate is warming largely as a result of human activity such as burning fossil fuels, the position espoused by nearly all Democratic elected officials. Only about one-in-four said that no solid evidence proves the climate is warming, the position taken by most GOP hopefuls.

By 72%-27% in a Pew survey, the public said that immigrants in the country illegally should be allowed to stay. The majority that favors what conservatives denounce as "amnesty" is divided, with 42% favoring allowing the immigrants to seek citizenship, as Clinton advocates, while 26% supported permanent residency without citizenship, Bush's position.

But while the majority of Americans agree with Democrats on those specific issues, Republicans stay competitive largely because of the deep, abiding skepticism and frustration about government voiced by a majority of Americans, most notably non-college-educated whites.

In a sharply divided nation, a majority of Americans agree with Democrats on specific goals, but a crucial swing bloc mistrusts the ability of either party to get much done or to make the nation's economic system work on their behalf.

That's where touting Clinton's experience and reputation for political shrewdness could pay off, Democratic strategists believe.

At the same time, campaign officials seem resigned to the reality that the negative side of how the public sees her probably won't change.

Unlike most presidential hopefuls, Clinton has the luxury of not having to introduce herself to the public or get over the hurdle of having people see her as a plausible candidate. The flip side of that, however, is that she enters the race with many Americans already opposed to her.

As she has moved back into the political arena from her days as secretary of State, the percentage of Americans who see Clinton unfavorably has risen. Amid controversy over her use of a private email server when she headed the State Department and questions about the motivations of donors to the Clinton Foundation, the share who see her as "honest" and "trustworthy" has declined.

Democratic strategists insist that's a manageable problem. "It's an issue," said one strategist with long-standing ties to both Clinton and former president Bill Clinton, "but it's not the only thing."

"We did a poll just before the 1992 election, and only about one-third of people said Bill was honest and trustworthy, but they elected him anyway," he said, speaking anonymously to avoid straining ties with the Clintons.

One factor helping Clinton is the partisanship that has stalled large parts of Obama's agenda. As Democrats see Clinton under attack, polls show they have started to circle the wagons, dismissing the criticisms as political sniping from the other side. A recent Des Moines Register/Bloomberg Politics poll of Democrats likely to vote in Iowa's caucuses, for example, found that seven in 10 felt the Clintons were getting a "bad rap" on the controversies.

And because America's partisan lines have hardened dramatically during the Bush and Obama presidencies, the Clinton campaign's main task is to keep Democrats motivated to vote while reaching out to a relatively small slice of voters who are truly up for grabs, including those disappointed by the achievements of the last eight years.

This version of Total Mail Converter is not registered.

"It's almost certainly a close election," Abramowitz said. "The partisan divide is so strong. There's less room for movement."

Centrist Dems wary of Hillary's move to the left // The Hill // Alexander Bolton – June 11, 2015

Moderate Democrats are worried about Hillary Clinton's recent embrace of liberal policies.

After positioning herself as a centrist and steely potential commander in chief in the 2008 Democratic primary, Clinton has shifted.

Clinton is now to the left of President Obama on the federal minimum wage. While Obama has endorsed a $10.10 hourly rate, Clinton has signaled support for more than doubling it, to $15 an hour.

The former first lady says same-sex marriage should be a constitutional right and endorsed Obama's executive action shielding millions of illegal immigrants from deportation. She wants broad reform of a criminal justice system and calls for automatic voter registration.

Red-state Democrats in Congress don't want Clinton to lose sight of a broadly appealing economic message that can win over white working-class voters who have deserted the party in droves recently.

"It's important that she has an economic platform that people can get on board with regardless of what state they live in," said Sen. Jon Tester (Mont.), the chairman of the Democratic Senatorial Campaign Committee.

"Be everywhere — Montana, Missouri, everywhere," Tester added.

Centrist Democrats say Clinton should broaden, not narrow, her approach.

"I don't think you write anything off. You show that you're not afraid and you show the ability to go into an area, and it will help lift spirits," said Sen. Joe Manchin (D-W.Va.). "I always do visit all 55 counties in my state. So when I ran statewide, I didn't give up on certain counties and never visited. So you don't give up on anybody."

It is very common for presidential candidates to move closer to their base in the primary and shift back to the center in the general election. But Clinton's strategy suggests she needs to shore up more of the base and is responding to pressure from liberal leaders such as Sen. Elizabeth Warren (D-Mass.).

Still, moderate Democrats are particularly concerned about Clinton's potential effect on state legislative races in Republican dominated states. They worry if she stays away from solid-red states, they will have a hard time winning down-ballot races that could shape the congressional districts of the future.

Some were alarmed when The New York Times reported that she is discarding the nationwide electoral strategy that her husband employed in the 1990s to win Southern states such as Arkansas, Georgia, Kentucky, Louisiana and Tennessee.

This version of Total Mail Converter is not registered.

The Times reported she is poised to “retrace Barack Obama’s far narrower path to the presidency” by focusing on the liberal base in a handful of battleground states in the Midwest and West instead of persuading undecided voters.

They fear a reprise of the failed electoral strategies of John Kerry in 2004 and Al Gore in 2000, who poured their resources into a handful of swing states instead of attempting to widen the playing field by playing offense in traditionally Republican territory.

“The election to look at was in 2004. John Kerry had conceded 227 electoral votes before Election Day. That means George Bush only had to get 43. That is the danger you run into. It took Al Gore down in 2000. You can’t concede but so much. I don’t think you concede anything. I think you battle them everywhere,” said David “Mudcat” Saunders, a Democratic strategist who specializes in reaching white, working-class voters.

Saunders says Kerry blundered by suspending campaign operations in seven states — Virginia, Louisiana, Arkansas, Missouri, Nevada, Arizona and Colorado — after winning the Democratic nomination in 2004. It didn’t help, he added, that Democrats decided to nominate him at a convention held in liberal-leaning Boston.

While Clinton might not have much hope of winning in Louisiana, Missouri or South Carolina, strategists argue that making a good-faith effort in those states can help candidates down ballot.

“The problem you got is the state legislatures. Take South Carolina for instance. In 2016 they’re going to have house elections and senate elections in their statehouse. If the Democrats don’t play there, it doesn’t increase turnout. Turnout in all cases always helps the Democrats in those areas,” Saunders said.

Clinton’s current chief rival, Vermont Sen. Bernie Sanders, has aggressively pushed a 50-state strategy for more than a year.

Last year he met with activists, unionized workers and college students in Alabama, Georgia, Mississippi and South Carolina. This month he wrote a letter to Democratic National Committee Chairwoman Debbie Wasserman Schultz calling for presidential debates in red states.

“By expanding the scope geographically of debates beyond the early calendar states we can begin to awaken activism at the grassroots level in those states and signal to Democrats and progressives in places like Texas, Mississippi, Utah, and Wyoming that their states are not forgotten by the Democratic Party,” he wrote.

Rep. David Price (N.C.), one of only a handful of white Southern Democrats left in the House, said, “I agree with what people in the so-called red states are saying about the down-ballot effects. A successful president is going to have to have some support from those states and members elected from those states.

“There’s a stake for the presidential candidate in spending a reasonable amount of time in non-blue-state areas,” he added.

The Clinton campaign, which did not comment for this article, has not publicly acknowledged giving up on a 50-state strategy.

It unveiled a nationwide organizing effort in April with a video in which Clinton vowed “there’s gonna be campaigns in all 50 states and we’re gonna need as many people as we can to volunteer, to sign up, to help us organize because I need your voices to be speaking out.”

This version of Total Mail Converter is not registered.

Rep. John Yarmuth, a Democrat from Kentucky, said he has heard Clinton already has a field director in his home state.

He believes Clinton has a chance of winning Kentucky, which her husband carried twice; he urged her to visit.

Some Democrats, however, argue that Clinton won't alienate voters in Southern states if she pushes immigration reform and same-sex marriage.

"In my district we have over 100 languages spoken in the public school system. It's become a very diverse population," said Yarmuth. "We have a huge thoroughbred breeding operation and thoroughbred breeding industry that relies heavily on immigrant labor. The people of Kentucky understand how important immigration reform is.

"Voting rights are important everywhere. Gay marriage is an issue right now that doesn't move voters away from somebody," he added.

Hillary Clinton's Economic Inequality Whisperer // National Journal // Eric Garcia – June 12, 2015

Heather Boushey's work on income inequality, paid family leave, and more may provide a preview of Hillary Clinton's 2016 messaging.

June 12, 2015 In her first campaign video, Hillary Clinton talked about how "the deck is still stacked in favor of those at the top" and how she wanted to be the champion for "everyday Americans." In one of her first campaign stops, she criticized outsized CEO compensation. And in March, before her official announcement, she said Americans should "think hard" about ways to make sure cities deal with inequality. But despite Clinton's talk, the actual specifics of what she would do as president to ameliorate growing wealth and income inequality in the United States have been quite thin.

To get an idea of what Clinton's proposals could be, talk to Heather Boushey, an economist who's regarded as a valuable adviser to the former secretary of state on economic policy.

"In terms of what I have been talking to her about, it has been about the big questions about what we should do for our economy and how we should think about the interventions that policymakers should make," Boushey told National Journal.

Boushey, who is advising Clinton in a private capacity, serves as executive director and chief economist of the Washington Center for Equitable Growth, which aims to make wonky research tangible for policymakers. In a way, that's what Boushey is working to do for Clinton. Boushey has researched the role of women in the workforce, income inequality, and paid family leave—all things that Clinton will be talking about in 2016.

Elisabeth Jacobs, senior director for policy and academic programs at the Washington Center, says Boushey is good at it, too. Boushey and Jacobs once explained French economist Thomas Piketty's landmark book on wealth inequality, Capital in the Twenty-First Century, to Sen. Angus King. That, Jacobs said, was like giving the senator "the Cliff Notes" version, and then starting "a conversation about what this might actually mean based on what he was thinking."

This version of Total Mail Converter is not registered.

"She's really exceptional in doing that translational work between the serious economic and other social science academic work into the policy space," Jacobs says of Boushey.

Boushey's work on paid family leave has lent some potential clarity to the candidate's policy gaps. Clinton hasn't said much about how she would enact the policy, and Jane Waldfogel, a professor at Columbia University School of Social Work, says it's difficult to get that done at the national level versus at the state level. Three states that have started paid family leave policies have used their already-existing temporary disability insurance programs to do so, and only five states and Puerto Rico have temporary disability insurance (Washington State had its program signed in 2007 but is not yet in effect.).

Boushey thinks a national paid family leave policy is possible. In a 2012 paper for Center for American Progress, where she is a senior fellow, Boushey laid out plan for a paid family leave program that would be administered by the Social Security Administration.

On CEO pay, Boushey again gets more detailed.

"There's a lot of wiggle room to be taxing at the top, but how you do that actually has implications for compensation," Boushey says, citing a study by Piketty, University of California, Berkeley's Emmanuel Saez, and Harvard's Stefanie Stantcheva. Boushey had the economists' study out in front of her during our interview. "There's a lot of evidence that the way we've been structuring tax policy vis–à–vis those at the top is not creating the right incentives for investment, [research and development] and shared prosperity," she said.

Boushey is glad that the wealth gap has come to the forefront of the 2016 political debate.

"I have to say that it is beyond exciting to see things that you have been, for me, working on spreadsheets for and thinking about for a really long time actually entering the political discourse," she said.

Boushey said recoveries from the last three national recessions, including the most recent one, have seen anemic job growth, which has made people more aware of the gap between rich and poor—and what that means for the economy.

"What you're seeing are repeated recoveries that just aren't cutting it," she said. "We've been like ostriches putting our heads in the sand going, 'What has changed in the past two decades?'" Boushey answers her own question: "Well, one of the biggest things is inequality."

Other researchers emphasize Boushey's realism and attempts to convert ideas that are being discussed in research circles into tangible policies.

"Heather really has been the person over the last several years who has taken the lead of just thinking really hard what it would take to enact paid family leave on the national level," said Jane Waldfogel, a professor at Columbia University School of Social Work. "She has her feet on the ground and has a very firm grasp of the economic principles."

For Boushey, an important part of being an income inequality-focused economist interested is trying to make the results of her research tangible for the average citizen.

"Where I think you hit the sweet spot in research is when what you can actually tease out of these datasets actually resonates with people's real-lived experiences," Boushey said. "For me, those moments come when I talk about my own research with my allergist, with my mom, and my mother-in-law."

This version of Total Mail Converter is not registered.

By translating income inequality to people's experiences, Boushey could help Clinton craft a message on inequality that could appeal to ordinary Americans—and present inequality not through a divisive prism of class war, but as a matter of economic security.

THE LEGACY TRAP // National Journal // Ronald Brownstein – June 12, 2015

Can Clinton and Bush transcend debates about their families' pasts to offer answers for the country's future?

As Hillary Clinton and Jeb Bush formalize their presidential candidacies over the next few days, both face the complex challenge of adapting their family legacies to their parties' new dynamics.

Compared with Bill Clinton's era, the Democratic Party today is more culturally liberal and economically populist. Compared with George W. Bush's era, the GOP is more dogmatically committed to shrinking government. These changes have presented Hillary Clinton and Jeb Bush with the common puzzle of appealing to parties that have grown more ideologically militant without renouncing the policy agendas and political strategies associated with their family names—agendas and strategies that often defied each party's traditional orthodoxy.

So far, this test has stumped Bush more than Clinton—as underscored by the campaign-staff reshuffle the former Florida governor announced this week, just before he is due to officially declare his candidacy next Monday. His lackluster first months exploring the race have been dominated by questions of where he would extend the policies of his brother, George W. Bush. That has exposed Jeb Bush to darts from both ideological conservatives and party pragmatists most concerned about finding a candidate who can win.

The pragmatists were dismayed by Bush's recent struggles to explain what he would have done differently than his brother in Iraq. That ordeal left Republicans fearing that if the party nominates Bush, Democrats would find it too easy to convert the campaign into a referendum on returning to the policies of the last Bush administration.

Bush's problems with the Right are rooted in two other elements of his brother's legacy. Though staunchly conservative on most issues, George W. Bush backed a pathway to citizenship for undocumented immigrants and an aggressive role for Washington in education reform. Politically, each idea was intended to court voters beyond the GOP base.

Conservatives chafed against those policies during George W. Bush's presidency and, after he left office, successfully eroded support in the party for both ideas. Jeb Bush, though, threatens that victory. The younger Bush has said he would accept either a pathway to citizenship or permanent legal status for the undocumented, and he has defended the Common Core curriculum reform (while rejecting President Obama's effort to advance it through federal policy).

Can Bush win these arguments in the GOP? Despite loud resistance from prominent conservatives, "Jeb Bush's view on immigration is ... more acceptable to Republican primary voters than most people assume," notes Peter Wehner, senior fellow at the Ethics and Public Policy Center. While many Republican voters view immigration skeptically, in the latest Pew Research Center survey, nearly three-fifths of the party (including GOP-leaning independents) said the undocumented should be allowed to remain legally inside the country. That number reached nearly two-thirds among the college-educated Republicans who are Bush's natural constituency.

Bush's continued support for Common Core may be a tougher sell with Republican voters. But it's probably less important for Bush to win the specific debates over immigration and education than to subsume both issues beneath bold new domestic and foreign policy ideas that excite GOP voters. So far he hasn't done that. Unless

This version of Total Mail Converter is not registered.

Bush can shift his campaign's focus toward the country's future, he's likely to remain stuck in debates over his party's past. And driving in reverse is no way to win a race.

Hillary Clinton, who kicks her campaign into higher gear with a major address on Saturday, hasn't faced nearly as much pressure yet within her party but could eventually confront her own legacy trap. Her announced rivals, Sen. Bernie Sanders of Vermont and former Maryland Gov. Martin O'Malley, have denounced free-trade and financial-deregulation policies that Bill Clinton pursued. Other Democrats worry about the Clinton family heritage of ethical controversy. On both fronts, Hillary Clinton's challenge will be less to defend that record than to transcend it.

On social issues such as gay marriage, Hillary Clinton has already embraced the Democrats' more liberal consensus. But for all her fiery economic rhetoric, it's not clear where she will land between her husband's business-friendly, deficit-conscious centrism and her party's rising populist current. It seems inevitable that Clinton, like Obama, will propose more responsibility for Washington than her husband envisioned when he declared, "The era of big government is over." Less certain is whether she will challenge her party to simultaneously reform government, as Bill Clinton did when he restructured welfare and balanced the federal budget. If she embraces reform (for instance, by streamlining entitlements for seniors to fund investments in kids), she risks antagonizing the Left; if she doesn't, she risks helping Republicans tag her as a return to uncontrolled big-government liberalism.

Like Jeb Bush, Hillary Clinton has to convince Americans that she is offering not just a dusted-off collection of ideas stored in the family attic but an agenda attuned to the challenges people face today. Their famous families make almost everything else about running for president easier, but no contenders may find that bar harder to clear than the candidates named Clinton and Bush.

POLITICAL INSIDERS POLL // National Journal // Sarah Mimms – June 12, 2015

"I think the contributors to the foundation pose the biggest problem."

Q: Does Hillary Clinton's wealth pose a problem for Democratic messaging in 2016?

DEMOCRATS (91 VOTES)

Yes: 30%

No: 70%

Yes

"Clouds the income-inequality message, which is not necessarily a winning message, but complicates it nonetheless."

"Nothing says 'middle class' quite like a $250,000 speaking fee."

"Hillary's camp will continue to protest that she's operated in a lawful way, but traction on speeches-for-hire and suspect activities of [the Clinton Global Initiative] are too inviting to ignore by ad-makers. Problem."

"Best case, we won't be able to attack Repubs as out of touch. Worse case, they turn HRC into Romney."

This version of Total Mail Converter is not registered.

"It's not the wealth itself but the means by which she accumulated it that makes it hard for 'ordinary Americans' to relate."

"I think the contributors to the foundation pose the biggest problem."

No

"Voters respect wealth. The issue is what you do with it and how you got it. She will be fine."

"FDR, JFK, HRC. No."

"As long as she doesn't build a car elevator in her house, she will be fine. Americans still admire success, although not ostentatiousness."

"Last time I checked, Lifestyles of the Rich & Famous and Keeping up with the Kardashians were very popular TV shows. She's fine as long as she keeps a common touch."

"If she were new to the electorate, possibly. But that's not the case. If you like her, you like her regardless. Who are the nonwealthy candidates?"

Q: Does Hillary Clinton's wealth pose a problem for Democratic messaging in 2016?

REPUBLICANS (88 VOTES)

Yes: 82%

No: 18%

Yes

"Hypocrisy anyone?"

"Both her declared primary opponents will put her on the defensive on this."

"It's going to be very hard for her to talk about income inequality when she's been getting six figures for an hour-long speech."

"Her definition of 'flat broke' is different from most people's."

This version of Total Mail Converter is not registered.

"In the context of income inequality, it takes away a huge issue for the Democrats."

"Wellesley, Yale, corporate boards, governor's mansion, White House, Senate, Foggy Bottom, back to the White House... just like you and me."

"Not because of how much money she has but the way she has made it and the way they have operated the Clinton Foundation."

"Like Romney, it is not the fact [that]she is wealthy that is a problem; it is her inability to talk about it that is a killer."

"Not as bad as Romney's car garage, but makes her Warren channeling seem a bit hollow."

No

"Rich Democrats get a pass in a way that rich Republicans never could."

"People generally expect politicians to be rich."

"She'll argue she can't be bought. The irony will be lost on the stupid."

. . . . . .

What Hillary Clinton Can Learn from Michelle Kwan's Figure Skating Career // The New Republic //
Elspeth Reeve – June 11, 2015

Hillary Clinton has hired beloved Olympic figure skater Michelle Kwan. But if you followed the athlete's career, the symbolism couldn't be more disastrous for Clinton's 2016 campaign. Clinton's career has some uncomfortable parallels with Kwan's: No one could beat the Kween. Until someone did.

Some political writers (dudes) like to compare politics to football or baseball, team events with many players and many games. But clear-eyed sport-loving political writers (me) know that politics is actually like the glamour sports—ice skating and gymnastics—which involve years of unseen training and a whole team of coaches and image-makers who sit on the sidelines on the big night as the athlete competes alone in the spotlight.

The tortured but entertainingly ominous HillKwan analogy goes like this: The 1998 Olympics Games in Nagano are the 2008 election. HillKwan is the beloved favorite. Kwan was the U.S. national champion; Clinton had coasted to reelection in the Senate. But a year before the Olympics/election, a fresh-faced youngster named Tara Lipinski [Barack Obama] had been getting attention. At the Olympics, HillKwan won over the judges [super delegates], but in the free skate, Tarack competed dazzling feats of difficulty and strength [doing the math on the primaries and caucuses]. In the end, HillKwan was defeated by the upstart Tarack.

Now, the important and serious question we face today is: Is the 2016 election exactly like the 2002 Olympic figure skating competition? Like Clinton in 2016, the graceful Kwan was the favorite in Salt Lake City, too. It was her turn. Despite troubles with her longtime coach [staff?], she was again U.S. national champion. Sure, Kwan faced tough competition from Russians [Republicans?] in the form of Irina Slutskaya [war on women!], but she was the battle-tested veteran, competing on home turf [friendly demographic trends!]. She started strong, winning the short program [the invisible primary?]. But in the free skate, Kwan stumbled. She was surpassed not only by Slutskaya, but by another teammate, the 16-year-old athletic snoozefest Sarah Hughes [Martin O'Malley??], who became 2002 Olympic champion. After the competition, Kwan skated the exibition she'd planned long before—in a gold dress, to the song "Fields of Gold." That, sports fans, is hubris. As she finished, tears ran down her cheek. Take note, Hillary.

This version of Total Mail Converter is not registered.

"Every four years a new person arose to take out Michelle," former pairs skater Chris Schleicher told Deadspin last year. Sound familiar? Kwan is now fully on board with Clinton's campaign to make sure Olympic past is not political prologue.

With boost from Clinton, efforts to expand voting access advance // MSNBC // Zachary Toth – June 11, 2015

States from Rhode Island to Louisiana took steps this week toward making voting easier. In Washington, a new bill that would automatically register citizens to vote when they turn 18 is gaining traction among Democrats. And Ohio's top voting official blocked a Democratic lawmaker on Twitter amid a spat over efforts to increase access to the ballot in the nation's most pivotal swing state.

It's more evidence that Hillary Clinton's major speech on voting last Thursday helped move along a conversation – already underway, to be sure – about how to to expand access to the ballot, especially by modernizing voter registration systems. It's a conversation that threatens to put Republicans on the defensive after years of playing offense on the issue with a wave of restrictive voting laws.

In her speech in Houston last Thursday, Clinton laid out an expansive and positive agenda to boost voting participation. The centerpiece was automatic voter registration, in which any citizen who has contact with the DMV is automatically registered unless he or she chooses to opt out—putting the responsibility for registering on the government rather than the individual. But Clinton also talked up online voter registration, a nationwide standard of at least 20 days of early voting, a full restoration of the Voting Rights Act, and a loosening of felon disenfranchisement laws, among other ideas.

In March, Oregon became the first state in the nation to pass automatic voter registration. Since then, 14 other states plus the District of Columbia—including deep red ones like Texas and Georgia—have introduced automatic registration bills, according to a tally by the Brennan Center for Justice. And three states plus D.C. have this year passed online voter registration, bringing the total number of jurisdictions that offer it to 27.

In just the week since Clinton spoke, Ohio and Rhode Island have both moved forward with online voter registration bills, and Louisiana passed a bill to study automatic voter registration. If it weren't for the fact that most state legislatures have already adjourned for the session, the number of states moving forward with expansive legislation would likely be larger.

"Many, many states are moving in the direction toward a more modern voter registration system," said Wendy Weiser, the director of the Democracy Program at the Brennan Center. "I'm really glad that this issue is now at a national stage, that we sort of set our sights toward the end goal of a real modern system that registers every eligible voter, that's accurate, that's updated, and where the government takes responsibility."

U.S. Rep. David Cicilline on Wednesday introduced a federal automatic voter registration bill modeled on Oregon's. The measure already has around 50 Democratic co-sponsors, including powerful figures like DNC Chair Debbie Wasserman Schultz, former Democratic Congressional Campaign Committee Chairman Steve Israel, and civil rights icon Rep. John Lewis.

This version of Total Mail Converter is not registered.

Cicilline's bill was in the works before Clinton's speech, but he said it could still get a boost from her high-profile embrace of the idea.

"Hopefully the secretary's comments will bring some more attention to this issue, and help us build momentum," Cicilline said. I think we have a responsibility to do everything we can to remove as many obstacles as possible to voting."

The bill is unlikely to go anywhere in a Republican Congress that won't even restore the Voting Rights Act. But Cicilline suggested his legislation could nonetheless provoke a useful and clarifying debate about whether Republicans actually want to make voting easier.

"I think if there's substantial resistance from the leadership in the House, it will invite a real conversation," he said. "You know: Why is it that one political party is not supporting this effort, and one is?"

But Ohio might be ground zero for how Clinton's ambitious plan may already be boosting those looking to make voting easier.

On Wednesday afternoon, State Rep. Kathleen Clyde, a Democrat, was notified on Twitter that she'd been blocked by an account in the name of Secretary of State Jon Husted. The move came after Husted, a Republican, responded defiantly to Clinton's criticism of Ohio's voting policies, among other states, in her speech. Husted, rebutting Clinton, called the state "the gold standard" for election administration.

That led to a series of tweets by Clyde Wednesday mocking the "gold standard" claim. Clyde accused Husted of improperly purging the vote rolls, and failing to mail absentee ballots to around 1 million eligible voters just because they hadn't voted recently. And she noted, accurately, that Husted has waged a years-long campaign to reduce early voting.

Husted and Clyde also have been sparring over how and whether to advance some of the expansive voting policies Clinton proposed. Though he's gained a national reputation as an advocate of restrictive voting policies, Husted has long been an advocate of online registration, and he testified Wednesday in support of a Republican-sponsored online registration bill, calling it "a common sense reform that is long overdue." The bill is expected to pass the Senate, but its prospects in the House are far less clear.

But in a letter sent the same day, Clyde wrote that Husted doesn't need new legislation to implement online registration. She said it's already in place, but it currently only accepts registration updates, not new registrations. All that's needed to change that is for Husted to "switch on" full online registration.

"He's been talking about this for years. How about some action?" said Clyde in an interview. "This is the type of thing that we should get up and running well before the presidential election in Ohio."

Husted has said he needs further legislative authority, and election law experts in Ohio say the question is debatable.

In the letter, Clyde also urged Husted to support a bill she introduced earlier this year that would establish automatic voter registration. Husted's office has opposed that measure, misleadingly suggesting – despite the opt-out provision – that it would require people to be on the rolls even if they didn't want to be.

A Husted spokesman didn't respond to a request for comment about blocking Clyde on Twitter, or about the secretary of state's positions on online or automatic voter registration.

This version of Total Mail Converter is not registered.

De Blasio says he will not endorse Hillary Clinton until she clearly opposes Trans-Pacific Partnership // NY Daily News // Jennifer Fermino – June 11, 2015

He's really playing hard to get.

Mayor de Blasio, who has said he won't endorse Democratic presidential front-runner Hillary Clinton until he's convinced she's got a plan to battle income inequality, is now calling on his old boss to speak out against a controversial trade deal.

Hizzoner said Thursday he's looking for a "very clear statement" from Clinton opposing the Trans-Pacific Partnership, which is loathed by the left but being pushed by President Obama.

"I think it's very important she speak up, make clear . . . that this trade deal is unacceptable," de Blasio said on a phone call he held with reporters blasting the deal.

He said it was important both as a matter of policy, and politically.

"People all over the country at the grass roots – certainly Democrats all over the country – are looking to her for leadership and her strong voice at this moment would make a very big difference," he said.

It's his latest attempt to push the traditionally centrist Clinton further to the left as she gears up for the 2016 Democratic primary.

It's his latest attempt to push the traditionally centrist Hillary Clinton (pictured) further to the left as she gears up for the 2016 Democratic primary.

Clinton has so far been mum on the trade deal, which would remove tariffs and other barriers to trade between the U.S. and 11 other nations.

Supporters say it will help the U.S. compete globally, but detractors — including many unions — insist it's a jobs killer.

In another snub to Clinton, he praised two of her rivals for the Democratic nomination — U.S. Sen. Bernie Sanders of Vermont and former Maryland Gov. Martin O'Malley — for their opposition to the trade deal, which Congress is currently debating.

"They both said very important and appropriate things on trade, and I give them both credit for that," said de Blasio, who headed Clinton's 2000 Senate campaign in New York.

"And I think that represents what a lot of people in this party feel on the ground all over the country."

De Blasio declined to say whether Clinton's support for the deal would be a deal breaker in terms of his endorsement.

This version of Total Mail Converter is not registered.

“I don’t deal with hypotheticals,” he said.

On Wednesday, de Blasio announced that he would not be attending Clinton’s campaign kick-off on Roosevelt Island on Saturday because he still hadn’t heard her vision for combating income inequality, which he has made the cornerstone of his mayoralty.

Although he’s repeatedly declined to endorse Clinton since she announced her candidacy in April, de Blasio has taken pains to praise the former secretary of state.

On Thursday, he said he is impressed with her so far.

“I’m very optimistic about where she and her campaign are going,” he said.

Dem operative Woodhouse says NYT retracted charges of illegality in Clinton email story // Politifact // Jon Greenberg – June 11, 2015

Questions about Hillary Clinton’s handling of her email records during her time as secretary of state are likely to dog her throughout her presidential campaign. But the candidate will have many defenders, including Correct the Record, a super PAC created to support Clinton.

Correct the Record president Brad Woodhouse, a long-time Democratic operative, dismissed the entire email matter during an interview recently on CNN.

"Every federal employer has to consider what they archive as work-related and what they consider personal, and she did what every other federal official did, what every other previous secretaries of state did," Woodhouse told New Day co-hosts Chris Cuomo and Alisyn Camerota on June 5, 2015. "Look, nobody has found -- you know, the New York Times wrote a story that some type of laws had been broken. Turns out they had to retract that. People had to back off that, and it's totally not true."

In the news business, retractions don’t come lightly and we wondered if in fact, the newspaper of record had taken back part of what it reported on Clinton.

In reality, the New York Times hasn’t retracted a word. The closest it came was in acolumn from public editor Margaret Sullivan, who wrote that the article that broke the story "was not without fault." But the lapse, Sullivan continued, was a failure to list exactly which regulations Clinton might have ignored.

That lack of specificity, Sullivan wrote, allowed Clinton supporters to score political points. "Not because it highlighted a factual error — the story was accurate — but because it kicked up enough dust to obscure the facts."

Sullivan, we should note, doesn’t speak for the newspaper. Her job is to serve as an internal but independent critic of the paper’s work, something akin to an inspector general in government.

Formal retractions or corrections come from the editors themselves, and as we noted, that has not happened.

This version of Total Mail Converter is not registered.

Adrienne Watson, a spokeswoman for Correct the Record, said Woodhouse was not using the word retraction in an official sense. Rather, he was speaking of the gradual fade in New York Times coverage that insinuated that Clinton had broken some law.

"Ultimately the charge was retracted, even if the New York Times never issued a correction," Watson said. "Their own experts changed their minds."

Let’s unpack that.

What the ‘New York Times’ said

The newspaper broke the story under the headline "Hillary Clinton Used Personal Email Account at State Dept., Possibly Breaking Rules." It’s opening lines were "Hillary Rodham Clinton exclusively used a personal email account to conduct government business as secretary of state, State Department officials said, and may have violated federal requirements that officials’ correspondence be retained as part of the agency’s record."

So the top of the story suggested a possible violation, which falls short of charging outright that she broke a law, as Woodhouse said.

But the article does lay the groundwork to add weight to the idea of a potential violation.

"Under federal law, however, letters and emails written and received by federal officials, such as the secretary of state, are considered government records and are supposed to be retained so that congressional committees, historians and members of the news media can find them."

And:

"Regulations from the National Archives and Records Administration at the time required that any emails sent or received from personal accounts be preserved as part of the agency’s records.

But Mrs. Clinton and her aides failed to do so."

About week and half after the initial story, the New York Times wrote that theregulations on preserving emails were vague.

"Although the White House has strict requirements dating back two decades that every email must be saved, there is no such requirement for federal agencies. Instead they are in charge of setting their own policies for determining which emails constitute government records worthy of preservation and which ones may be discarded."

While, as the story noted, President Barack Obama signed a 2014 bill that required government officials who use personal email accounts to hand over those records in 20 days, that law took effect after Clinton left the State Department. According to Thomas Blanton, a government disclosure expert cited in the story, this gave Clinton "wiggle room."

This version of Total Mail Converter is not registered.

Blanton was also cited in the original article. However, it is not accurate to say he changed his mind from one week to the next. In the first New York Times story, Blanton said "it was a shame" that the emails from Clinton's personal account had not been turned over automatically.

The New York Times also cited in its first story Jason Baron, a lawyer at Drinker Biddle and Reath, who is a former director of litigation at the National Archives and Records Administration. At the time, Baron said he could not think of another instance when a high-ranking official used a private email account for all government business. Blanton described Clinton's email scenario as a serious breach.

However, Baron did not say the practice was illegal. In the weeks that followed, he consistently said it was a bad practice.

Our ruling

Woodhouse said that the New York Times retracted the charge that Clinton's handling of her email broke a law. That's wrong on two points. The newspaper never accused Clinton of breaking a law. Also, while the newspaper's public editor said the original story should have included more details, the paper never issued a retraction or a correction. A spokeswoman for Woodhouse's organization agreed with that point.

The claim is not accurate, and we rate it False.

Bill Clinton's Labor Secretary Urges Hillary Clinton to Oppose TPP at Kickoff // The Observer // Jullian Jorgensen – June 11, 2015

Former Secretary of Labor Robert Reich, who served under President Bill Clinton and oversaw the roll-out of the North American Free Trade Agreement, joined Mayor Bill de Blasio today in urging Hillary Clinton to use her presidential campaign kickoff speech to oppose the Trans-Pacific Partnership trade pact—a deal Mr. Reich deemed "NAFTA on steroids."

"I would hope that she very clearly, specifically opposes the Trans-Pacific Partnership," Mr. Reich said of the former secretary of state in a media conference call this afternoon.

Mr. de Blasio, Ms. Clinton's former Senate campaign manager who has yet to offer up an endorsement in the Democratic primary, also urged Ms. Clinton to come out against the trade deal, which unions and progressive politicians have derided as bad for American workers.

"I'd like to see a very clear statement that this trade deal should be opposed and should be stopped," Mr. de Blasio said.

While he knew what he'd like to hear, Mr. de Blasio has said he will not attend Ms. Clinton's campaign kick-off, which is being held Saturday just down the East River from Gracie Mansion on Roosevelt Island. Today, he recalled her speaking on trade issues in 2008 in a way that "resonated" in states like Ohio, which he visited to campaign for her in that year.

"I think it's very important she speak up make clear that there will be no more NAFTAs," Mr. de Blasio said. "People all over the country, at the grassroots, certainly Democrats all over the country, are looking to her for leadership, and certainly her strong voice would make a very big difference."

This version of Total Mail Converter is not registered.

Mr. Reich noted it would not be the first time Ms. Clinton, as a candidate, has taken a position that differed from the policies of her husband, former President Bill Clinton. He noted her recent push to end mass incarceration.

“I hope that she does the same with the TPP, relative to NAFTA,” Mr. Reich said.

Mr. Reich was charged with rolling out NAFTA under Mr. Clinton and, like many who oppose the TPP, said the 1990s trade pact had delivered poor results for American workers.

“Once the dust cleared, we did find that a lot of manufacturing jobs left the U.S., they first went to Mexico and then they promptly went to Southeast Asia,” Mr. Reich said.

He was also charged with enforcing the trade deal’s guidelines for better labor conditions in other countries, but said it proved “extraordinarily difficult to do,” something he suspected would hold true for the TPP as well.

Mr. Reich and Mr. de Blasio bashed the idea of Congress holding a “fast-track” up or down vote on the trade pact, very little of which has been made public. The deal has pitted many in the left wing of the Democratic party against President Barack Obama, who backs the deal.

“To have this large a trade agreement or investment agreement negotiated in secret and fast tracked through Congress without any opportunity for amendment, when most of America has no access to this trade agreement at all—what I know about it was leaked through Wikileaks—it seems to me makes a mockery of democracy,” Mr. Reich said.

Bill Clinton brushes aside foundation criticism // CNN // Dan Merica – June 11, 2015

The entire Clinton interview will air Sunday at 9 a.m. on CNN's "State of the Union" with Jake Tapper.

Denver (CNN)Bill Clinton aggressively denied allegations that donors to his family's foundation were given special treatment by Hillary Clinton's State Department in a lengthy interview with CNN set to air on Sunday.

The former president told CNN's Jake Tapper that no Clinton Foundation donor has "asked me for anything," adding that his wife was too busy as secretary of state to do favors for foundation supporters.

"She was pretty busy those years," Clinton told Tapper. "I never saw her study a list of my contributors, and I had no idea who was doing business before the State Department."

The Clinton Foundation and their rolls of foreign and corporate donors have become a flashpoint for Hillary Clinton's newly announced presidential campaign. Critics and investigative reporters have sought to prove that supporters of the Clinton Foundation were currying favor with the Clintons when they donated, but no blatant example of influence peddling has been revealed in months of scrutiny.

Clinton said that any crossover between Clinton Foundation donors and companies the State Department was lobbying for abroad was more happenstance than nefarious.

This version of Total Mail Converter is not registered.

"America's always had to lobby for American-made airplanes," Clinton said, referring to the fact that Boeing, an American airplane manufacturer, had worked with both the State Department while also donating to the foundation's work in Haiti.

"I don't think they (donated) to make the government like them better. We do like them better. All Americans are grateful that there are American jobs and businesses around the world," Clinton said. "So I don't know of anything, if there was even an appearance of conflict, except all these folks helped us do what we do, which I think is good work."

While Clinton said nothing was ever given to the foundation's donors, he said that he could not outright deny that any of his donors were hoping for anything in return when they cut his foundation a check.

"I know of no example, but I don't ever know what people's motives are," he said.

Clinton echoed many of his wife's supporters and aides when he said attacks on his foundation were strictly about politics.

"Nobody even suggested it or talked about it or thought about it until the political season began," Clinton said..

The foundation, however, has admitted they've made missteps in the past, particularly on the reporting and approval of their foreign donations. Foundation aides admitted earlier this year they "made mistakes" in reporting, but did nothing intentionally wrong.

Clinton's comments came during the annual meeting of Clinton Global Initiative America in Denver, where foundation supporters made nearly 80 pledges to address issues such as providing low-income Americans with alternatives to predatory loans and providing Navajo Nation with solar power.

In his interview with Tapper, Clinton described his foundation as an endeavor to "get people who have money to people who don't, and to give it to them in a way that's empowering so it actually changes their lives."

Clinton reiterated that the foundation's aim was to help the powerless; people "who are working as hard as they can, but who don't have enough money to support their kids and meet basic human needs."

"They can't change the future," he said. "(For them) every tomorrow is just like yesterday. That's how I define powerless. Not poverty. Not adversity alone. But the inability to alter your condition."

The entire Clinton interview will air Sunday at 9 a.m. on CNN's "State of the Union" with Jake Tapper.

'Conversation' with Hillary Clinton? That'll be $2,700 // Daily Mail // AFP - June 12 2015

Four, five, even six times per week, Hillary Clinton meets deep-pocketed supporters eager to shake hands with the celebrity Democrat -- all-but-obligatory encounters helping her amass the war chest needed to win the White House.

Qualifying guests are invited to hold what is described as a "conversation with Hillary," at a cost of $2,700 -- the legal limit set by the Federal Election Commission (FEC) on donations to candidates in the 2016 presidential primary cycle.

This version of Total Mail Converter is not registered.

Once the primaries are decided, a supporter can contribute a fresh $2,700 maximum to a candidate in the presidential election.

Clinton, a former secretary of state and the prohibitive favorite for the Democratic nomination, has participated in some 40 fundraising receptions since launching her campaign in April, according to the Sunlight Foundation, a nonpartisan Washington organization that studies campaign financing.

By any measure it is an intense schedule to follow from now until Election Day 17 months away, and more rigorous than the smattering of public events she has held as a candidate.

Clinton, 67, holds her first major campaign rally Saturday in New York, one expected to draw thousands of voters.

But who attends the swankier, less publicized functions?

Friends of Clinton, influential Democrats, executives, a Facebook co-founder, her husband Bill, and clean-energy billionaire Tom Steyer have participated in the events. On June 29, rocker Bon Jovi will sing for one of the gatherings.

Clinton participated in three receptions Wednesday in three cities in the US northeast.

Regulatory loopholes could allow Clinton to extract more money from her donors, but the candidate has publicly committed to reforming campaign finance laws in order to dampen the growing influence of private donations on US elections.

Prominent Republican rival Jeb Bush regularly commands tens of thousands of dollars per attendee at certain events, in extraordinary cases up to $100,000.

He avoids campaign ceilings through a legal formulation known as a "super PAC."

These types of political action committees were born from a 2010 Supreme Court decision allowing unlimited contributions to such groups as a form of free expression, provided the entities remain independent from the candidates and their campaigns.

But the alleged independence of such super PACs has come into question. Jeb Bush's "Right to Rise" group is led by a close associate of the all-but-declared candidate, and the organization is exclusively dedicated to supporting Bush's run.

Bush, a former Florida governor, has yet to announce his candidacy -- that is expected to occur Monday in Miami. But the PAC's staffers are already talking openly about preparing for Bush's campaign.

By delaying formal declaration of his candidacy, Bush can continue to raise unlimited funds for his super PAC, bypassing campaign contribution caps.

This version of Total Mail Converter is not registered.

- 'Obscene moment' -

Clinton herself will likely hold her nose and open the fundraising floodgates in order to fill Democratic campaign coffers if she is to match Bush's money juggernaut.

A specific goal is already said to have emerged: exceed the $1 billion raised by President Barack Obama, the Democratic Party and affiliated groups for his successful 2012 re-election effort.

Several Democrats allied with Obama, and close to Clinton, are expected to launch a fundraising effort seeking contributions to Priorities USA Action, a super PAC formerly committed to Obama.

Clinton is expected to tap into such flows.

"She does not have clean hands," said Bill Allison, a senior fellow at Sunlight Foundation.

"She would argue that she's forced to do it because that's the system we have," Allison added. "That to some extent is true, but that doesn't make her noble."

One candidate who says he refuses to embrace the fundraising leviathan is independent Senator Bernie Sanders, a "Democratic socialist" and Clinton rival in the primaries who believes campaign finance will be a central theme of the election.

"We live in an obscene moment," Sanders said Thursday.

"Billionaires are now literally buying American elections and candidates."

Duggan's power now rivals Putin, Bill Clinton jokes // Detroit News Washington Bureau – June 11, 2015

Former President Bill Clinton heralded Detroit's turnaround after the Motor City's exit from a record setting Chapter 9 bankruptcy restructuring — and jokingly compared the city's mayor to Russian leader Vladimir Putin.

At a Clinton Global Initiative event Wednesday in Denver, Clinton held a panel discussion with Detroit Mayor Mike Duggan, Kresge Foundation president and CEO Rip Rapson and a Detroit baker and business owner, April Anderson.

During the nearly 40-minute discussion on neighborhood revitalization, Clinton said that being mayor of Detroit could be America's "most coveted municipal job" — and noted that with the Detroit land bank, much of the city's 139 square miles is controlled by the city.

Detroit's 2013 bankruptcy restructuring allowed Duggan to "basically become the most powerful municipal official in the country. He controls over half the land mass in the city of Detroit now. He's making old Putin look like a piker — and people actually like (Duggan)," Clinton said to laughter, according to video of the event posted online by the Clinton Foundation.

This version of Total Mail Converter is not registered.

Rapson said Duggan may not live that image down: "That's a great image. I like to think of Mayor Duggan as our Mayor Putin. That's terrific. I think that's going to stick," Rapson said.

The city owns nearly half the city's property, Duggan said, or about 40,000 vacant parcels. Clinton compared Detroit to the "Homestead Act" in 1862 that convinced Americans to help settle the west by offering them free land. Duggan didn't directly respond to the Putin comparison.

Kresge was one of the nonprofits that helped Detroit exit bankruptcy more quickly by contributing to a fund that saved city-owned art at the Detroit Institute of Arts from being sold and defrayed pension losses for retirees.

Clinton praised the city's revitalization, but noted that the city lost 60 percent of its population since the 1950s — and is down a quarter since 2000.

Duggan, 56, said that he is focused on boosting the population — and has said he wants to be judge when he is up for re-election if the city is growing again. Detroit has lost population for every year that Duggan has been alive.

"You can drop Manhattan, Boston and San Francisco in the city of Detroit boundaries — and still have room left over," Duggan said. The real challenge is revitalizing the neighborhoods after the dramatic turnarounds in downtown and midtown, he said.

Duggan said there are 5,000 new housing units under construction in Detroit. Duggan said he is working to sell the 40,000 vacant houses in the city. The city is auctioning three homes a day. On Tuesday, three homes sold for a total of $100,000, Duggan said.

Duggan noted that the city is offering to allow homeowners to buy next door vacant lots for just $100. The city is now also offering to lease vacant land if the neigbhorhood association signs off on the use — such as a playground or urban farm.

During the event, Duggan said Clinton is the single biggest customer of Detroit watchmaker Shinola. Clinton bought customized watches for the Secret Service agents on his security detail that featured the presidential seal as Christmas presents.

Speech inflation: Why Bill Clinton, George W. Bush, and others get massive speaking fees // Fortune // Ben Geier – June 11, 2015

In just under two years, President Obama will be out of office, leaving the White House and giving way for another politician to start taking flak. What, pray tell, will he do with all that free time? If his predecessors offer any clue, he won't do much, but he'll get paid a lot for it.

Last week, Politico reported that former President George W. Bush makes between $100,000 and $175,000 for every speech he gives and that he has given at least 200 speeches since leaving office in 2009. A bit of simple math translates that activity into more than $30 million for the former president in speech fees alone. Compare that to the relatively paltry $400,000 a president makes a year while in office, and you can see why presidents look forward to their retirement.

Paying ex-presidents to give speeches really took off with Gerald Ford, Politico notes—which makes sense, since

This version of Total Mail Converter is not registered.

Ford didn't ever really plan to run for president and likely figured he would stay in the House much longer than he did. Ford took umbrage when he was criticized for making money off of his former job, saying that as a private citizen he could leverage his past however he pleased.

Not long after Ford started hitting the lecture circuit, the Washington Speakers Bureau—home to many high-powered speakers, including George W. Bush and his wife Laura—was founded in 1979. These agencies have played a major role in the skyrocketing fees that high-powered speakers now command.

"Whenever you have a middleman, that adds to the cost," said Lance Strate, a communications professor at Fordham University. The desire among agencies to maximize fees, and the added ability to negotiate that comes with having professional representation, means organizations are more likely to see speaking fees grow. Plus, the agency system simply provides more access to influential figures like ex-presidents, meaning more groups are able to get the power elites they want, if they are willing to pay the price.

But why exactly are organizations willing to pay so much for an hour of a former politician's time? It isn't for the content, that's for sure. Generally, speakers and those who hire them are mum on just how much money gets handed over for these engagements—which, by the way, aren't usually the most thought-provoking or newsworthy speeches. (Politico notes that in one speech to a bowling industry group, Bush let loose the earthshaking bon mot that "bowling is fun.")

"The speech is kind of secondary to … just being able to have a big name at your event," Strate said. "It might get reported on some form of TV or cable news, which further adds to the prestige and the publicity of the event."And even if it doesn't end up on the evening news, almost every conference will put their speeches on YouTube, where there is always a chance it will go viral.

Though speakers fees are often kept confidential, we do have a few estimates of what famous ex-politicians make:

Bill Clinton supposedly made around $225,000 for a gig last February.

Rudy Giuliani, the former mayor of New York and one-time Republican presidential hopeful, is said to have pulled up to $270,000 for a speech.

Sarah Palin, former Alaska Governor, former Republican vice-presidential candidate, and all-time cable news and tabloid fixture—is said to have made $115,000 for a speech in 2011.

These are just the big guns. Even the fringiest of also-rans—think Howard Dean and Herman Cain—have big-time speakers agents and can pull in serious coin for giving a fluffy 45-minute talk. Given that most of the declared 2016 candidates on both sides of the aisle have a fairly slim chance of becoming president, perhaps financial incentives, rather than the pull of public service, has some impact on just how many people run for high office.

Clinton rally coincides with gun show at fairgounds // The Des Moines Register // Josh Hafner – June 11, 2015

Hillary Clinton's Iowa campaign kickoff event will share the Iowa State Fairgrounds this Sunday with an established gun show.

The gun show's organizer, a Republican county supervisor, has welcomed Clinton, a Democratic frontrunner for president, to visit to learn about Iowa gun enthusiasts and hunters.

"If Hillary Clinton would come through, I would welcome her," said Daryl Klein, 56, of Dubuque County, who's operated gun shows in Iowa for more than 30 years." I would like her to see what we do instead of the rhetoric put out by the media a lot of the times, what and who we are."

This version of Total Mail Converter is not registered.

Clinton, the former first lady and secretary of state, has called for tighter gun regulations in the U.S. as recently as last year, calling the country's handling of firearms "way out of balance" in an address to the National Council for Behavioral Health in Maryland.

"We have to rein in what has become (an) almost article of faith, that anybody can own a gun anywhere, anytime. And I don't believe that," she said, according to Politico.

When informed of Klein's invitation to the Clinton campaign, Iowa spokeswoman Lily Adams said she would pass it along.

"Hillary has been to the state fairgrounds before and is excited to host the launch party there on Sunday. It's no surprise to us that other organizations found a home at the fairgrounds as well."

Security at the gun show

Klein stressed to The Des Moines Register that ample safety rules enforced by his gun show should prevent any worry about the amount of firearms that the gun show will draw to the same site of Clinton's event.

The show's team of private security ensures each gun that enters the show is empty, marked and rendered inoperative with a cable tie, he said. His security guards also check guns upon exit, Klein said.

Still, accidents happen: During the show's 2012 event at the fairgrounds, one vendor shot his own hand while setting up a gun display. That vendor, now banned from the show, was not seriously injured.

"We are a family event. We have lots of women and children come through also," Klein said. "I think sometimes we get a bad rap."

Other candidate visits

Clinton wouldn't mark the first presidential candidate to visit one of Klein's gun shows, held under his banner of Trade Show Productions, Ltd., which have taken place at the fairgrounds for years.

Republican Rick Santorum, the 2012 Iowa caucuses winner now on his second White House campaign, has visited the gun show in the past, Klein said, as well as Iowa U.S. Sen. Chuck Grassley, also a Republican.

One-time GOP candidates Tom Tancredo and Sam Brownback also visited in years past, Klein said.

Hillary Clinton Supports Women's Rights, Gay Rights in "Living History" Instagram Video // E! Entertainment – June 11, 2015

Hillary Clinton's Instagram game is on!

This version of Total Mail Converter is not registered.

The 2016 presidential hopeful only joined this realm of filtered squares yesterday, but she's already got a lifetime of accomplishments up on display! In a mere six posts--including one "Living History" video--@hillaryclinton has brought the social media world up to date on what she's been doing throughout the years to advance women's rights and gay rights.

This particular clip includes photos from Hillary's childhood, her wedding to Bill Clinton (!), family trips to Disneyland and her own daughter Chelsea Clinton becoming a mother. We also look back and see her as first lady, New York's first elected female Senator and U.S. Secretary of State. In videos pieced together from decades back to the present, she champions the a similar message: "Human rights are women's rights, and gay rights are human rights."

Brava! Ms. Clinton even had time to put up a most impressive #throwback Thursday photo that shows she's had lots of ambition from the get-go!

Hillary, who made her Insta-debut with a cleverly captioned pantsuit pic, is using this feed to rally her supporters, too. She's got a graphically pleasing countdown to her official campaign kickoff on New York City's Roosevelt Island, urging her current followers to "Get in a New York State of Mind" and "tag a friend who should follow before Saturday"!

#SomebodyHiredAGoodSocialMediaManager!

Lady Gaga and Tony Bennett to sing for Hillary // NY Post // Emily Smith – June 9, 2015

Lady Gaga and Tony Bennett will serenade Hillary Clinton at a fundraiser for the presidential candidate at Manhattan’s Plaza Hotel.

Tickets for the June 27 event are $2,700 a pop with a limited number of $1,000 tickets.

But the devoted few who raise $50,000 get blessed with host status, a photo with Clinton (and possibly Gaga and Bennett) and an invite to a VIP after-party.

A source said, “They’re not sure if it’ll be a seated affair or if people will be standing — it’s a pricey night to be standing.”

Gaga has long supported Clinton, calling for her to run for president and blasting Tim Gunn for criticizing her pantsuits.

Gaga said in 2011, “I think Hillary Clinton has more important things to worry about than her hemline.”

Quote Of The Day // The Skimm – June 11, 2015

“Hard choices” – The caption on Hillary Clinton’s first Instagram post that featured red, white, and blue pantsuits. House of Uncle Sam would approve.

This version of Total Mail Converter is not registered.

OTHER DEMOCRATS NATIONAL COVERAGE

O'MALLEY

O'Malley: I haven't seen video of pool party brutality // CNN // Alexandra Jaffe & Betsy Klein – June 11, 2015

As a former mayor of Baltimore, Martin O'Malley has made racial unrest and law enforcement reform an issue in his nascent presidential campaign.

But on Thursday night, he said he had not seen the video of the latest incident that's sparked cries of police brutality against minorities: an officer's apparent disproportionate reaction to reports of a group of teens fighting at a pool party in Texas.

The video of the incident went viral and critics accused the officer Eric Casebolt of racism. Casebolt was caught on tape responding to reports of fighting at a pool party by slamming a bikini-clad, teenage girl to the ground and waving his gun at a group of boys, most of them black.

He resigned on Tuesday, amid a police investigation into his actions.

When CNN asked O'Malley about the incident, he said, "I haven't seen it, I've heard of it."

O'Malley said because of the widespread use of camera phones, "we're going to be seeing more incidents that involve police officers and citizens," but did not comment on substance of the specific incident in Texas.

"And often times, those incidents will involve issues of race and legacy of race that all of us, whether black or white, share as Americans. And that issue of race in America and law enforcement have been intertwined for 300 to 400 years in this country," he said.

O'Malley said that officers who are "well-trained and play by the rules" are the "norm," but acknowledged videos like these make Americans question that. Officers should adopt body cameras and other tools to combat the negative perception of police officers and protect themselves, O'Malley said.

"With the advent of new technology in the hands of every citizen, we need to put better technology in the hands of police departments so they can be open and transparent and accountable," he said.

During his campaign launch, O'Malley touched on the death of Freddie Gray, who died in the back of a police van in Baltimore.

"There is something to be learned from that night, and there is something to be offered to our country from those flames," he said.

O'Malley touts progressive values, experience, results // Quad City Times // James Lynch – June 11, 2015

This version of Total Mail Converter is not registered.

Selling himself as a progressive who gets things done, Martin O'Malley engaged in classic Iowa retail politics Thursday afternoon at a Mount Vernon house party.

O'Malley, who later had a campaign rally at Sanctuary Pub in Iowa City, emphasized his experience and record of getting things done as Baltimore mayor and two terms as Maryland governor.

"I am the only candidate in this race with 15 years of elected executive experience." O'Malley said more than once during a 13-minute stump speech and about 20 minutes of question-and-answer.

That's important, he told more than 120 people who crowded into Nate and Maggie Willems' home, because "getting things done matters."

"It matters not only for the accomplishment of the task at hand, it matters for restoring the public trust necessary to build the deeper and larger consensus so we can start acting like Americans again," O'Malley said.

The 52-year-old O'Malley also drew a generational distinction between himself and the "very honorable and good people" — Hillary Clinton, 67, and Vermont Sen. Bernie Sanders, 73 — who also are seeking the Democratic presidential nomination.

His perspective is one that will "speak to where our country is going rather than where our country has been," O'Malley said.

His audience liked the merchandise, but for many, it is too early to commit to a candidate.

"He's an impressive guy," said Linda Yanney of Iowa City, who asked O'Malley about the disparate incarceration rates for blacks and whites. "He could play well, but there's a lot of time between now" and the first-in-the-nation precinct caucuses scheduled for Feb. 1.

O'Malley offered "the right ideas, progressive ideas," said Terry Lessmeier of Mount Vernon and might be a nice fit compared to Sanders "who is not discreet and Clinton who is too discreet" in expressing progressive values.

That was part of O'Malley's sales pitch, too.

Voters who look at his "15 years of elected executive experience" will see "a fearless advancing of progressive goals and progressive values," O'Malley said. "I don't apologize for them. I plan to speak fearlessly about the progressive values and progressive goals that are going to make our country better."

O'Malley, Lessmeier said, may have an advantage in that "he's the most telegenic, and in today's world, that's important."

O'Malley will be back in Iowa July 17 for the Iowa Democratic Party Hall of Fame Celebration in Cedar Rapids. Clinton, Sanders and former Virginia Sen. Jim Webb are scheduled to participate, too.

This version of Total Mail Converter is not registered.

SANDERS

Bernie Sanders Demands Hillary Clinton Take Trade Stance 'Right Now' // NYT // Alan Rappeport – June 11, 2015

Senator Bernie Sanders of Vermont delivered a sharp critique of Hillary Rodham Clinton on Thursday for her reluctance to talk about issues as a presidential candidate and vowed that he is running against her to win.

Mr. Sanders, an independent who is seeking the Democratic nomination, said he is offended by Mrs. Clinton's silence on trade and urged her to share her real views with voters.

"Trade policies have been disastrous," Mr. Sanders said at a breakfast hosted by The Christian Science Monitor in Washington. "If she's against this, we need her to speak out, right now."

Mr. Sanders then listed a number of issues where he said Mrs. Clinton has failed to share her views, including climate change, the Keystone Pipeline and the renewal of the Patriot Act.

"What is the secretary's point of view on that?" he asked of the act that he voted against.

Promising to run a campaign without personal attacks, Mr. Sanders questioned Mrs. Clinton on how she plans to address the influence of the "billionaire class" and said that her vote to authorize the 2003 Iraq War raised questions about her judgment.

"I'm not here to criticize a vote that she cast years ago," Mr. Sanders said. "But what does that mean about your judgment assessing information?"

The comments from Mr. Sanders come as Mrs. Clinton is about to formally kick off her campaign with a rally in New York this weekend.

The senator acknowledged that he remains an underdog in the race but said that he is picking up momentum in terms of crowds and fund-raising. He estimated that he has received about 200,000 donations averaging about $40 each.

"This is not a protest campaign," Mr. Sanders said when asked if he really believed he could beat Mrs. Clinton. "I am in this election to win."

Rival Challenges Clinton to Say Where She Stands on Trade // AP // Ken Thomas – June 11, 2015

Vermont Sen. Bernie Sanders called on Democratic presidential rival Hillary Rodham Clinton on Thursday to say exactly where she stands on President Barack Obama's trade agenda now that Congress is considering it.

"I think our trade policies have been disastrous," Sanders said during a breakfast sponsored by The Christian Science Monitor. "Secretary Clinton, if she's against this, we need her to speak out right now. Right now. And I don't understand how any candidate, Democrat or Republican, is not speaking out on this issue right now."

This version of Total Mail Converter is not registered.

The House was starting debate on so-called fast-track authority, which would let the administration complete a trade deal with Pacific countries that Congress could accept or reject, but not change. The proposed Trans-Pacific Partnership would lower trade barriers among 12 nations.

Clinton, a former secretary of state, has expressed concern that the deal may allow currency manipulation and fall short on health and environmental protections. But she's said she wants to see the agreement in its final form before judging it. Sanders and former Maryland Gov. Martin O'Malley, who is also seeking the Democratic presidential nomination, vigorously oppose the deal.

Clinton aides did not immediately comment on Sanders' remarks. Clinton has been under pressure to oppose Obama's plan from labor unions and liberal groups, which say it would ship jobs overseas and undermine health and environmental standards.

Republicans who lead Congress are planning votes Friday on a program to retrain workers displaced by trade agreements, called Trade Adjustment Assistance, and fast-track authority may be voted on then, too.

Sanders, who launched his presidential bid in late April, has drawn large crowds to his events in Iowa and New Hampshire and estimates he has raised $8 million for his presidential campaign, based on about 200,000 contributors donating an average of $40.

The Vermont independent, who sides with Democrats in the Senate, predicted he can raise $40 million to $50 million by the Iowa caucuses and New Hampshire primary in early 2016.

The self-described democratic socialist said his campaign manager had recently traveled to Iowa and was hiring staff in preparation for the caucuses. "We're gearing up," he said.

"This is not an educational campaign," Sanders said. "This is not a protest campaign. This is a campaign to win."

Sanders acknowledged Clinton is the "heavy favorite" at the start of the campaign but said "we have momentum. And our numbers are growing."

Bernie Sanders insists his momentum is no fluke // Politico // Jonathan Topaz – June 10, 2015

Bernie Sanders, enjoying a rise in early-state and national polls and attracting large crowds at his rallies, has a message for voters: believe the hype.

The Vermont senator, an Independent who is running for the Democratic nomination for president, said on Thursday he has no illusions about the gap between himself and far-and-away front-runner Hillary Clinton.

But the self-described democratic socialist said his promising early returns aren’t a fluke.

“This is not an educational campaign. This is not a protest campaign. This is a campaign to win,” said a confident Sanders to a group of reporters at a Christian Science Monitor breakfast.

This version of Total Mail Converter is not registered.

Sanders has fashioned himself as the authentic progressive and the preferred liberal alternative to Clinton, who herself has been veering leftward, promoting grassroots issues such as college affordability and criminal justice reform.

On Thursday, Sanders acknowledged, as he has in the past, that Clinton is a “heavy favorite,” but argued that he’s making ground and that name recognition plays a big role in polling.

“I think the secretary may well be one of the best-known people in the United States of America. I am not,” Sanders said.

Sanders grabbed attention this week for scoring over the weekend a surprising 41 percent in an official Wisconsin Democratic Party straw poll at the state convention, losing to Clinton by just eight points.

The Vermont senator has also been creeping up in the national polls. He’s climbed to 15 percent in the Democratic field, up from single digits before his kickoff rally in Vermont on May 26. And the most recent Iowa and New Hampshire polls showed him at 16 and 18 percent, respectively — also a jump from earlier polling.

Sanders, the longest-serving independent in congressional history, has also been drawing pretty impressive crowds. More than 3,000 supporters showed up to a fiery Sanders rally on a Sunday in Minneapolis. Last week, an estimated 1,000 people showed up in Keene, New Hampshire, and most events in his recent trips to Iowa were standing-room only, including 700 people who showed up in Davenport, the largest Iowa rally for a candidate in either race.

Sanders said on Thursday that his campaign has at least 200,000 campaign contributors and that his team is staffing up in Iowa and New Hampshire. His team is expected to open its Iowa office shortly.

“We have momentum. Our numbers are growing,” said Sanders, adding that his campaign is less than two months old and still in its early stages.

During the breakfast meeting, Sanders continued to pressure Clinton on several policy areas, notably on the Trans-Pacific Partnership, the free-trade deal opposed by the liberal wing of the Democratic Party. He said Clinton’s failure to take a stand on the issue offends him.

“If she’s against this, we need her to speak out right now. Right now,” he said.

He also contrasted his leadership on several core progressive issues with Clinton — noting his efforts taking on corporate interests, in trying to block the Keystone XL pipeline and speaking out against the PATRIOT Act.

“Where is the secretary on that?” he asked.

The senator also offered some kind words for New York City Mayor Bill de Blasio, a progressive leader who has declined several times to endorse Clinton despite running her 2000 Senate campaign. De Blasio at a press conference this week called Sanders a “great senator” and confirmed that he wouldn’t attend Clinton’s campaign kickoff rally on New York City’s Roosevelt Island.

“I have a lot of respect for Mayor de Blasio,” Sanders said, calling the mayor one of the nation’s “leaders” on income inequality. He said that he would call de Blasio at a certain point and that he’d love to have his endorsement.

Still, Sanders avoided attacking Clinton too harshly. Unlike fellow Democratic presidential hopeful former Rhode Island Gov. Lincoln Chafee, he said her vote for the Iraq War was not disqualifying — “everybody makes bad votes.”

And asked about contributions to the Clinton Foundation from foreign governments, Sanders pivoted to the Koch brothers, the GOP mega-donors who he argued were having a more corrosive impact on the democratic process.

In calling for more presidential debates, including those with Republicans, he called on Democrats to have a 50-state strategy — part of a larger argument that his progressive policies will play well with a majority of Americans and even traditionally conservative voters.

This version of Total Mail Converter is not registered.

“It is not a radical agenda. In virtually every instance, what I’m saying is supported by a significant majority of the American people,” Sanders said, calling out Republican candidates former Florida Gov. Jeb Bush, New Jersey Gov. Chris Christie and former Texas Gov. Rick Perry by name for wanting to cut Social Security.

Sanders, who wrote Democratic National Committee chair Debbie Wasserman Schultz to call for more debates earlier in the cycle, called the current structure “much too limited” and said he regretted that the DNC didn’t consult his campaign before rolling it out.

One of Sanders’ most direct contrasts with Republicans came during his initial discussion about paid sick leave, maternity leave and vacations — labor protections he said are central to his new “family values” agenda.

The senator, who is laying out his plan more specifically later on Thursday, said he borrowed the phrase from Republicans who have used it to restrict reproductive rights for women. Sanders, who has visited several union halls since announcing his candidacy and is a favorite of organized labor, said he will introduce legislation to guarantee ten days of vacation time for workers and keep working to institute the 40-hour work week.

Elsewhere on policy, Sanders, who has called for a single-payer health care system and typically offers only mild praise for the Affordable Care Act, confirmed that he would try to “move away from the ACA” toward a Medicare-for-all system if he were to become president.

He also added that he’d soon be unveiling a comprehensive tax plan — including a tax on Wall Street speculation and ending loopholes that allow corporations to stash income in tax havens abroad. Sanders said that those moves, plus an unspecified increase in taxes on wealthy individuals, would help pay for his investments in health care and education, including his recently introduced bill to have tuition-free four-year public college.

“I believe the overwhelming majority of Americans support it. I suspect Wall Street does not,” he said of a tax on Wall Street speculation.

Sanders will head to Iowa this weekend for a three-day swing through the Hawkeye State, and will be there at the same time as Clinton, who kicks off her Iowa campaign Saturday and Sunday.

Bernie Sanders: Hillary Clinton's Silence on Trade Deal 'Offensive' // Bloomberg // Sahil Kapur – June 11, 2015

Hillary Clinton's refusal to take a stand on a controversial Asia trade deal is offensive, one of the Democratic presidential front-runner's challengers, Senator Bernie Sanders, said Thursday.

"I don't understand how, on an issue of such huge consequence, you don't have an opinion," Sanders, a self-described democratic socialist who launched a bid for Democratic nomination earlier this year, told reporters at a Christian Science Monitor breakfast.

The Vermont lawmaker is an outspoken opponent of the trade deal, known as the Trans Pacific Partnership. Clinton, who spoke in favor of giving President Barack Obama authority to negotiate a sweeping trade deal with Asian countries while she was serving as his secretary of state, has demurred about taking a stand on the legislation now before Congress.

“This is a campaign to win.”

Senator Bernie Sanders

Asked if Clinton's refusal to take a position offends him, Sanders said:

This version of Total Mail Converter is not registered.

"Yes, it does."

The trade debate cuts across party lines and divides Democrats like Obama from key parts of the party's constituency: labor unions and environmentalists oppose the deal because they fear it would undercut wages in the United States and permit air and water pollution globally. The Senate approved authority for Obama to cut a deal that could not be amended by Congress; the House is currently considering the bill.

"If she's against this, we need her to speak out, right now. Right now," Sanders said. "I don't understand how any candidate, Democrat or Republican, is not speaking out on that issue."

Sanders is making economic inequality and the struggles of middle-class and poor workers the centerpiece of his admittedly long-shot bid for the Democratic nomination. He said he plans to introduce legislation later Thursday to extend sick leave rights.

He insisted he's not the Don Quixote of 2016.

"This is not an educational campaign. This is not a protest campaign. This is a campaign to win," he said. While "I freely admit that Secretary Clinton comes into this a heavy favorite," the senatoradded that "we have momentum. And our numbers are growing."

Sanders also said he would not approve a super-PAC. Such entities can establish themselves without the backing of candidates, who are legally not permitted to coordinate with them. But many candidates — including Clinton — have effectively allied themselves with the outside spending groups, signaling to supporters who want to write large checks where they should send them. Sanders, who considers the amount of money that has flowed into campaigns after the Supreme Court effectively gutted legal limits on contributions "obscene," said he won't do that.

"I don't want the money of the billionaire class," he said. "Which is easy for me to say because I wouldn't get their money if I wanted to."

Sanders Explains Obama's Biggest Mistake And What Clinton Is Doing Wrong // Buzzfeed // Evan McMorris-Santoro – June 11, 2015

President Obama turned his back on the millions who rallied to support him when he assumed office, cutting off the only means he had to effect the sweeping changes he promised on the campaign trail in 2008 and leaving him at the mercy of Republicans in Congress.

That's the diagnosis from Bernie Sanders, the independent Vermont senator and Democratic presidential candidate who held court as the left-wing attack dog in the presidential race for about an hour Thursday surrounded by reporters at one of Washington's fanciest hotels.

Sanders proclaimed himself the man with the "most progressive views of any candidate" in the race — "philosophically, I am a Democratic Socialist," he said at one point — and proceeded to prove the point, detailing broad support for western European economic and education policy, attacking Democratic frontrunner Hillary Clinton for declining to publicly join the progressive push against free trade expansion, bemoaning money in politics while also promising never to have his own super PAC and proudly noting he never voted for any of the U.S. wars in Iraq, including the one launched in 1991.

This version of Total Mail Converter is not registered.

He spoke about how the faith he was born into motivates him, addressed a weird interview with public radio in which he was accused of having joint US-Israeli citizenship, and spoke about his surprising success in the nascent days of his presidential bid.

The impassioned critique of Obama summarized Sanders' skill at vocalizing the frustrations of the president's progressive allies, laying out succinctly what anyone who has been within distant earshot of a progressive activist has heard many times.

"The biggest mistake Barack Obama made in my view is that after his brilliant campaign in 2008 where he mobilized millions of people, ran one of the great campaigns in American history, essentially what he said to his supporters was, 'thank you very much for electing me, I'll take it from here on myself. I'll sit down with John Boehner, I'll sit down with Mitch McConnell, we'll negotiate, we'll come up with some compromises, thanks very much for what you did,'" Sanders said. "I will not make that mistake. The point that I'm making is, and this is where my campaign is very different from the others, I do not believe that any president who is standing up for the working class of this country can be successful without the mobilized activist grassroots movement behind him or her. So I will be working hard to make sure that mobilization exists."

As for Clinton, Sanders expressed bewilderment that the former Secretary of State hasn't publicly chosen sides in the trade debate with hours to go before a House vote on fast-track trade authority that the activist left has made defeating as its number one goal.

"You can be for the [Trans-Pacific Partnership trade deal], I think the president is dead wrong, he is for it," Sanders said. "You can be against it, I'm against it, Warren's against it, Sherrod Brown's against it, the majority of Democrats in the Senate are against it. You can be for it, or against it. I don't understand how on an issue of such huge consequence, you don't have an opinion."

Clinton has been playing it very cautiously on the president's trade agenda, avoiding directly pitting herself against either Obama or his progressive opponents.

"There are questions being raised about this agreement. It hasn't been negotiated yet," Clinton said on the trail in Iowa recently. "I have said I want to judge the final agreement."

Sanders also spoke of big marches on Washington by students demanding a better deal on college costs and marches by workers demanding an increase in the minimum wage.

Sanders' Obama history is a little off, though his tactical critiques are often raised by liberals. Obama turned his campaign into first Organizing for America and then Organizing For Action, nonprofits whose goal in part was to keep Obama's campaign infrastructure in place for the reelect but also to use his massive list of supporters to pressure Congress via online campaigns and public rallies. Large OFA marches and rallies, feared by some of Obama's opponents after he won in 2008, never really materialized, although digital campaigns in support of the president's policies are still blasted out of OFA's Chicago headquarters on a regular basis.

Sanders has done well in his opening weeks as a candidate, amassing, he said, more than 200,000 small-dollar donors and racking up poll numbers that make him number two in the Democratic nomination contest, albeit one running far behind the frontrunner Clinton. Sanders said he's in it to win it, and promised an increase in poll numbers as his name ID increases. He also promised to be outpspent by the impressive financial operations of Clinton. On the whole, he was comfortable in the role of pugnacious underdog, dismissing the Democratic Party's plan for primary debates and promising to open discussions with the party chair and his fellow candidates about how best to build a debate calendar.

The Washington event, a breakfast sponsored by the Christian Science Monitor, came just a day after Sanders' appearance on the Diane Rehm Show, a syndicated public radio program. Sanders said he forgave Rehm for her question about joint Israeli-American citizenship, a longstanding and wholly incorrect conspiracy theory labeled anti-Semitic by some Jewish groups in the hours after Rehm's broadcast.

This version of Total Mail Converter is not registered.

“I like Diane Rehm. She is a good radio interviewer,” he said. “I suspect what happens is her staff gives her a list of questions and someone screwed up pretty bad.”

Sanders was asked to weigh in on how his relationship with Judaism affects his political outlook.

“I’m proud to be Jewish, I’m not particularly religious,” he said. He said growing up Jewish in the post-World War II years taught him elections like the one that put Adolf Hitler in office can have very serious consequences.

“The lesson that I learned as a little kid was to understand in a very deep way what politics is about,” he said.

Reporters also wanted to know a lot about Sanders’ opinion of Europe. Sanders has long called for Western European-style social safety nets, universal healthcare programs, and structures that make higher education free or next to free for most students. America has a lot to learn from Europe, Sanders said. A reporter asked if he thinks Europe has much to learn from America.

“As a former mayor, what mayors look at is the concept of best practice. What best practices means…you look all over the country and you say, ‘what are other cities doing that would be good?’ and you steal those ideas,” he said. “That’s what we should be doing as a world. Are we doing things better than other countries? Of course we are, we have a lot to be proud of. We are a very entrepreneurial country, I mean every other day someone is coming up with another great idea, another great invention. We do that probably better than any other country on earth, and people should learn from us.”

But in terms of protecting and taking care of the needs of working people,” Sanders continued, “we have a lot to learn from many other countries around the world.”

Sanders promised to bring many of those western European-style programs to the United States if he becomes president. Dinging the president again, Sanders said it was time for a more progressive approach than Obamacare.

Sanders seemed pleased by his growing standing as the Democratic Party’s progressive-in-chief, a position fueled by a campaign that has lit up the grassroots on the left despite the lack of initial support from many activist left organizations who were until recently pouring all their efforts into trying to cajole Massachusetts Sen. Elizabeth Warren into the presidential race. His campaign building steam, Sanders, said he’s been amazed by the DC money machine he’s discovered as he’s emerged as a prominent presidential candidate.

“A lot of people want to make a lot of money off of campaigns,” Sanders said, when asked what he has learned so far. “There is an entire industry here in Washington, D.C. of folks who are prepared to help you for some extravagant fees.”

Bernie Sanders hires Elizabeth Warren 'draft' director for progressive campaign // The Guardian // Ben Jacobs – June 11, 2015

Bernie Sanders’ campaign for president isn’t just trying to harness the lingering progressive energy behind the failed attempt to draft his fellow liberal senatorElizabeth Warren.

Now they’re hiring the minds behind her grassroots movement, too.

The Guardian has learned that the Sanders campaign has hired Blair Lawton, who served as field director in Iowa for the Run Warren Run effort, which announced it was shutting down last week.

This version of Total Mail Converter is not registered.

Lawton will serve as political director for Sanders in Iowa, the early primary state where Sanders and Hillary Clinton will both visit this weekend. He previously worked as a regional field director in Iowa for Barack Obama's re-election campaign, then managed Democratic get-out-the-vote efforts in Alaska in 2014.

Sanders long positioned himself as a leading progressive voice in the Democratic party, and has declared he is "in this race to win" as a liberal alternative to Clinton.

The grassroots efforts to recruit Warren, however, put up a road block among the party's left-leaning base – until Run Warren Run gave in to the Massachusetts senator's repeated insistence that she would not challenge Clinton for the nomination.

"To be sure, Warren – and grassroots economic populism more broadly – was already a rising force well before our efforts began," the group's organizers wrotein preparation to fold last week. "Although Run Warren Run may not have sparked a candidacy, it ignited a movement."

Warren has long been an icon on the left, but an Iowa poll released earlier this month showed Sanders jumping ahead in the caucus state as he began to draw crowds at double capacity.

The hiring of a top staffer from the Run Warren Run effort signals an opportunity for the Sanders campaign to tap into both the enthusiasm for Warren and the organizing already done in the state on her behalf.

Sanders has also hired several other staffers to fill key positions in Iowa, including Justin Huck to serve as the campaign's state field director and Tara Thobe to oversee logistics.

Youth Unemployment and Dr. King's Dream // Medium // Bernie Sanders – June 11, 2015

Many years ago I was honored to be among those who marched on Washington with Dr. Martin Luther King Jr. I was there for his famous "I Have a Dream" speech, and I heard him say that African-Americans live "on a lonely island of poverty in the midst of a vast ocean of material prosperity."

Dr. King taught us that the struggle for justice is economic, as well as social and legal. As he said in Memphis, a few short weeks before his death:

Our struggle is for genuine equality, which means economic equality. For we know now that it isn't enough to integrate lunch counters. What does it profit a man to be able to eat at an integrated lunch counter if he doesn't have enough money to buy a hamburger?

"We have come here today," Dr. King told us in Washington, "to dramatize a shameful condition." We have seen progress, but that shameful condition persists. Too many Americans still live in poverty. Many are working in poverty, too, because they can't earn a living wage. And if we don't do something about it, the generations to come will have it even worse.

That's why I have joined with Rep. John Conyers to introduce the Employ Young Americans Now Act. It will provide $5.5 billion in immediate funding to employ one million young Americans between the ages of 16 and 24, and to provide job training to hundreds of thousands of others.

Let me tell you why this is so important. The Economic Policy Institute studied the real unemployment figures for recent high school graduates aged 17–20, including people who have given up looking for work and those who are working part-time but seek full-time employment. They are devastating. More than one third of white and Hispanic youth (33.8 and 36.1 percent, respectively) are looking for work. Shockingly, so are more than half of African-Americans (51.3 percent).

This version of Total Mail Converter is not registered.

I want to emphasize that:

When you look at the real job figures, more than 50 percent of young African-Americans are looking for work.

Recent college graduates are struggling, too. The real unemployment rate for young white graduates is 12.9 percent. And it's nearly double that for young African-Americans and Hispanics (23 percent 22.4 percent, respectively). That's nearly one in four.

Worse, studies have shown that a person's lifetime earnings are heavily influenced by the amount of money they make in the first few years of their working lives. We're not just hurting these young people today. If we do nothing, they will be deprived economically for the rest of their lives.

The picture is already grim. More than one in six part-time workers, and nearly one in twenty full-time workers, is impoverished despite their own labors. And African-Americans and Hispanics are twice as likely to among the working poor as their white counterparts. If we do not address the crisis of youth unemployment, these statistics are likely to become even worse.

One thing is clear: We are not making the progress that Dr. King called us to achieve in the 1960s. More than one in four African Americans live in poverty, while that figure is less than one in ten for whites. The median income for African-American households is less than 60 percent that of white households. And a recent study from Brandeis University shows that the wealth gap between black and white families has nearly tripled over the last twenty-five years.

There is much that we must do to address these inequities. We need to raise the minimum wage to a livable amount. This is not unreasonable.

If the minimum wage had kept pace with productivity, it would be more than $16 per hour today. It is only the greed of the few, and the political disenfranchisement of the majority, that has kept the minimum wage so low.

When I heard Dr. King speak in on that afternoon in 1963, the actual minimum wage was actually higher than it is today. 1963's Federal minimum wage was worth $8.37 in today's dollars. Today it's $7.25.

We must not condemn young people, especially in our minority communities, to lives that are even harsher than those of their parents. It is time to declare once and for all: Black lives matter—on the streets, and on the job too.

As Dr. King told us on that sunny day in Washington, "1963 is not an end, but a beginning." It's our turn to do the work of justice. Our young people are our nation's future, and it is time to give them the future they deserve.

Sanders hires key Iowa staff members // The Quad City Times // Ed Tibbetts – June 11, 2015

Democratic presidential hopeful Bernie Sanders, who turned a lot of heads last month with big crowds in Iowa, is putting staff in place to try to capture some of that enthusiasm.

This version of Total Mail Converter is not registered.

On Thursday, the campaign said Blair Lawton, the man who ran the Iowa arm of the now-suspended effort to convince U.S. Sen. Elizabeth Warren to run, is moving over to be the Vermont senator's political director in the state. Lawton's hiring was one of three positions the campaign confirmed Thursday.

"He's a good get for us," said Pete D'Alessandro, a longtime Democratic operative who has been charged with putting together a staff in Iowa for Sanders.

Lawton said that Sanders was a logical choice for him. "I've always admired the senator," Lawton said. "He's a great progressive we need in the race."

D'Alessandro also said that Justin Huck, the field director for the League of Conservation Voters in Iowa, has been picked to be the field director for the Sanders campaign here.

In addition, Tara Thobe, who worked in New Mexico the last election cycle, has been tapped to be statewide operations director.

Early polls still say former Secretary of State Hillary Clinton holds a wide lead, both in Iowa and nationally.

A Des Moines Register/Bloomberg Politics poll, released last week, said that 57 percent of likely Iowa Democratic caucus-goers support Clinton Sanders was next at 16 percent. Former Maryland Gov. Martin O'Malley and ex-Sen. Jim Webb, of Virginia, both were at 2 percent.

Clinton also has an organizational head start. The campaign has opened offices across the state and has more than two dozen field organizers working here.

Sanders, O'Malley and Webb all are in various organizational stages.

Still, the Sanders campaign says it is seeing dividends from the early interest in the senator.

D'Alessandro said of the more than 600 people who signed in at Sanders' event in Davenport, twice as many as he would have expected indicated they were willing to caucus for him. "This early in the game, that's a really good sign," he said.

Sanders, Clinton, O'Malley and Webb will all be in Iowa over the next few days.

O'Malley will make a trio of stops on Thursday.

Clinton, who is launching her campaign with a speech in New York on Saturday, will be in Iowa the same day. On Sunday, she will hold her first large-scale event in the state with a rally at the state fairgrounds in Des Moines.

This version of Total Mail Converter is not registered.

Webb will be in central Iowa on Sunday, Monday and Tuesday.

Sanders, meanwhile, will be holding a half dozen events across the state Friday, Saturday and Sunday.

None of the visits are to the Quad-Cities.

Sanders pushes paid vacation legislation // Burlington Free Press // Nicole Gaudiano – June 11, 2015

Sen. Bernie Sanders will introduce legislation Thursday that would require paid vacations for millions of workers as part of a "true family values" agenda he's pushing as he runs for the Democratic presidential nomination.

The bill would provide 10 days of paid vacation for employees who have worked at least one year at a job, ensuring them access to the minimum vacation benefits most companies already offer white-collar, high-salary workers, according to his office. The bill would apply to employers with at least 15 employees.

Sanders, I-Vt., said the U.S. is a "stressed out nation," with nearly one in four workers getting no paid vacation time. It's also the only advanced economy that doesn't guarantee workers some form of paid family leave, paid sick time or paid vacation time, he said.

"The idea that people do not have the time to take a few weeks off to be with their kids, to enjoy themselves, to relax, is really not what America should be about and is certainly not a family value," Sanders said in a Wednesday interview. "The bottom line of all of this is to bring reality to the concept of family values."

Sanders also is co-sponsoring a bill by Democratic Sen. Kirsten Gillibrand of New York to guarantee workers at least 12 weeks of universal paid family and medical leave, and a bill by Democratic Sen. Patty Murray of Washington to guarantee at least seven paid sick days per year.

Murray's bill passed the Senate 61-39 in March as an amendment to a budget resolution, but that measure doesn't carry the weight of law.

In January, President Barack Obama granted federal employees six weeks of paid parental leave, and he endorsed seven days of paid sick leave during his State of the Union address.

Opponents of mandates to provide paid sick and family leave say they would hurt businesses, cost jobs and could damage job opportunities for women. But Sanders said the idea a woman could lose her job because she had a baby is "completely unacceptable."

It's "horrendous" that mothers have to rush back to work during the most important bonding time with their babies because they don't have enough money to stay home, he said.

"I know that the right wing will oppose all of this," he said. "But the question they have got to answer is, 'How come these ideas can exist in every other major wealthy country on earth except in the United States of America?"

This version of Total Mail Converter is not registered.

OTHER

Bayh won't seek Indiana Senate seat // The Hill // Jonathan Easley – June 11, 2015

Former Sen. Evan Bayh (D-Ind.) will not enter the race to replace retiring Sen. Dan Coats (R-Ind.) in Indiana, a source familiar with Bayh's thinking told The Hill on Thursday.

Bayh instead will focus on helping former Secretary of State Hillary Clinton win the White House, according to the source.

Bayh would have been a formidable candidate had he run. He has high name recognition and remains popular in Indiana. In addition, he still has nearly $10 million in his campaign war chest.

Many Democrats believed Bayh's entrance in to the race would be a game-changer for their party, but political watchers in the state were doubtful he would take the plunge. In 2010, Bayh decided against seeking a third term in the Senate, citing frustration over gridlock in Congress.

With Bayh on the sidelines, the path to the Democratic nomination is currently clear for former Rep. Baron Hill (D-Ind.), who previously served four terms representing Indiana's 9th district in the House.

Senate Democratic Leader Harry Reid (D-Nev.) and House Minority Whip Steny Hoyer (D-Md.) will host a Washington, D.C., fundraiser for Hill's Senate bid later this month — a sign that establishment Democrats may be coalescing around his candidacy.

However, State Rep. Christina Hale (D-Ind.) has also said she's considering running. And John Dickerson, the former director of The Arc, a nonprofit that helps Indianans with intellectual and developmental disabilities, is also mentioned as a potential contender.

So far, there are two Republicans in the race.

Rep. Marlin Stutzman (R-Ind.), a Tea Party-aligned candidate, will be seeking to rally the conservative base in the state. Coats's chief of staff, Eric Holcomb, is also running, and considered a more establishment-friendly candidate.

Rep. David Young (R-Ind.), who defeated Hill in a 2010 House race, is also believed to be considering a bid.

The GOP candidate will likely be favored going into the race. Indiana has only gone for the Democratic presidential candidate once since 1968.

GOP

BUSH

This version of Total Mail Converter is not registered.

Wall Street lining up for Jeb Bush campaign fundraiser in New York // WaPo // Matea Gold – June 11, 2015

Wealthy hedge fund managers, bankers and private equity investors have signed on to host one of the first official fundraisers for Jeb Bush's soon-to-be-announced presidential campaign, a June 24 breakfast reception in New York that is on track to bring in at least $1 million.

Already, three dozen heavyweight players have committed to raise a minimum of $27,000 each for the event, according to a copy of the invitation obtained by the Washington Post.

Among them are New York Jets owner Woody Johnson, former Barclays chief executive Robert E. Diamond Jr., private equity executive Emil Henry, investment banker Jeff Bunzel, hedge fund manager Duke Buchan, and Alex Navab, who heads KKR's private equity business in the Americas.

New Jersey state Sen. Joseph M. Kyrillos, who chaired Chris Christie's 2009 New Jersey gubernatorial campaign, is also listed as a co-chair of the fundraiser. He defected to Bush this spring, as The Post previously reported.

Co-chairs of the June 24 event, set to be held at a midtown Manhattan hotel, get access to a 7:45 a.m. photo reception, an 8 a.m. host reception and then the larger breakfast event. They also will be invited to a retreat in Kennebunkport, Me., for bundlers who bring in $27,000 in the first 15 days of the campaign.

Bush, who spent the last five months stockpiling tens of millions in an allied super PAC, is set to officially announce his White House bid Monday in Miami. After that, he's planning two intense weeks of campaigning and fundraising, hoping to bring in millions for his official campaign committee by the close of the quarter on June 30.

Jeb Bush's legally nonexistent campaign has had a lot of problems // WaPo // Max Ehrenfreund – June 11, 2015

Disagreement, distrust and dysfunction: That's a whole lot of trouble for a campaign that legally does not exist.

The Washington Post's Ed O'Keefe and Robert Costa describe how even though former Florida Gov. Jeb Bush (R) has not declared himself a candidate for president, his campaign has already found the time for a few serious internal squabbles. The organization has been "disjointed in message and approach, torn between factions and more haphazard than it appeared on the surface," O'Keefe and Costa report. "Bush's first six months as an all-but-declared candidate have been defined by a series of miscalculations, leaving his standing considerably diminished ahead of his formal entry into the race on Monday."

When Bush does formally declare himself a candidate, presumably he and his campaign will stop coordinating strategy with the independent committees supporting him — coordination that is illegal for a candidate for elected office, as Eric Lichtblau and Nick Corasaniti discussed in The New York Times last week.

The thing is, the law does not distinguish between candidates who claim they haven't decided whether they're running but secretly (or not so secretly) are running, and candidates who have launched their campaign already (or who have launched it more than once). Even candidates who are just "testing the waters," which is a technical term, are subject to rules.

Yes, there are gray areas, and the law isn't completely clear, but here's O'Keefe and Costa's summary of what Bush has been up to over the past few months:

This version of Total Mail Converter is not registered.

Bush revived a 650-member alumni network of aides who worked for him as governor, and he recruited 21 veterans of his father's and brother's administrations to advise him on foreign policy. He hired state directors in the first four early states, aides for outreach to evangelical Christians and Hispanics, and a spokeswoman dedicated to fielding questions from the Spanish-language press.

As Bush travels the country, he has fielded more than 900 questions from donors, reporters and voters, according to aides. He has maintained a busy schedule that stretches from the early-voting states of Iowa, New Hampshire, South Carolina and Nevada — where conservative Republicans remain skeptical — to places visited less frequently at this early stage by presidential candidates, including Denver, Seattle and Puerto Rico.

Watchdogs have accused Bush — along with other Democratic and Republican candidates — of violating the law, but given partisan gridlock at the Federal Election Commission, their complaints will probably go unheeded.

Bush's non-candidate candidacy isn't just a clever manipulation of obscure election law. Donors have given millions of dollars to the un-campaign — although, as O'Keefe and Costa report, probably not nearly the $100 million his advisers had predicted. The money raises serious questions about whether the only people who can fully participate in American democracy are people who have rich friends.

Bush's GOP primary opponents see him as out of touch with the party's base and more concerned about what his donors think. Ideally, good election laws would prevent candidates from relying on exorbitant fundraising dinners to buy their way into races and force them instead to win votes the hard way, by talking to citizens.

In Europe, Jeb Bush sounds like Barack Obama // Politico // Eli Stokols – June 11, 2015

Jeb Bush, now on the third day of a European tour meant to showcase his foreign policy chops, is sounding a little bit like the man he's trying to replace: Barack Obama.

Stylistically, Bush is a striking a more aggressive posture than the president, warning about Russian encroachment and vowing to more staunchly defend America's allies in Eastern Europe.

But on substance, Bush has offered little to differentiate himself from Obama's cautious, consensus-driven approach to confronting Russian leader Vladimir Putin — aside from a vague call for "defensive military support" for the Western-backed Ukrainian government.

On Thursday, Bush told reporters that his meetings with the Polish president and other government and business leaders here in Warsaw have confirmed his belief that Poland wants America to play a bigger role in Europe and the world and that "it's really important for the United States to stay active and be clear about the role that we can play.

"When there's doubt, when there's uncertainty, when we pull back, it creates less chance of a more peaceful world," Bush said.

He repeated his call for bolstering U.S. military forces in the Baltic states, where Obama last year ordered a buildup of air force units. "The numbers are, I understand, in the hundreds, and that doesn't send a signal of strength. We need to be more robust, and need to encourage our allies to invest more in security," Bush said.

This version of Total Mail Converter is not registered.

And Bush again went further than Obama has, calling for sending defensive weapons to the embattled government in Kiev. Lawmakers on both sides — as well as many of his own top advisers — have urged the president to arm the Ukrainians with lethal weapons, but he has thus far demurred.

"I think we need to provide defensive military support, because it's very hard to make the structural reforms necessary and grow the economy in a world where there's a threat of further aggression," Bush said. "That would be the first step."

But he provided few specific ideas for challenging Putin, calling vaguely for "a strategy" that is "comprehensive" and "forward-leaning."

He reiterated his line that the U.S. "can't be all things to all people; we can't be the world's policeman" — a refrain that echoes Obama's own September 2013 declaration that "America is not the world's policeman."

And Bush's calls for reassuring nervous NATO allies ignored Obama's Sept. 14, 2014, speech in Talinn, the Estonian capital, in which the president bluntly declared, "We will defend the territorial integrity of every single ally" and warned Putin against further aggression, as he did again during last weekend's G-7 summit in Bavaria.

Nor has Bush differentiated himself much on economic issues.

In Berlin, he stressed the importance of the Transatlantic Trade and Investment Partnership, a U.S.-European trade deal that Obama supports.

In Warsaw, he met with the Polish-American Freedom Foundation and lauded the group, which he described as "an offshoot by the way of a U.S. effort investing in the future of this country and it was an extraordinary success"; Obama has hailed the foundation several times.

But on the question of whether the U.S. and Europe should invest more foreign aid in Ukraine, Bush was noncommittal.

So far, the U.S. has provided Kiev with $2 billion in loan guarantees; the European Union has coughed up $1.8 billion in economic aid, which The Economist has called "contemptible." Additional economic aid, many believe, could loosen Russia's grip by helping Ukraine develop its own natural gas resources, making it less reliant on Moscow.

Bush also said any future aid should be tied to economic reforms, and that Europe "should play a leading role" in this area.

Asked about whether Georgia or Ukraine should join NATO, Bush again agreed with Obama.

"There's a process that these countries need to go through," he said. "I think that process is established and it's the right one."

As for whether the U.S. should consider putting permanent military bases in Poland, Bush was careful not to over-commit, pointing out that he's not yet privy to the intelligence he'd need to decide.

This version of Total Mail Converter is not registered.

“Maybe I should get classified briefings,” Bush said with a chuckle. “I’ll talk to my national security adviser and get back to you, how about that?”

Sean Hannity scores first Jeb Bush interview // Politico // Hadas Gold – June 11, 2015

Fox News host Sean Hannity continues his streak as conservative king maker, as the network announced Thursday that he will have the first interview with Jeb Bush after his presidential campaign announcement next week.

The former Florida governor is expected to announce his presidential campaign Monday in Florida. On Tuesday, Hannity will interview Bush. Bush will also appear on "The Tonight Show with Jimmy Fallon" that same night.

Bush campaign spokespeople confirmed that Bush will not hold any interviews Monday and that Hannity will be his first.

Four GOP hopefuls have given Sean Hannity dibs on their first interviews as candidates: former Texas Gov. Rick Perry and Sens. Ted Cruz, Rand Paul and Marco Rubio. Other candidates have tried to land an interview with the conservative host, campaign sources have previously said, only to be turned down — either because they had given their first interview to another media outlet or because they weren't popular enough.

The interview with Bush will air next Tuesday at 10 p.m.

Jeb Bush: 'Putin has changed' since brother George saw his 'soul' // CNN // Tom LoBianco & Dana Bash – June 11, 2015

Asked his opinion on the Iraq War recently, Jeb Bush struggled to find his footing while supporting his brother. But ask about Russian President Vladimir Putin -- of whom former President George W. Bush once said that he "got a sense of his soul" -- and older brother Jeb gets right to the point: "He's a bully."

How does he square that difference? Jeb Bush said Thursday that Putin has evolved over the years.

"I think Putin has changed, for sure. He has changed over time and he has been emboldened by, whether it's true or not, the perception is that we've pulled back," Bush said. "So people do change and this is an example of that."

READ: Jeb Bush's foreign policy strategy: 'I am my own man'

Indeed, George Bush's own relationship with the Russian leader deteriorated over his term, to a point where he and just about every other Republican agree Putin is a threat that needs to be contained.

Jeb Bush has not said exactly how he would handle Putin if elected president, but he did say Thursday that the U.S. needs to step up its military presence in Eastern Europe to support allies like Poland.

"We need to be more robust, we need to encourage our NATO allies in Europe to invest more in their own national security. We need to do the same In our country. We need to be consistent about what types of actions we will take should there be more aggression," he said.

This version of Total Mail Converter is not registered.

On the crisis in Ukraine, where leaders are begging for more assistance from the West, Bush said they should be provided with more military help.

"We need to provide defensive military support. It's hard to make the structural reforms and grow the economy in a world where there is aggression," Bush said.

The theme of Bush's trip this week to Germany, Poland and Estonia -- ahead of his expected announcement Monday that he's running for president -- is to highlight what he calls the importance of a "forward leaning" American approach here, one he argues is lacking under the Obama administration.

But just how Bush would take the forward leaning concept, and turn it into policy as president, is a work in progress.

He would not say, for example, whether former Soviet countries like Ukraine should be accepted into NATO, instead saying he would defer to the process that allows that.

Still, he sees plenty of room to attack the current president and implicitly criticize leading 2016 Democratic contender Hillary Clinton for an unsuccessful "reset" with Russia.

"I think to deal with Putin, you need to deal from strength. He's a bully," Bush said in Berlin Wednesday, repeating a message he's using throughout his Europe trip this week. "You enable bad behavior when you're nuanced with a guy like that."

He continued, "I'm not talking about being bellicose, but saying, 'Here are the consequences of your actions.' And that would deter the kind of bad outcome that we don't want to see."

And at the close of separate remarks in Berlin Tuesday, Bush took a final shot at Clinton and Obama.

"I think there's lots to do, and we're beginning to realize the 'reset button' didn't turn out so hot," he said.

Putin is a perfect whipping boy for Republicans as his support for separatists' hostile takeover of Ukraine combined with his condescending rhetoric toward the United States have revived Cold War rivalries between the two countries.

Since then, Western powers have pushed to isolate Putin. At the same time Bush was in Germany, Obama was in the country for a meeting of the G7, which kicked out Russia roughly a year ago. High on the agenda was whether economic sanctions against Russia were working.

Back home, the politics are easy for Republicans. Democrats have set the policy for the last seven years and one of the chief architects also happens to be the likely Democratic presidential nominee: Hillary Clinton.

"It makes sense that the Republican candidates are out to critique, and Hillary Clinton tries not to say much," said Leon Aron, U.S.-Russia relations expert at the American Enterprise Institute, who consulted with 2012 Republican nominee Mitt Romney but has not signed onto any 2016 campaign yet.

This version of Total Mail Converter is not registered.

Aron noted that he has been contacted by several prospective Republican presidential campaigns and said the fact that candidates have been reaching out to him so early in the election cycle is a clear sign of the importance foreign policy -- and specifically U.S.-Russian relations -- will play in this race.

The interest so early in Russia, he said, is part of a broader trend which has American voters focused abroad this cycle, including deep worries about Middle East unrest.

But for all the clear advantages of using Putin as a punching bag, that role also has a liability when it comes to the Bushes.

In his book "Decision Points," George Bush recounted a meeting with Putin in 2001. At one point he asked if it was true that Putin's mother had given him a cross blessed in Jerusalem. Putin then softened somewhat as he told the story of how he lost the cross in a fire.

"I thought of the emotion in Vladimir's voice when he shared the story of the cross. 'I looked the man in the eye,' I said, '... I was able to get a sense of his soul,'" Bush wrote. Bush also assessed then that Putin was "straightforward" and "trustworthy."

Even fellow Republicans have criticized the president's comments. As the 2008 GOP presidential nominee, Arizona Sen. John McCain said, "I looked into Mr. Putin's eyes and I saw three things — a K and a G and a B." The 2012 Republican candidate, Mitt Romney, also warned that Putin posed a much more serious threat than was perceived by the Obama administration.

Yet by the time George Bush left the White House, he, too, had soured on Putin. In the final year of his term, Bush struggled to decide how to handle Russia's stunning invasion of Georgia. In his book, published two years after he left office, Bush called the invasion a "low point" in his relationship with Putin. He also noted that in the years following his 2001 meeting with the Russian president, "Putin would give me reasons to revise my opinion."

That makes it easier for his brother Jeb to take on the Russian leader during his trip to parts of the former Soviet Union this week.

And it also helped that George Bush's role in bolstering Eastern European countries is well-regarded in those states, making the Bushes sympatico on their over-arching foreign policy stance toward Russia.

Though Jeb Bush's last name can be a negative when he travels abroad, given how disliked George Bush became in most of Europe, his campaign stops on this trip emphasize areas where there is public support for either his brother or his father.

Former President George H. W. Bush helped reunify Germany with the fall of the Soviet Union -- a fact son Jeb pointed out to applause during his speech in Berlin.

And George W. Bush stood fast with former Soviet states, proposing a missile defense shield in Poland as a means of deterring Iran, which Obama later scrapped.

Candidates often spend more time criticizing policies and decrying international villains than spelling out their own course of action. And while Jeb Bush has used tough rhetoric, his actions may prove different. Aron said the usual approach is for U.S. presidents to open their terms with a general policy of détente with Russian leaders before relations deteriorate.

This version of Total Mail Converter is not registered.

He pointed to President John F. Kennedy and Soviet leader Nikita Khrushchev as the model and Reagan's encounters with the Soviets early in his first term while they were fighting in Afghanistan as the exception. George W. Bush's ability to see Putin's soul? That fit into the pattern, too.

Dmitri Trenin, director of the Carnegie Moscow Center, said that based on what Jeb Bush had said so far, Russians watching America would conclude that "Jeb has said the minimum that is now required in the West" so "he is generally sober."

That means he would potentially be welcomed as an alternative to the current man in the Oval Office. "'The U.S. will not turn into a friend if he is elected, but at least we will have a change of partner,'" Trenin said they would assess. "'We are so tired of Obama.'"

Jeb Bush says view on unwed births 'hasn't changed at all' // MSNBC // Benjy Sarlin – June 11, 2015

Facing scrutiny over his rhetoric and record regarding single mothers, former Florida Gov. Jeb Bush told reporters on Thursday that two-parent homes help children "live lives of purpose and meaning."

In a chapter of his 1995 book "Profiles of Character" entitled "The Restoration of Shame," Bush, who is in Europe this week on an international tour, complained that having children outside of marriage had become common because there was "no longer a stigma attached to this behavior" and that "parents and neighbors have become ineffective at attaching some sense of ridicule to this behavior."

Asked by msnbc whether his views regarding the application of shame had changed, Bush suggested his book's warning had proved prophetic and stressed the importance of encouraging young people to get married before having children.

"My views have evolved over time, but my views about the importance of dads being involved in the lives of children hasn't changed at all," he said. "In fact, since 1995 ... this book was a book about cultural indicators [and] the country has moved in the wrong direction. We have a 40-plus percent out-of-wedlock birth rate."

Bush has talked on the trail about research showing improved economic fortunes for children who are raised with two parents and on Thursday reiterated the importance of family structure.

"It's a huge challenge for single moms to raise children in the world that we're in today and it hurts the prospects, it limits the possibilities of young people being able to live lives of purpose and meaning," he said.

After a follow-up question on whether the chapter was meant to apply to policy, Bush said that he was "speaking of [marriage] in the policy context and the focus was on men."

In responding to the story, Bush's staff has pointed reporters to a later passage in the book noting that raising the issue "does not mean we should demean the heroic efforts of single parents who are trying to raise good, decent children."

A number of news outlets and commentators this week are also revisiting a 2001 law Bush allowed to pass that included a so-called "Scarlet Letter" provision requiring mothers who give their children up for adoption to publicly post records of their sexual histories that might alert potential fathers about the birth. Bush raised concerns about that provision at the time but allowed the bill to pass into law without signing it. He later signed a repeal of the controversial section in 2003 after it was struck down by a court.

This version of Total Mail Converter is not registered.

Asked by msnbc whether he had regrets about how the issue was handled, Bush said he could not recall the full details but that the broader law was intended to support single mothers by improving collection of child support from fathers.

“To assume you can create a fatherless society and not have bad outcomes I think is the wrong approach,” he said. “I don’t remember what the repeal was, I can remember the purpose of the law was to enhance the ability to collect child support because men have the responsibility of taking care of their children.”

Bush’s latest remarks prompted an unsolicited one-sentence response from Democratic National Committee spokeswoman Holly Shulman.

“Shame on you, Jeb,” Shulman wrote in an e-mail.

Jeb Hated Easy Divorce. So Did Hillary. // The Daily Beast // Betsy Woodruff – June 11, 2015

Sometimes in the course of campaigns, opposing sides circulate information that comes back to bite them.

This is one of those times.

On Wednesday, Democrats were up in arms over comments Jeb Bush wrote in his 1995 book that expressed criticism of divorce that occurred without a clear cause.

“[No]-fault divorce quickly became a tool for those who used the law not to escape physical or mental cruelty but to pursue career dreams and trade in their wives for something more appealing,” he wrote in Profiles in Character.

Cue the outrage.

“Bush has to hope the book stays out of print,” wrote Joan Walsh, Salon’s editor-at-large.

And at the Washington Post, opinion writer Catherine Rampell criticized Bush’s “histrionics about no-fault divorce” and called his views on the issue “strange and/or relatively retrograde.”

Behind the scenes, Democratic communicators pushed the “Jeb is anti-divorce” narrative calling it “insane.”

But here’s the thing:

In her 1996 book, It Takes A Village, Hillary Clinton took the same position.

Oops.

This version of Total Mail Converter is not registered.

Let's compare.

Bush argued that no-fault divorce generally hurt kids, and that lawmakers might want to consider making parents to be more circumspect about ending their marriages.

In a 1996 Orlando Sentinel op-ed, Bush wrote that Florida's no-fault divorce law provided important protections for women in abusive situations but also "threw the baby out with the bath water."

"In real terms, divorce meant parents spending less time with their children," he continued. "According to a number of studies, the absence of one parent in the household has been enough to result in an increased propensity for crime, suicide, out-of-wedlock births, depression and truancy."

He then noted that some argued for "an extended mandatory cooling-off period" before letting parents with minors finalize their divorces, but added he wasn't sure the cooling-off periods would be good policy.

Ultimately as governor, he didn't move to implement such a rule.

The AP reported in 2002 that "Bush said that he does not want that [no-fault divorce] law changed, saying it could lead to abusive situations if it is more difficult for couples to split up."

Now, in her 1996 book, It Takes A Village, Hillary Clinton argued a strikingly similar position.

"[W]ith divorce as easy as it is, and its consequences so hard, people with children need to ask themselves whether they have given a marriage their best shot and what more they can do to make it work before they call it quits," she wrote, echoing Bush's concerns about how divorce impacts children. "For this reason, I am ambivalent about no-fault divorce with no waiting period when children are involved. We should consider returning to mandatory 'cooling off' periods, with education and counseling for partners."

So both Bush and Clinton were open to—but ultimately noncommittal about—policies designed to make it harder for parents of minor children to get divorced.

Clinton's campaign didn't respond to a request for comment.

In one sense, Clinton went even further than Bush on the issue, suggesting in her book that divorce is a public health problem.

"I admire the way the Parent Education Program in Columbus, Ohio, treats divorce as a public health issue," she wrote.

And she even invoked Bill Bennett, the Reaganite and conservative culture warrior, to make the case against divorce.

"One does not have to agree with all the remarks of former Secretary of Education William Bennett to welcome his acknowledgment before the Christian Coalition that divorce is hard on children," she wrote.

This version of Total Mail Converter is not registered.

Clinton didn't leave her anti-divorce rhetoric in the 90's.

During a Senate floor speech in 2004 arguing against a constitutional amendment that would have barred same-sex marriage (she was opposed to gay marriage until 2013), she invoked no-fault divorce again.

"Now, if we were really concerned about marriage and the fact that so many marriages today end in divorce, and so many children are then put into the incredibly difficult position of having to live with the consequences of divorce," she said. "Perhaps 20, 30 years ago we should have been debating an amendment to the Federal Constitution to make divorce really, really hard, to take it out of the states' hands and say that we will not liberalize divorce, we will not move toward no-fault divorce, and we will make it as difficult as possible because we fear the consequences of liberalizing divorce laws."

Elsewhere in the speech, she was explicit about her concerns over the divorce rate.

"We are living in a society where people have engaged in divorce at a rapid, accelerated rate," she said. "We all know it is something that has led to the consequences with respect to the economy, to society, to psychology, and emotion that so often mark a young child's path to adulthood."

It just goes to show when your potential nominee has a long record, it might pay to check it before you start questioning the other candidate's sanity.

RUBIO

Marco Rubio, like a lot of Americans, is terrible with money // WaPo // Jonnelle Marte – June 11, 2015

Marco Rubio has been getting a lot of attention for his financial blunders.

He once cashed out a retirement account to help pay for a new refrigerator and to cover his kids' private school tuition, despite having cash on hand. And in a deep dive into his finances, the New York Times reported this week that Rubio has saved very little, even when making a decent amount of money. In addition to paying off his student loans, he used part of his book advance to splurge on an $80,000 boat.

Rubio has been talking more openly about his struggles on the campaign trail, using the story to relate to voters. His campaign says that the boat was a fishing boat and that he isn't like other presidential candidates who came from wealth. The son of Cuban immigrants — his father was a bartender and his mother was a hotel maid — he didn't grow up with a lot of money, he says. "Like most Americans, I know what it's like for money to be a limited resource and to have to manage it accordingly," he told the Times in a statement.

Are his mistakes really that different from that of other people who are struggling to pay off student loans, raise their families and pay their mortgages? Here's what some of the numbers say.

Saving rates.

Rubio often struggled to save, even during times when he was earning high income, the Times reported. He's better off than a lot of consumers but still falls within the bottom 90 percent of households when it comes to wealth. By that standard, his saving habits are in line with that of other people who have similar amounts of wealth. As the chart below shows, people in the bottom 90 percent save close to zero percent of their pay each year, according to an analysis by Emmanuel Saez and Gabriel Zucman, economists with the University of California, Berkeley. Saving rates jumped to 15 percent for people in the top 10 percent, or those with more than $660,000 in net worth.

This version of Total Mail Converter is not registered.

Cashing out retirement accounts.

This is a mistake that financial pros warn about constantly. When Rubio cashed out nearly $70,000 in retirement savings from an IRA last year to buy a new refrigerator and help pay for his children's private school tuition costs, he likely faced a steep tax bill and set back his retirement readiness. (He has other retirement savings, but he also had other cash on hand, according to reports.)

Early retirement withdrawals usually come with a 10 percent penalty and the requirement to pay taxes on the cash that's taken out. They also puts a dent in retirement income by cutting down on the amount of savings invested that can grow over time. Still, plenty of people dip into retirement savings before they should to pay for more immediate needs like college tuition or to cover the bills after a job loss. About 8 percent of people in their 40s and 10 percent of people in their 50s took early withdrawals from their IRAs in 2013, according to the Employee Benefit Research Institute. Those rates increased as people got closer to retirement age.

Income fluctuation.

Another part of Rubio's story is that his income has changed dramatically over the years. Last year he made $174,000 as a U.S. senator last year and earned another $52,000 from book royalties and a teaching position at Florida International University, as my colleague Sean Sullivan reported. But that's still not as much as he was making when he worked as a lawyer in the private sector. And he's had other ups and downs: He earned a modest salary as a member of the Florida state legislature, then saw a huge pay raise when he landed a job at a private law firm, before taking a pay cut to join the U.S. Senate. His $800,000 book advance in 2012 was another big windfall.

Turns out that a surprising number of Americans see income fluctuate from year to year, or from month to month. While that kind of income volatility is more pronounced for the poor, it's not limited to them. One in four people saw their incomes rise or drop by 30 percent or more from 2013 to 2014, according to an analysis of 100,000 Chase Bank account holders by the JPMorgan Chase Institute.

Still a top earner.

To be sure, Rubio is better off than a lot of consumers in a key way. His annual pay, while not in the millions, still put him in the top 5 percent of households when it comes to income. That leaves him in a better position to build wealth and to have enough savings to ride out emergencies when they happen. The majority of households, or 55 percent, do not have enough cash on hand to replace one month's worth of income, according to a study by Pew Charitable Trusts. People in the bottom quintile of earnings only had enough savings to replace a median of nine days of income. For the top quintile, median savings were enough to stretch for 52 days.

Rubio And Five U.S. Congressmen Voted For Florida's 'Scarlet Letter' Adoption Bill // HuffPo // Laura Bassett – June 11, 2015

Sen. Marco Rubio (R) was among the Florida state legislators who voted for the so-called "Scarlet Letter" law in 2001 that required single mothers to publish their sexual histories in the newspaper in order to place their babies up for adoption.

This version of Total Mail Converter is not registered.

Five U.S. congressmen -- Reps. Mario Diaz-Balart (R), Lois Frankel (D), Jeff Miller (R), Gus Bilirakis (R) and Dennis Ross (R) -- were state legislators at the time and voted for the controversial bill. Reps. Debbie Wasserman Schultz (D), Frederica Wilson (D), Daniel Webster (R) and Bill Posey (R), who were also state legislators back then, voted against it.

The law, which passed with overwhelming majorities in the House and Senate, required unwed moms who wished to put their babies up for adoptions to post details about their recent sexual encounters in the newspaper in an attempt to contact the father, even if the woman was a victim of rape or incest. The purpose of the bill was to inform estranged biological fathers that their children were being adopted and give them the chance to intervene.

The "Scarlet Letter" law gained media attention this week after The Huffington Post reported that former Florida Gov. Jeb Bush (R) had advocated for the public shaming of unwed parents in his 1995 book. Bush allowed the controversial law to go into effect in 2001, but signed a repeal of it two years later after it was successfully challenged in court.

The fact that Rubio, a 2016 presidential candidate, supported the bill could inoculate Bush from criticism that he allowed it to go into effect if Bush decides to throw his hat in the ring.

The Gainesville Sun reported in 2002 that some lawmakers -- including Frankel, a longtime women's right activist -- did not realize the newspaper publication provision was in the bill when they voted for it. "I have to admit I'm horrified that I voted for this," Frankel told the Sun at the time.

Rubio and the other current members of Congress who supported the bill did not immediately respond to a request for comment.

Is the GOP heartland ready to embrace Marco Rubio? // LA Times // Lisa Mascaro – June 11, 2015

Marco Rubio sliced through a pork roast at an Iowa fairgrounds, not even a softball question about his family's beloved Cuba could get the Republican presidential hopeful to veer from friendly chit-chat to engage in a more substantive political conversation.

The Florida senator, who is beginning to introduce himself to the American heartland, preferred to stick to safe topics like the deliciousness of the Iowa-made pork seasoning or roasting techniques.

Had this been his hometown of Miami, there would have almost certainly been a reference to carnitas, a favorite Latino pork dish. But this being Iowa, Rubio hardly breathed a word of Spanish throughout the event, which brought together several GOP presidential candidates hoping to make an impression in the state with the nation's first presidential caucus.

Asked by a reporter to address more serious issues, Rubio again brushed questions off with a smile, keeping his eye on the roast pork. "We're working here," he said cheerfully.

Rubio's candidacy has steadily and quietly ascended in the complicated Republican primary field. Even though he rarely tops the polls, Rubio seems to be everyone's first pick as a second choice, reflected in a recent Des Moines Register poll. Strategists say that gives Rubio the potential to emerge as a strong consensus candidate in a GOP field that already features nearly a dozen aspirants.

Rubio, 44, has a youthful, upbeat message that he hopes will contrast not only with Democratic favorite Hillary

This version of Total Mail Converter is not registered.

Rodham Clinton, but also with former Florida Gov. Jeb Bush and other Republican contenders.

Rubio's potential appeal to minority voters, particularly Latinos, is another key selling point as the Republican Party struggles to broaden its base.

But it's unclear whether he can parlay boyish charisma and soaring rhetoric into a viable presidential bid, and some voters and strategists are asking the same disarmingly simple question about Rubio: Is there any there there?

And as he moves his campaign into Midwestern and early nominating states with less diversity -- Iowa is about 92% white -- it remains to be seen whether Rubio's appeal will translate with traditional GOP voters.

"I really need more information on him," said Janelle File, a retired bank vice president, after listening to Rubio speak. "He's really well-spoken and has a great background. But I really want to see more."

Last weekend's pig roast and motorcycle ride, hosted by Republican Iowa Sen. Joni Ernst in Boone, could have been Rubio's moment to shine. It was his second trip to the state, and highly anticipated. With his message of economic conservatism, Christian values and a strong national defense, Rubio was poised to capitalize on his early support for Ernst, the popular senator elected last November.

Marco Rubio enters 2016 race touting youth, avoiding messy issues

Marco Rubio enters 2016 race touting youth, avoiding messy issues

But Rubio didn't seem to impress the crowd as much as he has in other settings. In pressed khakis and a starched-collar shirt, Rubio could barely compete with Wisconsin Gov. Scott Walker and former Texas Gov. Rick Perry, who swaggered into the roast-and-ride event wearing blue jeans and leather.

Rubio skipped the motorcycle ride and politely declined Ernst's offer to ride on the back of her bike. He joked that he would do better at a Jet Ski race.

In many ways, Rubio is an outsider here in middle America, and he takes care not to come off as too youthful, urban or ethnic. In telling his family's immigrant story here, he didn't mention his parents' journey from Cuba, as he usually does.

Rubio instead presented himself as someone just like them: a dad who pays the mortgage, sends his kids to Christian school and believes the new generation will do better.

"I had some people say I'm not old enough or haven't been in government long enough," he told the crowd. "I'm 44 years old, but I feel 45, and I've been in government long enough to know that what we're doing now doesn't work. If we keep promoting the same people, we will get the same result and the future will leave us behind."

Rubio's aides characterize his campaign strategy as "lean and mean," and deny any desire to push Rubio more out front than he is, preferring a come-from-behind strategy. He has yet to hire a director for his Iowa operations, as others have, though aides insist the campaign is ramping up and more staff is coming.

Iowa voters are a famously persnickety bunch, both aggressive in their expectation that every candidate will court their vote and passive in their unwillingness to commit to any one presidential hopeful too soon.

This version of Total Mail Converter is not registered.

That might be in part because Republicans here have picked a string of losers recently in a statewide caucus that prides itself on being the first testing ground for presidential candidates. Their past GOP choices, Mike Huckabee in 2008 and Rick Santorum in 2012, failed to win the party's nomination, let alone the White House.

That could provide an opening for Rubio as Iowans look for a viable alternative to likely front-runners Bush and Walker. "Many of us Iowans are super-sensitive to this: We're tired of being the angry white-guy party," said one senior Republican in the state, granted anonymity to speak frankly about the choices. "It doesn't hurt that [Rubio is] a different face."

Younger voters in particular call Rubio a favorite, and at the Iowa event the few Latino voters in the predominantly white crowd dashed over to Rubio for selfies.

"You're going to be all over Facebook," shouted one fan.

"That's great; we need to be!" Rubio responded.

"I love Rubio," swooned Laurie Millam, who runs the business school at an online university. She said she particularly liked how the Latino candidate smoothed racial and partisan distinctions with a "one America" message.

Recent media scrutiny about Rubio's personal debt and his family's many traffic tickets may only be helping him among ordinary Americans. At the speech, one Iowan jokingly offered driving lessons. The campaign has taken it all lightly, starting the satirical Twitter hashtag, #RubioCrimeSpree.

They attribute nearly $100,000 in online donations over the last few days to people sending money in response as a gesture of support.

At some point, Rubio will need to sit down at the kitchen table and display the skills and resources necessary to tell voters his vision for the nation, much like he did when he was a long-shot Senate candidate going door-to-door five years ago in Florida.

Cornered by one young voter with questions about the future of federal spending, Rubio broke from script and launched into a discourse on the economics of Medicare costs and need for entitlement spending reforms.

But several Iowans were less than impressed with Rubio's performance.

When asked about Rubio's speech, Joe Wells, a retired aviation services manager from Cedar Rapids, responded in a distinctly Iowa-nice way: He changed the subject.

"I never heard from Carly before," he said, referring to Carly Fiorina, the former Hewlett-Packard executive turned presidential candidate, who also attended the event.

When pressed for his views on Rubio, Wells gave a lukewarm assessment: "He's certainly better than Bush or Christie," a reference to the New Jersey governor.

This version of Total Mail Converter is not registered.

Brenda Remsing, a homemaker from Corydon who rode to Boone on the back of friend's motorcycle, likes Sen. Ted Cruz, the firebrand Texas Republican, but she puts Rubio as her second favorite.

"He'd be a good No. 1 -- if I can't have No. 1," she said.

For Rubio, for now, that might be endorsement enough.

Liberals defend Marco Rubio against blistering New York Times attacks // Fox News – June 11, 2015

It's not often that Jon Stewart, host of "The Daily Show," defends conservatives, but that is what he did Wednesday.

Stewart became the latest critic of The New York Times recent stories attacking presidential contender Sen. Marco Rubio, a Florida Republican, for everything from having four traffic tickets in almost 20 years to having had a large student loan and buying expensive items.

"I can't think of a single person who would be bothered by this," Stewart said on his show, in reference to the condemning tone of the Times stories against the senator's tickets and how he used money from his book to lease an Audi, and buy a fishing boat.

The Washington Post quoted some of the Times' findings – which included announcing that Rubio's wife had gotten 13 traffic tickets – and noted, sarcastically, "Outrageous!"

Rubio has somewhat turned the Times seeming hatchet job in his favor, mocking it in emails to supporters and the press, and even getting campaign donations because of the newspaper's attacks.

Said the Post of the Rubio campaign: "Now, they've even got 'The Daily Show' on their side for the moment."

Some publications cast the Times' stories as elitist and gossipy.

"If the Times wanted to make Rubio look relatable to the average American—more like them than his potential opponents—they couldn't have come up with much better than show he has had financial problems,'" wrote a Bloomberg News writer. "Rubio took out $100,000 in student loans that he just paid off three years ago; most of his opponents have probably never even seen a tuition bill. These are points in Rubio's favor. People will like this about him."

PAUL

How Rand Paul Has Already Changed the 2016 Race // TIME // Joe Klein – June 11, 2015

Rand Paul has been a bad, bad boy. Just ask him. "I'm not very popular in Washington right now" was his opening line at a series of town-hall meetings in New Hampshire, two weeks after he had filibustered and, temporarily, crashed the bulk collection of phone data by the federal government. "I messed up their Memorial Day plans."

This version of Total Mail Converter is not registered.

The line drew laughter and applause in the great state of New Hampshire, a flinty and skeptical province. Anything that gums up the federal machine is a good thing, it seems, even if it involves national security. “One of my colleagues asked, ‘What do we do if the authority to collect data lapses?'” he continued. “I told him, ‘Well, we could rely on the Constitution for a few hours.'”

More applause–but weaker this time. This was relatively esoteric stuff, and Paul had to explain himself: He’s in favor of using search warrants to collect the phone data of suspected terrorists, just not bulk collection of all the phone records of all the people, which he believes is unconstitutional under the Fourth Amendment of the Bill of Rights, which prohibits unreasonable search and seizure. He goes all the way back to the colonial lawyer James Otis, who fought unwarranted search procedures by the British. His audiences stay with him as he explains all this. He speaks plainly and well, without bombast or frills. He knows his stuff. But this is not the sort of thing Republican audiences expect from their candidates. It’s more educational than emotional. He doesn’t speak in any detail about Obamacare, immigration, Iran, abortion or gay rights.

By the time his 15-minute stump speech is over, he has delivered a tutorial about the First, Second, Fourth, Fifth, Sixth, Ninth and 10th amendments to the Constitution. “We Republicans won’t be successful as a party,” he says, “until we support the entire Bill of Rights as enthusiastically as we support the Second Amendment”–that is, the right to bear arms.

Rand Paul has a following in the GOP, just as his father Ron Paul did. But he’s a far more interesting candidate. Paul the Elder had cranky tendencies, railing against the Federal Reserve and in favor of hard currency. Paul the Younger has softer edges; he is an ideologue, but a supple and eclectic one–he talks about things his father never did, and his party doesn’t much, like the justice system in poor black neighborhoods (Sixth Amendment: right to a trial by jury). He tells his Republican audiences the outrageous story of Kalief Browder, a black teenager who was arrested in New York City for allegedly stealing a backpack–he claimed he was innocent, refused to plea-bargain–and spent 1,000 days in jail awaiting trial. Browder committed suicide in early June. “No wonder people in those neighborhoods are pretty angry,” he says.

Paul drives his fellow Republicans crazy with his foreign policy views, which are the opposite of the frothing militarism of the John McCain wing of the party. He’s not an isolationist, but not exactly a “realist” either. “We should arm the Kurds,” he told me, sipping water at a diner in Derry. “They’re about the only ones who are really fighting ISIS.” I pointed out that the Egyptians were fighting ISIS too, in Libya and Sinai. He considered this for a moment, then said, “Yeah, but they put thousands of people in jail for dissent.” It was a purist answer: he wasn’t ready to support an oppressive state, even if it was fighting on our side against a mortal enemy.

The current conventional wisdom is that Paul doesn’t have much of a chance to win the nomination–even though, according to a recent poll, he runs stronger against Hillary Clinton than any other Republican does. But his message is fresh and consequential. It throws a klieg light on the deficiencies of the two major parties: the mindless Republican war-silliness and the utter failure of the Democratic welfare state to alleviate intergenerational poverty. “I was on the South Side of Chicago a few weeks ago,” he said. “And the people there know the current system isn’t working. They’re about ready to try something new.”

But what? His “solutions”–like lower taxes on businesses in poor neighborhoods–are insufficient, and his libertarianism doesn’t begin to address the deficit of individual responsibility that plagues our communities, poor and rich alike. I’d love to hear what he has to say about what democracy demands from its citizens. Still, he is attempting something that few candidates will risk–an intelligent conversation, on issues that really matter. I’m thrilled he’s in the race.

Rand Paul Signs on to Amendment Barring Ground Troops Against ISIS // Bloomberg // David Weigel – June 11, 2015

Kentucky Senator Rand Paul has had a devil of a time with his amendments related to foreign policy. This week, the Foreign Relations Committee rejected Paul's amendment to the National Defense Authorization Act that would have cut off U.S. aid to the Palestinians. The prospects look better, but not much better, for Paul's co-sponsorship of an amendment to strengthen the 1971 Non-Detention Act. On the campaign trail, Paul likes to talk about his amendment that would have paid for higher military funding with cuts to foreign aid. The story ends with most senators voting against him.

This version of Total Mail Converter is not registered.

Thursday, Paul took on another uphill and telling battle. He co-sponsored an amendment from Connecticut Senator Chris Murphy, a Democrat, that would bar funding for ground troops being sent to the Levant to fight ISIS. The amendment's text:

No funds appropriated by this Act may be used to support the deployment of the United States Armed Forces for the purpose of ground combat operations in Iraq or Syria, except as necessary-

For the protection or rescue of members of the United States Armed Forces or United States citizens from imminent danger posed by ISIL; or

To conduct missions not intended to result in ground combat operations by United States forces, such as-intelligence collection and sharing;

enabling kinetic strikes limited operations against high value targets;

operational planning; or other forms of advice and assistance to coalition forces fighting ISIL in Iraq or Syria Questions to Paul's office and presidential campaign went unanswered, but he's left no confusion about his ISIS stance. Since last fall, he's favored attacks on ISIS positions that threaten American interests. He's also favored arming the Kurds as they fight ISIS, telling an audience this weekend in Merrimack, N.H., that America should take the military equipment that's unused and "rusting" in Afghanistan and "airlift it" to any Kurds who need them. At the same event, Paul spoke about giving the Kurdish minority a state of its own after the defeat of the Islamic State.

All of this, according to Paul, would require a new Authorization of Military Force, and new funding votes. That's Murphy's position, too, and the position of several progressive co-sponsors. Paul, for now, appears to be the only Republican (and only Republican presidential candidate) taking this stance via the NDAA amendment.

WALKER

Scott Walker Says Supporters Have Suggested Walker-Rubio 2016 Ticket // Bloomberg // John McCormick – June 11, 2015

Some who have talked to the governor privately about a possible pairing say they have been surprised by how seriously he seems to be taking the prospect.

Wisconsin Governor Scott Walker on Thursday talked positively about a Republican presidential ticket—potentially announced even before the first nomination balloting—that would include himself and Senator Marco Rubio of Florida.

In a Bloomberg Politics interview, the likely candidate also expressed agreement with President Barack Obama on the pressing issue of fast-track trade legislation.

Walker, 47, isn't expected to formally enter the race until early July, after his state has completed a two-year budget plan. Still, he's apparently given some consideration and had discussions already about a potential running mate, with the focus on Rubio.

This version of Total Mail Converter is not registered.

“I've actually had quite a few people, grassroots supporters, donors, and others who have made that suggestion,” he said when asked about a Walker-Rubio ticket.

“For now, you know, Marco is a quality candidate,” Walker said. “He's going to be formidable in this race as things progress. And if we were to get in, we'd be as well, and we'll see where things take us.”

Walker was in Utah to meet with potential financial supporters and to speak at a summit hosted by 2012 Republican nominee Mitt Romney that's attracted six declared and likely presidential candidates. The full interview will air Thursday at 5 p.m. ET on With All Due Respect on Bloomberg TV and BloombergPolitics.com.

Walker said both he and Rubio often hear the suggestion that they should combine forces, potentially even before the first nomination voting in Iowa in February 2016, as a way to stand out amid a crowded field. “We'd just probably have to arm-wrestle over who would be at the top of the ticket,” he said.

Some who have talked privately to Walker about a possible pairing with Rubio say they have been surprised by how seriously the Wisconsin governor seems to be taking the prospect. At this phase of presidential campaign, the norm would be for a White House hopeful to summarily dismiss such a move, in public and in private.

Walker said he likes governors and their executive experience better than senators as potential presidents and vice presidents, but that Rubio stands out.

“I do like Marco Rubio,” he said. “I think he and I have similar thoughts on national defense and foreign policy.”

Walker noted how he tweeted greetings to Rubio, 44, for his birthday last month, a move that also underscored his own relative youthfulness amid a mostly older Democratic and Republican field.

“Marco, happy birthday from one 40-something to another,” Walker said of his greeting. “There’s certainly a generational issue there.”

In the most recent Bloomberg Politics/Des Moines Register Iowa Poll, Walker led in the state that starts the nomination process, while Rubio was the most popular second choice among likely Republican caucus participants.

Trade, tax policy

Walker said he supports giving Obama the authority to submit trade agreements to Congress for an expedited, up-or-down vote without amendments. “If we don't go down this path, we're going to be at a competitive disadvantage, and so I think it just makes sense,” he said.

At the same time, like many Republicans who support granting the trade authority recent past presidents have had, Walker said the deal would allow the Republican-controlled Congress to review Obama's actions.

“If this president were to give them a bad deal, they should hold him accountable and vote it down,” he said. “They have every right to do that under the proposal."

This version of Total Mail Converter is not registered.

On taxes, Walker said he'd look for ways to lower them especially for those in "the middle of the bracket" as well as for businesses. "I certainly wouldn't be talking about anybody paying any more," he said.

The popular home-mortgage deduction is not a place where Walker would look for additional revenue to balance the cuts he'd like to see made, he said. "We're going to look at the entire tax code and what the best way to reform is, but I think homeownership is an important part of living the American dream," he said.

He expressed similar views about the popular deduction for charitable contributions.

CRUZ

Ted Cruz under fire for Tennessee campaign chairman // Politico // Adam Lerner – June 11, 2015

Ted Cruz's presidential campaign is pushing back against criticism that the Texas senator named an anti-Islamic politician as his state chairman in Tennessee.

On Wednesday, Cruz spokesman Rick Tyler called the reaction to the appointment "absurd."

Tyler's comments came in response to a prominent Muslim-American advocacy group's complaints about the Cruz campaign's new state chairman, Kevin Kookogey.

Announcing the move, Cruz hailed Kookogey's "experience and knowledge of both the landscape in Tennessee and the issues that matter to Tennesseans," such as "American sovereignty, defense, and religious liberty."

As chairman of the Williamson County Republican Party in 2012, Kookogey pushed a resolution condemning Republican Gov. Bill Haslam for hiring Samar Ali, a practicing Muslim, and for appointing a council on Islamic affairs in the state.

"RESOLVED that the Williamson County Republican Party hereby opposes Tennessee Governor Bill Haslam's recent appointment of a Shariah compliant finance expert to the Tennessee Department of Economic and Community Development," the resolution said.

The Haslam administration swatted down the allegations at the time.

"Samar Ali was hired to be ECD's international director. Her job duties are to manage the TNTrade export program and to supervise our four international offices in Germany, Japan, China and Canada," Clint Brewer, an official with the state's Department of Economic and Community Development, told Politifact. "There is no part of her job — or any department operations — that involves Shariah compliant finance or Shariah law," Brewer said.

Ali stayed in office for 18 months, and is now a private attorney at a Nashville law firm.

This version of Total Mail Converter is not registered.

But the bruised feelings remain: On Tuesday, the Council on American-Islamic Relations demanded that Cruz end its affiliation with Kookogey for his "longstanding support for anti-Muslim and Islamaphobic causes."

Tyler, the Cruz spokesman, pushed back in a statement to the Tennessean on Wednesday.

"It is absurd to suggest that being a defender of American law under the United States Constitution is somehow anti-Muslim," Tyler said.

Ali, a former White House fellow and Obama administration counterterrorism adviser who was born in Nashville and grew up in Tennessee, told the Tennessean last year that the sharia law flap was a "very painful experience."

"It also made me realize how fast one can be dehumanized," Ali added, "and I definitely felt dehumanized."

Ted Cruz fights GOP approach on Obamacare subsidies // Politico // Manu Raju – June 11, 2015

Ted Cruz is planning to battle his party over Obamacare again — this time, if Senate Republicans seek to extend subsidies that could be killed by the Supreme Court as soon as this month.

In an interview with POLITICO, the 2016 presidential candidate weighed in on the high-stakes Supreme Court case that could end subsidies for millions of people who receive their health insurance through the federal exchange. A majority of Republican senators have endorsed an approach to keep those subsidies in place until September 2017, but Cruz flatly said "no" when asked if he'd sign on as well.

"I think the best legislative option is to allow states to opt out," Cruz said in the Capitol. "I am cautiously optimistic that the Supreme Court will conclude in King vs. Burwell that the Obama IRS disregarded the plain language of the statute and acted lawlessly. And when that occurs, it will be a real opportunity for Congress to lead."

He added: "In a perfect world, we would take that opportunity to repeal Obamacare. At a minimum, we should allow states to opt out."

Cruz's comments underscore the challenges for Republican leaders if they win the Supreme Court case: They'll have to find a way to help the millions who could immediately see their health care costs skyrocket without appearing to endorse a law they universally despise.

And it's bound to grow more complicated with the injection of 2016 politics: Republican senators in blue-states facing reelection will be eager to avoid a public revolt and find a way to keep federal dollars flowing to people who rely on the subsides to defray their health care costs; conservatives running for president will be eager to renew their demands to kill the controversial law once and for all.

There are several proposals aimed at addressing this dilemma, with one leading option proposed by Sen. Ron Johnson, a conservative up for reelection next year in Wisconsin, which has a federal exchange. While Johnson's approach would extend the subsidies through the summer of 2017, it would also kill the law's individual and employer mandates and repeal insurance industry reforms, a proposal backed by Senate Majority Leader Mitch McConnell (R-Ky.) with 31 co-sponsors.

Other Republicans have proposed their own version, including freshman Sen. Ben Sasse (R-Neb.), who wants to allow financial assistance through tax credits over 18 months but gradually reduce them over that timeframe. And Sen. Bill Cassidy (R-La.), another freshman, has a plan that would not keep the subsidies, though he's signaled he'd be open to extending them depending on how the court rules.

This version of Total Mail Converter is not registered.

Cruz has been open to some transition period in the past. In February, Cruz offered his own bill to repeal Obamacare. But his bill says the current law would stay in place for six months after the measure's enactment date.

It's not unlike Cruz to battle his party over health care; he did it in 2013 after a 21-hour speech demanding that the GOP use a must-pass spending bill to defund Obamacare. When the end result was a government shutdown, he became a scourge of Republicans in Washington.

Sen. John Barrasso (R-Wyo.), a member of Republican leadership, said it's unfair to contend that Republicans are seeking to protect the law if they were to temporarily extend the subsidies.

"Republicans will have a response to protect the people who have been hurt by the president's illegal action, but we are not going to protect the law," he said.

Cruz ramps up attack on ObamaCare // The Hill // Sarah Ferris – June 11, 2015

Sen. Ted Cruz (R-Texas) is ramping up his attacks on ObamaCare — but in a way that will likely put him at odds with Republican leadership.

In two separate interviews on Thursday, Cruz said he would oppose a GOP strategy to extend ObamaCare subsidies that could be struck down by the Supreme Court later this month.

Instead, he said he wants a bill that would let states "opt-out of Obamacare" altogether, he told The Washington Post.

"I think the best legislative option is to allow states to opt out," the presidential candidate told Politico.

The King v. Burwell case, which could result in an estimated 6.4 million people losing their subsidies, is the Republican Party's biggest healthcare challenge before the next election. In Texas alone, 832,334 people stand to lose their subsidies.

The majority of Senate Republicans — Cruz not included — have signed onto a plan from Sen. Ron Johnson (R-Wis.) that would temporarily continue the subsidies, while also repealing the individual and employer mandates.

Two other presidential candidates in the Senate, Sens. Rand Paul (R-Ky.) and Marco Rubio (R-Fla.), also declined to co-sponsor the bill, though it did earn the backing from a fourth candidate, Sen. Lindsey Graham (R-S.C.).

If the court rules against ObamaCare, Republicans will need to act fast to prevent millions of people from dropping out of their healthcare plans.

If no plan is enacted, Democrats are likely to cast the blame on Republicans, who had widely backed the case initially.

But the prospect of a conservative win in King v. Burwell has caused friction among congressional Republicans, who have sharply disagreed on how to avert a healthcare meltdown.

This version of Total Mail Converter is not registered.

Last month, House and Senate leaders disclosed that they will not be releasing their contingency plans for the court case until after the decision.

CHRISTIE

Chris Christie Lays Out Education Plan // NYT // Nick Corasaniti – June 11, 2015

Gov. Chris Christie of New Jersey leaned on the podium with his right elbow, his standard let-me-give-it-to-you-straight stance, and gave one of his classic blunt warnings, this time setting up a nearly hour long speech laying out his educational platform.

“It’s time we had a conversation about education that isn’t defined by ideological dogma or by narrow, personal, institutional interests,” Mr. Christie told the packed room at Iowa State University in Ames, Iowa. “Lets talk about what real educational reform for America looks like.”

But notably, Mr. Christie never touched on his recent abandonment of the Common Core, the set of nationwide educational standards that many conservatives abhor. He has previously denied that his new position against the standards is related to his presidential aspirations.

Instead, Mr. Christie spoke at length on his educational record in New Jersey and how that would inform his vision for the country. And, although the speech was billed as focused on kindergarten through 12th grade, Mr. Christie spent the majority of his time tackling the issue of student debt in higher education, another frequent talking point on the campaign trail.

“Entire generations are being saddled with debt,” Mr. Christie said. “There has not been a town hall meeting I’ve had, in New Jersey or outside of New Jersey, since the beginning of the year, where someone hasn’t raised the issue of student debt.”

He called for an expansion of Pell grants and other federal education funding, saying Congress should expand student aid programs for people at the bottom of the economic ladder. But he criticized President Obama’s plan to make community college free, saying, “We know there is nothing free in the world.”

He proposed “income share agreements” as an alternative to student loans. His proposal would give students the option of paying a percentage of their income for a set amount of time to whomever fronts the cost of college.

“With an income share agreement, there’s no lump sum to pay, so there’s no downside,” he said, also arguing that investors in the program would have more incentive to help the student succeed to recoup their money.

He also called for more transparency in college billing and spending, joking that students and parents had a right to know if a tuition increase was going toward building a new rock-climbing wall. And, like his speech Tuesday in Washington where he argued for a less rigid school calendar, he made the case for universities to offer both night and weekend classes, to let students who need to work their way through college hold down a steady job.

His proposals for reforming kindergarten through 12th-grade education centered on a common theme for the New Jersey governor: confronting the teachers’ union. He spoke early and often of how he restructured teacher tenure in his home state and introduced merit pay for them. He lamented that he was unable to convince the union to agree to change the “last in, first out” layoff policy for teachers.

This version of Total Mail Converter is not registered.

“The power of the teachers’ union has prevented us from using quality based layoffs,” he said. “It’s the worst policy that money can buy.”

He also pointed to his expanded school choice in New Jersey as another victory over the teachers’ union.

“This is a program driven by a simple principle — I think parents are better suited to make decisions about their children’s education than union leaders,” Mr. Christie said.

But as he based many of his recommendations on his education record in New Jersey, reviews in his home state were mixed, most notably in the city of Newark, which has the largest school district in the state.

In 2010, Mr. Christie helped secure, along with former Mayor Cory Booker, a $100 million donation from Mark Zuckerberg, the chief executive of Facebook, to help Newark’s floundering schools. Mr. Booker is now a United States senator representing New Jersey.

The plan, executed in conjunction with Mr. Booker under the banner of “One Newark,” contained some of the important elements of Mr. Christie’s education platforms, like eliminating neighborhood public schools in favor of a lottery to give parents more choice over which schools their children attend.

But that had the unintended effect of leaving some families with children attending multiple schools across the city, and led to an uprising in Newark that helped elect Ras J. Baraka as mayor last year. He was a vocal critic of the plan.

Despite these issues, Mr. Christie, the product of New Jersey public schools himself, still seems to be sticking to school choice and other reforms he has made in New Jersey. As he said in his closing remarks, “When we dare to innovate and fight the status quo, we give our children a fighting chance in this new world.”

Top Chris Christie Aide Goes to His Political Action Committee // NYT // Maggie Haberman – June 11, 2015

Maria Comella, the long-serving communications director to Gov. Chris Christie of New Jersey, will move over to the governor’s political action committee in a senior role, the latest move that indicates he will run for president.

Ms. Comella will become senior adviser to Leadership Matters for America PAC, according to another spokeswoman for Mr. Christie, Samantha Smith.

Her move to Mr. Christie’s political arm is taking place as he appears on the verge of announcing a presidential campaign for 2016, seeing a void in the current Republican field that is as much stylistic as policy-driven.

Ms. Comella has been almost constantly by Mr. Christie’s side since he became the governor of New Jersey after defeating the Democratic incumbent, Jon Corzine, in 2009. She has advised him on a range of issues, but has also been deeply involved in a social media strategy that helped make the governor a mini-celebrity on YouTube through clips of his famously combative town hall meetings.

This version of Total Mail Converter is not registered.

“Maria understands messaging and the fast-moving and ever-changing media landscape better than anyone in the country,” said Mike DuHaime, the top political adviser to Mr. Christie, who hired Ms. Comella when both worked on the Rudolph W. Giuliani’s presidential campaign in the 2008 election cycle. “She is smart, fierce, respected and effective.”

On that campaign, Ms. Comella, a New York native and George Washington University graduate who also worked on Capitol Hill, oversaw about 20 staff members. Her most recent title was deputy chief of staff for communications and planning for Mr. Christie.

Christie: Debt-free college is 'wrong' // Politico // Allie Grasgreen – June 11, 2015

New Jersey Gov. and Republican presidential contender Chris Christie laid out a multi-pronged higher education agenda Thursday, and a key part — unsurprisingly — is college affordability.

The issue has shot into the spotlight in recent weeks, both in Congress and on the campaign trail. Christie delivered his address at Iowa State University, in Ames, Iowa.

Setting the stage with the story of his father — a top high school student who enlisted in the Army because he couldn’t afford to accept an offer to attend Columbia University, then returned to Rutgers University on the G.I. Bill — Christie proposed “a system where we all need to take personal responsibility to grasp the opportunities in higher education, but also one where we can get a leg up when we need it.”

Debt-free college, Christie said, is not the answer.

“That is a typical liberal approach. It is wrong,” he said, according to prepared remarks. “If college graduates are going to reap the greater economic rewards and opportunities of earning a degree, then it seems fair for them to support the cost of the education they’re receiving.”

Democratic candidates Hillary Clinton, Gov. Martin O’Malley and Sen. Bernie Sanders have all expressed varying levels of interest in the increasingly popular debt-free college concept.

However, Christie said Congress should “properly fund and expand” financial aid programs for low-income students, noting that Pell grants have expanded while Supplemental Education Opportunity Grants and Perkins Loans have tapered off.

Christie also wants to consider approaches like tax credits for donors to higher education grant organizations, and income-share agreements, where students repay private financing received in college with some percentage of their income in the future. (Sen. Marco Rubio has introduced legislation for such plans).

Christie slams rival for 'scaring' voters // The Des Moines Register // Jennifer Jacobs – June 11, 2015

New Jersey governor Chris Christie was the keynote speaker at the Polk County GOP's spring fundraiser Thursday night, where he stressed that the world is "an unstable, dangerous, ugly place" when America pulls back from its place as the dominant force.

He said that he, as a former U.S. attorney who prosecuted terrorists and put them in jail in New Jersey, speaks from a position of knowledge. "Something unique in politics," he said. "I actually know what I'm talking about."

Without singling out presidential candidate Rand Paul by name, Christie blasted the Kentucky U.S. senator for sending out fundraising solicitations noting his opposition to U.S. surveillance programs.

This version of Total Mail Converter is not registered.

"To raise money off those speeches and then brag how much money they raised by scaring people about their civil liberties – it's disgraceful. And it's dangerous," Christie said. "You need to decide as you pick a new national leader: Do you want someone who wakes up every morning saying, 'My first job is to make sure I protect the lives of the American people and I will do everything that I can within the law to do that,' or another college professor?"

The country doesn't need another inexperienced leader "with theories about things they've never done and never experienced," Christie said.

Christie told personal stories about how his mother, Sondra, told him before she died in 2004 that if he ever ran for president, he'd better be direct with the American people.

"I'm one of the most psychoanalyzed national political figures in the world. We now end the mystery. You now why I am the way I am," he said, to laughter. "There will be some days where you like what I say and there will be other days where you sink your head and you say, 'I cannot believe he just said that.' But here's what you'll never have to say: You'll never have to say, 'I wonder what he's thinking. I wonder what he feels and I wonder what he's thinking and I wonder what he's willing to fight for.'"

Iowa will be a tough proving ground for Christie, who was in ninth place in a field of 16 GOP presidential contenders in a recent Des Moines Register/Bloomberg Politics poll of likely caucusgoers. When the Register asked him Thursday if he could win the Iowa caucuses, he answered: "Listen, the only reason to get in is to win. ... What I know is if I get into a race, I'll compete."

He said he intends to "be who I am. And if my ideas are good enough and people connect with me, I'll change minds."

Several Iowans at the Polk County dinner, including Liz Van Zomeren, a Johnston Republican, said Christie exceeded their expectations by far.

GRAHAM

Sen. Mark Kirk calls Lindsey Graham a 'bro with no ho' // Politico // Nick Gass – June 11, 2015

According to his Senate colleague Mark Kirk, Lindsey Graham (R-S.C.) is a “bro with no ho.”

Kirk made the remark about Graham during a Senate Appropriations Committee markup session on Thursday. The Huffington Post, which first reported on the comment, posted audio of the hot mic incident.

“I’ve been joking with Lindsey,” Kirk said, according to the audio. “Did you see that? He’s going to have a rotating first lady. He’s a bro with no ho.”

Kirk’s office told HuffPost that the Illinois Republican had been “joking around with his colleagues.”

Graham has made light of his bachelorhood, joking this week that if he wins the presidency, he would have a

This version of Total Mail Converter is not registered.

"rotating first lady." The 59-year-old South Carolina senator has never married and has no children.

Lindsey Graham Introduces Abortion Bill // RealClearPolitics // Andrew Desiderio – June 11, 2015

In what some consider a play for votes on the right, Sen. Lindsey Graham introduced an abortion bill Thursday on Capitol Hill, where the South Carolina Republican was flanked at a news conference by leaders in the pro-life movement.

The legislation, titled the Pain-Capable Unborn Child Protection Act, would ban abortions past 20 weeks, unless the life of the mother is in jeopardy or the woman was the victim of rape or incest and received medical treatment or counseling at least 48 hours before the abortion.

Additionally, the bill would allow women to file a lawsuit against an abortion provider who violates provisions outlined in the act.

Graham, a 2016 presidential candidate, said it is the government's duty to "protect the most vulnerable" in America. Having a debate over when life starts and ends is long overdue, he said, and the issue is something that deserves to be discussed on the campaign trail.

"I don't believe abortion, five months into pregnancy, makes us a better nation," he added. "I have no doubt the legislation will one day be passed by Congress and signed into law."

But the bill's prospects of becoming law with President Obama's signature are slim. According to the latest Gallup polling, half of Americans consider themselves pro-choice, while 44 percent say they are pro-life. But Graham says his legislation should appeal to the former, calling it a "reasonable position" to take.

Abortion-rights groups are casting Graham's efforts as an assault on women's health and a campaign ploy. "Sen. Graham's bill is not about policy. It's about politics," NARAL Pro-Choice America President Ilyse Hogue said in a statement. "He is choosing to use his position in the Senate to advance an abortion ban to bolster his long-shot White House bid in a shameless play to early state ultra-conservative voters."

Graham dismissed that assertion. "Just look at my history in the pro-life movement," he told RealClearPolitics after the news conference. "I was here long before I thought about running for president."

But the 2016 presidential candidate may need to shore up his support among social conservatives, as he has said he would not fight a Supreme Court decision that upholds same-sex marriage, and argued the Republican Party should welcome Caitlyn Jenner, formerly Bruce Jenner, and other transgender Americans. "I'm into addition," Graham argued Sunday on CNN. "I can only imagine the torment that Bruce Jenner went through. I hope she has found peace."

Hogue also said the influence of anti-abortion groups is "dwindling." But leaders of those groups – the Family Research Council, National Right to Life Committee, Americans United for Life, and Concerned Women for America – disagree.

NRLC President Carol Tobias disputed assertions by the American Congress of Obstetricians and Gynecologists that scientific evidence invalidates arguments for a ban on abortions after 20 weeks. ("Legislative efforts to limit abortions after 20 weeks represent an obvious attempt to restrict the ability of American women to get the care they need, when they need it," ACOG President Mark S. DeFrancesco said in a statement.") Tobias called that argument “willful ignorance at its best.” She accused the media of serving as “amplifiers of misinformation” brought forth by groups like ACOG and Planned Parenthood.

This version of Total Mail Converter is not registered.

“A baby at five months has developed organs and can feel pain,” CWA President Penny Nance said. “They deserve our legal protection.”

Graham promised debate on the measure this year, and told reporters that Senate Majority Leader Mitch McConnell supports it.

SANTORUM

Rick Santorum, moderate Republican? // CNN // Alexandra Jaffe – June 11, 2015

He was conservatives' pick to take on Mitt Romney in the 2012 GOP presidential primary, but in an exclusive interview with CNN's Erin Burnett on Thursday night Santorum seemed ready to turn over a new leaf.

The former Pennsylvania senator once compared homosexuality to beastiality. But he showed a more accepting tone on Thursday, saying he would accept an endorsement from transgender icon Caitlyn Jenner. (Jenner said in an interview she is a Republican).

"If that's the way she feels about my candidacy, sure," he said.

When Jenner went public with her decision, Santorum said he accepted her as a woman and that his "responsibility as a human is to love and accept everybody."

He struck a similar tone on Thursday night, but suggested he still doesn't agree with her decision.

"My job as a human being is to treat everybody with dignity or respect -- period, stop, full stop, no qualification to that," he said. "Do I have to agree with their positions on issues or how they see America? Of course not."

Santorum also said he was open to the idea that humans are contributing to climate change.

"Clearly the earth has warmed," he said. "I do have questions about what role man plays in this warming. I think there are a lot of folks who do question that."

He said, however, the scientific consensus is still out on that and that, more importantly, the policies arising from the belief that humans are contributing to climate change are "very damaging to the United States of America."

Santorum's made strengthening the American family a centerpiece of his second bid for the White House, but said Sen. Lindsey Graham's single-dom shouldn't disqualify him from the presidency.

"I think you elect the person to be president," he said when asked whether the fact Graham has never married should impact his bid. "We've had bachelors before in the White House."

This version of Total Mail Converter is not registered.

And though he's drawing piddling crowds to Iowa diners, compared to his stunning first-place finish in the 2012 caucuses there, Santorum is totally unfazed. One-on-one contact with as many Iowans as possible, Santorum says, is all part of the plan.

"People can mock and say, 'Oh, you know, it's only four or five people.' In small rural counties, four or five people make all the difference," he said on CNN.

Santorum raised eyebrows when he encountered only two diners at a stop at a restaurant in Iowa on Monday, but he said his team felt "really good" about signing them both up as volunteers, and that one will advocate for him at the caucuses next year.

And he said he was willing to go to "every county in Iowa to recruit three or four people," which he called a "pretty good hit rate" for a campaign.

"We feel really good that if you go to a town with 350 people, if you get four, five, that's actually not a bad percentage of the folks in town," he said.

Rick Santorum Says Economic 'Stagnation' Will Help Him Win in 2016 // Bloomberg News // Mark Niquette – June 11, 2015

To hear Rick Santorum tell it, the nation's tepid economic recovery may be his key to winning the Republican presidential nomination.

Interviewed Thursday on Bloomberg's With All Due Respect, Santorum was responding to comments from Iowa voters asking what's different in 2016 after the former Pennsylvania senator won that state's caucus but lost the nomination to Mitt Romney in 2012.

"What's different is the country has been in stagnation four more years," Santorum said. "I recognize what the core of that problem is, and we have an economic platform that's going to not only unite America but win this election."

“What's different is the country has been in stagnation four more years.”

Santorum said he has a "pro-worker immigration policy" and plans to release an economic and tax plan soon that will focus on manufacturing, construction and energy jobs. It will appeal to disaffected Democrats and "folks in middle America who are seeing their wages flat-lined, income falling, and neither political party addressing that," he said.

The former Pennsylvania senator had 6 percent support in a Bloomberg Politics/Des Moines Register Iowa poll released May 30 with former Florida Senator Marco Rubio, behind Wisconsin Governor Scott Walker at 17 percent, Senator Rand Paul of Kentucky and retired neurosurgeon Ben Carson at 10 percent, with former Florida Governor Jeb Bush and former Arkansas Governor Mike Huckabee next at 9 percent each.

Rick Santorum signs ATR tax pledge // The Washington Times // David Sherfinski – June 11, 2015

This version of Total Mail Converter is not registered.

Former Sen. Rick Santorum of Pennsylvania, a 2016 GOP presidential candidate, has signed Americans for Tax Reform's Taxpayer Protection Pledge committing to oppose and veto any efforts to raise taxes, the group said Thursday.

"By signing the Taxpayer Protection Pledge to the American people, Senator Santorum continues his tradition of protecting American taxpayers against higher taxes," said ATR President Grover Norquist.

Mr. Santorum signed the pledge as a U.S. Senator and as a presidential candidate in 2012. He joins Sens. Ted Cruz of Texas, Rand Paul of Kentucky and Marco Rubio of Florida, as well as former Hewlett-Packard CEO Carly Fiorina and former Texas Gov. Rick Perry as 2016 presidential candidates who have signed the pledge.

Mr. Norquist has also offered praise for former Arkansas Gov. Mike Huckabee, another presidential candidate, who took his own pledge not to raise taxes.

Former Florida Gov. Jeb Bush, who is announcing his 2016 plans Monday, has indicated he does not plan on signing any such pledges, but his team has said his record on taxes is clear.

With each announcement of the 2016 presidential contenders who have signed the pledge, ATR has pointed out that the lone Republican presidential candidate in 2012 who did not make such a pledge was former Utah Gov. Jon Huntsman, who dropped out of the race shortly after a third-place finish in New Hampshire.

KASICH

Is John Kasich Too Cranky To Be President? // NBC News // Perry Bacon – June 11, 2015

He could be a top contender for the GOP nomination. But first, he might want to get people to stop calling him a jerk.

Republican insiders say that Ohio Gov. John Kasich, who is planning to officially enter the 2016 campaign next month, is an experienced swing state governor who could ultimately emerge as one of the party's leading candidates. But Republicans both privately and publicly say that Kasich's style is grating, and they are skeptical of whether it can be effective in a long presidential campaign.

In private settings and sometimes even in public ones, Kasich is known to be brusque, confrontational and dismissive of others' views, even fellow conservatives.

Fred Barnes, the executive editor of the conservative Weekly Standard and an influential voice in GOP politics, said this week Kasich could be the party's nominee if "he stops acting somewhat like a jerk."

"He spends a lot of time criticizing other Republicans ....and that doesn't make any sense," Barnes said in a radio interview this week with Hugh Hewitt, a conservative radio host.

Mark Souder, a former Indiana congressman who served in the House with Kasich, said his former colleague's "lack of patience" would be a "big challenge."

This version of Total Mail Converter is not registered.

"His mannerisms, his expressions, his sarcasm, etc. can be off-putting at times," said Souder.

Souder added, "If he can survive the initial beating in the early states, and keep his cool without lecturing people or implying they aren't smart enough to understand, I think he has an excellent chance."

Jeb Bush's struggles have potentially created an opening for Kasich, another Republican governor in his 60's. After flirting with a run for most of the year, Kasich has now hired a senior team of advisers that includes one of the men who helped John McCain nearly beat George W. Bush in 2000.

He's beginning to get the kind of exposure a potential candidate needs, too. The Ohio governor, along with several other candidates, will speak on Friday in Park City, Utah at Mitt Romney's annual gathering of influential GOP donors and other figures.

Kasich could be an appealing alternative to Republicans who like Jeb Bush's political approach but are wary that he could be derailed because of the baggage attached to the Bush name. The Ohio governor, like Bush, was twice elected in a key swing state that Republicans desperately need if they want to win the White House.

Kasich is also a more moderate conservative in the Jeb Bush mold. He is a supporter of the Common Core education standards and an occasional critic of Tea Party conservatives. He also backs a path to legalization for undocumented immigrants.

"I think he is smarter and has more knowledge of the issues than Walker and Rubio," said John Feehery, who was a top aide on Capitol Hill when Kasich ran the House Budget Committee.

Kasich is to the left of even Bush on some issues. He has set a goal that at least 15 percent of the companies hired for contracts by the Ohio state government be minority-owned. And his decision in 2013 to expand Medicaid under the Affordable Care Act remains a deep concern on the right.

Conservatives are bitter that Kasich not only expanded Medicaid, as President Obama has urged governors across the country to do, but has cast those who opposed the move as being insufficiently Christian.

He told National Journal earlier this year, "the conservative movement—a big chunk of which is faith-based—seems to have never read Matthew 25." (In this chapter of the Bible, Jesus urges his followers to care for the poor.)

Erick Erickson, the conservative activist who runs the RedState blog, argues Kasich's comments are akin to saying, "Jesus wants him to expand government."

But other Republicans find Kasich's demeanor a welcome change from overly cautious political rhetoric.

"John's a Baby Boomer and tends to a little irreverent in conversation. I think it's kind of refreshing," said Tom Davis, a former Virginia congressman who also served in the House when Kasich.

"Some people think it's not appropriate decorum. I don't look at that as being a jerk. I like candid," Davis added.

This version of Total Mail Converter is not registered.

Feehery agreed Kasich could overcome questions about his temperament. But he argued that even with Bush's struggles, the ex-Florida governor and the other candidates have spent months courting the GOP's major donors, making it hard for Kasich to raise money.

"I would put him in the top tier, if he can get the money," said Feehery.

But Kasich's personality is already emerging as an issue. After the Ohio governor met with journalists from the Concord Monitor last week, the New Hampshire paper noted, "the prickly Republican began with a tone of irritability."

Fifty minutes into the interview, Kasich suggested that he was bored, even though a key part of his campaign strategy is winning in New Hampshire, where voters are more moderate.

"I'm getting ready to be done with this," he told the reporters. "Are we getting close?"

CARSON

Ben Carson doesn't want to talk about 'the gay issue' // MSNBC // Adam Howard – June 11, 2015

Dr. Ben Carson, the retired neurosurgeon and conservative candidate for the 2016 Republican presidential nomination, is sick and tired of discussing "the gay issue."

During an appearance Wednesday on CNN, Carson brushed aside questions regarding discrimination against the LGBT community, arguing that there are "more important" subjects worth delving into.

"I don't really want to talk about the gay issue," Carson told CNN's Brianna Keilar. "Except maybe you can get the answer for this question: 'What position can a person take who has no animosity toward gay people, but believes in the traditional definition of marriage that would be acceptable?'"

"I think the Constitution protects every single American," he added. "Everybody has equal rights, nobody has extra rights."

Carson has a history of making incendiary remarks about the LGBT community. Earlier on Wednesday, he told Fox News' Bret Baier that he gets "irritated" when people equate gay rights with equal rights. In March, he was widely ridiculed for suggesting that men who enter prison straight can "come out" gay, while insisting that homosexuality is a choice.

Although Carson eventually walked back those remarks, he has consistently sparked controversy with his off-the-cuff musings about the sex lives of LGBT people. Earlier this year, he even suggested that bakers might poison wedding cakes if they were forced to make them for same-sex couples.

In 2013, after he publicly compared same-sex marriage to bestiality and pedophilia, Carson was forced to withdraw from a planned commencement speech at his alma mater, John Hopkins University.

"Someday in the future, it is my hope and prayer that the emphasis on political correctness will decrease and we will start emphasizing rational discussion of differences so we can actually resolve problems and chart a course that is inclusive of everyone," Carson said at the time.

This version of Total Mail Converter is not registered.

On Wednesday on CNN, Carson said that "Every group faces some type of discrimination," adding, "Christians face a lot of discrimination. I wish we would talk more about that."

Ben Carson's hot mess of a campaign: A predictably dysfunct ional mish-mash of fire-breat hing rhetoric and insane policy ideas // Salon // Simon Maloy – June 11, 2015

Ben Carson's presidential campaign continues to flawlessly meet expectations, which is to say that it is a fiery catastrophe of failure, greed, and embarrassment. There was really no other way this situation could play out. Carson's political celebrity was never rooted in anything meaningful – conservatives fell in love with him because he insults President Obama and refuses to be "politically correct." The Wall Street Journal editorial board encouraged Carson to run for the White House for no other reason than his willingness to say things that are "un-PC." And, not surprisingly, Carson's attempt to transform this crude, superficial appeal into an actual political movement has been disastrous.

Carson has officially been in the 2016 race for just over a month, and already his candidacy is falling apart. The Washington Post reported last week that several top staffers have already resigned from the campaign, which "has been marked by signs of dysfunction and amateurism." A big part of that dysfunction seems to be that Carson's political orbit is populated by opportunists who are at least as interested in cashing in on the Carson boomlet as they are in electing him president. Instead of working in sync, Carson's aides and supporters fighting with each other with as they work to grab as much cash as they can:

Two independent super PACs designed to help Carson are instead competing directly with Carson's campaign for donations and volunteers, while campaign chairman Terry Giles resigned last month with the intention of forming a third super PAC.

Giles said he intends to try to persuade the other two super PACs, called Run Ben Run and One Vote, to cease operations so that all outside efforts can be coordinated through the new group. But with Carson's brand a galvanizing force on the right, there are potentially millions of dollars to be raised off his name, and the other super PACs are said to be reluctant to shut down.

As for Carson himself, he's apparently none too interested in the toxic internal fights that are sabotaging his campaign apparatus. "Carson occasionally drops by his Alexandria campaign headquarters," the Post noted, "but his main interaction with staffers is once a week, at 10 a.m. on Sundays, when he participates in a conference call." He'd rather be out on the trail, talking to voters, and proposing bad, confusing policy ideas that aren't really tethered to any sort of ideology, or even to common sense. Yesterday, according to MSNBC, Carson floated the idea of a "covert division" of government employees that would "monitor what government people do" and make sure they're doing their jobs, or something.

It's an idea that's rooted in a conservative caricature of government employees as parasitic loafers who just sit in their cubicles all day laughing as they count the money they're stealing from hardworking taxpayers who have real jobs. If you're a conservative who has a problem with the size and complexity of the federal government, I'm not sure why you'd support an expansion of the federal workforce (and an extra layer of bureaucracy) as a means to fix it. A spokesman for Carson tried to clarify what he meant: "Covert division? More like Secret Shopper, a quality control strategy used worldwide to improve customer service and customer care." It's not immediately apparent how a strategy used to improve customer service would apply to people in white-collar jobs, but whatever. It's an idea.

But again, this idea isn't meant to conform to ideology and it's not intended as a serious policy proposal – it's just another of the crude appeals to right-wing resentment that seems to be Carson's sole political talent.

The question that arises from all this dysfunction and nonsense is: how long can he keep this up? Right now he's pulling decent crowds at Iowa events and his national poll numbers are, for the moment, inching upwards. But that won't last with a shambolic campaign apparatus and a platform based entirely on generating outrage. Carson's approach to campaigning doesn't seem to diverge too significantly to his life as a Fox News pundit: just go out there and be "un-PC" and something something congratulations President-Elect Carson.

Ben Carson: 'The people are frustrated — they're waking up' // The Washington Times // David Sherfinski – June 11, 2015

Retired neurosurgeon Ben Carson appears to be heartened by recent polling on the 2016 GOP field that's put the political neophyte near the top of a crowded set of contenders.

"The people are frustrated — they're waking up, and they have a lot more brains than people think they do," Mr. Carson told Fox News' Bret Baier. "I can't tell you how many times [I've] faced situations where people say, 'He can't do that. No one's ever done that.' If I listened to that stuff, I wouldn't be talking to you right now."

Mr. Carson is currently fourth in RealClearPolitics' average of recent public polling on the Republican field at 9 percent, behind former Florida Gov. Jeb Bush at 11.3 percent, Wisconsin Gov. Scott Walker at 10.8 percent and Sen. Marco Rubio of Florida at 10.3 percent.

"As you can see from the polling, the people are convinced to a large degree, and 40 percent of 'em still don't even know who I am," Mr. Carson said.

FIORINA

Fiorina's campaign-trail attacks leave out her own ties to Clinton // LA Times // Joseph Tanfani – June 11, 2015

In a crowd of Republican presidential contenders hammering away at Hillary Rodham Clinton, no one has been more relentless than Carly Fiorina.

In speeches and media interviews, some of them while shadowing Clinton on the campaign trail, the former Hewlett-Packard chief executive has attacked the Clintons' family foundation for a lack of transparency amid reports that it accepted money from foreign governments. "She is not trustworthy," Fiorina says in a video on her website, itself named ReadytoBeatHillary.com.

In a Facebook post, Fiorina excoriated the Clintons for accepting donations from foreign governments "while making promises about transparency that they never intended to keep."

What else don't we know? What don't we know about your donors?" she asked Wednesday on Fox News about the Clintons' charitable efforts. "What don't we know about the conflicts of interest that those donors represent?"

But in Fiorina's own philanthropic ventures, one of the key points of her resume as a White House hopeful, she has had a friendlier relationship with the Clintons and their foundation than she highlights on the campaign trail. And, in pressing for help for women around the globe, Fiorina is more similar to Hillary Clinton than she admits.

The discrepancies show how personal and professional ties can complicate life on the campaign trail for well-connected people like Fiorina, who also unsuccessfully ran for Senate in California in 2010.

This version of Total Mail Converter is not registered.

One Fiorina charitable effort, a campaign to fund women's empowerment projects around the globe, went forward with help from the State Department when Clinton was secretary.

And Fiorina has roles in two charities that participated in projects that became commitments with the Clinton Global Initiative, one of the organizations in the Clintons' worldwide philanthropic network in which charities and companies announce partnerships to pledge action on social projects.

She has also twice participated in Clinton Global Initiative events. In 2013, she spoke on a small panel that discussed how to boost female entrepreneurship. Last year, she appeared with former President Clinton and three other people on a televised panel discussion on how best to pull people out of poverty.

Fiorina at times sparred with the former president and criticized Democratic economic policies, saying that the Obama administration "made the rich much richer." But she also argued for the role of small business and praised the organization's work. "Seed capital, support, tools, energy -- all of the initiatives that the Clinton Global Initiative invests in to try and build Main Street entrepreneurship -- it has always been the hope of this country," Fiorina said.

A spokeswoman for Fiorina said she was "delighted" to participate in a session advocating for women who are entrepreneurs, and characterized the second discussion as "a debate with Bill Clinton." Fiorina has contrasted her belief in transparency with Clinton's, saying last month: "Unlike Hillary Clinton, I am not afraid to answer questions about my track record or beliefs." She did not respond to follow-up questions about her involvement with the foundation or her work with the State Department.

Bill Clinton, speaking at a Clinton Global Initiative conference on Wednesday, said the foundation had always considered itself nonpolitical and had hosted a number of Republican politicians, including Mitt Romney and John McCain. He didn't mention Fiorina.

Fiorina helped spark a charitable drive in 2008 called the One Woman Initiative, targeting women's empowerment groups, mostly in Muslim countries. According to the organization, she set it up with help from the State Department, the U.S. Agency for International Development and then-Secretary of State Condoleezza Rice.

It took about a year to raise the money. By the time the approximately $500,000 in grants was released, in June 2009, President Obama was in the White House and Clinton was secretary of State. The initiatives included a microfinance program in Pakistan, a conflict-resolution program in the Philippines and an economic development program in India.

The initiative aimed to distribute grants with the help of corporate sponsors, and with support from the Department of State and USAID. The agencies also declined to comment on the initiative.

The Clinton Global Initiative draws together corporate and charity leaders for networking and to announce commitments to complete projects together.

Fiorina is connected to two groups that participated in such programs. She is board chairman of Good360, a Virginia-based group that connects companies who want to donate goods with charities that need them. Hilton Worldwide made that program a Clinton Global Initiative commitment in 2013.

This version of Total Mail Converter is not registered.

Fiorina also is on the advisory board of the National Center for Entrepreneurship and Innovation, a group that wants to open a center celebrating inventors and entrepreneurs on the National Mall in Washington. That too was announced as a Clinton initiative commitment in 2013. But the plans have stalled, in part because the Smithsonian decided it couldn't devote resources to the project, said Philip Auerswald, the group's board chairman.

The advisory board and Fiorina didn't play a role in the decision to announce the project as a Clinton initiative commitment, he said, adding: "Carly has been nothing but supportive throughout this process."

Carly Fiorina blasts media focus on her Hillary Clinton trolling // The Washington Examiner // Ashe Schow – June 11, 2015

GOP presidential candidate Carly Fiorina has been a tough critic of Democratic presidential frontrunner Hillary Clinton, but to those who think she's spending too much time going after the former secretary of state, she says it isn't where the "bulk" of her attention goes.

Fiorina noted during a press call Thursday that she has answered hundreds of questions since she announced she was running for president and has addressed any subject.

"So it's simply not accurate to say that all I do is attack Hillary Clinton," Fiorina said in response to a Washington Examiner question. "That may be what the media pays attention to, but that certainly isn't where the bulk of my attention goes, either in my remarks with voters, or my conversations with voters, or my speeches or my Q&A."

Fiorina also said that it didn't matter who the Democratic nominee for president ends up being, she'll oppose them on their policies.

"And if, like Hillary Clinton, another nominee lacks a track record of leadership — I will point that out. And if, like Hillary Clinton, another nominee lacks a track record of transparency, I will point that out as well," Fiorina said. "Every single one of those things is fair game and it has nothing to do with her gender or my gender."

Fiorina has received some criticism in recent weeks for her continued trolling of Clinton. Marc Ambinder of The Week said that Fiorina needs "to move beyond Clinton." Two weeks ago, reporters in South Carolina — where Fiorina gave a press conference outside of a Clinton event — wondered if she had more to offer than just bashing Clinton.

Fiorina was defensive of the suggestion that she just attacks Clinton, adding that she will continue to address any and every issue.

"The fact the media pays more attention to one thing than another is nothing I can do about that," Fiorina said. "I will continue to talk about all of the issues and continue to raise up a contrast between the policies that I think work best for this nation and the policies that the leftwing of the Democratic Party is pursuing."

OTHER

Fox News Adds G.O.P. Candidate Forum Amid Criticism of Debate Plans // NYT // Maggie Haberman

Fox News has decided to add a "candidate forum" before the first Republican presidential debate on Aug. 6, after the network came under criticism for its criteria to winnow down the number of people onstage.

This version of Total Mail Converter is not registered.

The announcement from Fox News on Wednesday night came as The Union Leader, a New Hampshire newspaper, said it would host its own forum with C-Span amid concern over the debate rules.

"As we noted when we first announced the debate criteria, our intention has always been to provide coverage to the wide field of Republican candidates and we are glad to present these details today," said Michael Clemente, the executive vice president of Fox News.

The forum will be moderated by two of the network's anchors, Bill Hemmer and Martha MacCallum. The criteria for making it into the 90-minute forum is scoring 1 percent "or higher in an average of the five most recent national polls." It will air in the afternoon, well ahead of prime time.

Fox News has been heavily criticized by lower-polling Republicans for debate criteria for allowing only those among the top 10 in an average of polling onto the prime-time stage. Candidates have also expressed concern about the rules established by CNN, which is hosting the second debate in September.

But CNN is planning a second debate as well, which will be shown in prime time for the lower-polling candidates.

Joe McQuaid, publisher of The Union Leader, announced that the newspaper's forum with C-Span will be held the same night as the Fox News debate. He indicated the new forum was in response to the limited debate rules planned by Fox News, which has already prompted some Republicans to consider maneuvers to try to maximize their polling numbers nationally but force them to bypass time spent in Iowa and New Hampshire, the first two early voting states in the nominating contest.

"What Fox is attempting to do, and is actually bragging about doing, is a real threat to the first-in-the-nation primary," Mr. McQuaid told The Union Leader.

The Koch brothers and the Republican Party go to war — with each other // Yahoo News // Jon Ward – June 11, 2015

The Republican National Committee's data arm last yearcalled it a "historic" occasion when it struck a deal to share voter information with the Koch brothers' rapidly expanding political empire.

It was an uneasy détente between the party committee, which views itself as the rightful standard-bearer for the GOP, and the behemoth funded by Charles and David Koch, which is free of the campaign finance restrictions that bind the RNCand plans to spend almost $900 million in the 2016 election cycle to elect a Republican to the White House.

Party leaders, including the current chief digital officer for the RNC, hailed the deal as an important step forward in the GOP's attempt to modernize itself.

But after the fall midterm elections, the deal was allowed to expire without being renewed. Since then, relations between the two sides have soured, turning into what one Republican operative described as "all-out war." Interviews with more than three dozen people, including top decision-makers in both camps, have revealed that the Kochs' i360 platform for managing voter contacts — which is viewed by many as a superior, easier-to-use interface than what's on offer from the RNC — is becoming increasingly popular among Republican campaigns.

This version of Total Mail Converter is not registered.

The RNC is now openly arguing, however, that the Kochs' political operation is trying to control the Republican Party's master voter file, and to gain influence over — some even say control of — the GOP.

"I think it's very dangerous and wrong to allow a group of very strong, well-financed individuals who have no accountability to anyone to have control over who gets access to the data when, why and how," said Katie Walsh, the RNC's chief of staff.

The Koch brothers and the Republican Party go to war — with each other

The fight between the RNC's chairman and the political operatives affiliated with Charles and David Koch over who controls the rich treasury of data on likely Republican voters has raised fundamental questions about what role the party's central committee — even under the best management — can hope to play in the age of super-PACs. And it raises an even more fundamental question of how you define a political party.

Super-PACs emerged as a major new force in the wake of the Supreme Court's Citizens United ruling in 2010. They now populate a political landscape that has been radically changed, leaving political parties weaker than they have ever been.

Presiding over the RNC in this new era has been Reince Priebus, who by all accounts has had a successful run as chairman since 2011. He brought the committee out of debtand has been a prolific fundraiser. He has worked hard toreform the party primary calendar to prevent a protracted fight similar to the 2012 primary that exhausts the eventual nominee. He has exerted control over the presidential primary debates, taking a hard line against moderators from media outlets who are perceived to be biased against Republicans, though he is experiencing pushback over his attempts to limit the number of participants in debates. And he has infused the building with young, digital-savvy staffers and elevated the importance of data, analytics and new technologies inside the committee.

Priebus believes the RNC is the proper custodian of the Republican Party's master file on the nation's electorate, which is used as a starting point for campaigns, who then use that information to build lists — called voter universes — of the people in a state or district that they want to target for both turnout and persuasion. Volunteers and donors are also targeted for recruitment using such lists.

The core issue, from Priebus' point of view, is one of loyalty and allegiance. The RNC is a permanent entity, committed to the Republican Party without question. The Koch network is too independent from the party to be trusted with possession of the GOP's most valuable core assets. If the Kochs — whose political history is steeped more in libertarianism than it is in any loyalty to the Republican Party — decided next week to use their database to benefit only their massive multinational corporation, they could do so.

The RNC, Walsh said, "has one job: to elect Republicans."

The Kochs' political arm, Freedom Partners, which oversees i360, views the issue as one of capability. Koch aides — several of whom used to work at the RNC — want to win elections, and in their view the RNC has inherent challenges to helping the party win. Party committee fundraising is severely limited by federal election law, while building, maintaining and enriching a database is expensive.

Michael Palmer, president of i360, emphasized in an email that his firm is a "private company that provides data, technology and analytical services to dozens of candidates, campaigns and other organizations that promote free market principles."

"Our clients own their own data and are free to share it as they see fit. We believe that a robust marketplace of political technology and data is a healthy way to advance past the single monopoly model that has failed the Republican Party in recent presidential elections," Palmer said.

This version of Total Mail Converter is not registered.

Some in the Republican Party agree with Priebus' point of view, believing the issue of allegiance to be fundamental. Others in the GOP, even some in highly consequential positions, think Priebus and the RNC are crying wolf. Senate Majority Leader Mitch McConnell (R-Ky.) and House Speaker John Boehner (R-Ohio) have been reluctant to conclude that i360 represents a threat to the party.

And the problem for the RNC is that while it has political data going back roughly two decades, you need more than just data in order to be the data hub for a political party. And that is where the RNC has fallen short. Its data is good, and it has continued to enrich it and even to help campaigns and key battleground states build sophisticated voter universesthrough the work last year of a company called TargetPoint. But campaigns need to use data, not just have it on the shelf.

"You can have all the data in the world, but if you can't use it to go engage people, it's not worth that much," said Mike Moschella, vice president at NationBuilder, a nonpartisan company that specializes in building "communications systems" to talk to volunteers and voters through email, social media and targeted advertising.

This is where companies like i360, as well as companies like NationBuilder, have gained an edge. In 2013 the RNCpromised to build a next-level system called Beacon. But so far Beacon is being used by only a small handful of state parties, Walsh said. About 40 state parties are still using the RNC dashboard that Beacon was built to replace, GOP Data Center, which was designed a few years ago by a company called FLS Connect. The most common complaint from those who do not like Data Center is that it is not easy for the average volunteer or field staffer to use.

The RNC now acknowledges that it was slow to respond to the rise of i360.

"There was a time when the party itself had not made the investments it needed to make and had rested on its laurels," said one source who had firsthand knowledge of the RNC's data operation.

RNC chief strategist Sean Spicer and Walsh also said the RNC was not competitive enough with i360 over the past few years in giving campaigns and state parties tools to use the data. For as long as anyone could remember, the RNC had dispensed voter information to campaigns and state parties like a pharmacy, upon request. In modern campaigns, however, operatives want to manipulate the data themselves.

"People were calling to get access to data and were being told just call us and we'll send you a CD-ROM," Spicer said.

The source with firsthand knowledge of the RNC's operations said that "the Koch world groups saw an opportunity where they were filling a vacuum."

After the 2012 election, i360 and others gained market share in Republican politics because the RNC spent much of 2013 deliberating over what it planned to do, and state parties and campaigns who wanted to start recruiting volunteers and building a universe of target voters needed a system to work with immediately. In addition, i360 was developed with user experience in mind; it built up an enriched voter file as time went on and its client list grew, providing more inputs. Like some of the most successful tech companies, from Facebook to Snapchat, it built an audience first and then expanded its offerings.

During the 2014 election, a number of Senate campaigns used i360; i360 said it was 11 campaigns in all. This cycle the group says eight Senate campaigns are using its programs, including those of two of the most vulnerable Republican Senators up for reelection in 2016: Rob Portman (Ohio) and Kelly Ayotte (N.H.). It's not clear, however, how many of those campaigns used i360 for most or all of their voter contact.

This version of Total Mail Converter is not registered.

Among the GOP presidential primary candidates, Sen. Rand Paul (R-Ky.) and Sen. Lindsey Graham (R-S.C.) are using i360 data services exclusively, while former Florida Gov. Jeb Bush and Sen. Marco Rubio (R-Fla.) are building their own voter files. Former RNC chief technology officer Andy Barkett is a key player in the Bush operation, and his performance will be closely watched, since he was charged with building Beacon at the RNC. Barkett has told contemporaries that he was undermined at the RNC by FLS Connect and other private companies who didn't want to lose business from the RNC.

The RNC has signed data-sharing agreements with most of the 2016 candidates or likely candidates. And the RNC — as itdid in 2014 — is trying to discourage campaigns and state parties from signing up with i360, according to numerous conversations with people who have knowledge of such conversations. This was a tactic that irritated many people in 2014. But Walsh, the new chief of staff, appears to be setting a different tone that admits past shortcomings and focuses on the philosophical argument that the GOP's data should be housed at a party committee, not at a private business empire.

The RNC is now confronting the Kochs more openly than before, by having Walsh speak on the record for this article and by making other key players available for interviews. Their decision to take their dispute with i360 public shows the level of alarm inside the RNC at the growing clout of the Koch political empire. They have concluded that the Koch political machine wants to replace them and to essentially become a shadow party.

"It's pretty clear that they don't want to work with the party but want to supplant it," the source close to the RNC said.

Adding to the rivalry, in January i360 poached the RNC's chief digital officer, Chuck DeFeo, who had played a senior role within the party committee's digital operation in 2013 and 2014. DeFeo's departure was a surprise to the RNC, and his decision to work for a direct rival was not well-received in the fifth-floor suite of offices that house the committee's top decision-makers. There was talk of having him escorted by security from the building, though that did not materialize.

Palmer, the head of i360, said that his organization simply wants to be helpful to the Republican Party at large. "We have repeatedly expressed a willingness in working with the RNC, and we will continue to work with any organizations interested in advancing free markets and a free society," he said.

But Spicer said that i360 is trying to marginalize DataTrust — the RNC's private sector arm — by offering to share information only with the RNC and not DataTrust. Cutting DataTrust out of the picture would possibly cement i360 as both the main platform provider to operatives in the field doing voter contact.

As long as i360 and the RNC worked together, both entities would receive the same data from operatives and volunteers in the field knocking on doors and making calls. But if i360 achieved dominance as the user platform of choice for Republican operatives, and if its relationship with the RNC ever went south and data-sharing ended, the Kochs would continue to get the bulk of ongoing fresh data collection, while the RNC would have to scramble and might find itself well behind i360.

The fear at the RNC is that this would give a private business empire the master voter file in Republican politics, and the party's main committee would be reduced to that of playing a bit role.

The RNC is currently telling state parties and campaigns that it is updating GOP Data Center to make it more user-friendly. Walsh said this would be ready in three to four weeks.

This version of Total Mail Converter is not registered.

However, critics of DataTrust, the RNC's data arm, say that it is in serious financial trouble, and multiple sources — from Koch world to a major party committee to a source intimate with Republican congressional leadership — said that Priebus asked McConnell and Boehner to have their campaign committees give $1 million each to DataTrust to help with paying off debt. Both leaders were unreceptive, these sources said, believing a soft-money committee should be able to raise that kind of money from a few donors rather than having money from the committees — which is raised in much smaller amounts and harder to come by — transferred.

A source close to the Republican congressional leadership said that DataTrust "has barely existed for the last two cycles" because of its inability to raise money.

In mid-April, the RNC transferred $1.5 million to DataTrust. RNC and DataTrust officials characterized this transfer as routine business and denied that DataTrust has had any fundraising or debt problems.

McConnell and Boehner, according to the congressional source, do not share Priebus' concern that the Koch brothers could own the GOP's master voter file in any way that held the party hostage.

It would not be "as difficult as it sounds" for the GOP to reassemble its own file and its own voter contact apps if the partnership with i360 dissolved for some reason, the source said, adding, "Everybody needs to take a deep breath on this thing."

Walsh, the RNC chief of staff, had a different version of events. She said there was a meeting held last year where DataTrust president John DeStefano updated a room full of Republicans on the latest business plan for his organization and that one idea discussed was to have the National Republican Senatorial Committee and the National Republican Congressional Committee contract directly with DataTrust as a show of support for the organization.

"One of top bullet points was, 'i360 is gaining market share and how do we publicly show that the federal party committees are behind the DataTrust model?'" Walsh said. "It was not, 'We're out of money.'"

Prior to 2010, the NRSC and NRCC had contributed $1 million each to the RNC for data infrastructure costs, and Walsh said that prior model was interpreted by some to be what DeStefano and others were proposing. But, she said, "there was no dollar amount" mentioned.

"By no means did that imply a $1 million contribution," Walsh said.

The result of all this infighting is that for the moment, Republican campaigns and even state parties are Balkanized between different approaches on which database to use and how to use it.

The Kochs' i360 is the superior user platform with a rapidly growing adoption rate among campaigns, while the RNC's data is available to all who want it and is the de facto database for RNC field personnel who are placed in key states. DataTrust has an exclusive agreement to swap data with the RNC and has a client relationship with outside groups such as American Crossroads, the American Action Network and the National Rifle Association.

Even some state parties have chosen to use i360 instead of, or in addition to, the RNC's system in their elections.

"We used i360 a lot. We didn't really get into the DataTrust issue," said Joe Cluster, executive director of the Maryland Republican Party, which helped get Gov. Larry Hogan elected in a deep blue state last fall. "Maryland wasn't one of the states [the RNC was] prioritizing for getting that data up to speed."

This version of Total Mail Converter is not registered.

“Every time I sent [the RNC] a voter file, it took them three weeks to upload,” Cluster said. “They weren’t updating our data as quick as other people.”

In Florida, another key battleground state, the state party is using NationBuilder for some of its needs and is also getting some predictive models from i360.

But Florida is one of the clearest examples that there is a belief among some in Republican politics that the data they glean in the field should go back to the Republican National Committee. They are going out of their way to make sure that any information they collect using NationBuilder goes back to DataTrust. And while they are using some of the i360 information, they are intentionally not using the Koch brothers’ tools for voter outreach, because they want to use the RNC’s Data Center.

Florida’s choices are driven in large part by a belief that the RNC is the more appropriate repository for political data than the Kochs, according to a source with knowledge of the state party’s thinking.

Other state parties are using the RNC’s voter file but have built their own dashboards to use instead of FLS Connect’s Data Center, the clearest indication that for those who have the money, time and expertise, the RNC’s user interface of choice has not been as good as some would like it to be.

The Michigan Republican Party last cycle spent between $500,000 and $1 million to build its own dashboard. Ohio’s GOP hired a close friend of Gov. John Kasich, venture capitalist Mark Kvamme, to build a system for them. Both systems bypassed the FLS Connect product and accessed the RNC’s file at DataTrust directly.

One Republican data operative who worked in Florida during the 2012 election said that because FLS Connect’s Data Center is “not a good user interface, [the RNC doesn’t] get enough credit.”

“They have really good data. And they’re making it really easy for people who know what to do with it to get at it,” he said.

The challenge for most state parties and campaigns is that they don’t have the money or the expertise to build their own dashboard systems with which to access the RNC’s data.

The relevance of these questions to who wins and loses elections is often debated. In a wave midterm election like 2014, it may be insignificant. But in a presidential election, when the presidency can be decided in one or two swing states, or in a closely contested Senate or congressional race, a superior data and technology operation can be an important advantage.

Many Republicans believe that having a presidential nominee will solve most of the problems with infighting over data and bring coherence and cohesion. In 2008, President Obama insisted that Democrats get onboard with a company called NGP VAN and use their Votebuilder system — which is built on top of the master voter file housed at the Democratic National Committee — to interact with voters, building a more concerted system of inputs into one voter file.

But it could be that the GOP may not get on the same page until there is an incumbent Republican president who has the time and money before a reelection campaign to insist that the party row in the same direction.

This version of Total Mail Converter is not registered.

'16 At 30 Thousand // NBC // Carrie Dann & Andrew Rafferty – June 11, 2015

In a crowded Republican presidential field composed of candidates like Ted Cruz, Ben Carson and Mike Huckabee, Jeb Bush often gets painted as a moderate. After all, he's the (expected) candidate who supports Common Core and has taken a softer stance on immigration than nearly any other Republican running in 2016. But recent reporting on passages in his 1995 book "Profiles in Character" -- and his response to questions about it today -- is a good reminder that the former Florida governor is very conservative when it comes to social issues.

Bush wrote in 1995 that single mothers are on the rise because there is "no longer a stigma attached to this behavior" and "parents and neighbors have become ineffective at attaching some sense of ridicule to this behavior." And in 2001, he declined to veto a bill that required unwed mothers who did not know the paternity of a child to publish their sexual histories in the newspaper before being able to put their child up for adoption.(He did sign the bill with the understanding that the publication provision would be changed, and he later signed a repeal of the law after it was challenged in court.) Asked about the issue while in Warsaw today, Bush said, "My views have evolved over time, but my views about the importance of dads being involved in the lives of children hasn't changed at all." Remember, this is the governor who intervened to keep Terri Schiavo alive on life support in the early 2000s. From a GOP primary perspective, Bush may look like a moderate for his views on education and support for a path to legal status for undocumented workers. But from a general election perspective, if Bush ever makes it that far, aspects of his record on social issues would put him squarely on the right.

With Clinton bound for Sioux City, GOP piles on // Sioux City Journal // Bret Hayworth – June 11, 2015

With Hillary Clinton bound for her third trip in Iowa, Republican Party officials are working to offset the message of the former first lady many presume will end up as the 2016 Democratic presidential nominee. Clinton on Saturday will hold a house party at a Sioux City residence, then on Sunday will hold her first traditional town hall meeting of the cycle in Des Moines.

The Republican National Committee is ramping up with a 30-second ad, titled "Wrong For America," that will hit Facebook and other digital options in Sioux City and Des Moines. The RNC says Hillary's latest swing, coined as a campaign launch rally with a New York City event prior to coming to Iowa (she first became a candidate on April 12), shows she has had a clunky start to her campaign.

"Hillary Clinton's latest campaign reset won't change a thing. She still refuses to answer the serious questions surrounding her finances, her family foundation, and her secret email server," said RNC Chairman Reince Priebus said.

Additionally, the Iowa Republican Party will hold a Saturday event in Sioux City, where Central Committee Member Cody Hoefert, of Lyon County, will describe why he thinks Clinton would be a poor president.

Clinton's Iowa Press Secretary Patrick Burgwinkle said Clinton is enthused to see more Iowans, via her first stop in 2015 in Northwest Iowa. It may not handle a huge crowd, but the house party will undoubtedly pack as many local Democrats as possible. It also will be simulcast nationally.

"From Day 1 this campaign has said that we value Iowa and we want to get out there and listen to Iowans," Burgwinkle said.

Republicans release anti-Hillary Clinton ad ahead of her Charleston visit next week // The Post & Carrier // Schuyler Kropf – June 11, 2015

This version of Total Mail Converter is not registered.

The Republican National Committee is releasing a second digital ad targeting Hillary Clinton in advance of her second campaign trip to South Carolina. Clinton will be in Charleston on Wednesday.

The 30-second GOP ad targets Clinton for "her clunky rollout and how she's dishonest, out-of-touch, and untrustworthy."

"The ad is part of a campaign by the RNC to target and recruit voters who want to Stop Hillary Clinton," promotional material says.

The ads are slated to run in Iowa, New Hampshire, South Carolina and Nevada when Clinton travels to those states.

"Hillary Clinton's latest campaign reset won't change a thing. She still refuses to answer the serious questions surrounding her finances, her family foundation, and her secret email server," said RNC Chairman Reince Priebus.

Clinton's South Carolina campaign, meanwhile, issued a status update that included assembling 2,484 signed commit to vote cards, and 120 grassroots campaign events, including 59 phone banks.

"What she said basically was put families first and if you do that and if you do what's right for families the rest of it will follow," said Clinton supporter Jane Pulling of Pinopolis.

The Clinton campaign has not confirmed where her Charleston appearance will be but it is expected to have a college education theme.

Romney Hosting GOP Hopefuls at Utah Retreat // RealClearPolitics // Courtney Such – June 11, 2015

The climbing trip is just one of the many activities planned for Romney's annual E2 Summit – a networking event being held Thursday-Saturday for current and future candidates to mix and mingle with business executives, possible campaign donors, and each other. (E2 stands for "experts and enthusiasts.")

Sens. Lindsey Graham and Marco Rubio, Govs. Chris Christie, John Kasich, and Scott Walker, and Carly Fiorina are either already there or will be soon. Walker was among the first to arrive but did not look dressed for an adventure.

The guest list also includes New Hampshire Sen. Kelly Ayotte, former Obama adviser David Axelrod, newswoman Katie Couric, former Defense Secretary Robert Gates, General Electric CEO Jeffrey Immelt, Walmart CEO Lee Scot; former NBA Commissioner David Stern, and Hewlett-Packard CEO Meg Whitman, according to an AP report.

"It's a good chance for 2016 candidates. … We brought in a lot of our donors; they can meet people, get to know them, and sell them on why they think they're the best candidate," the Boston Globe reported Romney's son Tagg saying Wednesday night in preparation for the event.

Aside from networking, this year's E2 agenda includes flag football, skeet shooting, yoga, horseback riding, and a hot air balloon ride, according to ABC News.

This version of Total Mail Converter is not registered.

Romney also hopes to share a little bit of campaign wisdom on what not to do during the presidential race.

"I think there's a lot you can learn from talking with a candidate who has run and won, but there's also a lot you can learn from a candidate who has run and lost," Craig Robinson, former political director of the Republican Party of Iowa, told The Hill.

"There were clearly problems with the Romney campaign, but if you get into [an event like this] you can really expand your knowledge base," he added.

Although Romney's days as a candidate are behind him, his efforts to have an influence on the nation's leadership are not over.

"I have come away more optimistic about America. It is the failing of White House leadership that concerns me, and that must change. I lost the election, but I will continue to fight," Romney said in his 2013 E2 Summit address.

As for what the presidential hopefuls want to get out of the retreat, they've largely been mum.

"The Governor is attending on behalf of Leadership Matters for America PAC," and the trip is "not a part of a campaign," Samantha Smith wrote RCP in an email on behalf of Gov. Christie.

Marco Rubio's team did not wish to comment, either, due to the private nature of the event.

A spokesman for Graham, however, told RCP in an email the South Carolina senator "is looking forward to discussing the importance of American leadership in the world and how a strong global presence keeps our nation safe."

TOP NEWS

DOMESTIC

Trade Fight Goes to the Wire // WSJ // Siobhan Hughes, Kristina Peterson & William Mauldin – June 11, 2015

Supporters and foes of President Barack Obama's bid to craft a sweeping Pacific trade deal waged furious, last-ditch campaigns hours before decisive votes set for Friday in the House.

The vote over whether to grant the president the power to expedite trade pacts looks set to be razor-thin, with serious consequences for all sides. Victory would mark a triumph for the White House, Republican congressional leaders and the business community, and a sharp blow to the unions who have pulled out all stops to defeat the bill.

The chief opponents in the fight—labor unions and progressive groups on one side and the Obama administration on the other—converged on Congress Thursday to appeal to a Democratic caucus torn over the benefits of trade and its impact on American jobs.

This version of Total Mail Converter is not registered.

Capital Journal is WSJ.com's home for politics, policy and national security news.

After that, AFL-CIO Chief Richard Trumka, who represents millions of union workers, urged Democrats to vote against both the fast-track bill and a worker's aid program that pays to retrain workers who lost their jobs to trade—aid labor has favored for decades. "Nothing is off the table" in the trade fight, Mr. Trumka said earlier this week.

Labor opposes the assistance as it appears in the current bill for a larger aim: because ending it would likely scuttle the elaborate package designed to grease passage of the fast-track legislation Mr. Obama needs to complete the Pacific deal. Unions say that deal would promote inadequate labor standards, threaten U.S. jobs and give companies incentives to move jobs abroad.

The battle between the White House and the party's progressive wing overshadowed the first step in a multipart plan by House Republican leaders aimed at getting to a Friday vote on the fast-track bill.

Approval of fast-track would give Mr. Obama the authority to submit trade deals to Congress for an up-or-down vote without amendments, as previous presidents have done. Such power would ease passage of the Trans-Pacific Partnership, a deal among the U.S. and 11 other nations to liberalize trade across nearly 40% of the world economy.

"I have talked to the president," House Speaker John Boehner (R., Ohio) said Thursday. "He's working at this. And I hope his efforts are successful."

Supporters of the trade bill overcame an initial hurdle Thursday when the House overwhelmingly passed a trade preferences bill that was designed to accommodate new concerns among Democrats about how the workers' aid program—known as Trade Adjustment Assistance—was to be funded. But the party's progressive wing wasn't assuaged, raising a fresh set of concerns and setting up another obstacle for a fast-track bill that has already faced many of them.

Democrats had earlier threatened to vote against the workers-aid program because it was to be paid for with cuts to Medicare providers. Under a deal negotiated over the course of the week by Mr. Boehner and Minority Leader Nancy Pelosi (D., Calif.), a new funding mechanism was included in the package of trade preferences for sub-Saharan Africa. It set out that the aid would be paid for by cracking down on tax fraud and boosting tax compliance.

The new provision was aimed at allowing Democrats to vote for trade legislation on Friday without worrying that they would be criticized for voting for Medicare cuts.

Mr. Trumka, the labor leader, worked to undercut the strategy, at one point likening Democrats who voted for the workers' aid program to lost souls. "He didn't get into any hard-line threats," said Rep. Peter DeFazio (D., Ore.) "He just thanked those who were with him…and he said he would pray for the rest."

The White House made its own tough case, arguing that unless Democrats voted for the workers' aid program, the program would expire at the end of the fiscal year. "We need to treat this moment for what it is: a life-or-death moment for TAA," Mr. Lew told Democrats, according to an aide in the room.

This version of Total Mail Converter is not registered.

"If you're a member of Congress, and you vote against Trade Adjustment Assistance this week, you are adding your name to the death certificate of Trade Adjustment Assistance because it will go away," White House spokesman Josh Earnest said later.

Thursday's scuffles in the House are just one front in a much larger, district-by-district fight that has targeted lawmakers across the country. Fierce opponents of the trade bill on the left and right have sent notably similar messages in a bid to thwart the legislation.

Unions and progressive groups are emphasizing arguments that also appeal to conservative organizations, accusing the Obama administration of undue secrecy, stretching the limits of executive power and undermining U.S. sovereignty.

"The left is using the language I use," said Richard Manning, president of Americans for Limited Government, a conservative group that is working to defeat fast-track legislation.

The Stop Fast Track coalition, backed by unions and groups such as the Sierra Club and the American Civil Liberties Union, is asking the public to call members of Congress and tell them the legislation is "undemocratic"—a message that appeals to voters of both parties.

"There are some areas where the guys on the left—unions and others—get it right, and this is one of those issues," said Judson Phillips, head of Tea Party Nation, one of the main tea party organizations.

Leaders of left-leaning and conservative groups aren't working hand in hand—an approach that would likely backfire in today's polarized capital—but their combined message is forcing Mr. Obama and Republican leaders who back the fast-track bill to fight a two-front war as they seek to corral the final votes.

Backed by Republican leadership, Mr. Obama says the Pacific pact, which includes Japan and Vietnam, would increase U.S. influence in the fast-growing region, promoting U.S.-favored commercial rules of the road as an alternative to China's economic system.

The plan is for the House to hold two fast-track votes Friday, one on the portion of the Senate bill that deals with worker aid legislation—funded by cuts to Medicare providers—followed by one on the part of the bill providing fast-track powers to Mr. Obama. The two issues were split up in a procedural maneuver known as "dividing the question" to allow conservatives opposed to the workers aid to vote against it.

If the worker aid portion is defeated, the fast-track vote wouldn't be held and House leaders would have to regroup. That scenario loomed larger on Thursday, alarming the White House and setting off a scramble to avoid that defeat.

But if the House passes the aid portion, it would then move on to fast-track, which promises to be one of the most suspenseful—and consequential—votes of Mr. Obama's second term. House passage of the two parts of the Senate-passed measure would send it directly to Mr. Obama for his signature.

Democrats block cyber bill, leaving measure in limbo // Politico // Tal Kopan – June 11, 2015

Democrats made good on their threats to block a bipartisan cybersecurity bill on Thursday, after they were infuriated by Republican procedural moves to pass the bill with only limited amendments, something Democrats

This version of Total Mail Converter is not registered.

called a “cynical ploy.”

The partisan blowup marked a stunning turn for legislation that’s enjoyed broad support. The measure had gained new urgency after the Office of Personnel Management announced 4 million federal employees’ records had been breached — at the hands of Chinese hackers, according to anonymous federal officials.

Privacy advocates in both parties had wanted to strengthen personal data protections in the measure, but Senate Majority Leader Mitch McConnell’s (R-Ky.) procedural gambit made it next to impossible to make those changes.

So Democrats and libertarian-leaning Republicans banded together to defeat McConnell’s plan to attach the cyberthreat information sharing legislation to the National Defense Authorization Act days. The procedural vote was 56-40, with McConnell needing 60 votes to advance the cyber bill.

The majority of Democrats were joined by several Republicans, including Sens. Rand Paul (R-Ky.), Mike Lee (R-Utah) and Dean Heller (R-Nev.), to block the bill from moving forward.

On the other side, a handful of Democrats, including Sens. Joe Manchin (D-W.Va.), Mark Warner (D-Va.) and Bill Nelson (D-Fla.), voted with McConnell to advance the cyber measure.

Senate Intelligence Committee ranking member Dianne Feinstein (D-Calif.) was the bellwether for Democrats on the bill. Despite having co-authored the measure, she opposed cloture and emerged from Thursday party lunches confident Democrats were closely aligned against advancing the amendment.

“We don’t oppose the bill, we just want it to come separately,” Feinstein said. “I think putting it on the defense bill doesn’t really make any sense. The cyber bill will take time. You just can’t pretend it’s an amendment that you can do in an hour. You can’t do it. It’s going to take debate, members want to express themselves, concerns want to be raised, and some of us want an opportunity to be able to say why certain things were done so that everybody knows.”

What happens next for the bill is unclear. The information sharing bill was expected to come to the floor as a standalone measure toward the end of the month before the McConnell move this week to attach it to the NDAA.

Senate Majority Whip John Cornyn (R-Texas) told reporters he wasn’t sure what would happen after Democrats sustained a filibuster: “We have a Plan A and a Plan B, and Plan B is Plan A,” he said.

“I am astonished that just after, what, it’s 4 million Americans’ records have been hacked at the Office of Personnel Management that they would not recognize the cyberthreat as real and something we need to deal with,” Cornyn added. “The president, as I recall, was just recently chastising Congress for not dealing with this, so we are, we have and we are, and I think it’s irresponsible to try to block it.”

Both sides accused the other of playing politics. Republicans said Democrats were being hypocrites for opposing cybersecurity legislation and Democrats threw the charge back at the GOP for attaching cybersecurity to a bill that has earned a presidential veto threat — though the NDAA has become law each year for decades.

Emotions ran high on the floor Thursday morning, as McConnell and Minority Leader Harry Reid (D-Nev.) fired increasingly harsh criticisms at each other.

“Most Americans would find it awfully cynical for Democrat leaders — in the wake of the Administration’s inability — inability — to stop such a massive cyberattack — to vote against the very same cybersecurity legislation their own party vetted and overwhelmingly endorsed in committee,” McConnell said.

This version of Total Mail Converter is not registered.

“This speech that my friend gave, I would suggest he walk into his office, his little bathroom there, walk in and look in the mirror, because over that mirror, he should be able to see the words hypocrisy and cynicism,” Reid fired back.

Reid called the move to attach the amendment to the bill a “cynical” and “deceitful ploy.”

In fact, the cyber bill isn’t as controversial as Thursday’s rhetoric would suggest. The basic idea is to give companies protections from lawsuits so they can share cyberthreat data with each other and with government. The House overwhelmingly passed similar legislation in April.

But some Democrats and libertarian-leaning Republicans have opposed the bill as written, calling it a surveillance measure masquerading as a cybersecurity bill. While none have believed they have the votes to stop the bill’s passage outright, even some of the Democrats who voted to advance the bill in the Intelligence Committee believed there would be an opportunity to offer amendments bolstering the privacy protections in the bill when it came to the floor.

Dennis Hastert pleads not guilty on all counts // CNN // Chris Frates, Bill Kirkos and Tom LoBianco – June 11, 2015

Former House Speaker Dennis Hastert has pleaded not guilty to all charges related to lying to the FBI about $3.5 million he agreed to pay to an undisclosed subject to "cover up past misconduct."

Hastert was arraigned in court in Chicago on Tuesday afternoon, amid reports he allegedly sexually abused former students.

The former House speaker has hired high-profile white collar crime lawyer Thomas Green to defend him in court. Green has defended clients involved in Watergate, Iran Contra and Whitewater.

Judge Thomas Durkin is allowing Hastert to be released on a pretrial release. Hastert had to sign and appearance bond of $4,500 which he forfeits if he fails to appear.

He was also barred from carrying firearms, had to surrender his passport and cooperate in giving a sample of DNA.

Hastert faces charges of lying to federal investigators and hiding bank transactions as part of a plan to pay $3.5 million in hush money to one of his victims, identified only as "Individual A". Law enforcement sources confirmed a second alleged victim was interviewed by them and the sister of a third alleged victim told ABC that her brother had been molested by Hastert.

Hastert worked as a high school teacher and wrestling coach before starting his career in politics. By the time he retired, in 2007, Hastert was the third most powerful public official in the U.S. (behind the president and vice president). During his time atop the House, Hastert oversaw an internal investigation of then-U.S. Rep. Mark Foley, who had been accused of sexually harassing male pages.

A few years after he left the House, according to the indictment against Hastert, he was approached by "Individual A" and agreed to pay $3.5 million to cover up "past misconduct". From 2010-2014, Hastert paid $1.7 million to the person, avoiding bank reporting requirements in the process.

This version of Total Mail Converter is not registered.

Hastert returned to his Plano, Ill. home Monday night. ABC News reported that Hastert had been at his Wisconsin vacation home before returning to Illinois.

INTERNATIONAL

Obama Looks at Adding Bases and Troops in Iraq, to Fight ISIS // NYT //Peter Baker, Helene Cooper & Michael r. Gordon – June 11, 2015

President Obama is open to expanding the American military footprint in Iraq with a network of bases and possibly hundreds of additional troops to support Iraqi security forces in their fight against the Islamic State, White House officials said on Thursday.

As Iraqi forces struggle on the battlefield, aides said Mr. Obama would consider establishing a series of outposts where American advisers would work with Iraqi troops and local tribesmen. The bases would be run by Iraqis, and Americans would still not engage in ground combat, but they would play a more active role closer to the front lines.

White House officials stressed that no proposal has been presented to Mr. Obama and added that they anticipated no decision in the next few weeks. But the prospect of further escalation came a day after the administration announced the opening of a new base in Anbar Province, an Islamic State stronghold, with an additional 450 American troops, bringing the total in Iraq to 3,550 — the size of a typical Army brigade.

Administration officials said they would evaluate whether that new Anbar base makes a difference in coordinating the war effort and, if it does, would consider replicating the approach in other parts of the country. Although officials said it was possible other bases could be opened without again sending more American troops, they acknowledged that more bases could require additional deployments.

For Mr. Obama, who has long resisted being drawn into another ground war since pulling out all forces in 2011, the latest developments represented another incremental step back into a sectarian conflict he had once hoped to be done with by the time he left office. Supporters of a more robust effort against the Islamic State called it a welcome if inadequate step to make good on the White House's vow to defeat the Islamic State, while critics warned of sliding into a broader, bloodier and ultimately ineffective campaign.

"The reason that we would consider expanding the training operation and the advise-and-assist operation that's underway will be because it's been an effective element of our strategy," said Josh Earnest, the White House press secretary. But Mr. Earnest emphasized that it was still "very hypothetical" and that "there are no immediate or specific plans to do that."

Gen. Martin E. Dempsey, the chairman of the Joint Chiefs of Staff, publicly raised the idea of establishing a network of what he called "lily pads" in Iraq while on a trip to Italy on Thursday. He said he did not envision another military base in Anbar, but Pentagon planners were looking at more northern areas for additional sites.

"You could see one in the corridor from Baghdad to Tikrit to Kirkuk to Mosul," General Dempsey told reporters aboard his plane.

The model would be the new base already being built at Al Taqqadum, an Iraqi post near the town of Habbaniya in eastern Anbar. The American troops being sent there are to set up the hub primarily to advise and assist Iraqi forces and to engage and reach out to Sunni tribes in Anbar, officials said. One focus for the Americans will be to try to accelerate the integration of Sunni fighters into the Iraqi Army, which is dominated by Shiites.

This version of Total Mail Converter is not registered.

As the arrangements at Al Taqqadum show, even deploying small teams of advisers at a new base can involve much greater troop commitments. The number of Americans actually involved in advising the Iraqis at the base would be just a small fraction of the 450 announced by the administration.

While American officials said earlier this week that 110 would be directly involved in training and advising, on Thursday they said there would be just 50 advisers. They will be split into two teams, Special Forces who will work with Sunni tribes, and advisers who will work with the 8th Iraqi Army Division. The rest are to provide support, logistics and force protection.

Although the goal is to retake the city of Ramadi, which fell to the Islamic State last month, General Dempsey indicated that an effort may be months away. He said it would take several weeks for the initial command and control center to be set up at Al Taqqadum.

“Timetables are fragile,” he said. “They are dependent on so many different factors.”

For the Pentagon, the timing has been a difficult issue as the United States Central Command and the Iraqi government have clashed over the pace of efforts by Iraqi security forces to retake areas captured by the Islamic State, also known as ISIS or ISIL. While the American military once forecast recapturing Mosul this spring, the fall of Ramadi less than 70 miles from Baghdad put that city much higher on the priority list.

Gen. Martin E. Dempsey, the chairman of the Joint Chiefs of Staff, at a graduation and commissioning ceremony at the United States Military Academy at West Point, N.Y., last month. Credit Mike Groll/Associated Press

General Dempsey said the United States was still hoping the Iraqi government would find a way to engage Sunnis to beat back the Islamic State, but he also talked of what he called a “Plan B” in case that never happens.

“We have not given up on the possibility that the Iraqi government could absolutely be whole,” he said, but added that “the game changers are going to have to come from the Iraqi government itself.”

“If we reach a point where we don’t think those game changers are successful,” he added, “then we will have to look for other avenues to maintain pressure on ISIL, and we will have to look at other partners.”

Mr. Obama discussed the Taqqadum plan with Prime Minister Haider al-Abadi of Iraq during a meeting in Germany earlier this month. But other Americans and Iraqi officials said they have also talked about expanding the concept beyond Al Taqqadum to other locations.

Some of President Obama’s statements about the American strategy to confront ISIS and its effectiveness.

Both sides have been deliberate about the idea. Sensitive to their own domestic politics, the Iraqis have said that any new American footholds in Iraq should be determined on a case- by-case basis. As a general rule, the Obama administration has conditioned American support on steps toward political inclusiveness and reform in Iraq.

Benjamin J. Rhodes, a deputy national security adviser to Mr. Obama, noted that with Al Taqqadum the president has already approved five hubs for American troops in Iraq, but has no specific plans for others at this point. “It’s more like notionally we may want to do more of that,” he said.

This version of Total Mail Converter is not registered.

Mr. Rhodes acknowledged what he called the concern of "a steady drip, drip, drip of personnel," but added that it was possible new bases could be established by moving troops around rather than sending more. Mr. Obama, he said, was not especially concerned about specific numbers of troops.

"What he's been more focused on is what they are doing," Mr. Rhodes said. "He's been more focused on not getting drawn into a combat role for U.S. forces."

The so-called lily pad bases could provide the American military with a way to advise and support Iraqi troops charged with protecting supply lines, towns and infrastructure if they do try to reclaim Mosul. And they could signal increased focus on supporting local tribes and fighters, as urged by the State Department.

"The closer the U.S. military is to the action on the ground, the better the chances of influencing positive outcomes, especially in building trusted relationships with the Sunni again," said Richard D. Welch, a retired Special Forces colonel who spent more than six years in Iraq.

At the same time, it is not clear the approach can be effective if advisers stay on bases. Many former American military officers argue the best way to help the Iraqis retake Ramadi and other cities is to have small American teams advise Iraqis on the battlefield and call in airstrikes.

Even keeping troops on base may have risks. In February, eight suicide bombers tried to get into an air base west of Baghdad where hundreds of American Marines were training Iraqi counterparts. Officials said the bombers were killed almost immediately by Iraqi forces.

Anthony Cordesman, a military analyst at the Center for Strategic and International Studies, said the latest moves may have some merit. "But creeping incrementalism is rarely a way of correcting a failed or inadequate strategy," he said, "and this approach certainly is not a new strategy or a way of addressing the problems that the existing strategy does not address."

OPINIONS/EDITORIALS/BLOGS

Republicans must stop derailing the Benghazi committee // WaPo // Elijah Cummings – June 11, 2015

Now that the State Department has released former secretary of state Hillary Rodham Clinton's e-mails relating to the attacks in Benghazi, the American people can see for themselves that there is not a scrap of evidence to back up claims that Clinton issued a "stand-down" order, or any of the other baseless allegations that Republicans have been making about her for years.

This is exactly what Reps. Adam Smith (Wash.), Adam Schiff (Calif.), Linda Sanchez (Calif.), Tammy Duckworth (Ill.) and I — the Democratic members of the Select Committee on Benghazi — have been saying since we obtained Clinton's e-mails in February. And it's why all five of us believe the time has come to voice the grave concerns we share over the extremely partisan and misguided direction this committee has taken.

For those keeping track, the committee has spent more than a year and more than $3 million trying to find evidence to damage Clinton and her presidential campaign, even as it continues to come up empty-handed.

Already, the committee has lasted longer than the investigations of the Iran-Contra affair, the assassination of President John F. Kennedy, the attack on Pearl Harbor and Hurricane Katrina.

This version of Total Mail Converter is not registered.

Yet the committee's chairman, Rep. Trey Gowdy (R-S.C.), may not release his findings until just months before next year's presidential election, according to news reports.

At this glacial pace, the Benghazi investigation will last longer than the Watergate investigation and the 9/11 Commission, and it will squander more than $6 million in taxpayer funds.

But that has not stopped Republicans from dragging out the committee's work, offering new excuses at every turn, and — in an astonishing and disgraceful display — seeking to raise campaign funds off the deaths of four brave Americans.

Now, House Republicans want to withhold nearly $700 million from the State Department's operational budget in an Orwellian attempt to improve the department's document production processes.

That simply makes no sense. Withholding two-thirds of a billion dollars from the department's budget — more than all of the salaries of all of the employees working on document production — would only grind the process to a halt.

The committee should stop blaming others for its own delays. It waited more than six months to send a request for new documents to the State Department and nearly a year to send new document requests to the Pentagon and the CIA. The committee has not held a single hearing in 19 weeks, despite the chairman's assertion that there would be public hearings on a monthly basis. It refuses to set a date for Clinton's testimony, although she has been willing to appear since last year.

Pushing this taxpayer-funded political attack further into election season sacrifices any chance that the American people will see it as serious or legitimate. As Greta Van Susteren of Fox News has warned, the committee's findings "will forever be plagued by allegations of unfairness, and politics."

Recognizing this fact, Republicans are becoming more desperate to justify the committee's existence, and they are resorting to strong-arm tactics straight out of the partisan playbook of discredited GOP investigations of the past.

For example, the committee majority recently issued a completely unnecessary subpoena without first contacting the witness. It clearly leaked this news before the subpoena was served and sent armed marshals to the witness's home to confront his wife — all just to get a cheap headline.

These actions directly contradict the spirit of the chairman's previous statement that compelling the testimony of cooperative witnesses such as Clinton "just seems a little heavy-handed," as well as his claim that "serious investigations do not leak information."

After nine reports on the Benghazi attacks from seven congressional committees and the independent Accountability Review Board, how many more times will Republicans investigate Clinton — and how much more will we be forced to spend — before they stop trying to prove that she engaged in some sort of conspiracy?

This slow-walked and abusive political charade on the taxpayers' dime is exactly the opposite of what we promised the families of those who were killed in Benghazi.

If there is any minuscule chance left to salvage the Benghazi committee's place in history, we need to return immediately to our core mission of implementing concrete reforms designed to help protect our diplomatic corps around the world.

This version of Total Mail Converter is not registered.

The Battle for the 2016 Middle Ground // WSJ // Daniel Arbess – June 11, 2015

America is not as polarized as it might seem from the noise level that in recent years has propelled into office candidates from both parties who hold marginal views. Nonpartisan independents, including the majority of Americans 18-30, are now by far the largest group of voters, representing up to 45% of the total and rising, according to the Pew Research Center. The question is how the presidential candidates in 2016 will engage and try to persuade this critical block of moderates.

Institutional momentum favors the Republicans, whose party is about a decade ahead of Democrats in the disintegration-reinvention cycle, having hit the polarized bottom with the tea party around 2009. Republicans now appear ready to come back toward the center, while Democrats seem to be marching to the left.

Hillary Clinton is unlikely to cede the party's liberal base to economic redistributionists like Bernie Sanders, and the next generation's version, Martin O'Malley. Any remnants of the Clinton centrism that marked her husband's tenure in the White House may have vanished by the time Mrs. Clinton becomes, as expected, the Democratic nominee.

The Clinton brand remains more popular than the Bush brand, however, suggesting that moderate Republicans will need a fresh face and new ideas that appeal to the party's base. Jeb Bush has reportedly talked about how to win the general without winning the primary—in other words, without aggressively courting the tea party and evangelical wings. But returning to the politics of compromise and collaboration has to start at home: The Republicans will have to find a formula and ticket that makes space in the big tent for the fired-up base and the more-moderate establishment.

A candidate like Ted Cruz could play a pivotal role. The senator from Texas is assiduously cultivating what he calls the tea party and evangelical "brackets," yet despite his early filibustering antics, he has experience as a Supreme Court litigator and seems to understand the importance of engaging the other side. He shows Reagan-quality conviction and willingness to state reality in foreign policy and, while his personal beliefs on social issues are on the far side of the tent, he seems above all willing to honor Supreme Court decisions and the legislative will of the states. The 44-year-old Sen. Cruz is definitely young and fresh, yet he might come to realize that, on the evidence of the past eight years, another presidency for a newcomer to the national scene is unlikely.

Right-wired players like a Sen. Cruz or Wisconsin Gov. Scott Walker might still be kingmakers if they manage to get centrists to accept their tea party and evangelical supporters as patriots dedicated to those most-American values of liberty, entrepreneurial initiative and family; moderate their own approach on domestic policy; and deliver their support to a more centrist candidate for a place on the ticket or in the cabinet. Ted Cruz might make an excellent partner for Jeb Bush.

Meanwhile, Marco Rubio, also 44, has more experience than Barack Obama did before he entered the 2008 race, and he is more collaborative than President Obama has ever been. The senator from Florida needs to do something creative to offset his own relative inexperience and lack of financial clout compared with the Bush family machine. An alliance of 40-somethings—Sen. Rubio and Sen. Cruz or the 47-year-old Gov. Walker—might well offer enough experience, generational freshness, vision and broad support to secure the Republican nomination.

There is also the chance for a true wild-card—a ticket led by the hugely accomplished centrist independent Michael Bloomberg. But his candidacy, even if he hasn't ruled out a run, would probably, by his own estimation, be a long shot. In any case a reunified Republican Party would be in the best position to reach across the aisle and lead a return in Washington to the bipartisan collaboration and compromise envisioned by the Constitution.

We saw it during the presidencies of Ronald Reagan and Bill Clinton, two of the most effective American leaders of the past 50 years, and it might come to pass that the silent plurality will let us see it again, beginning in 2016

This version of Total Mail Converter is not registered.

How Bill Clinton and Teneo duped t he State Dept. ethics dummies // Leader & Times // Dick Morris – June 11, 2015

In 2011, Bill Clinton had a problem. He had already figured out how to parlay his reputation into income by giving speeches. But, now, with his wife serving as Secretary of State and a Democrat in the White House, he wanted to take things to the next level and actually solicit relationships with major companies and foreign governments.

He envisioned a network of corporate and foreign clients who would give him speaking fees, generate consulting income in which he could share, and give to his Foundation whose assets and income he could use as he wished.

But to realize this grand vision, he needed an intermediary that would get clients and nurture the web he envisioned. So, working through his top aide and protégée, Doug Band, he set up Teneo.

Band, for his part, realized this was the way to cash in on the relationship with his boss.

But Doug and Bill faced a problem. They needed the approval of the State Department Ethics Office that Obama had made Hillary set up to monitor the business dealings of her peripatetic husband.

So they scrubbed the application. Band's role as a principal of Teneo was omitted and he was identified just as the Clinton aide who submitted the application. The real purpose of the new company was hidden and the application claimed it was only designed "to study geopolitical, economic and social trends."

In fact, it was a deal to hire Bill using his name and relationship with Hillary to attract global corporate and government clients. In return, Teneo paid him handsomely, solicited donations for the Clinton Foundation and set up lucrative speaking engagements for Bill.

Win-win Teneo and Clinton. He'd get them clients; they'd get him speaking gigs.

Team Teneo desperately wanted Bill Clinton to head its Advisory Board – so it could hold out the former President and husband of the Secretary of State as part of its team.

For its part, Teneo planned to tell corporations and governments about how to fashion a positive relationship with the US government and the State Department to get what they wanted.

Teneo itself described their company's mission:

"In the US, we use our deep relationships to provide strategic counsel and help clients navigate policy debates in Washington and state capitals as they look to find support, amplification and clarity around the issues that they care about."

Who better to do so than the former president and current husband of the Secretary? But Teneo couldn't tell the Ethics Officers that this was the real substance of the deal.

This version of Total Mail Converter is not registered.

An earlier application by the Clinton Foundation requesting approval of a business relationship between Bill Clinton and billionaire Clinton supporter and donor Haim Saban had been rejected. The Ethics Officer turned it down “based on the fact that Haim Saban, a founder of this entity, is actively involved in foreign affairs issues, particularly with regards to the Middle East, which is a priority area for the Secretary.” Since Teneo and its clients intended to be involved in global affairs that were a priority for the Secretary of State, there was a likelihood that the Teneo request would be denied, too.

Clinton and Band did all they could to hide the real nature of Teneo and make it seem like a routine application for State Department review.

But it was anything but routine.

The big red flag was out there in plain view for the Ethics Police to see: For the first time in two years and hundreds of submissions to the Ethics Board, this application came directly from Doug Band and not from the normal channels at the Clinton Foundation. And, again, for the first time, the request was not copied to the Clinton Foundation, but only to Cheryl Mills. The inner circle was keeping things tight.

But the State Department missed that one completely.

And, according to documents released to Judicial Watch, the State dupes never raised a question as to who was running Teneo and how Clinton would function. Had they done so, they would have discovered that Band’s other partner was Declan Kelly.

As a kind of pre-cursor to Teneo, Hillary had appointed Kelly to the newly created job as the State Department’s Special Economic Envoy to Ireland. A major donor, supporter, and financial bundler for Hillary the job put Kelly in touch with corporations in and out of Ireland on behalf of the U.S. State Department. Translation: he networked for future clients.

Now he was leaving the State Department to do the same thing for Teneo. But that conflict of interest eluded the State Department ethics dummies too.

In fact, his role begs the question of why would the State Department appoint an Irish citizen as its “economic envoy” to Ireland? Why would we even have an economic envoy to Ireland? The answer is simple — because the Clintons saw the future value — for them. And then they grabbed it. According to Irish Central, (Kelly’s) “connection and bond to President Clinton has opened up major avenues to him. In a business where power and influence is everything he has the 800-pound gorilla in his corner.”

And Kelly made sure that gorilla was well fed.

The Ethics Police never asked exactly what Clinton would be doing for Teneo. They just rubber-stamped the request.

But Bill made clear exactly what was going on when he announced that, the next year, that he had “changed his relationship” with Teneo.

“Because of the invaluable help I continue to receive with my business relationships and speaking engagements, as well as with CGI and other philanthropic activities, like the Ireland investment conference, I felt that I should be paying them, not the other way around."

This version of Total Mail Converter is not registered.

And that valuable help has been seen in his overseas and corporate speaking engagements and the millions given to the Foundation.

Bill Clinton had the deepest of relationships in the U.S. and around the globe and perfectly fit Teneo's needs. A match made in heaven.

And no worries about the State Department.

Alexandria Phillips

Press Assistant | Communications

Hillary for America | www.hillaryclinton.com

This version of Total Mail Converter is not registered.

From:	"John Podesta" <john.podesta@gmail.com>
To:	"Milia Fisher" <mfisher@hillaryclinton.com>
Date:	4/23/2015 1:53:08 PM
Subject:	Fwd: Statement of Frank Giustra | CEO.CA

Can you tweet statement with something very simple like Guistra replies, adding actual facts to NYT conjecture.

---------- Forwarded message ----------
From: "Josh Schwerin" <joshschwerin@gmail.com >
Date: Apr 23, 2015 8:06 PM
Subject: Statement of Frank Giustra | CEO.CA
To: "hrcrapid@googlegroups.com " <hrcrapid@googlegroups.com >
Cc:

http://ceo.ca/2015/04/23/statement-of-frank-giustra/

Statement of Frank Giustra

POSTED ON APRIL 23, 2015 BY FRANK GIUSTRA
CATEGORY FRANK GIUSTRA ,

A book that has not yet been published has caused the New York Times to publish a wildly speculative, innuendo-laced article about the Clinton Foundation and my role in contributing money to it. There is not one shred of evidence to back up the Times' conclusions. This is not about me, but rather an attempt to tear down Secretary Clinton and her presidential campaign. If this is what passes for investigative journalism in the United States, it is very sad.

The facts do not comport with the story in the New York Times. The reporter, Jo Becker, wrote a similar piece in 2008, which was eventually debunked by Forbes. http://www.forbes.com/2009/01/12/giustra-clinton-kazakhstan-pf-ii-in_rl_0912croesus_inl.html

1. I began working on financing the purchase of mining stakes from a private Kazakh company in early 2005. The purchase was concluded in late 2005.

- In late 2005, I went to Kazakhstan to finish the negotiations of the sale. Bill Clinton flew to Almaty a few days after I arrived in the country on another person's plane, not on my plane, as the Times reported. Bill Clinton had nothing to do with the purchase of private mining stakes by a Canadian company.
- I sold all of my stakes in the uranium company – Uranium One – in the fall of 2007, after it merged with another company. I would note that those were sold at least 18 months before Hillary Clinton became the Secretary of State. No one was speculating at that time that she would become the Secretary of State.
- Other media outlets have insinuated that I influenced the decision by the U.S. to sign a free trade agreement with Colombia. At one point, I was an investor in Pacific Rubiales, a Colombian energy company. I sold my shares in Pacific Rubiales several years before the U.S.-Colombia Free Trade Agreement, which, I will note, was approved by several U.S. agencies and the White House. To theorize that I had anything to do with that is sheer conjecture.

I hope that the U.S. media can start to focus on the real challenges of the world and U.S. society. Focus on poverty, homelessness, infrastructure, health care, education, or fractious world politics. You are a great country. Don't ruin it by letting those with political agendas take over your newspapers and your airwaves.

I am extremely proud of the work that we have done at the Clinton Giustra Enterprise Partnership. Thousands of people, all over the world, have been helped by this initiative. I plan to continue that work long after the harsh glare of this week's media stories has faded.

4 Votes

This version of Total Mail Converter is not registered.

Sent from my iPad

--

You received this message because you are subscribed to the Google Groups "HRCRapid" group.
To unsubscribe from this group and stop receiving emails from it, send an email to hrcrapid+unsubscribe@googlegroups.com .
To post to this group, send email to hrcrapid@googlegroups.com .
For more options, visit https://groups.google.com/d/optout .

This version of Total Mail Converter is not registered.

From: "German Marshall Fund" <press@gmfus.org>
To: podesta@law.georgetown.edu
Date: 11/22/2015 6:00:00 PM
Subject: Transatlantic Take: Success in Ukraine could Threaten Western Unity

If you have problems viewing this email, you can view it as a web page. To view the mobile-friendly web page click here.

G | M | F The German Marshall Fund of the United States
STRENGTHENING TRANSATLANTIC COOPERATION

Transatlantic Take

Success in Ukraine Could Threaten Western Unity

Andrew Moravcsik — November 23, 2015

WASHINGTON—Today's headlines about Syria obscure a major triumph for Western policy. Ukraine seems to be heading toward an informal settlement largely on European and U.S. terms. Yet this success could threaten the very Western unity that brought it about.

Over the past three months, Ukraine has witnessed a stable cease fire, partial withdrawal of military equipment, scheduling of federal instead of separatist elections, and a plan to bolster OSCE monitoring. Russian President Vladimir Putin seems resigned to pursue his aims primarily through economic and political means. In hard-headed Kissingerian terms, two years of conflict have shifted Ukraine from the Russian sphere of influence into the Western camp. Putin's actions in Crimea have failed to undermine the post-Cold War global order elsewhere in the world.

This marks a considerable Western achievement. Of course the result is not perfect. Crimea remains — and, realistically, will remain — Russian. Ukraine continues to be economically vulnerable. Complex negotiations will be required to unfreeze the conflict in its eastern provinces — and they may fail. For the moment, however, facing a no-win situation, Putin is playing along.

Yet over the next six months, transatlantic and intra-European tensions may distract Western governments from the successful formula they have pursued, which stresses civilian power wielded by a German-led Europe. Three dangers loom...

FULL ARTICLE

Andrew Moravcsik is a Senior Fellow at the Transatlantic Academy, an initiative of the German Marshall Fund of the United States in Washington, DC, and Professor of Politics and Public Affairs at the Woodrow Wilson School, Princeton University.

The views expressed in GMF publications and commentary are the views of the author alone.

This version of Total Mail Converter is not registered.

From:	"Clinton Foundation Press Office" <press@clintonfoundation.org>
To:	"Clinton Foundation Press Office" <press@clintonfoundation.org>
Date:	7/30/2015 8:24:55 PM
Subject:	Clinton Foundation in the News: Donor Update

Today, the Clinton Foundation updated its donor posting with contributors who gave in the first two quarters of 2015. We wanted to make sure you were aware, and had information about today's news.

In Elite Daily today, Clinton Foundation supporter, Benjamin Cunningham, a donor who gave $230 for the first time last year because he was drawn to the work, shared why he contributes and how his support impacts lives around the world:

> "This new breed of philanthropy that former US president Bill Clinton has pioneered is helping several initiatives to become more efficient and effective in their efforts to improve lives around the world."
>
> "I'm proud to support an organization that shares my commitment to collaborating with others for the greater good, to addressing challenges that face us here and now and to making thoughtful investments that will better society."
>
> "I will continue to support the Clinton Foundation because it is effectively making a difference in people's lives."

Read it here: http://elitedaily.com/news/clinton-foundation-donation/1155436/
Share this oped on twitter here: https://twitter.com/ClintonFdn/status/626865768538443776

The Chronicle of Philanthropy reported on this disclosure, "Clinton Foundation, Aiming to Quiet Critics, Releases Donor Data," saying:

> "The Clinton Foundation took a major step Thursday toward keeping its promise of increased transparency by updating its online database to reflect contributions through the end of June."
>
> "About 90 percent of the donations were $100 less or less, consistent with previous years, the foundation said."
>
> "In April, it said it would take a number of steps to increase transparency. In addition to the quarterly reports, it suspended Clinton Global Initiative international events, which in recent years had attracted prominent names and big checks. It promised to refuse money from foreign governments except from a half dozen Western nations friendly with the United States that have previously funded Clinton Foundation programs."

Read it here: https://philanthropy.com/article/Clinton-Foundation-Aiming-to/232059

Politico this afternoon published an article, "Clinton Foundation says donations on the rise," reporting:

> "The Clinton Foundation announced Thursday it raised more money in the first half of 2015 than it did in the same period last year, despite months of criticism and scrutiny into its donors."
>
> "The nonprofit is not legally required to disclose its donors, but it has been releasing the names of donors and the range of their contribution on its website."

Read it here: http://www.politico.com/story/2015/07/clinton-foundation-donations-on-rise-120825.html
Share this article on Twitter here: https://twitter.com/politico/status/626845555046633473

The Washington Post also reported on the increase in donations, saying:

> "According to the foundation, overall giving rose for the first six months of 2015 compared to the first part of 2014. The number of new donors and previous contributors who gave new money rose as well, they said."
>
> "The release comes as Shalala and Chelsea Clinton, who serves as the foundation's vice-chair, travel in Haiti, viewing organization projects intended to help that nation rebuild from the 2010 earthquake."

Read the article here: http://www.washingtonpost.com/news/post-politics/wp/2015/07/30/amid-presidential-campaign-launch-clinton-foundation-reports-rising-donations/

Lastly, the Miami Herald reported on our recent trip to Haiti, where Foundation President Donna Shalala and Chelsea Clinton led a delegation of supports to see our life changing work firsthand. You can read that article here .

You can read more about our supporters on our website .

Below, we've provided the full statement from Foundation President Donna Shalala, background on our 2015 donors, and information on the work of the Foundation's initiatives in 2015.

This version of Total Mail Converter is not registered.

Statement from Donna Shalala, President of the Clinton Foundation:

"This week, Chelsea Clinton and I traveled to Haiti where we saw the important work that our donors are supporting. We are grateful for the generous support of more than 300,000 donors that makes our work possible – helping farmers lift themselves out of poverty, assisting island nations with renewable energy projects, empowering girls and women, promoting healthier communities and nutritional school options here in the United States. We are encouraged by the increased support that we have received this year, which has reinforced the Foundation's operational strength, and we know that donors are giving more because they are seeing the impact of our work across the globe."

Backgrounding Points on 2015 Donors:

Today, the Clinton Foundation updated its online disclosure of contributors and grantors, to include those who have provided financial support in the first and second quarters of 2015. This voluntary disclosure reflects the Foundation's commitment to transparency and accountability.

Donations to the Clinton Foundation in the first two quarters of 2015 reflects the Foundation's continuing financial strength and support from a wide range of donors:

- Overall giving in the first half of 2015 is up compared to the first two quarters in 2014;
- Total number of donors is higher compared to the first two quarters in 2014;
- Both the number of new donors, and the number of returning donors, has increased from the first two quarters in 2014;
- Consistent with previous years, approximately 90 percent of donations were $100 or less.

Previous to this update, the Clinton Foundation has disclosed its donors and their aggregate levels of contribution on an annual basis. Those donors who contributed in the most recent time period (in this case Jan 1 - Jun 30 2015) are marked with an asterisk.

In April, the Foundation announced that it would update this list on a quarterly basis moving forward. This month's posting marks the first such update, which covers the first two quarters of 2015. For more information about the Clinton Foundation's policy update in April, please visit: https://www.clintonfoundation.org/press-releases/clinton-foundation-policy-update

The support to the Clinton Foundation has enabled specific programs to expand their work and reach even more individuals across the globe. See the below information for progress and expanded work by each of the Clinton Foundation's initiatives in the first half of 2015.

Clinton Foundation – Progress and Expanded Work in 2015

Clinton Development Initiative
In February, CDI, in partnership with the Minister of Agriculture and Animal Resources of the Republic of Rwanda, announced the signing of a new MOU to expand CDI's efforts into Rwanda. The expansion is currently aiming to increase soya and seed production; improve yields and crop productivity; and promote climate-smart agronomics. In this past growing season, CDI established 27 demonstration plots, managed by lead farmers, and used as training centers for more than 2,300 farmers.

Clinton Climate Initiative
In February, CCI participated in a ground-breaking for a wind power project in Jamaica which they worked to facilitate. Wigton Windfarm Ltd is Phase III of one of the largest wind projects in the Caribbean and, when completed, will reduce Jamaica's oil consumption by an estimated 37,000 barrels, and reduce CO2 emissions by approximately 48,000 tons annually.

Clinton Giustra Enterprise Partnership
The Clinton Giustra Enterprise Partnership launched its supply chain enterprise model in Haiti in 2014. To date, its enterprise Acceso Peanut has trained over 3,200 farmers on best practices for smallholder peanut growing and purchased peanuts from close to 900 farmers for sale to local buyers.

Clinton Health Matters Initiative
In May, the Clinton Health Matters Initiative unveiled its fifth Blueprint for Action in Adams County, Mississippi. The Blueprint for Action is CHMI's strategic framework for health improvement that will drive a five-year strategic plan focusing on high priority health areas with action steps and measurement criteria to improve local health outcomes.

Clinton Foundation in Haiti
In February, President Clinton participated in the opening of the Marriott in Port-au-Prince. The Marriott Port-au-Prince is

This version of Total Mail Converter is not registered.

Haiti's first internationally branded hotel. The new hotel has incorporated many positive environmental features and has worked with the Clinton Foundation to ensure local procurement of goods and services.

No Ceilings
On March 9, No Ceilings released the Full Participation Report and NoCeilings.org , through an interactive event that brought together world leaders and grassroots activists, with more than 1,000 people attending in person and over 40,000 viewing by livestream. No Ceilings also released the Full Participation Plan – a set of policy priorities and principles for action to accelerate progress and ensure that commitments to gender equality translate into measurable improvements on the ground. No Ceilings continues its Conversations series, having just concluded its 18th conversation in Haiti, and is using the data and plan to inform sustained efforts, commitments, and partnerships.

Too Small to Fail
Expanded partnerships have been critical to Too Small to Fail's efforts in 2015. Earlier this year, Too Small to Fail announced a partnership with Text4Baby, which brought early literacy tips to the mobile phones of more than 820,000 parents nationwide. In addition, our partnership with Univision's "Pequenos y Valiosos" resulted in more than 149 million viewer impressions of PSAs on early numeracy, the benefits of bilingualism and the important role of fathers and grandparents, along with 21,000 parents who pledged to spend 15 minutes a day talking, reading, and singing to their children. Too Small also released "Talking Is Teaching: Talk, Read, Sing" PSAs with moms Amanda Peet, Jennifer Garner, Kelly Rowland, Salma Hayek, Lisa Ling, and Lena Headey in honor of Mother's Day. And, at CGI America in June, three separate Commitments to Action were made to help grow awareness and put more resources in the hands of parents and caregivers to talk, read, and sing to their young children in every day places such as laundromats and playgrounds.

Clinton Global Initiative
At CGI America in June, 79 new Commitments to Action were announced, which are expected to: impact the lives of more than 1.6 million people in the United States, create or fill nearly 210,000 jobs, create more than $11.3 million in new capital for small- and medium-sized enterprises, and help more than 110,000 students gain access to STEM education opportunities.

At CGI Middle East & Africa in May, 29 new Commitments to Action were announced, which will positively impact the lives of more than 800,000 people. When fully funded and implemented, these efforts by CGI commitment makers will positively impact more than 132,000 girls and women through a variety of programs to improve quality of education and increase access to employment and skills development opportunities; more than 123,000 people through access to training programs; and more than 60,000 students who will become enrolled in school.

At CGI University in March, more than 1,000 Millennials made 700 Commitments to Action to increase girls and women's inclusion in STEM fields; improve access to clean water in developing nations; provide rural communities with affordable sources of renewable energy; and increase nutritional options in food deserts.

Clinton Presidential Center
From October 1, 2014 – July 19, 2015, the Clinton Presidential Center has welcomed 373,890 visitors – an increase of 19% from the same time last year. The Center also launched, in conjunction with three other presidential centers, the Presidential Leadership Scholars Program, which graduated its inaugural class of 60 scholars last month in Dallas. The Clinton Presidential Center hosted its module in Little Rock in April, led by instruction by leading academics and practitioners, and a discussion with President Clinton. Speakers for the graduation ceremony included President Clinton, President George W. Bush, and entrepreneur Mark Cuban.

Alliance for a Healthier Generation
In June, the Alliance for a Healthier Generation, an affiliated organization, announced progress on a McDonald's 2013 CGI Commitment to Action to increase access to fruits, vegetables, and healthy beverages. This included removing soda from kids' meal menu boards and adding a side salad as an option instead of French fries in value meals. The study showed promising progress in just the first year of implementation. It also saw a decrease in soda selected with a Happy Meal and an increase in healthier options being offered in restaurants—low-fat dairy, fruit and side salads.

This version of Total Mail Converter is not registered.

From:	"Genevieve Thaler" <gthaler@hillaryclinton.com>
To:	nhstaff <nhstaff@hillaryclinton.com>
Date:	12/5/2007 8:40:38 AM
Subject:	NH CLIPS 12/5/07 PM
Attachments:	NH CLIPS 12-5-07 PM.doc

NH CLIPS 12/5/07 PM

HRC

NEA NH endorses Clinton, Huckabee- Primary Source 12/5/07
http://www.boston.com/news/local/politics/primarysource/

Bill Clinton: Don't focus on the horse race- Boston Globe (AP) 12/4/07
http://www.boston.com/news/local/new_hampshire/articles/2007/12/04/bill_clinton_complains_media_coverage_ignores_wifes_experience/

Suspect in Clinton hostage case wishes cops had shot him- Boston Herald (AP) 12/5/07
http://www.bostonherald.com/news/2008/view.bg?articleid=1048957

State shrinks OK'd Eisenberg- Boston Herald 12/5/07
http://www.bostonherald.com/news/regional/general/view.bg?articleid=1048889

OP ED: Trailer park kook should be ready for day in court- Boston Herald 12/5/07
http://www.bostonherald.com/news/opinion/columnists/view.bg?articleid=1048851

OP ED: It's electability vs. inevitability- Boston Herald 12/5/07
http://www.bostonherald.com/news/opinion/op_ed/view.bg?articleid=1048826

Clinton, Romney still ahead in NH poll- Union Leader 12/5/07
http://www.unionleader.com/article.aspx?headline=Clinton%2c+Romney+still+ahead+in+new+NH+poll&articleId=04464c71-9281-41af-b9fd-62e89077ba28

Gunstock couldn't be happier- Laconia Citizen 12/5/07
http://www.citizen.com/apps/pbcs.dll/article?AID=/20071205/GJNEWS02/712050043/-1/CITIZEN

A Conversation with Bill Clinton—Blue Hampshire, 12/4/07
http://www.bluehampshire.com/showDiary.do?diaryId=2594

Sen. Clinton Schedule: December 5-7, 2007—NH Insider, 12/5/07
http://www.nhinsider.com/press-releases/2007/12/5/sen-clinton-schedule-december-5-7-2007.html

Sen. Clinton Delivers Major Economic Policy Address in New York, NY Today—NH Insider, 12/5/07 http://www.nhinsider.com/press-releases/2007/12/5/sen-clinton-delivers-major-economic-policy-address-in-new-yo.html

Bill stumps for Hillary in Western NH—Political Intelligence, 12/4/07
http://www.boston.com/news/politics/politicalintelligence/2007/12/bill_stumps_for_1.html

Ex- president give the senator a hand- Valley News 12/5/07
http://www.vnews.com/12052007/4413441.htm

Bill defends Hillary's record- Manchester Express 12/5/07
http://www.manchexpress.com/express.pdf

EDITORIAL: Bill, you're kidding right?- Manchester Express 12/5/07
http://www.manchexpress.com/express.pdf

Man in Clinton drama thought suicide- WBZ 12/5/07
http://wbztv.com/racenh/Leeland.Eisenberg.new.2.603034.html

How many religious leaders back Clinton?- WCVB 12/5/07
http://www.thebostonchannel.com/politics/14780579/detail.html

I started a joke- Primary Pundit 12/5/07
http://www.blogthecoast.com/primary/pundit/2007/12/i_started_a_joke.html

Clinton blames telephone attacks on Obama- Party Line Blog 12/5/07
http://blogs.eagletribune.com/preselection

When Hillary attacks- Party Line Blog 12/5/07
http://blogs.eagletribune.com/preselection

Rivals make hay of Clinton's vote on terrorist label- Concord Monitor 12/5/07 http://www.concordmonitor.com/apps/pbcs.dll/article?AID=/20071205/FRONTPAGE/712050306

This version of Total Mail Converter is not registered.

DEMS
Democrats pounce over Iran nuclear story- WCVB 12/5/07
http://www.thebostonchannel.com/politics/14780091/detail.html

A calm Democratic radio debate- Portsmouth Herald 12/5/07
http://www.thenewhampshireprimary.com/news/2007_12_5_news_nation.html

OBAMA
Sen. Obama to Issue Call to Serve, Vow to Make National Service Important Cause of His Presidency—NH Insider, 12/5/07 http://www.nhinsider.com/press-releases/2007/12/5/sen-obama-to-issue-call-to-serve-vow-to-make-national-servic.html

Obama Says He Will Crack Down on Credit Card Companies Preying on Middle Class Families—NH Insider, 12/5/07 http://www.nhinsider.com/press-releases/2007/12/5/obama-says-he-will-crack-down-on-credit-card-companies-preyi.html

Oprah rally sells out- Manchester Express 12/5/07
http://www.manchexpress.com/express.pdf

Democratic hopeful Obama proposes new and expanded national service programs- WHDH 12/5/07
http://www3.whdh.com/news/articles/decision_2008/BO68263/

Obama's wife meets local working women- Portsmouth Herald 12/5/07
http://www.seacoastonline.com/apps/pbcs.dll/article?AID=/20071205/NEWS/712050363/-1/NEWS09&sfad=1

Sold Out- Party Line Blog 12/5/07
http://blogs.eagletribune.com/preselection

EDWARDS
Adwatch: Edwards assails corporate Dems- Boston Globe 12/5/07 (AP) http://www.boston.com/news/nation/articles/2007/12/05/adwatch_edwards_assails_corporate_dems/

Edwards: Corporate Democrats are as bad corporate Republicans- Boston Globe 12/5/07 (AP) http://www.boston.com/news/nation/articles/2007/12/05/edwards_corporate_democrats_as_bad_as_corporate_republicans/

Edwards goes way too far—Blue Hampshire, 12/5/07
http://www.bluehampshire.com/showDiary.do?diaryId=2599

Updated Edwards Schedule—NH Presidential Watch, 12/5/07
http://nh2008.blogspot.com/2007/12/updated-edwards-schedule.html

Edwards: Corporate Democrats are as bad corporate Republicans- WHDH 12/5/07
http://www3.whdh.com/news/articles/decision_2008/BO68262/

KUCINICH
Kucinich Questions Himself?—Blue Hampshire, 12/5/07
http://www.bluehampshire.com/showDiary.do?diaryId=2598

GOP
GOP poll claims it's a free-for-all- Manchester Express 12/5/07
http://www.manchexpress.com/express.pdf

AP: Republican field wide open- WCVB 12/5/07
http://www.thebostonchannel.com/politics/14780043/detail.html

ROMNEY
Romney grabs 6th place on Mass ballot- Boston Globe 12/5/07
http://www.boston.com/news/nation/articles/2007/12/05/giuliani_resigns_as_head_of_firm_calls_his_work_there_totally_legal/

Romney asks supporters to 'sponsor' new ads- Boston Globe 12/5/07
http://www.boston.com/news/nation/articles/2007/12/05/giuliani_resigns_as_head_of_firm_calls_his_work_there_totally_legal/

Study: American bias vs. Mormons very strong- Boston Herald 12/5/07
http://www.bostonherald.com/news/2008/view.bg?articleid=1048888

Weld talks up Romney's money smarts on New Hampshire's campaign trail- Boston Herald 12/5/07 (AP)
http://www.bostonherald.com/news/2008/view.bg?articleid=1048849

OP ED: Time for wooden Mitt to loosen up- Boston Herald 12/5/07
http://www.bostonherald.com/news/opinion/columnists/view.bg?articleid=1048887

OP ED: To foes, Mitt is such a man of faith, it's scary- Boston Herald 12/5/07
http://www.bostonherald.com/news/opinion/columnists/view.bg?articleid=1048874

Illegal immigrants continued to work at Romney home- Union Leader 12/5/07 http://www.unionleader.com/article.aspx?headline=Illegal+immigrants+continued+to+work+at+Romney+home&articleId=f3029ed6-05f8-4b88-

This version of Total Mail Converter is not registered.

af06-d6504d4c53a0

Romney rebuts Giuliani criticism- Nashua Telegraph (AP) 12/5/07
http://www.nashuatelegraph.com/apps/pbcs.dll/article?AID=/20071205/NEWS08/71205007

Romney rebuts Giuliani on is economic record- Manchester Express 12/5/07
http://www.manchexpress.com/express.pdf

Illegal immigrants landscape for Romney- WCVB 12/5/07
http://www.thebostonchannel.com/politics/14777025/detail.html

Silent on religion, Romney sticks to budget- Concord Monitor 12/5/07 http://www.concordmonitor.com/apps/pbcs.dll/article?AID=/20071205/FRONTPAGE/712050304/1217/NEWS98

GIULIANI
Adwatch: Giuliani invokes 1980 crisis- Boston Globe (AP) 12/5/07
http://www.boston.com/news/nation/articles/2007/12/05/adwatch_giuliani_invokes_1980_iranian_hostage_crisis/

Giuliani's Clients Come Back To Bite—Democratic National Committee Blog, 12/4/07 http://www.democrats.org/a/2007/12/giulianis_busin_1.php

Rudy's "One Hour"—NH Presidential Watch, 12/5/07
http://nh2008.blogspot.com/2007/12/rudys-one-hour.html

Giuliani says he'd be like Reagan—Political Intelligence, 12/5/07
http://www.boston.com/news/politics/politicalintelligence/2007/12/giuliani_says_h_1.html

Rudy on TV: dealing with tyrants—Primary Monitor Blog, 12/5/07
http://www.yourconcord.com/primaryblog/rudy_on_tv_dealing_with_tyrants

Giuliani wants to be the next Reagan- Party Line Blog 12/5/07
http://blogs.eagletribune.com/preselection

McCAIN
McCain: Iran report highlights need for better human intelligence- Boston Globe (AP) 12/4/07 http://www.boston.com/news/local/new_hampshire/articles/2007/12/04/mccain_iran_report_highlights_need_for_better_human_intelligence/

McCain: Better intelligence needed- Manchester Express 12/5/07
http://www.manchexpress.com/express.pdf

HUCKABEE
Huckabee refuses push to evaluate other faiths- Boston Globe 12/5/07
http://www.boston.com/news/nation/articles/2007/12/05/giuliani_resigns_as_head_of_firm_calls_his_work_there_totally_legal/

Huckabee's rise in polls may only be a snapshot in time after what Murray Waas uncovered—Below Boston, 12/5/07
http://www.soapblox.net/belowboston/showDiary.do?diaryId=1326

Collins: Huckabee one scary character—Democracy for New Hampshire, 12/5/07
http://www.democracyfornewhampshire.com/node/view/5140

Huckabee, Like Bush, Wasn't Briefed—Democratic National Committee Blog, 12/5/07 http://www.democrats.org/a/2007/12/huckabee_like_b.php

Creationism question irks Huckabee- WCVB 12/5/07
http://www.thebostonchannel.com/politics/14780617/detail.html

VIDEO: Mike Huckabee funny guy?- WPTZ 12/5/07 http://www.wptz.com/video/14771410/index.html

PAUL
Ron Paul: Black Men Are 'Potential and Actual Terrorists'—Blue Hampshire, 12/4/07
http://www.bluehampshire.com/showDiary.do?diaryId=2595

The Registration Bomb – Make Ron President!—NH Insider, 12/5/07
http://www.nhinsider.com/nhigb/2007/12/5/the-registration-bomb-make-ron-president.html

Can Ron Paul's Internet revolution translate into votes- Portsmouth Herald 12/5/07 http://www.thenewhampshireprimary.com/news/2007_12_4_news_nation.html

TANCREDO
Tancredo unveils 2nd ad hitting illegal immigration- Boston Globe 12/5/07
http://www.boston.com/news/nation/articles/2007/12/05/giuliani_resigns_as_head_of_firm_calls_his_work_there_totally_legal/

Consequences- Party Line Blog 12/5/07
http://blogs.eagletribune.com/preselection

This version of Total Mail Converter is not registered.

THE FIELD
New Hampshire today, Dec. 5- Primary Source 12/5/07
http://www.boston.com/news/local/politics/primarysource/

Biden, Dodd Si, Hillary, Obama No—Blue Hampshire, 12/4/07
http://www.bluehampshire.com/showDiary.do?diaryId=2597

The Music Man Campaign: Anyone Using It?—Blue Hampshire, 12/4/07
http://www.bluehampshire.com/showDiary.do?diaryId=2596

Open Thread: It's NPR, so pinkies up—Blue Hampshire, 12/4/07
http://www.bluehampshire.com/showDiary.do?diaryId=2593

All for amnesty—Primary Monitor Blog, 12/5/07
http://www.yourconcord.com/primaryblog/its_not_what_you_know#comment-16

It's not what you know … --Primary Monitor Blog, 12/5/07
http://www.yourconcord.com/primaryblog/its_not_what_you_know

Presidential campaign update- NHPR 12/5/07
http://www.nhpr.org/node/14198

Imus grills primary candidates- Party Line Blog 12/5/07
http://blogs.eagletribune.com/preselection

NH ISSUES
News from truthout.org—Democracy for New Hampshire, 12/5/07
http://www.democracyfornewhampshire.com/node/view/5142

EVENT ALERT!! Thursday December 6 – The Unpress: New Gatekeepers of the NH Primary?—Granite Grok, 12/5/07 http://granitegrok.com/blog/2007/12/thursday_december_6_the_unpress_new_gate.html

New Hampshire News Links for December 5th, 2007—NH Presidential Watch, 12/5/07 http://nh2008.blogspot.com/2007/12/new-hampshire-news-links-for-december_05.html

Planning ahead and working together saves on heating costs—Seacoast NRG, 12/4/07 http://www.seacoastnrg.org/2007/12/04/planning-ahead-and-working-together-saves-on-heating-costs/

Contributions to Hillary Clinton for President are not deductible for federal income tax purposes.

Paid for by Hillary Clinton for President

This version of Total Mail Converter is not registered.

From: "Burns Strider \(CTRFF\)" <burns.strider@americanbridge.org>
To: CTRFriendsFamily <ctrfriendsfamily@americanbridge.org>
Date: 7/25/2014 10:11:00 AM
Subject: UPDATED Russia/Ukraine TPs

TALKING POINTS: HILLARY CLINTON ON RUSSIA, UKRAINE

BACKGROUND: In the last two weeks, Secretary Clinton has provided new insight about the reset with Russia, vocalized her concerns about Russian President Putin, and his role in the continuing conflict in Ukraine – especially after a civilian airplane was shot down by what evidence suggests were pro-Russian militants.

Russian Reset:

· In an interview with CNN's Fareed Zakaria airing Sunday, Hillary Clinton discussed the reset with Russia and how and why U.S.-Russian relations have changed since

· According to Secretary Clinton, "So when he [Putin] announced in the fall of 2011 that he would be changing positions with Medvedev, I knew that he would be more difficult to deal with. He had been always the power behind Medvedev, but he had given Medvedev a lot of independence to do exactly what you said and make the reset a success." [CNN, 7/25/14]

· Clinton continued, stating, "I think that what may have happened is that both the United States and Europe were really hoping for the best from Putin as a returned president. And I think we've been quickly, unfortunately, disabused of those hopes. [CNN,7/25/14]

The Downed Airplane:

· Discussing Putin's responsibility for the downed plane in an interview airing Sunday, Clinton said, "I think if there were any doubt it should be gone by now, that Vladimir Putin, certainly indirectly -- through his support of the insurgents in eastern Ukraine and the supply of advanced weapons and, frankly, the presence of Russian Special Forces and intelligence agents -- bears responsibility for what happened." [CNN,7/25/14]

· While the U.S. has been very clear in its criticism of Putin and Russia, Secretary Clinton believes the Europeans could do more. In an interview airing Sunday, she said, "The United States has continued to move forward on that, Europe has been reluctant…They need to understand they must stand up to Vladimir Putin." [CNN, 7/25/14]

· Secretary Clinton thinks that "Putin is pushing the envelope as far as he thinks he can" and "the only language he understands is one that is very tough, very patient, very clear." [The Charlie Rose Show, 7/17/14]

· Europe needs to toughen their own sanctions, find alternatives to Russian oil, and do more to help support the Ukrainians protect themselves and their borders.

· According to Clinton, Putin needs to know "that there is a price to pay for this kind of behavior." [Associated Press,7/21/14]

Hillary on Russia as Secretary of State:

· As Secretary of State, Hillary Clinton was clear-eyed about Putin. Any other characterization is patently false. In 2008, she publicly pointed to Putin's past as a KGB agent and warned that he couldn't be trusted.

· Clinton warned of concerns in late 2012 that Russia was trying to re-Sovietize Eastern Europe.

· Secretary Clinton worked arduously to advance American interests with Russia, even in tough circumstances.

· Secretary Clinton worked successfully to secure Russia's cooperation in anti-terrorism efforts in Afghanistan, reaching a historic "lethal transit " agreement, allowing U.S. military planes to transport lethal materials over Russia to Afghanistan.

This version of Total Mail Converter is not registered.

· She worked with Russia to secure critical, crippling sanctions against Iran.

· Not to mention, Secretary Clinton oversaw passage and enactment of the New START Treaty reducing nuclear weapons and making us all safer.

This version of Total Mail Converter is not registered.

From: "Sarah Stephens" <sarah@democracyinamericas.org>
To: john.podesta@gmail.com
Date: 8/1/2014 10:43:26 AM
Subject: Friends Don't Let Congress Drive Cuba Policy

Having trouble viewing this message? Click Here

August 1, 2014

Dear Friends:

Congress spent a month spinning itself into a frenzy over the crisis at the southern border of the U.S.

But, after weeks of photo ops, accusations that the Obama Administration created the crisis and failed to stop it, and shameful efforts to marginalize the children who fled poverty and violence in order to get here, nothing happened.

The least productive Congress in modern history has spun itself into a ditch. It has made the migration crisis so dire and so toxic that even punitive legislation to fix it became too hot to handle. Backed up against their own deadline for the August recess, neither the House nor the Senate could find enough votes to pass even band aid-sized fixes to a greater than tourniquet-sized problem.

As of this publication, the House leadership is considering how to press forward - making the legislation meaner to migrants, which dooms the bill to failure - or by taking the moral highroad and driving off on vacation. In the meanwhile, both House Appropriations Chairman Harold Rogers (KY-5) and Speaker John Boehner issued statements telling the President to sweep up the mess by taking executive action (ironic, given the recent House decision to sue him for using his authority to implement health care reform).

There are media reports, such as here by the Wall Street Journal, saying the President will take broad action by September to address the crisis without waiting any longer for Congress to act.

While some in Congress hope the President will take executive action to fix the border, we and others have been urging the President to use his authority to make further reforms to U.S.-Cuba policy.

But, as the 44 signers of the letter supporting executive action on travel, negotiating with Cuba, and other issues, reminded President Obama in May, "Timing matters and this window of opportunity may not remain open indefinitely."

What could close the window? U.S. politics, as bad as it is, is likely to get worse. There are just ninety-five days until the midterm elections take place; 156 days until the new Congress is seated.

What happens if today's gridlocked Congress gives way to a 114th Session of Congress dominated by one party, as even non-partisan pundits predict today, and it takes on President Obama aggressively as he ends his term and the parties nominate candidates to replace him? Does the window close and, if so, what happens to the hope for executive action then?

This version of Total Mail Converter is not registered.

What happens if Charlie Crist, candidate for Governor in Florida, who has come out as anti-embargo and considered traveling to Cuba, is defeated in November by incumbent Governor Rick Scott in what is then interpreted as a referendum on Cuba policy reform? What happens then?

What happens as policy changes that take long lead times - for example, solving the problem of a hemispheric boycott of the Summit of the Americas by inviting Cuba to participate - are eclipsed due to the passage of time? What happens then?

What happens if Alan Gross's physical health and mental state are as precarious as his legal team indicates? If his condition deteriorates further, what happens then?

What happens if there is an abrupt change in the political structure in Cuba given the advanced ages of its senior leadership? How could the window stay open then?

The President's authority to take significant actions that reform Cuba policy, that free Alan Gross, whose imprisonment remains the chief obstacle to warming relations, and that speed the U.S. toward normalization, is greater than most people realize. Once the Supreme Court acts, perhaps later this year, on a case with implications for the foreign policy powers of the presidency, the extent of his authority to make really big changes in U.S. - Cuba relations could grow larger still.

However, it is not the President's power but his willingness to use it, given the political space he has and the time constraints that face him, which is pivotal now. What also matters deeply - and we're told, may matter more than many of us know - is whether the government in Havana understands just how close we are to the window of opportunity slamming shut.

President Obama's actions in his first term to expand travel for Cuban families and people-to-people exchanges - described as modest here and disregarded as domestic politics by some in Cuba - continue to provide big benefits. But, he can and should do a lot more.

To get there, it is President Obama and not Congress who must drive policy. But, he should start revving the engine now before it is too late.

This week in Cuba news...

Contents

U.S.-CUBA RELATIONS
- Hillary Clinton tells Jorge Ramos she wants to normalize U.S.-Cuba relations
- United Nations and U.S. Treasury Department sanction North Korean companies
- Alan Gross now refusing visitors
- State Dept. gives mixed review of religious freedom in Cuba
- Spain arrests 14 in migration scheme giving Cubans fake documents for entry to U.S.
- Yris Pérez Aguilera, Cuban dissident, meets with members of Congress
- U.S., Cuban baseball teams face off in Cuba
- BNP Paribas reports its 2nd quarterly loss in bank history after paying U.S. fine

CUBA'S FOREIGN RELATIONS
- 1.4% decrease in June tourist arrivals
- ALBA and Mercosur to create joint special economic zone

IN CUBA
- Cuba celebrates anniversary of beginning of the Revolution

Recommended Reading
- Will warming Cuba-EU ties open up U.S.-Cuba relations? , Americas Quarterly
- The other current , Rachel D. Rojas, Progreso Weekly
- Museum honors Cuba's revolutionaries , Tracey Eaton, Al Jazeera
- China issues some details of loan for new Santiago port , Progreso Weekly
- How to view a changing Cuba , Kevin O'Donnell, CNN

This version of Total Mail Converter is not registered.

Cuba's hardcore skateboarders get some lift , Mary Murray, NBC
Las visitas de los presidentes de China y Rusia a Cuba: geopolítica y actualización (in Spanish), Carlos Alzugaray Treto, OnCuba Magazine

Recommended Viewing

Digitization of endangered African diaspora collections at the major archives of the province of Matanzas, Cuba, The British Library
Beautiful Sepia Portraits of Cuba's Ballet Prodigies , Maia Booker, The New Republic

Recommended Listening

5 nuevos ritmos musicales que han surgido en Cuba en los últimos años (in Spanish), The Wow

A note: CDA will be taking a summer recess on the week of August 18. There will be no Cuba Central Newsblast on Friday, August 22.

Also, CDA Summer Intern Eliana Kanefield will leave our fold today and return to Columbia University this fall. We want to thank her for all her hard work -- she will be missed!

U.S.-CUBA RELATIONS

Hillary Clinton tells Jorge Ramos she wants to normalize U.S.-Cuba relations

Former Secretary of State Hillary Clinton reiterated her position that the U.S. should lift the embargo on Cuba in an interview with Jorge Ramos for Fusion TV . In response to the question of whether she thought the U.S. should end the embargo, she said:

> "Yes, I would like to see that. I advocate that in my book, because I think it's been a failure, and I think it has propped up the Castros, because they can blame everything on the embargo. You don't have freedom of speech, you don't have freedom of expression, you know, you're still having political prisoners; everything is blamed on the embargo. I would like to see us move toward normalizing relations eventually. And therefore more Americans [going] back and forth. That's something President Obama did and I supported. ... We do have our own political prisoner in Cuba, Alan Gross, a man who has been thrown into prison and not being given a chance to come home to his family. So I would like to see that resolved, and I would like to see us move toward ending the embargo and trying to, by our example, by commerce, by all kinds of visits, you know, help the Cuban people have a different future."

When asked if she was interested in a "Nixon moment" going to Cuba, she said, "You know, someday I'd like to go to Cuba. I would, someday. Yes."

In June , when Clinton released her book, Hard Choices , she revealed that she had advocated for President Obama to work to lift the embargo. The complete video of Clinton's interview with Ramos is available here (her comments on Cuba start at the 6:00 mark). A transcript of her comments regarding Cuba is available from the Tampa Bay Times.

United Nations and U.S. Treasury Department sanction North Korean companies

On Monday, the UN Security Council (UNSC) blacklisted Ocean Maritime Management, the operator of the Chong Chon Gang ship, imposing a travel ban and a freeze on its assets, reports Reuters . According to the UNSC committee that made this decision, "Ocean Maritime Management Company, Ltd (OMM), played a key role in arranging the shipment of the concealed cargo of arms and related material." The UNSC, however, did not move to sanction Cuban officials involved in the case, in which weapons and military equipment were hidden under a shipment of sugar from Cuba to North Korea.

Eight Members of Congress sent a letter to Samantha Power, the U.S. Ambassador to the UN, asking that Power's office push for the Cuban officials who were involved in the Chong Chon Gang case to be named as sanctions violators, reports El Nuevo Herald. Representatives Ros-Lehtinen (FL-27) and Díaz-Balart (FL-25) wrote the letter, which was also signed by Representatives Sires (NJ-8), Salmon (AZ-5), Duncan (SC-3), Smith (NJ-4), DeSantis (FL-6), and Duffy (WI-7). According to the Miami Herald , Russia's veto power at the UNSC may have spared Cuba from facing sanctions.

This version of Total Mail Converter is not registered.

On Wednesday, the U.S. Treasury Department also placed sanctions on two North Korean companies and 18 cargo ships for violation of the UN arms embargo. The sanctions similarly excluded Cuba, and according to a Washington official interviewed by the Miami Herald, such measures were likely viewed as unnecessary given the U.S. embargo against Cuba already in place.

Alan Gross now refusing visitors

Scott Gilbert, the lawyer for jailed USAID subcontractor Alan Gross, says that Gross's physical condition is deteriorating and that he is now refusing visitors due to his depression, reports Café Fuerte . According to Gilbert, Gross has lost the use of his right eye and has not been able to exercise for the past two months because his hips are in such bad shape.

Since he was arrested and imprisoned, Gross has suffered from health problems, including chronic pain and degenerative arthritis in his leg, the Gross family reports on their website, Bring Alan Home .

In June , Gross's mother passed away. His wife, Judy Gross, and Gilbert visited him a week later, and subsequently reported that he was deeply depressed.

State Dept. gives mixed review of religious freedom in Cuba

The U.S. Department of State's Bureau of Democracy, Human Rights, and Labor released its International Religious Freedom Report for 2013 . The report's section on Cuba was largely critical, but also acknowledged improvements in religious freedom on the island, the Miami Herald reports. The report said that Cuba's Office of Religious Affairs continues to regulate all forms of religious activity, and that religious groups must apply to the Ministry of Justice for authorization. The report also mentioned the repeated detentions of members of the dissident group Ladies in White while they march to and from Mass on Sundays.

The report also noted that:

> "Most established religious groups, however, reported an increased ability of their members to meet, worship, travel abroad, recruit new members, and conduct charitable, educational and community service projects. They also reported fewer restrictions on religious expression and the importation of religious materials."

Spain arrests 14 in migration scheme giving Cubans fake documents for entry to U.S.

Spanish police arrested fourteen people -- eleven Cubans and three Spaniards -- who were operating an illegal network that provided false identification documents for Cubans to migrate to the U.S., reports AFP . The network was based on the island of Tenerife in the Canary Islands, where the Associated Press reports it was able to take advantage of the sizable local Cuban community.

The migrants would first receive false Spanish residence permits that would allow them to enter Mexico without a visa. Spanish citizens, along with citizens of all other European Union countries, are not required to have a visa to travel to Mexico, whereas Cubans need a visa to enter the country. Once in Mexico, the Cubans could cross the border into the U.S., where they qualify for residency under the Cuban Adjustment Act. The network's services cost between $1,350 and $2,000 per person.

This version of Total Mail Converter is not registered.

This week, Reuters reported on the different experiences of migrants coming to the U.S. from Cuba as opposed to many Central American migrants; while Cubans are allowed to stay in the U.S. under the Cuban Adjustment Act, migrants from other countries face the threat of deportation after making their own harrowing journey.

Yris Pérez Aguilera, Cuban dissident, meets with members of Congress

Yris Pérez Aguilera, a Cuban dissident, visited the U.S. Congress this week and met with Cuban-American Members from South Florida, reports the Associated Press. She met with Rep. Mario Diaz-Balart (FL-25), Rep. Ileana Ros-Lehtinen (FL-27), and Rep. Joe García (FL-26). Pérez Aguilera is married to fellow dissident Jorge Luis García Pérez ("Antunez"), who was imprisoned from 1990 to 2007 for working against the government, reports Terra.

U.S., Cuban baseball teams face off in Cuba

Cuba's baseball team swept the U.S. Collegiate National Baseball Team in a five-game series, reports the Associated Press. The annual series resumed in 2012 after having been shut down in 1996. The AP reports that last year, when the series was played in the United States, the U.S. team swept the series. The host country switches every year, reports the Havana Times.

BNP Paribas reports its 2nd quarterly loss in bank history after paying U.S. fine

French bank BNP Paribas is reporting a $5.8 billion second quarter loss after the U.S. fined the bank $8.9 billion in June for violating U.S. sanctions against Cuba, Iran, and Sudan, reports the Financial Times. This is only the second quarter in which the bank has experienced a loss since its establishment in 2000. In response to the fine, the bank will form a supervisory committee and "a conduct committee in charge of monitoring and possibly redrafting the group's policies in certain 'sensitive' business sectors or countries."

CUBA'S FOREIGN RELATIONS

1.4% decrease in June tourist arrivals

This week, the National Statistics Office in Havana released a report that revealed a 1.4% decrease in tourists arriving in June 2014 as compared with the same month last year, reports Bloomberg. Prior to June, Reuters reports that Cuba had been experiencing a 3.9% increase in tourist visits for the 2014 year. When comparing total tourist arrivals in 2014 with those in 2013 to date, the arrivals have increased by 3.9%, with 1,660,055 tourists traveling to the island since January 2014 as opposed to the 1,587,000 tourists who came in 2013 up until June 2013.

The decrease in visits by tourists over the last year has been largely in travelers coming from Argentina (-34.4%) and the United Kingdom (-27.1%). It should be noted that the estimated 350,000-400,000 Cuban-Americans who visit Cuba each year are excluded from the data used to calculate these statistics, as they are not counted as tourists by Cuba.

ALBA and Mercosur to create joint special economic zone

Presidents of the Mercosur member states signed an agreement with the presidents of countries in the Bolivarian Alliance for the People of Our America (ALBA) establishing a special economic zone among those countries, as well as the member countries of Petrocaribe and Caricom, reports Telesur. The agreement "aims to facilitate trade and industrialization among member countries."

Cuba is a member of both ALBA and Petrocaribe, which is an oil alliance between

This version of Total Mail Converter is not registered.

Venezuela and seventeen other Caribbean nations. The agreement was signed at the Mercosur Summit, which took place this week in Caracas, Venezuela.

IN CUBA

Cuba celebrates anniversary of beginning of the Revolution

Cuba celebrated the July 26, 1953 attack on the Moncada Barracks that marked the beginning of the Cuban Revolution last Saturday, reports the Associated Press . This year the ceremony took place in Artemisa, Cuba, roughly an hour's drive west of Havana.

Ramiro Valdés, one of Cuba's Vice Presidents and a commander during the Revolution, gave the principal speech . In it, he emphasized Cuba's accomplishments since the Revolution and the need for Cuban unity. He also praised the results of the economic reforms taking place in Cuba, such as the commercialization of the market for agricultural goods and the development of Mariel Port.

Recommended Reading

Will warming Cuba-EU ties open up U.S.-Cuba relations? , Americas Quarterly

In the just-released summer edition of Americas Quarterly, Sarah Stephens, CDA's Executive Director, argues that the EU's engagement with Cuba should serve as a model for the U.S., while Joel Brito argues that doing so will not lead to any human rights improvements.

The other current , Rachel D. Rojas, Progreso Weekly

Progreso Weekly reports on a new energy production cooperative formed in Cuba to use renewable energy sources, and the importance of local initiatives to promote green energy use.

Museum honors Cuba's revolutionaries , Tracey Eaton, Al Jazeera

"Only 14 are left." Tracy Eaton describes the goal and vision of the new museum, constructed by former rebel Alejandro Ferras, to honor Cubans who fought against the dictatorship of Fulgencio Batista. For photos of the museum, see Al Jazeera's display, In Pictures: Cuba's revolutionary museum.

China issues some details of loan for new Santiago port , Progreso Weekly

Progreso Weekly gives an update on the agreements that China and Cuba signed during President Xi Jinping's visit to Cuba last week . It reports that the port at Santiago de Cuba, in which China is investing, will become -- after Mariel -- Cuba's second deep-water port.

How to view a changing Cuba , Kevin O'Donnell, CNN

CNN's Kevin O'Donnell interviews Harvard professor Jorge Dominguez on recent and prospective cultural, political, and economic changes with respect to Cuba and its foreign relations.

Cuba's hardcore skateboarders get some lift , Mary Murray, NBC

Mary Murray delves into the "23 y G" skateboarding community in Havana and the work of Cuba Skate, an organization dedicated to providing resources to Cuban skateboarders so they can skate in a "safe vibrant place."

Las visitas de los presidentes de China y Rusia a Cuba: geopolítica y

This version of Total Mail Converter is not registered.

actualización (in Spanish), Carlos Alzugaray Treto, OnCuba Magazine

Former Cuban diplomat Carlos Alzugaray analyzes the recent visits of Russia's President Vladimir Putin and China's President Xi Jinping to Cuba. He describes both countries as important allies for Cuba, saying that the country's alliance with China is crucial for Cuba's economy, and its alliance with Russia is crucial in the geopolitical and military sphere.

Recommended Viewing

Digitization of endangered African diaspora collections at the major archives of the province of Matanzas, Cuba, The British Library

This collection of documentation on slavery in the sugar-producing region of Matanzas has recently been digitized. Many of the documents, which contain "demographic statistics, information on ethnicity, resistance, occupations, property, economy of free and enslaved Africans," were considered endangered, as they had not previously been protected from Cuba's humid climate. Through this digitization project, local staff learned different components of the archival process. This page contains 400 pictures of different documents.

Beautiful Sepia Portraits of Cuba's Ballet Prodigies , Maia Booker, The New Republic

Booker presents a series of 2012 photographs of dancers at Cuba's prestigious National Ballet School taken by photographer Rebekah Bowman.

Recommended Listening

5 nuevos ritmos musicales que han surgido en Cuba en los últimos años (in Spanish), The Wow

"The Cubans have been changing, evolving, reviving to become who they are." Explore this evolution through the music of five Cuban artists of 21st century Cuba.

Until next time,

The Cuba Central Team

DONATE NOW THROUGH Network for Good

Like our work? Consider a monthly donation!

The Cuba Central Newsblast is produced by the Center for Democracy in the Americas (CDA). CDA is devoted to changing U.S. policy toward Cuba and the other countries of the Americas by basing our relations on mutual respect, fostering dialogue with those governments and movements with which U.S. policy is at odds, and recognizing positive trends in democracy and governance. For more information, check out the CDA website . You can also like us on Facebook or follow us on Twitter .

© 2014 Center for Democracy in the Americas. All rights reserved.

This version of Total Mail Converter is not registered.

Forward email

SafeUnsubscribe

This email was sent to john.podesta@gmail.com by sarah@democracyinamericas.org
|
Update Profile/Email Address | Rapid removal with SafeUnsubscribe ™ | Privacy Policy.

Trusted Email from Constant Contact FREE
Try it FREE today.

Center for Democracy in the Americas | PO Box 53106 NW | Washington | DC | 20009

This version of Total Mail Converter is not registered.

From: "Fariba Yassaee" <fyassaee@albrightstonebridge.com>
To: "Anne Hall" <Anne.Hall@APORTER.COM>
"Bill Antholis" <antholis@virginia.edu> bill.danvers@gmail.com
"Brian Katulis" <bkatulis@americanprogress.org>
"Bruce Riedel" <briedel@brookings.edu>
"Caitlin McDonnell" <cmcdonnell@albrightstonebridge.com>
"Carol Browner" <cmbrowner@me.com>
"Carole Hall" <chall@brookings.edu>
"Catherine Whitney" <Catherine.Whitney@skadden.com>
"Chris Roberts" <croberts@albrightstonebridge.com>
"Dan Benjamin" <dbenjam61@hotmail.com>
"Daniel Silverberg" <danielsilverberg@yahoo.com>
"Denis McDonough" <denis.mcdonough@gmail.com>
"Derek Chollet" <dhchollet@gmail.com>
"Don Gips?? \(don.gips@gmail.com\)" <don.gips@gmail.com>
donkerrick <donkerrick@comcast.net>
"Eryn Sanders" <eryn.sepp@gmail.com>
"Fariba Yassaee" <fyassaee@albrightstonebridge.com>
"Greg Craig" <gcraig@skadden.com>
"Jamie?? Rubin" <JamesPRubin1960@gmail.com>
"Jan Stewart" <jstewart@albrightstonebridge.com>
"Jeff Smith" <jeffrey_smith@aporter.com>
"Jeremy Bash" <jeremybash@gmail.com>
"Jessica Lewis" <lewisje03@yahoo.com>
"Jim?? Miller - Department of Defense \(james.n.miller.jr@gmail.com \)" <james.n.miller.jr@gmail.com>
"Jim O'Brien" <jobrien@albrightstonebridge.com>
"Joanna Nicoletti \(info@forwardengagement.org\)" <info@forwardengagement.org>
"Joe Cirincione" <jcirincione@ploughshares.org>
"John Norris" <jnorris@americanprogress.org>
"John Podesta" <john.podesta@gmail.com>
"Julianne Smith" <julsmi@gmail.com>
"Ken Lieberthal" <klieberthal@brookings.edu>
"Kurt Campbell" <kurtmcampbell@yahoo.com>
"Laura?? Huber" <lhuber@albrightstonebridge.com>
"Leon Fuerth" <hdpf@msn.com>
"Maida?? Stadtler" <mstadtler@apcoworldwide.com>
"Marcel Lettre" <marcel.lettre@gmail.com>
"Mariah Sixkiller \(mariah6@gmail.com\)" <mariah6@gmail.com>
"Martin Indyk" <mindyk@brookings.edu>
"Michael Morell" <michaelbuckeye24@gmail.com>
"Michele Flournoy" <micheleflournoy3@gmail.com>
"Pat Griffin" <pgriffin@pmj-dc.com>
"philip.gordon?? \(philip.gordon@verizon.net\)" <philip.gordon@verizon.net>
"Rich Verma" <rverma@steptoe.com>
"Rob Malley" <rmalley555@gmail.com>
"Rose Marie Owen" <rmowen@virginia.edu>
"Samuel Berger" <sberger@albrightstonebridge.com>
"Sharon Burke" <burkese@comcast.net>
"Steve Ricchetti" <sricchetti@cox.net>
"Strobe Talbott" <stalbott@brookings.edu>
"Susan Rice" <ricesusane@aol.com>
"Suzy George" <suzygeorge8@gmail.com>
"Tamara Wittes \(twittes@brookings.edu\)" <twittes@brookings.edu>
"Tara Sonenshine" <tsonenshine@earthlink.net>
"Theodore Waddelow" <twaddelow@albrightstonebridge.com>
"Tim Roemer" <tjroemer@gmail.com>
"Tom Daschle" <Tom@DaschleGroup.com>
"Tom Donilon" <tdonilon@gmail.com>
"Tom Downey" <tdowney@dmggroup.com>

This version of Total Mail Converter is not registered.

"Tommy Ross" <trossjr@gmail.com>
"Toni Verstandig" <tonigverstandig@gmail.com>
"Tony?? Blinken" <ablinken@aol.com>
"Veronica Pollack" <veronica@daschlegroup.com>
"Vikram Singh" <vsingh@americanprogress.org>
"Wendy Sherman" <wendyrsherman@gmail.com>
Date: 4/6/2015 7:05:15 AM
Subject: Sandy Berger in Politico

http://www.politico.com/magazine/story/2015/04/the-fantasy-of-a-better-iran-deal-116676.html?hp=rc1_4#.VSKGu_nF81w
The Fantasy of a Better Iran Deal
Politico
The critics are dreaming. Tougher sanctions would only isolate Washington, not pressure Tehran.
By SAMUEL R. BERGER
April 05, 2015

Some are insisting on a "better deal" than the framework nuclear agreement reached with Iran on April 2. But the idea of a better deal is a chimera, an illusory option, and it should not lull us into thinking there is another agreement to be had if only we were to bear down harder. The present agreement, which depends on important pieces to be resolved by the end of June, can substantially reduce the ability of Iran to develop a nuclear weapon over the next ten years or more and also creates a dynamic that could be a game changer in the combustible Middle East.

Senator Mark Kirk has postponed a vote on the Iran sanctions bill he wrote with Senator Robert Menendez, possibly until June 30. This is a constructive step, avoiding an action that would undercut negotiations toward a final agreement. But we need to keep the sanctions issue in mind because it is inextricably intertwined with the same calls for a better deal emanating from people in Congress, Israel, and other critics. No one can argue that a better agreement wouldn't be better—3,000 Iranian centrifuges is better that 5,000; a 20-year deal is better than 10. The tough question is: How do you get there? Putting aside what the Iranians might do in response to additional pressure—dig in deeper, speed up their program–and looking just at our side of the equation, the notion of a better deal is unachievable.

Here is why. According to critics, seeking a better deal starts with increasing sanctions on Iran. If tough sanctions brought them to the table, tougher sanctions will bring them to their knees. At some point their economy will be in tatters from the intensified sanctions, and they will be forced to return to the bargaining table and agree to better deal. With a closer look, however, this scenario unravels.

First, it is highly unlikely that even our allies in Europe would join us in further sanctions against Iran in the wake of a nuclear agreement they believe is sensible and positive. That is even truer for other countries—like India, Japan, South Korea and China—that were pulled into the existing sanctions regime quite unwillingly. The support of these countries for the oil sanctions in particular has been critical to the sanctions' effectiveness. They will not willingly sign up for more.

Second, if a deal falls through, it is likely that the existing multilateral sanctions regime will begin to crumble. As noted, countries like India and South Korea, who don't feel threatened by an Iran nuclear weapon, will be only too happy to find a pretext to break out of the sanctions—perhaps tentatively at first but in a rush as others do. It will be hard to argue the rationale for sanctions, which, from the perspective of nearly every nation, will have achieved their purpose—bringing Iran to the table to negotiate serious limitations on its nuclear program.

Indeed, the proponents of tougher sanctions to get a "better" deal have misunderstood the nature of the Iranian sanctions. The fact is that the United States does not own or control the multilateral sanctions regime. The effectiveness of the sanctions is based on how the international community views the perceived threat and therefore the legitimacy of coercive actions to stop it.

Third, those who seek a better deal through tougher sanctions argue that we don't necessarily need international support. The United States could unilaterally enact sanctions that have extraterritorial reach, as we already have done with a number of Congressional measures since 2010. The proposition is that we will to some degree deny foreign companies access to the larger, more important American market, if they choose to do business with Iran.

However, the context has entirely changed since the Comprehensive Iran Sanctions Act was passed in 2010. New extraterritorial sanctions would be directed against an Iran that has reached an agreement on its nuclear program with major world powers. The rest of the world generally detests our assertion of authority involving foreign companies in foreign countries. Here, for example, we would seek to close the U.S. market to Germany's BMW if they sold cars to Iran or Japan's Sony if it sold in Iran. If Congress imposed sanctions in spite of a nuclear agreement reached with Iran by major powers, the international community—except for a few countries—would believe those sanctions to be illegitimate. In this context, it is hard to imagine the U.S. government moving ahead with major sanctions proceedings against many of our friends and allies.

So, as we discuss and debate the merits of this framework agreement, and a final agreement that may follow, let's recognize that this is the agreement we will have—not some imagined alternative. In my judgment, if the next stage of negotiations succeeds, the framework that emerged this week lays the groundwork for a strong and effective agreement.

The framework does not—nor by itself is it likely to—fundamentally alter the other threats Iran poses in the region, including its ongoing efforts to exert control in Damascus, Beirut, Baghdad and Sanaa, and its continuing threat to Israel. That is why it is important to embed this agreement in a regional strategy that bolsters concrete cooperation with our friends in the region and reassures them that we are there for the long haul. President Obama's summit with regional partners at Camp David will be an important opportunity to look not only at the hot spots, but at the bigger picture.

This version of Total Mail Converter is not registered.

The Iran nuclear agreement is important not despite other troubles in the region but because of them. Each challenge would be more difficult and dangerous if Iran's nuclear program was unconstrained and unmonitored, let alone if Iran were to develop a nuclear weapon and spark others in the region to follow. Under the agreement that is emerging, we will have a high degree of confidence—as will others in the region—that Iran's nuclear program is seriously constrained. Walling off the nuclear threat does not extinguish the fires that are burning in the region. But it does remove what would be the most combustible fuel.

There is no second bite at this apple. This is a good deal. We should not be distracted by talk of a better one.

Enacting new, tough sanctions in an effort to force Iran toward a "better" deal would mystify and alarm the rest of the world, isolating and weakening us. Such sanctions would crumble under their own weight —amounting to, as Shakespeare said, "sound and fury, signifying nothing."

Samuel R. Berger was national security adviser to President Bill Clinton from 1997-2001; he is currently chair of Albright Stonebridge Group.

Fariba Yassaee | Vice President
Albright Stonebridge Group LLC
601 13th Street, NW | 10th Floor |Washington, DC 20005
O +1.202.759.5100 | D +1.202.759.5156 | F +1.202.759.5101
fyassaee@albrightstonebridge.com

As of March 2, 2015 ASG's Washington, DC offices have relocated to:
601 13th St NW | 10th Floor | Washington, DC 20005 | Main Line +1 202.759.5100

From:	orca100 <orca100@upcmail.nl>
To:	podesta@law.georgetown.edu
Date:	2/20/2016 7:51:05 PM
Subject:	While most centrist & leftwing politicians lie liberally about (esp. Continental) Europe's Immigration Disaster, Angela Merkel & Wouter Bos once blurted out the terrible truth, thereby sounding just like Pim Fortuyn

Before Angela Merkel wrapped herself in the cloak of madcap multiculturalism, she had tagged non-Western immigration in Germany as a "total failure." With all the irrefutable evidence-based facts slapping her in the jowly face, Frau Merkel had thus described non-Western immigration in Germany https://www.youtube.com/watch?v=UKG76HF24_k . Could not be any more devastating, now could it? But that was before she flip-flopped her way into farce, joined the swivel-eyed sect and painted the Wutbürger and, by implication, her former self as racist. Her lurch to the loony left must have disconcerted the hell out of the CSU. The glib "racists in Germany" slur would be a far harder sell to mainstream-media consumers, if they knew all the evidence-based facts and expert opinions (see a previous email headlined "Multikultistan: A house of horrors for ordinary Germans") long hidden by most MSM outlets. Deception by omission is the most common form of lying committed by the vast majority of mainstream media, which regard the twisting of the truth beyond all recognition as their core business. Or to quote fourth-century monk Saint Augustine, "He who conceals a useful truth is equally guilty with the propagator of an injurious falsehood."

Wouter Bos: "In the Netherlands, migrants and people of migrant background have a much greater chance than others of being poorly educated, unemployed, sick or ending up with a criminal record."

If centrist pols make you grab for your barf bag, Europe's leftists – so many of whom have gone from Communist Holocaust Denial to Immigration Disaster Denial, as I will demonstrate at a later date – are even more derisible, having discovered a new false religion to throw their weight behind. But truth be told, not all Leftists are deaf, dumb and deceivable. A handful of them did speak out and warn about the ever-worsening Immigration Debacle, yet were never heard in the cacophony of craziness similar to the Red Guardist terror in Maoist China minus mass murder. As a matter of astonishing fact, Wouter Bos, a former Leader of the Dutch Labour Party, admitted in the IHT article below, "In the Netherlands, migrants and people of migrant background have a much greater chance than others of being poorly educated, unemployed, sick or ending up with a criminal record."

Tragically, that's not even scratching the surface in terms of the NUMBER of immigration-disaster subjects. For example, there's no mention of anything from widespread political extremism and rampant Muslim anti-Semitism, to gay bashing and the ultraviolent mass grooming of white girls by Muslim men in Britain, the Netherlands, Germany, etc. (much more about that at a later date), to mention just a few items on an laundry list running from here to hell.

Likewise, that's not even scratching the surface in terms of the ever-worsening ENORMITY of the immigration-disaster subjects. For instance, a Dutch Crimewatch-style TV program is now actively "whitened up," so as to prevent it from showing nothing but Muslim and black thugs targeting the weakest in society. What's more, a BBC-quoted expert discloses that all Swedish Muslim immigrants are not only unemployed, but also structurally unemployable – so completely useless to employers for the duration of their wholly welfarized lives http://www.bbc.co.uk/news/world-europe-22650267. So Fox was not exaggerating in citing the cataclysmic joblessness rate among immigrants in Muslimized Malmö, which has already turned into one big banlieue https://www.youtube.com/watch?v=RwKsRa6bUp4. At the same time, a leftwing economist admits that almost all immigrant women in the Netherlands are not only jobless but also unemployable http://weblogs.nrc.nl/mees/2010/03/05/harteloos-nederland, while Dutch Muslim men fare only marginally less catastrophically, judging from all the damning evidence seen.

Or to mention the last remaining unmentionable in the immigration debate in the Netherlands, the otherwise PC-infantilized NRC newspaper quoted Dutch psychologist Jan te Nijenhuis as saying, "Many people don't want to hear this, but the considerably lower IQ scores by immigrant children translate into a considerably worse school performance." As if all of that weren't deeply disturbing enough, psychologist Indra Boedjarath http://www.trouw.nl/tr/nl/4324/nieuws/article/detail/1394009/2007/10/27/Dubbelleven-Marokkanen-fnuikt-psyche.dhtml explains that many Moroccan youngsters suffer from psychological problems, adding that numerous Moroccan criminals are "slightly mentally handicapped." Shockingly, 55% of all young Moroccan males in the Netherlands have been the subject of a police investigation http://www.nieuwsblad.be/article/detail.aspx?articleid=GIE2B2Q4K. Indeed, the unofficial, yet reliable figure for Amsterdam is 70%! On and on, it goes.

This version of Total Mail Converter is not registered.

***

The decade-old URL no longer works http://select.nytimes.com/iht/2005/10/19/international/IHT-19globalist.html?n=Top%2FNews%2FWorld%2FColumns%2FRoger%20Cohen

October 19, 2005

Globalist

Europe's Troubles Push Even the Left Rightward

By ROGER COHEN

International Herald Tribune

The pendulum of Europe's political direction tends to be erratic, but for the moment it is pointing rightward. That may be surprising at a time when the Continent has spent a lot of time defining itself in opposition to President George W. Bush's conservative administration.

But it's less surprising when two factors are considered: the alarm caused by jihadist killings in Madrid and Amsterdam and London, and the difficulties of social market economies with comprehensive welfare systems creaking under the strain of high unemployment and aging populations.

The terrorism means that law and order, part of Angela Merkel's winning message in Germany, is in and indulgence toward immigrants is out. The economic difficulties, especially in France and Germany, are pushing in the direction of free-market reform. Both these trends favor the right.

It has not been lost on Europeans that terrorism has come from within. The killings have in general been perpetrated not by agents sent from the Middle East, but by Europe's own, Muslims born and raised in European societies or long-term residents. The murderers knew freedom, often a great deal of it, and opted for an attempt to destroy the open societies that nurtured them.

That is disquieting, especially for a European left that had long held aloft the "multi-culti" model of diverse peoples living side by side and in harmony without a strong overarching national culture.

So the left is moving right. Earlier this month, Wouter Bos, the leader of the Dutch Labor Party, had some sharp comments for a gathering of European socialists. His speech suggested the degree to which the mainstream European left is reconsidering its past policies in the light of the violence that has struck the Continent.

"Every society has limits to its capacity to absorb newcomers," Bos said. "Successful integration therefore above all requires a restrictive migration policy because our capacity to integrate and emancipate is not limitless. And it will require toughness, both on those who arrive new into our societies and the society that adopts them."

Toughness on immigration is a new message for the left. So is talk of "emancipating" immigrants, a clear message that European Muslims will have to show more readiness to buy into the norms of Western societies on such matters as the equality of men and women and freedom of sexual choice.

This version of Total Mail Converter is not registered.

Bos acknowledged that past policies had proved inadequate. “Social Democrats all over Europe have not been too good at tackling these problems,” he declared. “Maybe because they were afraid to be accused of racism.”

Another reason, of course, was that hostility to immigration was the terrain of the right and, in its ugliest form, the preserve of extreme-right xenophobes like France’s Jean-Marie Le Pen.

But the left now sees that it is possible, indeed critical, to confront the grave failures of immigration policy without adopting the bigoted excesses of the right. For one thing, the welfare state that is the great creation of European social democracy depends on change because a welfare system supporting out-of-work immigrants in disproportionate degree tends to stir resentments that are explosive.

In the Netherlands , Bos said, “migrants and people of migrant background have a much greater chance than others of being poorly educated, unemployed, sick or ending up with a criminal record. Here again the result, if we do nothing about it, will be that the white middle-class tax-paying citizen wonders: Am I paying taxes for myself or am I paying for them?”

In a similar way, if basic values are not shared in a society, the welfare system, ultimately based on a sense of solidarity, frays. The welfare state is a form of collective insurance. For it to work, there has to be some agreement on the nature of the risk and the nature of the way of life to be defended. From Britain to Spain , evidence has accumulated that such a consensus has been lacking.

The bottom line, after Europe’s recent violence, is that greater efforts, in education and in imparting the meaning of citizenship in a European democracy, appear essential if tensions with immigrants are to be eased. Nationalism tends to be anathema in Europe, which knows its downside too well. But national values and national pride may be making a comeback.

Of course, as long as the economies of Germany and France remain stalled with unemployment rates hovering around 10 percent, tensions within European societies will tend to persist. Societies that fail for long periods to produce significant growth or jobs are societies that promote a paralyzing dependency and stifle hope.

That is why both Merkel and the center-right French prime minister, Dominique de Villepin, have proposed tax cuts, greater labor market flexibility, reductions in nonwage labor costs and other measures to try to stop the institutionalization of unemployment in their countries.

In a coalition with the Social Democrats, Merkel’s margin for maneuver will not be great; Villepin faces French labor unions and may opt to zigzag into ineffectiveness. But at least they have been frank about the core of their countries’ problems: the fact that it has often been more attractive financially not to work than to work.

Their joint presence may just revive the French-German alliance and give a new impulse to free-market ideas in the euro zone. Resistance will be significant. But Merkel has real convictions about where she wants to go; Villepin has unusual energy. This combination could bring results, especially as the railing of leftists against globalization, neoliberalism and the like has an increasingly sterile air in both countries.

The most successful politician in a major industrialized democracy, Prime Minister Junichiro Koizumi of Japan , has successfully deployed a mixture of radical reform and carefully dosed nationalism. Merkel and Villepin may take a leaf from his book.

After all, toughness, national values and a freer market are even being espoused by some of Europe’s mainstream left. Could there be a looming market for European neocons?

E-mail: rcohen@iht.com

++++++++++++++++++++++++++++++++

This version of Total Mail Converter is not registered.

The URL no longer works http://select.nytimes.com/iht/2006/02/14/international/IHT-14politicus.html?n=Top%2FNews%2FInternational%2FColumns%2FJohn%20Vinocur

Blunt Talk on Migration From Dutch and Danes

By JOHN VINOCUR

International Herald Tribune

Post-politically correct Europe starts here. It loops north to Denmark . These days, it branches east, although less distinctly, to Germany.

But in the Netherlands the words are free, and inhibitions about describing and dealing with the problems caused by immigration, particularly from Islamic countries, are largely gone.

“In 2002, I was demonized for urging the Amsterdam City Council to drop publishing notices on every piece of business it does in Kurd, Papiamento and God knows what,” said Geert Dales, who is mayor of Leeuwarden, a city of 100,000 on the North Sea.

Four years ago, Dales’s thrift was called intolerance or even racism. For a decade, anyone expressing concern about projections that Amsterdam would have a Muslim majority by 2020 (about 65 percent of its young people now have Islamic backgrounds) risked disgrace as a closet fascist. Now the Dutch discuss the implications of similar population projections and similar time frames for cities like Rotterdam and The Hague without cramped circumlocution.

In comparison, direct official- and politician-speak in places like Britain, France and Spain shies from the idea that failed national policies accommodating (or avoiding) Muslim integration have been factors in the most confidence-shaking European events of the new century:

Bomb attacks by local Islamic extremists in Madrid and London, the murder of a Dutch filmmaker by a member of the Amsterdam Moroccan community, riots in immigrant towns around Paris, and now, Denmark and Danes coming under threat and attack around the world after a newspaper published cartoons of the Prophet Muhammad.

The post-politically correct comes in here. Danes point to Islamists in their midst - not themselves - as the key factor in turning the cartoons into a source of misery. A poll in the Danish media late last week said that 58 percent believed the central problem was not the newspaper’s choice to carry the cartoons, but imams living in Denmark who propagated them and even more devastating fakes in Islamic countries.

By way of an explanation, this comes down to both the Netherlands and Denmark, countries with small but dense populations, cherished cultures, and languages that require protection, feeling a new precariousness in their national identity as a result of substantial Islamic immigration. In both places, the mainstream left has followed the center-right onto this track.

Perhaps because there has been open contempt for assimilation by Muslims in supposedly soft and marginal places like the Netherlands and Denmark, both countries have been intent on demarcating the line where their accommodation of immigrants stops.

You could call it a flow-reversal of attitudes in two famously tolerant nations. Their emphasis, coming now with special intensity caused by a sense of declining sovereignty, is specifying that their Muslim communities must demonstrate compatibility with Dutch or Danish society.

A Dutch example: In more politically correct France, race or national origin are excluded from official statistics, whether they involve job-seekers or the prison population. In calmly talking about Leeuwarden, Dales says point-blank that an immigrant group from Curaçao, making up 1 percent of the city's population - Muslims represent 16 percent - is responsible for 50 to 60 percent of its crime.

This version of Total Mail Converter is not registered.

What to do? Expressed in the increasingly blunt Dutch manner, Dales's response was not that short of the style of the U.S. Marine Corps: kicking butt and taking names.

He told me about a national pilot program that would let cities like Leeuwarden initiate proceedings "to send them back."

Dales, a member of the center-right Liberal Party, a component of the government coalition, believes all the same that Dutch history suggests the country can successfully absorb its Islamic immigrants. He very much trusts in the possibility of their integration and sees there are successful examples of it in every Dutch town. "But it involves an approach that says, again and again, exactly what is non-negotiable and exactly what is required."

Requirements, according to Dales: educational achievement, speaking Dutch, acceptance of the work ethic.

Dales's accompanying view of daily reality: a 65 percent dropout rate among Muslim immigrants in Leeuwarden's schools; notoriously poor language capacities; and inconsistent interest in finding jobs, complicated by insufficient training and a Dutch network of social services that for decades made the Netherlands a kind of Nirvana for the work-challenged.

Above all, Dales said, the difficulty for some Muslims was that Islam had principles that are no way in line with those of Dutch society.

When I asked Prime Minister Anders Fogh Rasmussen in Copenhagen last week about a Dutch-Danish post-politically correct link (a phrase first used by the American writer Christopher Caldwell), he talked about insisting on the same core values that Frits Bolkestein, the original politically incorrect Dutchman and former European Union commissioner, first described in relation to Islam as "non-negotiable." Like the separation of religion from politics, the importance of work, and Western notions of freedom of expression and gender equality.

"We're on the right track," Rasmussen said. "I see a very clear tendency that other European countries will go in our direction."

In Germany, where the former Social Democratic interior minister, Otto Schily, said two years ago that multiculturalism was dead, there are indications that Rasmussen's view of a European trend has some reality.

The Bundestag's vice president, Wolfgang Thierse, a Social Democrat, has recommended that only German be spoken on school grounds and received unexpected support from teachers' unions, while Christian Democratic state governors are backing a plan that would require testing acceptance of the principles of the Constitution and genuine German language skills as requirements for citizenship. Parliamentary debate in Berlin on the Danish situation on Friday was not so much a succession of calls to tolerance but of remarks that there should be respect for religion "but not its instrumentalization" and that this respect must not be a "one-way street."

But in light of the Danish experience, countries considering a more politically incorrect stance on immigration may now think twice.

Bolkestein, who warned in the early '90s about Islam's challenge to the Dutch and Europe, is not optimistic. He believes Europe has only seen "the thin edge of the wedge" of pressure to come from rogue states and Islamic extremists.

"Next time," he said, "I fear it will be oil, or Israel, or nuclear weapons rather than cartoons." End of article.

***

This version of Total Mail Converter is not registered.

France's under-siege Jewish community is estimated to have dwindled from 500,000 to 400,000 – with anecdotal evidence suggesting that a mass exodus may well be under way

Welfare sponging on a scale never seen before in human history is just one item on a never-ending list of non-Western immigration horrors in esp. Continental Europe, which also includes rampant anti-Semitism. At present, the lion's share of anti-Semitism in Germany comes from Muslims, while the Far Left and Far Right account for the much smaller remainder. Green Party Co-Leader Cem Özdemir acknowledges that anti-Semitism is rife among German Turks and other Muslims. Hell, if you translate the PC Kremlinese uttered by the BBC's previous chief Germany correspondent into plain English, even he appears to say so.

France plays host to 6 million Muslims, and a Jerusalem Post article http://www.jpost.com/Opinion/Columnists/Article.aspx?id=170731 expects France's Muslim community to be the majority within 50 years. And that's not even factoring in Turkey's probable entry into the EU. This demographic tsunami is really bad news for Jews. Let me quote from http://www.telegraph.co.uk/news/worldnews/europe/france/11335980/Antisemitism-in-France-the-exodus-has-begun.html: Attacks on Jews have risen sevenfold since the 1990s. No wonder Jewish emigration from France is accelerating. From being the largest Jewish community in the EU at the start of this decade, with a population of around 500,000, it is expected by Jewish community leaders to have fallen to 400,000 within a few years. That figure is thought by some to be too optimistic. Anecdotally, every French Jew I know has either already left or is working out how to leave. […] Almost of all these attacks have been carried out by Muslims.

The Jerusalem Post piece echoes this assessment: "In recent years, burgeoning hostility emanating primarily from radical Muslims has led to increasing desecration and bombing of Jewish sites and synagogues, as well as violent altercations on the streets climaxing with the 2006 kidnapping, brutal torture and murder of Ilan Halimi, a young Parisian Jew. Hostility has become so pronounced that Jews are now warned not to wear kippot in public even in central thoroughfares such as the Avenue des Champs Elysees in Paris.

This version of Total Mail Converter is not registered.

From:	"Brent Budowsky" <brentbbi@webtv.net>
To:	"John Podesta" <john.podesta@gmail.com>
Date:	4/23/2015 8:28:38 AM
Subject:	John, Re: Peter Schweizer

I sent the following note about the real Peter Schweizer agenda to a prominent Republican who is very close to Jeb Bush who knows I strongly support Hillary but with whom I have a good personal relationship.....here is what is really happening:

My thought for the day: I've been looking into this Peter Schweizer book and his institute. Here is my take. Set aside the merits of the issues in Clinton Cash and his upcoming Jeb Bush book. I think he is the equivalent of an operative running a private nonprofit oppo research operation funded by conservative sources who oppose both Hillary Clinton and Jeb Bush.

For this reason, media is wrong when they say that Schweizer doing a Bush book demonstrates nonpartisanship, they miss the point. What I believe he is doing is running a private oppo research operation supporting a candidate or candidates other than either Bush or Clinton.....financed by sources who oppose both Bush and Clinton.

Quite an ingenious operation, especially since he is building what are essentially a form of ex parte relationships with the New York Times and Washington Post which become, regardless of the merits of the issues he raises, public relations departments of his private oppo research operation.....

best, Brent

Sent from my iPad

Sent from my iPad

This version of Total Mail Converter is not registered.

From: "Ryan Duncan" <ryan@progressiveaccountability.org>
To: bigcampaign@googlegroups.com
Date: 7/1/2008 5:33:46 AM
Subject: [big campaign] Media Monitoring Report - Morning 07/01/08

Main Topics: McCain's Trustworthiness, McCain Camp Using Politics of Fear, Wesley Clark Comments

Summary of Shift: And we're back! McCain coverage today focused around the Wesley Clark comments on McCain's military experience, as well as on the Charlie Black and Joe Lieberman comments on McCain benefiting from a terrorist attack on U.S. soil. MSNBC has a focus today on who is most trustworthy, with both sides being called out for their flip-flops. Obama has a new ad out that some hypothesize is an effort to force McCain to spend money in states he has yet to compete in. Other non-McCain related news highlights included Bill Clinton's support for Obama's campaign, continued violence surrounding Zimbabwe's disputed elections, and wildfires continue to ravage California. Israel is in the news over whether or not it might attack Iran over it's nuclear program, and violence in Afghanistan is up with more deaths reported there this month than in Iraq.

Highlights:
1. MSNBC: McCain Attacks Obama's Trustworthiness, Called Out For Hypocrisy
2. McCain Camp & Their Politics of Fear Campaign
   a. CNN: Charlie Black and Joe Lieberman use the Bush Politics of Fear Tactic to Highlight McCain's Qualifications
   b. MSNBC: McCain Campaign Counting on October Surprise, Using Politics of Fear
3. MSNBC: New Obama Ad Forcing McCain to Go On Defensive In Some States
4. Comedy Central: Stephen Colbert's "Make McCain Exciting Challenge!"
5. Wesley Clark Scrutinized For Claiming Military Service Doesn't Qualify McCain to be Commander in Chief (CBS, Early Show, No Clip)

Clips:

Highlight #1
McCain Attacks Obama's Trustworthiness, Called Out For Hypocrisy (MSNBC, 07/01/08, 9:16am)
MIKA BRZEZINSKI: John McCain's new strategy against Obama isn't attacking his rival's policy positions or even his patriotism. Rather, the GOP presumptive nominee has chosen to question Obama's trustworthiness.

JOHN MCCAIN: This election is about trust, and trusting people's word. And unfortunately, apparently on several items, Senator Obama's word cannot be trusted.

BRZEZINSKI: But John McCain is no stranger to the flip-flop himself, so which candidate is more trustworthy this election season? […]

BRAD BLAKEMAN: […] Barack Obama is beyond flip-flopping, it's what I call an abomination.

BRZEZINSKI: Uh, but John McCain has his share.

BLAKEMAN: Well, look, when you have a long record of service dating back to the 80s, and you're serving over a long period of time, your policies are going to evolve and you're going to have changes in policies. That's natural. […]

BRZEZINSKI: Brad, all fair, but I'm sure that David could list some from the near past as well that apply to John McCain. Offshore drilling, tax cuts.

DAVID GOODFRIEND: If you twist my arm, I will. Brad mentioned the campaign finance reform pledge, and you know, John McCain uses campaign finance reform the way a magician uses a magic wand. He'll just wave it and try to pull something different out of the hat each time. What he did, John McCain, was say I want to use public financing and he said that to a bank in order to get a loan, and then the chairman of the federal election commission said that would be a big no-no if you wanted to somehow turn away that funding, when John

This version of Total Mail Converter is not registered.

McCain wanted to do so. So under the law, John McCain was forced to stick with his initial declaration to use public financing. So, I guess only when the federal campaign finance law steps in and tells him he has to keep his word, then he keeps his word.

BLAKEMAN: […] John McCain is not going to go back on his word, he's sticking to public financing.

GOODFRIEND: The public financing is undermined, as you know Brad, by those secret 527s organizations that McCain says he so opposes that are now funding television expenditures on his behalf across the country.

[…]

GOODFRIEND: Well, look, let's go back to the original question. Who's more of a flip-flopper, who can you trust? I think both of these gentleman are fine public servants, and I think it's ridiculous for the McCain camp to somehow points its finger at Barack Obama and say he can't be trusted because he's changed. Brad calls it evolution when it's John McCain. Well, I got news for you, politicians change their positions, that's true. Both these guys have good character, Barack Obama's my pick, he's the guy that has the best judgment.

Highlight #2
Charlie Black and Joe Lieberman use the Bush Politics of Fear Tactic to Highlight McCain's Qualifications (CNN 07/01/08 07:58am)
ED HENRY: Republican John McCain insists that if elected he will not be a Bush clone, but some McCain allies seem to be ripping a page from the president's playbook. Raising the specter of a possible terror attack next year to sway voters against Democrat Barack Obama.

JOE LIEBERMAN: Remember that the truck bombing of the world trade center happened in the first year of the Clinton administration. 9/11 happened in the first year of the Bush administration. John McCain is ready to take the reins on January 20th, 2009, he doesn't need any training.

HENRY: Lieberman, the former democratic vice presidential candidate now an independent, is so close to McCain he is mentioned as a possible running mate. And his comments follow McCain adviser Charlie Black recently saying a terror attack between now and the election would help McCain. Black apologized. A Lieberman aide told CNN the senator was not playing the fear card but highlighting McCain's qualifications.

LIEBERMANN: We need a president ready to be commander and chief on day one. Senator Clinton said that over and over again. She was ready to be president on day one. Why? Because our enemies will test the new president early.

HENRY: asked about Lieberman's comments, white house spokeswoman Perino agreed there could be a terror attack next year.

DANA PERINO: I think Senator Lieberman, unfortunately, could be right. Only reason I say is that we know that there are people very dangerous trying to attack us every day. The president has been looking for Osama bin Laden since September 12th. That effort has never let up.

HENRY: The "the New York Times" said the Bush administration did let up. Officials charging the Iraq war diverted resources from the fight against Al Qaeda. The president's approach to Iran is also under fire with journalist . . . claiming the U.S. is stepping up covert operations inside Iran and edging closer to a possible attack.

DAVID GERGEN: At this point, with George W. Bush as unpopular as he is, to argue the case for continuity in foreign policy, it does not seem to be a big election winner.

HENRY: that's why McCain is walking a fine line. His allies are touting his traditional national security credentials when voters may be ready for a new approach.

McCain Campaign Counting on October Surprise, Using Politics of Fear (MSNBC, 07/01/08, 9:48am)

This version of Total Mail Converter is not registered.

MIKA BRZEZINSKI: Will there be an October surprise? A last minute event or campaign move that could change the tide of the November election. John McCain's chief strategist Charlie Black, drew fire for saying another attack on U.S. soil would be a big advantage for John McCain. And then on Sunday, McCain supporter Joe Lieberman argued that McCain would be best prepared in case of a 2009 terror attack.

[Lieberman Face the Nation Clip Shown]

BRZEZINSKI: [...] I Got to tell you, there is a little bit of the politics of fear going on between Charlie Black and Joe Lieberman and these comments. Not sure if it's going to work this time around, is that what's happening?

SUSAN PAGE: Well, I think it's true, undoubtedly true that John McCain's strongest card is his national security experience since that he's been around longer and dealt with more of these issues over time than Barack Obama has. [...] This is an issue that probably favors John McCain over Barack Obama. An economic issue would probably favor Barack Obama over John McCain of course. You can have October surprises that aren't national security issues though. [...]

BRZEZINSKI: Democrats are accusing republicans of fear mongering here, how do they play up John McCain's foreign policy and military credentials without seeming like they're engaging in fear tactics?

JON DECKER: It's a tough road to walk and I think that they're finding that out, they being the surrogates for John McCain. You saw, and you mentioned, what Senator Lieberman said and what Charlie Black said just a week ago, essentially the same thing. If the McCain campaign is depending on an October surprise to win the election, that's not a good campaign strategy. It may help them out in the long term but it's not a strategy to depend on. You need to, obviously, win on the issues that matter most to American voters. And just bringing up, as Senator Lieberman did, just to get back to that point that presidents are tested in the first year. It is a fact that those things did occur within the first year. [...]

Highlight #3
New Obama Ad Forcing McCain to Go On Defensive In Some States (MSNBC, 07/01/08, 9:04am)
CHUCK TODD: "[...] I think it's about making McCain a little bit nervous, seeing if he ends up forcing McCain to spend money in some of these other states. McCain has yet to spend money in Virginia, in North Carolina, Indiana, Montana. So let's see, I think the Obama people want to see, can they move the polls enough in some of these supposedly red states, that suddenly McCain is playing more defense than offense."

Highlight #4
Stephen Colbert's "Make McCain Exciting Challenge!" (Comedy Central, 06/30/08, 11:35pm)
STEPHEN COLBERT: [...] McCain isn't the best speaker. That his oratory style is like an Ambien smoothie with a Nyquil boost. But at least McCain knows that. That's why he gave a recent speech in front of a green screen. He was issuing a challenge, asking average Americans to use their imagination's to make him interesting. Well, I took up that challenge and posted the green screen footage of John McCain at Colbertnation.com and you, the heroes, responded to my "Make McCain Exciting Challenge!" [...]

--~--~---------~--~----~------------~-------~--~----~
You received this message because you are subscribed to the "big campaign" group.

To post to this group, send to bigcampaign@googlegroups.com

To unsubscribe, send email to bigcampaign-unsubscribe@googlegroups.com

E-mail ryan@campaigntodefendamerica.org with questions or concerns

This is a list of individuals. It is not affiliated with any group or organization.
-~----------~----~----~----~------~----~------~--~---

This version of Total Mail Converter is not registered.

This version of Total Mail Converter is not registered.

From: "Gregory Rosalsky" <grosalsky@progressivemediausa.org>
To: bigcampaign@googlegroups.com
Date: 6/6/2008 2:50:36 PM
Subject: [big campaign] Media Monitoring Report - Evening 06/06/08

Main Topics: McCain's New Ad, McCain and the Everglades, McSame

Summary of Shift: Obama and Clinton's 'secret meeting' and the future for Hillary consumed significant analysis this evening. Senator Diane Feinstein had a positive impression of the meeting, who hosted the event at her house. Clinton is expected to endorse Obama tomorrow. The Obama campaign is planning a 50 state strategy for the fall campaign. John McCain toured the everglades in Florida and released his first general election ad today. The cable networks continued to discuss the legacy of RFK, in the wake of his assassination anniversary yesterday.

Today was a bad day for the economy. The Dow dropped close to 400 points and unemployment numbers are up. There were riots in India in over gas prices.

Highlights:

1) McCain releases new general election ad
a. "CBS Evening News" plays ad, Couric says the it "portrays himself as a reluctant warrior"
b. On Fox News: New McCain ad tries to paint McCain as un-hawkish war hero
2) McCain toured the everglades in Florida, defended vote against protecting them
3) Paul Begala: Comically analyzes McCain's oratory skills, jokes McCain will bomb "all the I countries, we have already had war with Iraq, next will be Iran, Indonesia, Iceland, Italy, probably Indiana"
4) "Hardball Big Number": McCain voted with George Bush 95% of the time in 2007
5) McSame as Bush on wiretapping, on "Countdown"
6) McCain appropriates Obama's messaging and atheistic on campaign website
7) President Bush announces appointment of a new Housing Secretary and talks about our sluggish economy
8) Rachel Maddow says "John McCain had a tough week", mentions his Iran divestment proposal that Obama already proposed last year and embarrassingly he voted against
9) Lieberman discusses why as a Democrat he supports McCain on Fox News
10) Congressman Walker claims McCain is best at understanding economy
11) On Fox News, Israeli Minister Shaul Mofaz: "Sanctions are Ineffective, Attacking Iran to Hault Nuclear Plans Will Be Unavoidable" (no clip)

Clips:

Highlight #1
"CBS Evening News" Plays McCain's New Ad, Couric Says the "New Ad Portrayed Himself as a Reluctant Warrior" (CBS 06/06/06 6:30pm)
KATIE COURIC: The presidential candidates used the dismal economic news today to take jabs at each other [...] Barack Obama blamed the big jump in unemployment on the "the failed Bush economic policies that John McCain wants to continue for another four years." McCain said Obama favors high spending and high taxes that will only hurt the economy.

MCCAIN: Senator Obama seems to want to go back to the failed policies of the '60s and '70s.

COURIC: McCain campaigned in Florida, a key battleground state, toured the everglades. And he put out a new ad that portrayed himself as a reluctant warrior [...]

New McCain Ad Tries to Paint McCain as UnHawkish War Hero (FNC 06/06/08 1:29pm)
MARTHA MACCULLUM: Let's talk about John McCain for a moment and I want to get the rest of the panel's reaction to his new ad, as he looks at his own campaign, head to head against Barack Obama. Take a look.

[…Plays John McCain's new ad…]

MACCULLUM: Peter, what's your reaction to that?

PETER JOHNSON: Well, it's a superb ad. I think he's done similar ads before in the primaries. And what it's saying is that he's a leader. Although he has a distaste for war, he's certainly committed to keeping the country safe. And so that's going to be his calling card for this election. Are you going to value someone who has no experience in foreign policy on the democratic side, or are you going to value republican candidate who has 5 ½ years torture in a prison camp and is committed to keeping America safe. That will be the hallmark of his campaign.

This version of Total Mail Converter is not registered.

MACCULLUM: He's clearly trying to say I'm not a hawk. I'm a military man and I have a great deal of experience, but I'm not a hawk.

Highlight #2

McCain Toured the Everglades in Florida, Defended Vote Against Protecting Them (CNN 06/06/08 5:27)

WOLF BLITZER: An old vote coming back to haunt the presumptive Republican presidential nominee, John McCain, just as he is touring the battleground state of Florida. Florida could be decisive come November […]

SUSAN CANDIOTTI: […] In trying to prove that he is the greener of the two candidates Senator John McCain in fact made a visit to the Florida everglades and took an airboat ride to try and make that point.
[…]

CANDIOTTI: […] Senator McCain is under fire by Democrats for opposing a 23 billion dollar water resources development act that includes a 2 billion dollar everglades restoration project.

[Clip of McCain media availability]

JOHN MCCAIN: They don't get it, they don't get it that the American people are fed up, they are fed up with the waste of their dollars and the out of control spending that is going to come to a halt when I am a president of the United States

CANDIOTTI: McCain says the bill also contains pork barrel projects. Democrats countered that McCain doesn't get it. Saying the bill only authorized the everglades project it didn't include the funding for it. The presumptive GOP nominee also reported for FISA, the foreign intelligence surveillance act. Allowing wiretapping phone calls without court authorization to prevent terrorism. President Bush so far has been unable to win reauthorization from congress.
[…]

Highlight #3

Paul Begala: Comically Analyzes McCain's Oratory Skills, Jokes McCain Will Bomb "All the I countries, we have already had war with Iraq, next will be Iran, Indonesia, Iceland, Italy, probably Indiana" (CNN 06/06/08 5:34pm)

PAUL BEGALA: Barack Obama has that silver tongue and that golden voice and Senator McCain has lead. He is dreadful speaker frankly, reading off prepared text. He is pretty good in town hall meetings, he is excellent in the interviews. He is the king of Sunday morning. You know, he is great in those. I don't think that is particularly useful for a president actually. To be a good interviewer on Sunday mornings. But he is really bad, I don't mean to be insulting but he was, and he stood. President Bush is also a terrible speaker, but he

WOLF BLITZER: Didn't hurt him he got elected twice.

BEGALA: Well he got elected once. The Supreme Court stole it the first time and he won the second time. But the Bush team always had great advance they had guys like Alex who cared about the pictures. The governor of Texas and then President Bush looked great at all his events. Poor McCain Tuesday night he had the green monster out there from Fenway Park. You know it looked pathetic.

BLITZER: I think you will agree Alex, he needs some help

ALEX CASTELLANOS Senator McCain's great strength is he is real, and acting the part is not certainly his strength but at the end of the day it is not about the packaging it is about the package. The substance is there. Look, no denying that Barack Obama is a remarkable, remarkable presenter and inspiring and that I think is a great strength in this election. But also a great strength is security, somebody you can trust, somebody solid. And McCain's strength is that.

BLITZER: I don't think there is any doubt, there is no doubt in my mind that maybe since Ronald Regan no American politician has been able to read teleprompter, a speech, and make it look so natural that the viewers out there have no idea he is actually reading his speech.

CASTELLANOS: He is the guy who can stand on top of the mountaintop and say we are going to go over here. And he lifts people that way. I think Republicans; we do ourselves a disservice when we say that that is unimportant. It's a big part of the job. But also a big part of the job is reassuring people that you can keep the country safe, that you're solid, you're reliable.

This version of Total Mail Converter is not registered.

If this is about the future, Obama has got an advantage.

BEGALA: This is exactly the case George W Bush made. This is why John McCain is a third term of Bush. He is essentially saying, I know I can't inspire you I know I have no vision but I'll bomb a whole bunch of countries. Well we tried that, we have seen that movie, it didn't work out very well. I think people are very hungry for the sort of leadership that Barack Obama is offering.

CASTELLANOS: Where, I missed that, he is going to bomb a whole bunch of countries

BEGALA: All the I countries, we have already had war with Iraq, next will be Iran, Indonesia, Iceland, Italy, probably Indiana, I'm joking, I'm joking CASTELLANOS: Republicans have even kept democrats like you safe for six years.

Highlight #4

"Hardball Big Number": McCain voted with George Bush 95% of the time in 2007

CHRIS MATTHEWS: So how are the Democrats gonna run against John McCain this Fall? By seizing on things like his 100 years statement about the Iraq war and by nailing his candidacy as George Bush's third term. McCain has made a point of touting of course his Maverick credentials, his actual Senate record may indicate otherwise. According to Congressional Quarterly voting tally from last year, what percentage of the time did John McCain cast votes in support of Bush's policies? 95. John McCain voted with Bush 95% of the time, last year at least. A statistic that could haunt him right up to election day. That is tonight's big number.

Highlight #5

McSame as Bush on Wiretapping (MSNBC 06/06/08 8:30pm)

KEITH OLBERMANN: As with so many positions that Senator McCain hues closely and often precisely with the Bush Administration, the Senator has tried to finesse the issue of warrentless wiretaps [...] The McCain camp now clearly saying the Senator believes what the current president believes, that the president of the United States may claim authority to wiretap Americans even where that might directly contravene federal statute. In other words, the president may break the law using amorphous constitutional power as an excuse. The top adviser to Senator McCain set the record straight. In a letter by the Conservative National Review this week, Douglas Holtz-Eaken wrote that McCain believes the constitution gave President Bush the power to order the national security agency to monitor America's international phone calls and emails without a warrent [...] Do you see any daylight between President Bush's position on this and Senator McCain's?

JOHN DEAN: No daylight whatsoever [...]

Highlight #6

McCain Appropriates Obama's Messaging and Atheistic on Campaign Website

CHRIS MATTHEWS: By now, we've all gotten familiar with Obama's campaign slogan, it's 'Change we can believe in.' Well apparently that message is so popular, even John McCain is a fan, check out the first page of McCain's new website, 'A leader we can believe in.' John McCain and his people may have seen the success Obama's had with his strong claim of authenticity, McCain too wants to be someone we can believe in.

Highlight #7

President Bush Announces Appointment of a New Housing Secretary and Talks About the Economy (FNC 06/06/08 1:45pm)

THE PRESIDENT: Welcome. Thank you. It's -- so glad to be here at the Department of Housing and Urban Development. And I've come to introduce you to your new boss -- Secretary Steve Preston. I want to thank Steve's wife, Molly, five children -- (applause) -- and his mom and dad, Lee and Ursula.

Mr. Secretary, thanks for coming -- Secretary Kempthorne. And Director John Walters. It's good to see two of your predecessors here, Steve -- Alphonso Jackson and Jack Kemp. Thank you all for coming. (Applause.)

This is a time of turbulence in the housing market and slow growth for our overall economy. This morning, the Labor Department reported that our economy lost 49,000 jobs in May, and the unemployment rate rose to 5.5 percent. This rise was caused, in part, by a surge of new young entrants into the job market. But it's clearly a sign that is consistent with slow economic growth.

This version of Total Mail Converter is not registered.

To help keep this economy growing, we did pass an economic stimulus package that provides tax rebates for American families and incentives for businesses to invest in new equipment. We're beginning to see the signs that the stimulus may be working. And now the Congress needs to take the next steps. At a time when Americans are concerned about higher gas prices, Congress needs to pass legislation that expands -- that will allow for the expansion of American energy production.

In this period of economic uncertainty, the last thing Americans need is a massive tax increase -- so Congress needs to send a clear message that the tax relief that we passed will be made permanent. (Applause.)

Unfortunately, these policies are being blocked by the Democratic Congress. So I call on congressional leaders to put partisanship aside, and work with me to enact these important initiatives for the American people.

This department is also critical to meeting the challenges we face in our economy. We need strong leadership in the Secretary's office. Steve Preston is the right man for the job. He's a financial expert who understands how the housing market impacts our broader economy. He's a skilled manager. He's a person of character and integrity.

Secretary Preston will work to strengthen home ownership with the same dedication he brought to his previous job of strengthening American small business community. As the head of the SBA, Steve presided over loan guarantee programs that are similar in structure to those run by the Federal Housing Administration. And just as entrepreneurs across our nation found a trusted friend in Steve Preston, so will America's homeowners.

Before coming to the SBA, Steve gained valuable financial and leadership experience in the private sector. His impressive career has taken him from investment banking to senior financial posts at major corporations. Wherever he's gone, Steve has earned the admiration of his colleagues. He takes on this new challenge with my full confidence and my trust.

Steve takes over for a good man, my longtime buddy, Secretary Alphonso Jackson. (Applause.) I thank you for your compassion and your hard work. You helped change a lot of lives. And I wish you and Marcia all the very best. See you back in Texas. (Laughter.)

I also want to thank Deputy Secretary Roy Bernardi for his service. He filled in as the Acting Secretary during this transition. He spent nearly seven years of his life here at this department. And I appreciate your hard work on behalf of all Americans. (Applause.)

As Steve takes office, his first priority will [be] to help lead my administration's response to the challenges in the housing market. We've taken aggressive action to help responsible homeowners to keep their homes by giving the FHA greater flexibility to offer refinancing options. We're also helping to bring together what's now called the HOPE NOW Alliance. By working together, participants in the mortgage industry have helped more than one and a half million families stay in their homes. HOPE NOW is working. But we've got more to do.

Yesterday, we learned that the foreclosure rates continued to rise in the first quarter. So Steve will work with Democrats and Republicans in Congress to address this challenge. We need to pass legislation to reform Fannie Mae and Freddie Mac. We need to pass legislation to modernize the Federal Housing Administration, and allow state housing agencies to issue tax-free bonds to help homeowners refinance their mortgages. By taking these steps we'll help more responsible homeowners weather this rough patch -- and, at the same time, strengthen the dream of homeownership for generations to come.

I've got confidence that we're going to meet these challenges, and I've got confidence in the people who work in this department. I appreciate what you do every day to expand the dream of home ownership. I thank you for your efforts to provide low-income Americans with access to affordable housing. You work hard to make our communities more vibrant and hopeful. The United States is fortunate to have such devoted public servants at this department. I'm grateful for your service.

You're going to have a worthy leader in Steve Preston. I thank the Senate for confirming Steve as your new Secretary. And now I ask the Senate to confirm the three remaining HUD nominees to help him lead this department.

Steve, I appreciate your stepping forward to serve your country once again. I congratulate you. Now I ask my Chief of Staff, Josh Bolten, to administer the oath of office.

(The oath of office is administered.) (Applause.)

This version of Total Mail Converter is not registered.

SECRETARY PRESTON: Great. Thank you very much. Mr. President, Chief of Staff Bolten, Molly, my children, my parents. Current and former members of the Cabinet, thank you for coming. My new partners at HUD, my friends -- (applause) -- and the many other distinguished guests here. Thank you for being here today. This is truly very humbling to see you all here to celebrate this event.

It is a profound privilege to serve our country as the Secretary for Housing and Urban Development, and to be a voice for the people that we serve. Thank you, Mr. President, for that confidence, for that trust. I also want to thank Senators Dodd and Shelby for their role in expediting the nomination process.

Ladies and gentlemen, it's appropriate that we gather here in this building. It's named for Robert C. Weaver, who was the first Secretary for HUD. And Dr. Weaver cautioned against treating people like statistics or data. In fact, he asked instead that we look behind the data to see the values and the concerns and the hopes and the lives of the people that we all serve.

We assist the homeless find shelter here at HUD. We help provide millions of Americans with affordable and public housing. Families who want to buy a home often turn to us. And increasingly, those we -- who are currently in homes come to us to keep them.

We know that home ownership can be a source of pride. It can be a place to grow up and grow old together. It can be a source for wealth creation. And it is a source of -- it is a stake in our communities. And also at HUD, we have a role of building and rebuilding many of those communities.

At the moment, there are difficulties in the housing market, and this is a decisive moment in our nation's economic history. HUD will be central to restoring stability in our markets and in the lives of many Americans. In fact, just in the last year, thanks to changes made by you, Mr. President, FHA is increasingly a pathway for hundreds of thousands of families to a more affordable, secure mortgage. And thank you. (Applause.)

And while we're all committed to addressing the immediate challenges in the housing market, we must also show the same kind of commitment to our future. We must provide a longer-term foundation for reform in the institutions that give homeowners access to capital to make that American Dream possible, while also generating enduring confidence in our financial markets.

As we confront these challenges, we're blessed with talented and committed employees at HUD. You understand that we can make a difference. In the next few months, we will need the best efforts of every one of you in the path ahead.

So, Mr. President, I look forward to working with you. I look forward to working with my partners in the administration. I'm committed to collaborating in a bipartisan fashion with members of Congress on the path ahead. So, ladies and gentlemen, let's roll up our sleeves, let's lock our arms. We have a lot of work to do we can do together as a team. So thank you very much. (Applause.)

Highlight #8

Rachel Maddow Says "John McCain Had a Tough Week", Mentions his Iran Divestment Proposal That Obama Already Proposed Last Year and Embarrassingly He Voted Against (MSNBC 06/06/08 6:30pm)

RACHEL MADDOW: I think that John McCain had a tough week. He had some unforced errors, that is my headline tonight. He's making these errors, not because he's taken any big hits from the Democrats, he's doing it to himself. On Monday proposed a divestment campaign on Iran. His campaign seemed caught off guard by the revelation that Obama proposed that idea last year without McCain supporting it. On Tuesday, McCain's green backdrop speech in Lousiana was about as well received as a Derek Jeeter Jersey in downtown Boston. On that same trip McCain was also apparently caught off guard by questions about his own record on investigating Hurricane Katrina. Then it was off to the Everglades where McCain had to spend his time defending his votes against protecting the everglades, instead of what he wanted to do which was to promote his environmental credentials. I think it's been a week of unforced errors for the McCain campaign. And I think it's making people wonder whether or not he didn't take advantage of the three month head-start he got in this General Election by sort of working the kinks out of his campaign [...]

Highlight #9

Lieberman Discusses Why As a Democrat He Supports McCain on Fox News (Fox News Live, 06/06/08 12:41pm)

JOE LIEBERMAN: There are two main reasons why last December I decided to cross party lines and support the Republican candidate John McCain. Overall, because I think he's the best prepared, over anyone who ran this year to be the president we need. One, he's ready to be commander and chief. Not just to lead our effort in Iraq and Afghanistan but to protect us around the world from the terrorists who attacked us on 9/11. But I've traveled around the world with John McCain over the last 20 years and he is well regarded and trusted by leaders all over the world and he knows the world. Secondly, the biggest problem our government has in it today, is us. It's partisanship, it's tribalism that divides us. Senator McCain has been unique in this place for just reaching across party lines, working with people he may not agree with on nine other issues, but the one he agrees with to move on, why because he wants to get something done for our country and that's the kind of person we need as president. So I'm proud to be a supporter and I'm going to help him all I can because I think he's best for America.

This version of Total Mail Converter is not registered.

Highlight #10

Congressman Walker Claims McCain is Best at Understanding Economy (Fox News 06/06/08 11:27am)

JON SCOTT: What do you see transpiring in a John McCain administration, should he win?

BOB WALKER: John McCain understands that you have to strengthen the weakest parts of your economy and you have to use the strong parts of your economy to your advantage. John McCain recognizes that a tax increase at this time would not be the right policy, and Barack Obama, across the board, is talking about a tax increase. John McCain wants to actually lower taxes, in particular make smaller businesses more productive. Secondly, John McCain recognizes that the strongest part of our economy is in our exports at the present time. He will expand the ability to sell American products overseas by expanding our free trade agreements. None like Barack Obama, who actually wants to back out of our trade agreements that we now have.

SCOTT: Should we listen to either one of these guys?

KELLY BINGEL: With all due respect to the congressman, I do have to say, Barack Obama is not talking about tax increases across the board. He's talking about a tax decrease of a thousand dollars for middle class families. And he's not talking about renegotiating all our trade agreements, he's talking about fair and free trade and looking at some of the environmental and labor agreements. That's what he's talking about, he's not talking about renegotiation all our trade agreements.

WALKER: He is talking about a unilateral renegotiation of the NAFTA agreement. Our biggest trading partners at the present time are Canada and Mexico. We are a huge beneficiary of that agreement. By putting that agreement into jeopardy, he is in fact causing some of the problems that are now on Wall Street, because they have a great deal of concern about that. As for tax increases, his tax increase will go directly to small business. Small business owners are people who use the individual income taxes to pay the taxes on their business. The tax increase that he is proposing will have a devastating effect on small business.

SCOTT: Let me ask you this, Kelly, on the day that Barack Obama wrapped up the nomination, when he locked it up, the DOW pushed lower. I that a coincidence?

BINGEL: No, I mean, yes it is a coincidence. It has nothing to do with Senator Obama, it has to do with the price per barrel of oil which continues to go up. That's what it has to do with, it has nothing to do with Senator Obama. And I think that most Americans recognize that what we need is change for our economy, and Senator McCain will give us four more years of this Bush administration. There's nothing different from President Bush's economic plans than from Senator McCain's economic plan. And Americans' don't want four more years of a Bush White House.

WALKER: Those are slogans that have absolutely nothing to do with securing the ills of the economy. You need to have somebody who understands the economy like John McCain.

--
Gregory E. Rosalsky
Progressive Media USA
202-609-7691 (office)
707-484-3796 (cell)
GRosalsky@progressivemediausa.org
--~--~---------~--~----~------------~-------~--~----~

You received this message because you are subscribed to the "big campaign" group.

To post to this group, send to bigcampaign@googlegroups.com

To unsubscribe, send email to bigcampaign-unsubscribe@googlegroups.com

E-mail ryan@campaigntodefendamerica.org with questions or concerns

This version of Total Mail Converter is not registered.

This is a list of individuals. It is not affiliated with any group or organization.
-~----------~----~----~----~------~----~------~--~---

This version of Total Mail Converter is not registered.

From: "John Podesta" <john.podesta@gmail.com>
To: "Dan Schwerin" <dschwerin@hrcoffice.com>
Date: 9/3/2014 5:28:40 PM
Subject: Re: HRC @ Clean Energy Summit

I think this is great. One small addition. In the Paris graph, I think a reference to Obama's Climate Action Plan and particularly the power plant rule has changed the international dynamic and made the US credible and a global leader that make the chances of success much greater.

That's an easy place to be generous to him without taking on any baggage.

On Sep 3, 2014 3:31 PM, "Dan Schwerin" <dschwerin@hrcoffice.com > wrote:

John, I hope I've caught you in time. Below and attached is our draft for Nevada. Would love your feedback.
Thanks!
Dan

HILLARY RODHAM CLINTON

REMARKS AT NATIONAL CLEAN ENERGY SUMMIT

LAS VEGAS, NV

THURSDAY, SEPTEMBER 4, 2014

Thank you, Harry, for that generous introduction and for leading the way here in Nevada and for our country toward a clean energy future.

I also want to thank the Center for American Progress, the Clean Energy Project, MGM Resorts International, and the University of Nevada, Las Vegas for making this event possible. I'm particularly pleased to see so many business leaders here today. This kind of all-hands-on-deck partnership – from government, business, academia, and the not-for-profit sector – is exactly what it's going to take to make real progress on our energy and climate challenges.

And, as Harry and others have explained so well here, this is one of the most sweeping, urgent, and consequential challenges we face as a nation and a world.

The data is unforgiving, no matter what the deniers say. Sea levels are rising. Ice caps are melting. Storms, droughts and wildfires are wreaking havoc. Thirteen of the top fourteen warmest years have all come since 2000.

This July, scientists found levels of carbon dioxide in our atmosphere not seen in millions of years.

The threat is real.

This version of Total Mail Converter is not registered.

But so is the opportunity.

If we come together to make the hard choices -- and make smart investments in infrastructure, technology and environmental protection, America can be the clean energy superpower for the 21st century.

Just look at what's happening in Nevada, thanks in large part to the leadership of Harry Reid.

This state has quintupled its renewable energy capacity since 2008. In the past four years, more than $5.5 billion have been invested here in clean energy production and infrastructure.

Harry helped bring together a broad coalition, including major casino companies, local tribal leaders, and environmental groups, to replace one of the nation's dirtiest coal plant with five utility-scale solar projects now under construction.

Nevada is now one of the leaders in the nation in solar energy capacity per person.

The state has more geothermal projects under development than any other.

The "One-Nevada Transmission Line" has created new markets for renewable energy and hundreds of jobs.

And on average, clean energy jobs in Nevada pay higher wages -- thousands of dollars a year higher. That means more Nevada families making it into the middle class and more families staying in the middle class.

This is the promise of a clean energy future. A future where we move past the old false choice between protecting our environment and growing our economy and instead do both.

Again, Senator Reid has led the way. In the Senate, he has worked with Democrats and Republicans alike and championed legislation such as the Energy Independence and Security Act, which led to new fuel economy standards for vehicles for the first time in 30 years.

This version of Total Mail Converter is not registered.

He provided crucial support for President Obama's efforts to cut carbon pollution from power plants, which will spur billions of dollars in private clean energy investment, improve air quality and respiratory health, and make a measurable dent in harmful emissions.

And Harry understands we need to do even more. Because while we can all be proud that domestic electricity generation from wind, solar, and geothermal more than doubled between 2009 and 2013, we still have a long way to go.

China and other competitors are already racing ahead with big bets on renewables. We cannot afford to cede leadership in this area. Our economic recovery, our efforts against climate change, and our strategic position in the world all will improve if we can build a safe bridge to a clean energy economy.

Part of that bridge will certainly come from natural gas. There are challenges here, to be sure, but the boom in domestic gas production is an exciting example of American innovation changing the game. If we do this right, it can be good for both our environment and our economy.

Gas is cleaner than coal… expanding production is creating tens of thousands of new jobs... and lower costs are helping give the United States a big competitive advantage in energy-intensive industries. We're also reducing our dependence on foreign oil and freeing up supplies elsewhere to help our European allies lessen their dependence on Russian energy.

To capitalize on this boom, we have to face head on the legitimate environmental concerns about some new extraction practices and their impact on local water, soil, and air supplies. Methane leaks in the production and transportation of natural gas are particularly worrisome. So it's crucial that we put in place smart regulations and enforce them, including not drilling when the risks are too high.

And to make sure natural gas really is an effective bridge fuel, we need to keep moving forward on renewables and a clean energy future.

Today tax incentives for alternative energy investments are unpredictable at best, while generous subsidies for fossil fuel are easy to come by. In fact, the world spends more than $500 billion dollars subsidizing fossil fuel every year, bloating budgets and creating incentives against innovation and progress. We can do better.

This version of Total Mail Converter is not registered.

We can create a positive environment for private-sector innovation and risk-taking, with targeted tax incentives, a commitment to research and development, and policies that encourage rather than undercut the transition to clean, renewable sources of energy.

We can invest in the infrastructure of the future, including next-generation power plants to produce electricity more cleanly, smarter grids to deliver it more effectively, and greener buildings to use it more efficiently.

At this point, we know a lot about what actually works.

Take the Clinton Climate Initiative, which my husband started some years ago through our Foundation. We're working with private and public sector partners to reduce carbon emissions, improve energy efficiency, and spur investments in green construction, including through some innovative new financing tools.

Our Home Energy Affordable Loan program works a little like a 401k or Health Savings Account, saving families as much as $500 a year in utility expenses. And the return on investment is up to about 23 percent.

When we helped retrofit the Empire State Building, with 2.8 million square feet of office space, 275 jobs were created over two years and the building's annual energy consumption dropped by 38 percent, worth roughly $4.4 million a year.

And that's just the beginning of what's possible. Good ideas are everywhere you look.

Jessica Matthews and Julia Silverman, two students at Harvard, created a soccer ball that harnesses kinetic energy with every kick and can power a lamp for three hours from just 30 minutes of play. They brought it to the Clinton Global Initiative and blew everyone away. The ball is now being used in six countries where soccer is universal but electricity is not.

If two college students can figure out a way to light up entire communities, imagine what we can do as a country if we roll up our sleeves and get to work?

This version of Total Mail Converter is not registered.

Rumor has it that Apple will soon unveil their iPhone 6. When they do, millions of Americans will rush to get their hands on this latest prize of 21st century technology. Yet, when they plug their shiny new devices into the wall, they'll be relying on an electrical grid that was built in the 1950s and still uses technology from the '60s and '70s.

We can do better.

With a true 21st century smart grid, we could time our dishwashers or air conditioners to turn on when demand for power is less and costs are lower. We could manage stresses on the grid, cutting peak demand to avoid blackouts – which research shows occur about 285 percent more often today than in 1984 and cost our businesses billions of dollars a year.

If the public and private sectors put aside politics and come together to get this done, we could do it before the iPhone 7 comes out.

All of this work at home is crucial to what we want to achieve abroad. Because America's ability to lead the world on climate and energy hinges on our commitment to act ourselves. No country will fall in line just because we tell them to. They need to see us taking significant steps of our own.

I know first-hand how hard it is to mobilize progress on a global scale. But there's no way to tackle this challenge without it.

When President Obama and I went to Copenhagen in 2009 for a global climate change conference, we ran into a brick wall of opposition from countries like China, which has become the world's largest carbon emitter but resists any kind of agreement that would obligate them to do something about it.

We had to literally crash a secret meeting between the Chinese, Indians, Brazilians and South Africans to force the issue. I'll never forget watching the President gliding by flustered Chinese security guards and the look on their faces when we finally sat down at the table.

But our persistence paid off. Thanks to the agreement we hammered out there, for the first time all major economies, developed and developing alike, agreed to make national commitments to curb carbon emissions through 2020 and report transparently on their mitigation efforts. That was just a start, but it provided a foundation to build on.

This version of Total Mail Converter is not registered.

Next year world leaders will return to the negotiating table in Paris with the hope of achieving an even stronger agreement applicable to all.

It will be another opportunity for American leadership. A chance to show the world that we're serious about meeting this challenge. That we can still do big things in this country.

So going forward, we all need to step up. Not just our government, but our private sector, our civil society, our research institutions and universities, our families and communities — all of us.

I know we can do better. When we work together, our capacity for progress is nearly limitless.

Let's make America the clean energy superpower our world needs.

Let's leave our children – and, yes, our grandchildren – a healthy and sustainable future.

Let's get to work.

Thank you.

###

This version of Total Mail Converter is not registered.

This version of Total Mail Converter is not registered.

From: "The Cuba Central Team" <sarah@democracyinamericas.org>
To: john.podesta@gmail.com
Date: 7/18/2014 10:48:53 AM
Subject: A Single Standard of Justice

Having trouble viewing this message? Click Here

July 18, 2014

Dear Friends:

In the news summary that follows, you will find reports about a new investigation into the USAID Cuban Twitter scandal, the growing impact of the increasingly tight enforcement of U.S. sanctions against Cuba and other nations on banks and global commerce, and the resumption of peace talks in Havana between Colombia and the FARC.

But first, we wanted to acknowledge what is unfolding in and near "a large wheat field dotted with purple flowers and Queen Anne's lace," in the lyrical prose of Sabrina Tavernise, a reporter for the New York Times. This is where wreckage from Malaysia Flight 17 and the remains of some of its 298 crewmember and passengers came to rest in Eastern Ukraine after it was shot down a little more than a day ago.

The victims included 80 children, three of whom were infants, a number of AIDS researchers and activists, the spokesman for the World Health Organization, and a graduate student from Indiana University, who was a chemist and a member of the IU rowing team.

The circumstances surrounding the shoot-down of this airliner are reminiscent of an earlier tragedy during the Cold War, when a Korean Airlines Flight was shot down in 1983 by Soviet fighter pilots. That resulted in the loss of 269 people, including a Member of the U.S. Congress.

Today, our memories were also stirred by a catastrophe that took place on October 6, 1976; not half a world away, but here in the Americas. Then, like now, the victims, 48 passengers and 25 crew members, were civilians; many were also young, including all 24 members of the Cuban Fencing Team, five Guyanese medical students, the wife of a diplomat and others.

Their Cubana de Aviacion Flight 455 had just taken off from Barbados when at least one bomb exploded and knocked the plane out of the sky. This was, as Peter Kornbluh of the National Security Archives has often said, the first mid-air bombing of a civilian airliner in the Western Hemisphere. All aboard - 57 Cubans, 11 Guyanese, and five North Koreans - were lost.

As we prepared this publication, the UN Security Council issued a statement calling for a "full, thorough and independent investigation" of the Malaysian airliner tragedy. Leaders from around the world called for an investigation and for accountability.

In the 38 years since the bombing of Flight 455, there has been no accountability for the loss of life; the families of the victims are not even mentioned in the news coverage of Malaysian Flight 17, as broadcast and print journalists recall similar incidents in the past.

Yet, Luis Posada Carriles, one of the two masterminds behind the bombing of the Air

This version of Total Mail Converter is not registered.

Cubana flight, continues to live and walk free in Miami, despite outstanding extradition requests from Cuba and Venezuela, which have yet to receive the response they merit from the U.S. government.

In some quarters, it will doubtless be controversial for us to remember that justice has still not been served in the case of Flight 455.

But our interest is in reforming Cuba policy to help the United States get past the double-standards that were deemed acceptable during the Cold War, but which are injurious to the national interest today, and adopt a single standard of justice in cases like this, now and into the future. The dignity of the victims in these cases demands nothing less.

This week in Cuba news...

Contents

U.S.-CUBA RELATIONS
- USAID Inspector General is investigating the U.S. "Cuban Twitter" program
- Foreign banks cautious after U.S. fine on French bank
- 5 Cubans play in MLB All Star game
- Man who hijacked flight to Cuba in 1984 gets 20-year U.S. sentence

CUBA'S FOREIGN RELATIONS
- Putin denies reports that Russia will reopen Lourdes spy station in Cuba
- Putin travels to Cuba; Russia and Cuba sign cooperation agreements
- Cuba takes part in CELAC meeting after BRICS summit
- Colombia's government and the FARC resume peace talks in Cuba
- Director General of World Health Organization visits Cuba

IN CUBA
- Cuba detains Ladies in White
- Ministry of Interior Commerce loosens restrictions on lodging houses for Cubans

Recommended Reading
- Life on the ground in Cuba , Katrina vanden Heuvel, The Nation
- Putin in Havana, America at the Movies , Sarah Stephens, Huffington Post
- Clash intensifies over travel to Cuba , William Gibson, Sun Sentinel
- President Obama could use a win , Richard Feinberg, The Hill
- Guantánamo Bay a thorn in Cuba's side , Sarah Rainsford, BBC News
- Why Cubans Are Defecting From the Republican Party , John A. Tures, Huffington Post
- All-Star Game: Tony Oliva relishes role of mentor to young Cuban stars , Mike Berardino, TwinCities.com

Recommended Listening
- Artists Try To Fuse Cultural Differences Between Miami And Cuba , David Greene, NPR

U.S.-CUBA RELATIONS

USAID Inspector General is investigating the U.S. "Cuban Twitter" program

USAID's Inspector General, charged with auditing the agency's activities, is conducting an investigation into its ZunZuneo "Cuban Twitter" program, reports the Associated Press .

ZunZuneo, created by USAID and funded under Helms-Burton, was a 'Twitter-like' text message service which, unbeknownst to its Cuban users, gathered their personal information and ranked their political leanings, on the way toward sending messages with political content to the users. The goal of ZunZuneo, launched after the detention of USAID subcontractor Alan Gross, was to enable political dissidents to organize "smart mobs" and incite public opposition to the government. The Obama Administration has described the project as "discreet" rather than covert. ZunZuneo acquired information on more than 68,000 Cubans before the program ran out of money and was discontinued without notice to its subscriber base in Cuba.

This version of Total Mail Converter is not registered.

The Inspector General confirmed to the AP that it is investigating whether the ZunZuneo program was subject to appropriate oversight and will publish the investigation's findings.

For Cuba Central's past coverage of the ZunZuneo scandal, see here , here , and here .

Foreign banks cautious after U.S. fine on French bank

Foreign banks are pulling back from doing business with commercial customers that have ties with countries subject to U.S. sanctions. As Bloomberg reported , the imposition of new sanctions against Russia, immediately following a record fine imposed on BNP Paribas, is causing banks to be "hyper-vigilant to the breadth of U.S. sanctions in making sure that no U.S. citizens are in any way connected to these transactions," said Michael O'Kane, a London-based lawyer at Peters & Peters LLP. "Recent events have shown there's a lot to lose."

As Reuters reports, "[M]ajor lenders in Europe and Asia are reacting to the steady flow of punishments from the United States by doing ever more to comply with U.S. laws and by cutting business ties in countries Washington dislikes rather than risk its wrath and, in the worst scenario, risk exclusion from the dollar system."

Bundesbank, the central bank of Germany, is one of the foreign institutions worried about fines that the U.S. could impose, particularly as the U.S. is currently investigating two other banks in Germany, Commerzbank and Deutsche Bank, for trading with Iran, Reuters reports.

Granma , the Cuban state newspaper, reports that Ulrich Grillo, the president of the Federation of German Industry, accused Washington of having "suffocated" German and French banks with unjustified fines.

These developments should provide additional fodder for complaints by countries against the extra-territorial reach of U.S. sanctions which emerge annually during the debate in the UN General Assembly on Cuba's resolution against the embargo.

5 Cubans play in MLB All Star game

Five Cuban baseball players participated in the MLB All Star game on Tuesday, which is the highest number in 40 years, the Wall Street Journal reports. Outfielder Yasiel Puig, of the Los Angeles Dodgers, first baseman José Abreu and shortstop Alexei Ramírez, both of the Chicago White Sox, pitcher Arnoldis Chapman, of the Cincinnati Reds, and outfielder Yoenis Cespedes of the Oakland A's, were all selected to play in the game.

The Associated Press reports that Cespedes, who repeated as winner of the Home Run Derby on Monday, said, "The Cuban league is below the major leagues levels, but the Cuban players have shown that we are capable to shine here." Puig said, "This is the sort of stuff all Cuban players dream since they were kids, being here at an All-Star game, playing at a World Series. ... We are five this year, and I hope we can add some more next year."

In recent years, the number of Cuban players coming to the MLB has increased steadily. Since 2010, 22 Cubans have started playing in the MLB, which is twice the number that arrived between 2005 and 2009. Cuban players are the third-largest group of foreign-born MLB players, behind players from the Dominican Republic and Venezuela.

Man who hijacked flight to Cuba in 1984 gets 20-year U.S. sentence

William Potts, a former Black Panther who hijacked a flight from New York to Miami and forced it to land in Cuba in 1984, was sentenced to 20 years in prison on Thursday, reports the Associated Press . He served a thirteen-year sentence in Cuba and lived on the island for sixteen years after his release, but decided to return to the U.S.

This version of Total Mail Converter is not registered.

in November 2013 in the hopes of being with his daughters, who live in the U.S., reports the Miami Herald .

Potts will be eligible for parole after serving seven years in the U.S., in recognition of the thirteen years he already served in Cuba. Even though most federal prisoners are not able to qualify for parole, Potts does because he committed his crime so many years ago. Potts pleaded guilty to kidnapping rather than the original charge of air piracy, for which he would have had to serve a minimum of 20 years in jail.

The Miami Herald reports that Potts was remorseful in court, saying, "If you just give me a chance, judge, I'll do you proud. ... I'm begging you, please, let me go back to my children."

CUBA'S FOREIGN RELATIONS

Putin denies reports that Russia will reopen Lourdes spy station in Cuba

Following his departure from Cuba, President Vladimir Putin denied published reports that Russia had reached an agreement with Cuba's government to reopen a Soviet-era base on the island that it used to monitor signals intelligence from the United States.

Active until 2001, the base was a Russian spy station that gathered signals intelligence from the U.S. during the Cold War. Putin ordered the station closed in 2001 to cut costs and to satisfy U.S. requests, and it has remained closed since, reports RT .

According to a transcript released of his press conference on Thursday, Putin was definitive about the decision in response to a reporter:

> REMARK: Thank you. Too bad about Lourdes, though.
>
> VLADIMIR PUTIN: No, it is not too bad. We are capable of resolving our defence issues without this component. We shut down this centre on agreement with our Cuban friends, and we have no plans to resume its activities.

Russian state news agency RIA Novosti reported that Russia had been in talks with Cuba about reopening the station in Lourdes for some years, but that these talks accelerated at the beginning of 2014. According to Reuters , this alleged acceleration may have been a reaction to the crisis in Ukraine and subsequent U.S. and EU sanctions on Russia.

When the suggestion that Russia would open the Lourdes facilities was initially reported, Rep. Ileana Ros-Lehtinen (FL-27) issued a statement saying, "If true, reports of a re-opening of the Lourdes spying facility in Cuba are yet another indication of Vladimir Putin's desire to deepen ties with a state sponsor of terrorism like Cuba and poses a national security threat to the Homeland."

On the same day, a spokesperson for the U.S. State Department offered a more guarded reaction:

> QUESTION: Do you have any thoughts on Russian plans to reopen its electronic surveillance base in Cuba?
>
> MS. PSAKI: Sure. Well, given, Scott, there hasn't been any formal announcement for - from the Russian or the Cuban Governments, I have very little to say. I'd of course - and would, naturally, have nothing to add on alleged Russian intelligence facilities. So if there's more public statements made, perhaps we'll have more to say.

Putin travels to Cuba; Russia and Cuba sign cooperation agreements

This version of Total Mail Converter is not registered.

As we reported last week , Russia's President Vladimir Putin traveled to Cuba on July 11. There, he met with Raúl and Fidel Castro and signed ten agreements and memoranda of mutual understanding (MOUs) with Cuba, reports the Associated Press . The agreements covered areas including cultural exchange, cooperation in the industrial and health sectors, and space demilitarization. The two countries announced plans to develop a joint rescue worker and firefighter training center in Cuba, and to collaborate in the hydroelectric field, reports Granma .

The countries also signed an oil-drilling accord which will allow Russian companies to drill in the oil fields at Boca de Jaruco, Cubadebate reports. This follows an agreement signed in May , which allows Russian oil companies Rosneft and Zarubezhneft to drill in Cuban waters.

Another agreement provided for collaboration in the construction of four generators at Mariel Port, which would provide energy for the industrial zone of Mariel as part of an "ambitious program of diversification and modernization of the energy system" planned for completion in 2030, reports AFP . Russian company Inter Rao and the Cuban Electric Union signed the contract, reports RT . The project requires $10 billion in foreign funding, of which Putin promised a Russian investment of $1.6 billion.

For more on the recent strengthening of ties between Russia and Cuba, see last week's Cuba Central .

Cuba takes part in CELAC meeting after BRICS summit

Leaders of the Community of Latin American and Caribbean States (CELAC) as well as other Latin American officials met with China's President Xi Jinping and Brazil's President Dilma Rousseff on Thursday, July 17, following the BRICS Summit that took place over the previous three days, reports Cuban state news agency Cubadebate . CELAC was represented by its Quartet of Chancellors, the heads of state of Costa Rica, Cuba, Ecuador, and Antigua and Barbuda. Raúl Castro traveled to Brazil to represent Cuba. Venezuelan President Nicolás Maduro and Chilean President Michele Bachelet also attended.

At the meeting, Jinping offered $20 billion to fund infrastructure projects in Latin America, as well as a $10 billion line of credit to CELAC nations, reports AFP . Jinping also agreed to set up a $5 billion fund for investments in Latin America.

The BRICS Summit, which concluded on Wednesday, further strengthened relations between China and Latin America, as it produced a major initiative: the creation of its own development bank to serve as a counter to the International Monetary Fund (IMF) and the World Bank, reports Reuters . The BRICS group is composed of five countries with emerging international economies: Brazil, Russia, India, China, and South Africa.

In response to the creation of the bank, President Castro stated, "We welcome this commitment to a new international order that is just and equitable." His full statements are available in Spanish here .

Cuba's increasing ties with the BRICS countries, especially now that they are forming their own development bank, could serve as a way to lessen the impact of the U.S. economic sanctions imposed on Cuba, reports Cuban state news source Radio Reloj . Jinping will travel to Cuba next week.

Colombia's government and the FARC resume peace talks in Cuba

Peace talks between Colombia's government and the Revolutionary Armed Forces of Colombia (FARC), resumed in Havana on Tuesday, July 15, reports AFP . A source in the Colombian government's delegation told AFP that these talks do not constitute a new round of negotiations, but rather "one or two meetings to wrap up unresolved things before starting on the issue of the victims [of violence]," the next subject the talks will seek to address.

This version of Total Mail Converter is not registered.

Last week, seventeen victims' organizations asked the government to include victims at the talks in Havana, reports Colombian newspaper El Espectador . At the end of the last round of talks, the delegations decided on the "guiding principles" for their discussion of the victims and victim compensation. The two sides will work out further details during the current talks.

Colombia's government and the FARC have been engaged in negotiations since October 2012, and have participated in more than twenty rounds of talks in Havana since November 2012 .

Director General of World Health Organization visits Cuba

Dr. Margaret Chan, Director General of the World Health Organization, visited Cuba this week along with Carissa F. Etienne, Director of the Pan-American Health Organization, reports EFE . It was reported that the delegation would visit Cuba's Genetic Engineering and Biotechnology Center, its Centers for Immunotesting and Molecular Immunology, and that Dr. Chan would also give a speech at the Ministry of Public Health.

Dr. Chan stated, "Whenever I come here I always learn something new from your scientists, from your health care workers," reports state news agency AIN . Dr. Chan also met with Cuba's President Raúl Castro during her visit, during which they discussed the state of healthcare in Cuba and the world, the United Nations Millennium Development Goals, and the World Health Organization's Assembly held in May of this year, reports AIN .

IN CUBA

Cuba detains Ladies in White

On Sunday, July 13, Cuban authorities arrested about 100 members of the Ladies in White who had gathered for their weekly march and to mark the 20th anniversary of the sinking of a tugboat which drowned 37 people who had been attempting to flee the island, reports the BBC . The women were freed after several hours.

U.S. Department of State spokesperson Jen Psaki released a statement condemning the detentions, and "urg[ing] the government of Cuba to end these practices and respect the universal human rights of the Cuban people."

Ministry of Interior Commerce loosens restrictions on lodging houses for Cubans

Cuban and international tourists may now stay in state-run casas de visita across the island, reports AFP . Casas de visita are state-owned hotels or houses that to-date have been restricted to use by government officials on business trips or on vacation. According to the new regulations, published in the Gaceta Oficial on Wednesday, these establishments will "offer lodging services to people who stay for work, rest and recreation." Preference will be given to state entities when making reservations.

According to AFP, casas de visita cost less than traditional hotels. The legislation details that prices will be decided by provincial governments, and payment at most establishments will be in Cuban pesos, though some will be authorized by the Ministry of Interior Commerce to charge in Cuban convertible pesos or to accept both currencies.

Recommended Reading

Life on the ground in Cuba , Katrina vanden Heuvel, The Nation

This piece includes the reflections of Cuba traveler Anna Theofilopoulou on the Nation's first-ever people-to-people trip. Of the U.S. embargo, she asks: "Isn't it time for the US to engage in some self-examination regarding this particular policy and change it?"

This version of Total Mail Converter is not registered.

Putin in Havana, America at the Movies , Sarah Stephens, Huffington Post

Sarah Stephens, CDA's Executive Director, writes about the lessons for U.S. policy offered by the visit of Russia's President Vladimir Putin to the island last week.

Clash intensifies over travel to Cuba , William Gibson, Sun Sentinel

Gibson writes about the debate over unrestricted travel to Cuba, noting that even as polls show the travel ban has fallen out of favor, several Members of Congress are trying to tighten restrictions.

President Obama could use a win , Richard Feinberg, The Hill

"[R]ethinking our Cuba policy is simply acknowledging that our Cold War-era strategy is woefully outdated," Feinberg writes. He argues that loosening the U.S. embargo on Cuba would help private entrepreneurs in Cuba and would be a diplomatic accomplishment for President Obama.

Guantánamo Bay a thorn in Cuba's side , Sarah Rainsford, BBC News

Rainsford reports on the effect the U.S. naval base at Guantánamo Bay has on Cuban residents, who are cut off, not only from the outside world, but also from the rest of the island.

Why Cubans Are Defecting From the Republican Party , John A. Tures, Huffington Post

In addressing why Cuban-Americans are turning away from the Republican Party, to which they have long given their support, Tures suggests the shift has to do largely with the "anti-immigration tone of the GOP."

All-Star Game: Tony Oliva relishes role of mentor to young Cuban stars , Mike Berardino, TwinCities.com

Berardino writes about the mentorship by Tony Oliva , the legendary Cuban baseball player, who played for the Minnesota Twins organization from 1962-1976, of Cuban baseball players currently active in the U.S. major leagues.

Recommended Listening

Artists Try To Fuse Cultural Differences Between Miami And Cuba , David Greene, NPR

Greene talks with several Cuban artists about their art and the spread of ideas between Cuba and the rest of the world. He speaks with the Cuban hip-hop duo Obsesión, who performed last year at CDA's 7th Anniversary Event. See the video of their performance here and here .

This version of Total Mail Converter is not registered.

Until next time,

The Cuba Central Team

DONATE NOW THROUGH Network for Good

Like our work? Consider a monthly donation!

The Cuba Central Newsblast is produced by the Center for Democracy in the Americas (CDA). CDA is devoted to changing U.S. policy toward Cuba and the other countries of the Americas by basing our relations on mutual respect, fostering dialogue with those governments and movements with which U.S. policy is at odds, and recognizing positive trends in democracy and governance. For more information, check out the CDA website . You can also like us on Facebook or follow us on Twitter .

© 2014 Center for Democracy in the Americas. All rights reserved.

Forward email

SafeUnsubscribe

This email was sent to john.podesta@gmail.com by sarah@democracyinamericas.org
|
Update Profile/Email Address | Rapid removal with SafeUnsubscribe ™ | Privacy Policy.

Trusted Email from Constant Contact FREE
Try it FREE today.

Center for Democracy in the Americas | PO Box 53106 NW | Washington | DC | 20009

This version of Total Mail Converter is not registered.

From: "t r u t h o u t" <messenger@truthout.org>
To: podesta@law.georgetown.edu
Date: 9/1/2014 8:04:44 AM
Subject: Fallacies in the Service of Fast-Food Exploitation

View Recent Newsletters

Tell a friend about Truthout!

Monday, 1 September 2014

truthout

Donate Today!

Truthout is a 501(c)3 nonprofit organization; donations are tax deductible.

One Hundred Ways to Change the Subject: Plutocratic Fallacies in the Service of Fast-Food Exploitation

Jeffrey Nall, Truthout: Fast-food worker demands are being met with "plutocratic fallacies" attempting to justify exploitive wages and division among workers. But as a consumer you can support alternative, ethically-inspired businesses, and follow practical steps to express solidarity with the fast-food labor movement.

Read the Article

Dean Baker | Labor Day Victories to Celebrate

Dean Baker, Truthout: In recent decades the news for the country's workers has been mostly bad. We've seen stagnant wages and anti-union court rulings. It would be easy to go on about how bad things are, but it is worth highlighting a couple of good news items against this backdrop.

Read the Article

Disposable Life

Max Silverman, Histories of Violence: We have become less and less aware of the changed environment in which disposing of lives takes place and the forms that disposability takes, so that we no longer recognize what is staring us in the face.

Watch the Video

What Black Women in West Philadelphia Had to Say About Women's Equality Day

Jasmine Burnett, RH Reality Check: "Rarely are black women interviewed in their neighborhoods and asked about a policy's impact on their lives. As such, on the days leading up to Women's Equality Day, I felt it was time to begin asking black women about their experiences with laws that secured their right to vote."

Read the Article

Global Warming and Economic Crisis Lead to One Solution: Climate Jobs

Sharmini Peries, The Real News Network: May

BuzzFlash

The BuzzFlash commentary for Truthout will return soon.

Russian Foreign Minister Calls for Immediate Cease-Fire in Ukraine

Read the Article at The Guardian

Labor History: The First Factory Strike

Read the Article at In These Times

At Least Five Ferguson Officers Apart From Brown Shooter Have Been Named in Lawsuits

Read the Article at The Washington Post

Restaurant Industry's Low Wages Leave 40 Percent of Workers in Near-Poverty

This version of Total Mail Converter is not registered.

Boeve from 350 and Bruce Hamilton of the Amalgamated Transit Union discuss how the environmental and labor movements have united to organize the People's Climate Summit in New York City.

Watch the Video and Read the Transcript

Thom Hartmann | If Unions Are Breaking Automakers, Why Are BMW and Mercedes So Rich?

Thom Hartmann, YES! Magazine: In Germany, auto workers get paid well and their companies still profit. In his book The Crash of 2016, the author explains why living wages and corporate success don't have to be mutually exclusive.

Read the Article

Heralding a National Trend? Enrollment Surges as New York City Begins Full-Day Prekindergarten for 50,000 Kids

Amy Goodman and Juan González, Democracy Now!: As the school year begins, New York City Mayor Bill de Blasio is launching his signature initiative of full-day universal prekindergarten at public schools. More than 50,000 children have already enrolled and thousands of additional teachers have been hired.

Watch the Video and Read the Transcript

The Humanity of Michael Brown

Ian Haney López, Moyers & Company: Dog whistle politics may hurt almost all Americans, but its basic technique is to dehumanize minorities, scaring voters with spectral images of welfare cheats, illegal aliens, invading hordes, potential terrorists and, perhaps especially, black men as menacing criminals.

Read the Article

Let's Give Workers Something to Cheer About

Robert L. Borosage, OtherWords: It's been a long time since workers have been truly celebrated. That's because the union movement that gave us this holiday is a shadow of its former self. If we really want to give workers something to cheer about, we need to revitalize unions.

Read the Article

Bank of America Settlement and the Need for Legal Aid Lawyers

Julia Gordon and Sarah Edelman, Talk Poverty: One of the best ways to prevent unnecessary foreclosures is to provide struggling families with a legal aid lawyer. While the state guarantees legal representation for any criminal proceeding, there is no such guarantee in civil cases.

Read the Article

The United States' War Hawks Back in Flight

Danny Schechter, Consortium News: With the United States government-and-media war hawks back in full flight - preparing to swoop down on Syria as well as Iraq - wiser heads might reflect on the chaos that previous adventures have caused.

Read the Article

Real Poverty

Read the Article at Daily Kos

Inequality: A Broad Middle Class Requires Empowering Workers

Read the Article at Campaign for America's Future

As Bombs Go Silent, Testimonies Mount That Israeli Soldiers Used Gazans as Human Shields

Read the Article at Global Voices

Top Ten Working Class Hero Films

Read the Article at The Progressive

This version of Total Mail Converter is not registered.

Support Truthout with a tax-deductible donation

Please add messenger@truthout.org to ensure you receive our messages

Truthout is a proud member of the New spaper Guild/CWA, Local 36047

Subscribe | Unsubscribe

Privacy Policy

This version of Total Mail Converter is not registered.

From: "Gregory Rosalsky" <grosalsky@progressivemediausa.org>
To: bigcampaign@googlegroups.com
Date: 6/2/2008 2:17:10 PM
Subject: [big campaign] Media Monitoring Report - Evening 06/02/08

Main Topics: McCain Speech to AIPAC, Obama vs. McCain on Foreign Policy, McCain and Phil Gramm

Summary of Shift: Tonight's punditry focused on a potential conclusion to the Democratic nomination battle. Ted Kennedy is recovering from a successful surgery. Senator Byrd is being hospitalized for a fever. President Bush urged his tax cuts to become permanent. James Clyburn is expected to endorse Obama tomorrow. Obama resigned from his church. Bill Clinton blasted Vanity Fair for an article they are publishing about him. Scott McClellan continues to hit various networks discussing the faulty path to the Iraq war. Dick Cheney said he will not read McClellan's book.
Also hot topics this evening, a Texas judge ordered the immediate return of polygamist sect children to their parents. Rock a nd Roll pioneer Bo Diddley died. A subsidiary of Blackwater bought a fighter jet for $4.5 million in February. The Iranian pre sident made veiled threats to Israel in a speech honoring the late Ayatollah Khomeini. Fuel prices hit another record high and t he Senate considers a climate change bill.

Highlights:
1) McCain speech to AIPAC, attacks Obama on Iranian diplomacy
a. New Gallup Poll shows 59% of Americans support Obama's approach to foreign policy, Cafferty says "bad news for John McCain"
b. McCain says Obama will put Israel at risk
c. Deputy RNC Chairman: McCain is trying to do "everything possible" to "change the regime in Iran" or "hurt them economically"
d. Rachel Maddow points out McCain did not support bipartisan Iran divestment bill last year, while Obama did
e. David Bonior: Iran has become a bigger problem under Bush-McCain policies
f. Fred Thompson on Fox News says Obama's willingness to engage Iran is a symptom of inexperience
g. Obama policy advisor hits back on Iran, links McCain to Bush
h. NYT's Bumiller discusses McCain-Obama Iran dispute, McDifferent and McWeak on the economy
2) Phil Gramm and McCain's lobbyist problem
a. Newsweek's Mark Hosenball: Gramm is a major McCain "economic adviser" and he lobbied on behalf of "subprime mortgage lenders", hurts McCain's image
b. Olbermann: Gramm blocked legislation that would have hurt Bin Laden before 9/11
3) MSNBC panel discusses how McCain was "inches away" from an "unprecedented" pledge to a one-term presidency because of age
4) GOP seeking Jewish vote but Obama beating McCain with group by a "healthy margin"
5) Pfotenhauer Says McCain not avoiding talks about economy, rather Obama's "mistakes" make it too difficult to avoid discussing foreign policy
6) RNC Chairman defends McCain, slams Obama on Iraq policy
7) Chris Matthews: McCain 'Isn't so old after all'

Clips:

Highlight #1
New Gallup Poll Shows 59% of Americans Support Obama's Approach, Cafferty Says "Bad News For John McCain" (CNN 06/02/08 5:00pm)
JACK CAFFERTY: We have some bad news for John McCain, who has spent the last couple of weeks beating up on Barack Obama because Obama said he would be willing to meet with leaders of countries considered to be enemies of the United States. Most Americans, most Americans support Obama. McCain was at it again today speaking to a pro-Israel group, he said it's hard to see what a summit with Iranian president Mahmoud Ahmadinejad would lead too, "except an earful of anti-semitic rants and a world-wide audience for a man who denies one holocaust and talks before frenzied crowds about starting another. " Well guess what? A new Gallup Poll suggests the country backs Obama. 59% of Americans responding to this Gallup Poll say it's a good idea for the president to meet with the president of Iran [...]

McCain Says Obama Would Put Israel at Risk to AIPAC (FNC 06/02/08 6:00pm)
CARL CAMERON: [...] At annual meeting of the influential American Israel Public Affairs Committee, or AIPAC, John McCain warned Jewish and Pro-Israel voters that Barack Obama would put the 60 year old Jewish state at greater risk with weak policy toward Iran and an accelerated withdrawal date from Iraq [...] While Obama says US foreign policy must change, McCain says the real issue should be judgment. In the wake of Ahmadinejhad's latest threats, the McCain campaign says Obama should abandon his willingness to meet the Iranian leader and the fact that he's not the McCain campaign says, proves that Obama's judgment is bad.

This version of Total Mail Converter is not registered.

Deputy RNC Chairman: McCain is Trying To Do "Everything Possible" to "Change the Regime in Iran" or "Hurt Them Economically" (FNC 06/02/08 5:15pm)
JOHN GIBSON: More jabs today between Obama and John McCain, at issue is US policy in Iran and the War in Iraq. McCain calling for tough new sanctions on Iran, not talks [...] You just heard David Bonior saying that Iran is more unstable after the past eight years. Your response on that?

FRANK DONATELLI: Well they're more unstable because they're ruled by someone that doesn't have the support of the general public and is pursing suicidal policies and he's somebody that's got to be stopped. I don't know how you can blame the Bush administration for that. What Senator McCain is talking about is doing everything possible, either to change the regime in Iran or to raise the stakes economically on them to such a degree by hurting them economically, that they are forced to change course. That's a far better way to approach Iran, then engaging Ahmadinejad in the first year of your administration to know preconditioned talks [...] This election is not about change or no change, it's about Change that will work versus change that won't work.

Rachel Maddow Points Out McCain Did Not Support Bipartisan Iran Divestment Bill Last Year, While Obama Did (MSNBC 06/02/08 6:07pm)
RACHEL MADDOW: I think that McCain may have goofed on Iran. Senator McCain addressed AIPAC, the hawkish pro-Israel.

[clip of McCain addressing AIPAC]

MADDOW: After mocking Obama's proposed talks with Iran, as you heard there, mocking them as a tried and fail policy of the past, McCain went on to propose his big new idea on Iran of his own, this worldwide divestment campaign to hit Iran economically. Now Obama's got his own AIPAC speech planned for Wednesday. You can expect a major counterpunch from Obama because it was Obama who proposed Iran divestment last year, in a bill with Sam Brownback, in a bipartisan effort that John McCain did not support. […]

David Bonior: Iran Has Become a Bigger Problem Under Bush-McCain Policies (FNC 06/02/08 5:10pm)
DAVID BONIOR: Senator McCain by the way, and if I can just say this, since he supports President Bush's policies, what we've seen during the Bush's years , is we've been more unstable in terms of our relationship with Iran, they've become more a nuclear power, and a nuclear problem [...] The present system certainly isn't working because they've expanded their nuclear capabilities more, under Bush and McCain policies [...]

Thompson Says Obama's Willingness to Engage Iran is a Symptom of Inexperience (FNC 06/02/08 4:40pm)
NEIL CAVUTO: Is this gonna be a central issue you think for Senator McCain and Republicans in general this Fall, Barack Obama's apparent willingness to talk to folks like Ahmadinejad and Senator McCain's leeriness of doing the same thing?

FRED THOMPSON: Well I think it's indicative of a broader issue and that is inexperience and a bit of naivety when it comes to dealing with state sponsors of terrorism and terrorists. You know, we saw again today from Ahmadinejad just how extremist and off the wall that he is. I mean this is a religious matter to them, it's not a matter of state when they talk about the coming of the 12th Iman and the destruction of mankind and the destruction of Israel and the United States and all of that. I don't know if Senator Obama will think his eloquence will allow him to persuade Ahmadinejad to talk the 12th Iman out of coming and returning to the world. So it's part of a broader issue, yeah, it's a very legitimate one.

Obama Policy Advisor Hits Back Against McCain on Iran, Links Him to Bush (MSNBC 06/02/08 1:16pm)
ANDREA MITCHELL: There are also challenges from John McCain […] at AIPAC today talking about Barack Obama and Iran.

[video clip of McCain AIPAC speech]

MITCHELL: Now he—Barack Obama is going to AIPAC also.
[…]
GREG CRAIG: It will be fairly dramatic, the differences in their approach. And if you like the way George Bush has handled our national interests in the Middle East—

MITCHELL: George Bush has a lot of support among the Jewish community and among the people who are pro-Israel for the stance he has taken on Israel.

This version of Total Mail Converter is not registered.

CRAIG: Andrea, if you really believe that the war in Iraq has made us stronger in that region— […] I think most neutral and objective observers believe that we are less capable of pursuing our interests and Israel's interests as a result of Iraq. And that the strong path is for our troops to be extricated from […] Iraq, where there is no longer a serious military mission to perform. And pursue our more vital interest, which includes protecting Israel. What has happened, of course, as a result of this current policy Iran has gotten stronger throughout the region. Hezbollah has gotten stronger in Lebanon. Hamas has gotten stronger in Gaza and in Palestine. And this is all on George Bush's watch. And I think that there's gotta be a different approach, and a different way of handling our interests in the Middle East. And it starts with withdrawal—careful, cautious, responsible withdrawal from Iraq.

NYT's Bumiller Discusses McCain-Obama Iran Dispute, McDifferent and McWeak on the Economy (MSNBC 06/02/08 2:06pm)
[video clip of McCain AIPAC speech]

JOHN HARWOOD: What do you think John McCain's trying to accomplish by pressing this argument that he's been advancing for the past several weeks—that Barack Obama has got a bad idea for negotiating with Iran?

ELISABETH BUMILLER: It's a centerpiece of their strategy to really, really go after Barack Obama on his national security credentials and to question his judgment on foreign policy. […] This is a very important message for this group this morning, this Jewish group. […] The McCain campaign says this is an important part of their fall strategy […] Obama has moved away from that more recently, but McCain has not acknowledged that.

HARWOOD: […] John McCain's going to Louisiana. […] What do you expect to hear from him tomorrow? And how much more aggressive is he gonna get at trying to put some distance between himself and Pres Bush? […]

BUMILLER: I would expect to hear an even stronger denunciation of what happened after Hurricane Katrina. […] We are going to see him running further and further away from the President. Except when it comes to fundraising. Then you will see the President behind closed doors, raising money for John McCain.

HARWOOD: Money talks.

TAMRON HALL: […] How does Sen McCain balance that strength in foreign policy, that many perceive him to have, with the issue of the economy? Through his own words, saying that that was his weak spot.

BUMILLER: Well he's come out with a big economic policy speech […] last month. There'll be more of that. He bristles when people what he said late last year, that he doesn't understand the economy as well as he should. […] So far, he hasn't really addressed […] how he would […] better financial markets in the future. He's put forth some proposals on how to help out people who are about to have their mortgages foreclosed. But right now, there hasn't been a great deal of detail.

Highlight #2
Newsweek's Mark Hosenball Discusses Phil Gramm and McCain Lobbyist Problem (MSNBC 06/02/08 1:45pm)
ANDREA MITCHELL: And there's another possible headache looming for Senator John McCain's campaign. The presumed Republican nominee is under fire again over ties with close advisors who have been Washington lobbyists. The latest is former Texas Senator Phil Gramm, McCain's long time friend. A familiar face on the campaign trail and in the Senate. He's also vice-chairman of UBS. And as late as this past winter, Gramm was a registered lobbyist on mortgage securities issues. […] What is Phil Gramm's role on economic advice and on how to handle the mortgage crisis? What is his campaign role?

MARK HOSENBALL: The campaign basically says that he is […] a national general co-chairman of the campaign, one of five. He has the role in all aspects of the campaign essentially. […] And they also said that he is a regular advisor on economic matters to Sen McCain, although they won't talk about specifics and they say that there are other full-time advisors—he's not paid by the campaign.

MITCHELL: Now of course, one could argue […] that there is no one on the Republican side who has more experience, more knowledge on a lot of these issues […] than Phil Gramm. […] So tell me, what's wrong with having Phil Gramm advising the campaign?

HOSENBALL: […] His bank […] got itself into a lot of trouble over subprime mortgages. He's been registered as a lobbyist for some of the subprime mortgage-related issues […] which have actually caused his bank to get into trouble. […] Yeah, he has a lot of experience in economic policy […] but have his economics been proven by the market and by recent events to be sound economics? […] And not only some of the bills he's been lobbying on are questionable in retrospect; but certainly, the performance of his bank in this market has certainly been questionable in retrospect. And the shareholders are probably not very happy. I would add, incidentally, that the McCain people got very angry about this story and said 'well, you didn't point out that one of Obama's top fundraisers, but not advisers, Robert Wolfe, is also a senior executive of UBS.' Fair enough, but from what I can tell, Wolfe is not advising Obama's campaign on economics. […]

This version of Total Mail Converter is not registered.

MITCHELL: What about the lobbying issues, though? How does this create a problem for John McCain? And is Gramm still a registered lobbyist?[…]

HOSENBALL: The bank deregistered him as a lobbyist for Congressional issues as of I think the end of April, the beginning of April. However, the bank's chief lobbyist still registered in Washington on a whole bunch of issues is somebody named John Savercool, who was for many, many years one of Gramm's top aides. So he may not be a lobbyist, but his influence is probably still there.

MITCHELL: And do you think this is beginning to hurt McCain, who has campaigned for so long against lobbying and against special interests? Is he beginning to lose that aura? […]

HOSENBALL: The problem is that Gramm is not the first lobbyist or ex-lobbyist […] to present an appearance problem […] for McCain. In fact, one of the other co-chairs of the campaign, […] Tom Loeffler, recently left the campaign after […] my colleague Michael Isikoff did a story about how he had got tons of money lobbying for Saudi Arabia. McCain has set very high standards […] for the people involved in this campaign, that they're not supposed to be involved in lobbying. This is another appearance problem.

MITCHELL: To be continued.

Olbermann Blasts Phil Gramm for Indirectly Helping bin Laden (MSNBC 06/02/08 8:37pm)
KEITH OLBERMANN: McCain's top economic advisor was not only on the wrong side of the mortgage issue but also on the wrong side of this nation's effort to choke off the funding for international terrorists. […] As we revealed here on Countdown last week, Gramm, on the payroll of the giant Swiss bank, UBS, helping to defeat U.S. legislation that would give relief to Americans facing foreclosure, at the same time he was helping write McCain's economic policies. Now Newsweek magazine reporting Gramm's bank is undergoing investigation for alleged use of overseas tax havens to hide assets of the wealthy from U.S. authorities. On September 20th, 2001, the New York Times reported that a single Senator had blocked legislation that would've helped investigators track Osama bin Laden's financial network before 9/11. It was Phil Gramm. […] Where does this end for McCain with Phil Gramm? He's wrong on the mortgages. He obviously on the wrong side of terrorism financing. […]

Highlight #3
MSNBC Panel Discuss How McCain was "Inches Away" From Pledging A One-Term Presidency Because of Age
(MSNBC 06/02/08 6:56pm)
[visual of quote from McCain]

MARC AMBINDER: When he formally announced his presidential candidacy last year, Sen. John McCain was inches away from making an unprecedented pledge: if he were elected, he would serve only one term as president. It could have been an earth-shifting moment for the campaign and the primary. At the time, McCain's fundraising pace was falling well short of its target and Republicans were not treating McCain as the frontrunner. The idea to serve one term had long been discussed among top advisers, and McCain was on board.

DAVID GREGORY: […] Ultimately, he didn't sign off on it at the time he actually announced his candidacy. […] What do you think the calculation was all about?

TODD PURDUM: The calculation for it was to make him above politics, above ambition. To say, 'I'll take one shot at four years and that will stop me from having to run for reelection the minute I get into office. It will make me free as a bird to follow my conscience and be above politics in someway.' And the reason not to do it is it ties your hands, makes you a lame duck the moment you take office.

JOHN HARWOOD: Yeah, David, it makes you above politics in a very weak way. Just like a former President, which is in fact what you would be on the way to doing as soon as you took oath of office. I think it shows John McCain had very good judgment to step away from that idea and he turned out to not need it to get the nomination.

This version of Total Mail Converter is not registered.

EUGENE ROBINSON: […] His mother is 96 years old and still rigorous and active. And so it's not as if he expects to be, you know, in his dotage in four years.

[…]

RACHEL MADDOW: […] It would give him two big benefits, as Todd says. It would give him that political advantage which we've seen resonates intensely in the response to Scott McClellan's book, this idea of the permanent campaign being such a toxic part of the Washington culture. […] Yes, it makes you a lame duck but it also gives you a political advantage and as Gene has hinted at, it would take away the fact that people are thinking about him being 80 at the end of his time in office, which is what he would be at the end of a second term. […]

HARWOOD: […] You're gonna see that maverick even more forcefully as he distances himself from President Bush and we're gonna see some of that John McCain we saw in 2000. Because the only way he can stay alive in this race. […]

Highlight #4

GOP Seeking Jewish Vote But Obama Beating McCain with Group By a "Healthy Margin" (FNC 06/02/08 9:53am)

MEGYN KELLY: […] Republicans are hoping that millions of Jewish voters that usually vote Democratic in these presidential elections, could choose McCain this November. […] Does McCain have a realistic shot, […] of actually winning over the Jewish vote that almost always goes democratic?

MARK GINSBERG: In deed there is a very good opportunity for him to capture a much more significant slice of the Jewish vote. Many of these people […] indicate that they're uncertain of exactly which way to go. So that means a good significant percentage of the community is up for grabs at this point.

KELLY: […] We expect, among other things, for McCain to rip on Obama in front of this group for not supporting the Senate Resolution that designated the revolutionary guard in Iran a terrorist organization. […] Will that resonate, do you think, with this group?

GINSBERG: Well it will resonate, particularly before the AIPAC national conference, because Senator Clinton did support that legislation. As did Senator McCain, Senator Obama did not on the basis that he felt that it would in affect grant a license to the President to launch an attack on Iran. […] Having read Senator McCain's speech, […] its quit clear that I think he is going to leave the audience a little bit disappointed because he is only calling for imposing greater economic, private economic sanctions on Iran. He's not taking it to the level of the Israeli government, which there should be at least the military option on the table against nuclear weapons of Iran.

[…]

KELLY: A recent poll shows found Obama beating McCain 6- 32, that's a pretty healthy margin among Jewish voters.

Highlight #5

Pfotenhauer Says McCain Not Avoiding Talking about Economy, Obama's "Mistakes" Make It Too Difficult to Avoid Discussing Foreign Policy (MSNBC 06/02/08 12:28pm)

TAMRON HALL: Senator John McCain is launching a new attack on Barack Obama's foreign policy. In a speech before a highly pro-Israel group in Washington this morning, he blasted Obama for opposing a resolution designating Iran's Revolutionary Guard as a terrorist organization. Nancy Pfotenhauer is John McCain's senior policy advisor […] So Nancy, Sen Obama has been arguing that Sen McCain represents a third Bush term and a policy that has made the U.S. and Israel less secure. How does the campaign respond to Sen Obama's claims?

NANCY PFOTENHAUER: The worst thing that can happen for Israel is for Iran to continue to gain power. And of course their big opportunity […] is if Sen Obama's plan for what to do in Iraq takes place, where he is basically just arguing for withdrawal, which would leave a huge vacuum for Iran to step in. And of course Iran is the largest state sponsor of terrorism that we know. And it is absolutely foolhardy for Obama to be granting them Presidential talks, what I call premature capitulation. Giving him what they want the most, rather than forcing sanctions in place, working with our allies to really tighten things down in Iran to make it more difficult for the current regime.

This version of Total Mail Converter is not registered.

HALL: The Obama campaign is also saying that Sen McCain promises sanctions against Iran that the Bush administration has been unable to persuade the U.N. Security Council to deliver.

PFOTENHAUER: And of course what Sen McCain said in his speech very clearly is that we should continue to push the U.N. Security Council, but if they do not act, that we should work on a multilateral basis with allies and people in the region. So we should be sitting down, as Sen McCain has, with President Sarkozy of France, with Prime Minister Brown in Great Britain, and we should be ready to take action. We should be doing things like freezing their financial assets and not granting visas.

HALL:[…] It was just a few weeks ago that people were making the argument that it as the economy that would lead into the general election. But it seems that Sen McCain really has attempted to control the conversation and keep it on the track […] of foreign policy. Many obviously believing that McCain is stronger in that area, and the Republican Party being stronger in that area. Is he trying to avoid talking about the economy?

PFOTENHAUER: Not at all, but Senator Obama's making it impossible not to discuss foreign policy. He keeps making mistakes that are so serious and get to the core of whether or not he is qualified to be Commander-in-Chief. And I think on issue after issue, the answer is a resounding 'no.' I'd like to back up […] to one of your earlier points. Sen McCain stressed to the audience, because it's so revealing, that Sen Obama refused to support an amendment that identified Iran's Revolutionary Guard troops as a terrorist organization. Now they are killing American soldiers. If you're not even willing to name our enemy, how could you possibly be qualified to defeat them?

HALL: Well I know Sen Clinton supported that and she was under great criticism for doing that as well.

PFOTENHAUER: Well 75 other Senators supported it.

HALL: I know they did. But, well that's another discussion. But we're out of time. Thank you.

Highlight #6
RNC Chairman Defends McCain, Slams Obama on Iraq Policy (MSNBC 06/02/08 3:50pm)
NORAH O'DONNELL: Has the war in Iraq made Iran stronger or weaker?

MIKE DUNCAN: Well, lets talk about the lack of judgment Barack Obama seems to have. You know Senator McCain has invited him to go to Iraq and he has not been there 876 days now. He has also not talked to General Petraeus not one single time. Yet he will unilaterally meet with leaders of hostile countries

O'DONNELL: Since you didn't answer that question I'll ask you another one. Since you brought up the trip to Iraq, you are right John McCain has been to Iraq 8 times, Barack Obama has been there once. It has been over 870 days since he has been there, and yet John McCain can't seem to get facts straight. By any objective analysis including the Washington Post who gave John McCain three Pinocchios. Why is it that John McCain doesn't know how many troops we have in Iraq?

DUNCAN: Well I know that John McCain knows a great deal more about Iraq because he has been there many more times then Barack Obama. Obama has a gap in his knowledge about rather the surge is working or not. He needs to go he needs to talk to General Petraeus.

O'DONNELL: But Chairman, John McCain said we are back down to pre-surge levels and in fact we are not. We still have a hundred and fifty five thousand (155,000) troops in Iraq. How does John McCain make such an egregious mistake?

DUNCAN: Norah, I can't get into verb tenses and things like that. I know John McCain understands. He has been to Iraq, as you say 8 times. He understands the troop level there. He is committed to victory for us in the Middle East. He understands how important it is. He understands how it all fits together [...]

Highlight #7
Chris Matthews: McCain 'Isn't So Old After All' (MSNBC 06/02/08 5:27pm)
CHRIS MATTHEWS: Cindy McCain is clearly having a good time. Last month she posed for this spread in Vogue. Pretty classy. And now in a new interview with U.S. News and World Report, she reveals that she feels the need for speed and rolling in high performance driving lessons. […] Hey, John's not so old after all, is he?

This version of Total Mail Converter is not registered.

--
Gregory E. Rosalsky
Progressive Media USA
202-609-7691 (office)
707-484-3796 (cell)
GRosalsky@progressivemediausa.org
--~--~---------~--~----~------------~-------~--~----~
You received this message because you are subscribed to the "big campaign" group.

To post to this group, send to bigcampaign@googlegroups.com

To unsubscribe, send email to bigcampaign-unsubscribe@googlegroups.com

E-mail ryan@campaigntodefendamerica.org with questions or concerns

This is a list of individuals. It is not affiliated with any group or organization.
-~----------~----~----~----~------~----~------~--~---

This version of Total Mail Converter is not registered.

From:	"Graham Allison" <grahamallison@belfercenter.hks.harvard.edu>
To:	podesta@law.georgetown.edu
Date:	3/8/2016 4:36:55 PM
Subject:	Is Iran Still Israel's Top Threat?

This version of Total Mail Converter is not registered.

From: "Robby Mook" <re47@hillaryclinton.com>
To: "Demastrie, Jesse" <Jesse.Demastrie@gmmb.com>
Date: 8/5/2015 11:26:46 AM
Subject: Re: AFP-IK; Unintimidated PAC (Walker PAC); J Street (pro-Iran nuclear deal) placing this week

AFP is only NH and not IA?

On Aug 5, 2015, at 6:09 PM, Demastrie, Jesse <Jesse.Demastrie@gmmb.com > wrote:

No update on American for Prosperity-IK yet. Stations have not been told what "IK" means nor have spots been received yet. Spending looks to be very large over 3 weeks 8/10-8/30. WMUR alone took $800k, with total for state over $1.1 million over the 3 weeks.

Unintimidated PAC (Walker PAC) has placed in Iowa to run 9/8-9/21 – a :60 – and 10/6-2/1 (30s).

J Street (pro Iran nuclear deal) – new spending
8/5 – 8/10
Total $432K

8/6
Total $4K
Washington, DC, ~5 GRPs, $4K – cable only

8/5 – 8/10
Total $428K – broadcast and cable
Portland, OR, ~165 GRPs, $32K
Philadelphia, ~190 GRPs, $83K
Detroit, ~540 GRPs, $138K
Baltimore, ~510 GRPs, $90K
Denver, ~250 GRPs, $85K

Ad: https://www.youtube.com/watch?v=SDZClQADEsA

From: Demastrie, Jesse
Sent: Wednesday, August 05, 2015 3:41 PM
To: Andrew Bleeker; Brian Fallon; Christina Reynolds; David Binder; Demastrie, Jesse; Elan Kriegel; Huma Abedin; Jason Rosenbaum; Jen Palmieri; Jesse Ferguson (HRC); Jester, Daniel; Joel Benenson; John Anzalone; John Podesta; Kaye, Anson; Kristina Schake; Lenar, AJ; Mandy Grunwald; Margolis, Jim; Marlon Marshall (HRC); Matt Dover; Matt Paul; Michael Halle; Michael Vlacich; Nick Merrill; Oren Shur (HRC); Oxhorn, Liz; Pinelo, Greg; Rimel, John; Robby Mook (HRC); Teddy Goff; Tony Carrk
Subject: Americans for Prosperity-IK; Hispanic Democrats for Trump

Americans for Prosperity-IK is starting to place for 8/10-8/30 in New Hampshire (Boston, Manchester, Portland, and Burlington). We don't yet know what "IK" stands for or what the spot is but will let you know if/when we hear.

Hispanic Democrats for Trump
8/6
Total $1,340 – cable only

Ad: https://www.youtube.com/watch?v=dmiwXBeO8U4
Spot applauds Trump for being such so offensive that he ends up helping Democrats.

Denver, ~10 GRPs, $1K

Jesse Demastrie Vice President, Associate Media Director
202.338.8700 | office
202.813.4983 | direct

This version of Total Mail Converter is not registered.

+gmmb cause the effect

This email is intended only for the named addressee. It may contain information that is confidential/private, legally privileged, or copyright-protected, and you should handle it accordingly. If you are not the intended recipient, you do not have legal rights to retain, copy, or distribute this email or its contents, and should promptly delete the email and all electronic copies in your system; do not retain copies in any media. If you have received this email in error, please notify the sender promptly. Thank you.

This version of Total Mail Converter is not registered.

From: "Adam Blickstein" <ablickstein@nsnetwork.org>
To: bigcampaign@googlegroups.com
Date: 1/11/2010 5:56:48 AM
Subject: [big campaign] From Politics of Fear to Politics of Nonsense http://www.nsnetwork.org/node/1499

From Politics of Fear to Politics of Nonsense

Washington, D.C. - Fareed Zakaria reminds us, "The purpose of terrorism is to provoke an overreaction." This weekend's continuing coverage of the failed underpants bombing saw several prominent conservatives sink to an unprecedented depth of hysteria and nonsense. If taken seriously, such responses would risk turning a failed attack into a successful one.

If we are to fight terrorists successfully, we as a nation must keep our poise and learn from this failed attempt. Congress should work to aid the administration, by using its hearings on the attempt to put together a pragmatic plan for improving our security at home. As President Obama declared in his speech last week, the U.S. must move forward with the recognition that "great and proud nations don't hunker down and hide behind walls of suspicion and mistrust. That is exactly what our adversaries want, and so long as I am President, we will never hand them that victory."

On terrorism, conservatives move from politics of fear to politics of nonsense. Over the weekend, core elements of the conservative establishment shifted from fear-mongering to nonsense-peddling, making claims with absolutely no basis in reality. In an absurd illustration of this shift, Keep America Safe - the outfit designed to protect the abysmal legacy of the Bush administration on counterterrorism - released a video attacking the Obama administration's response to the failed underpants bombing, complete with a ticking clock and an explosion at the video's conclusion. Sadly, throughout the weekend, other conservatives have adopted this same hyperbolic rhetoric:

> Liz Cheney: Liz Cheney went on ABC's "This Week," alleging that the Obama administration was caught off guard by terrorist activity in Yemen, despite the Administration year-long, close scrutiny of precisely that issue. On Sunday, Cheney said "after the president's press conference, when you had John Brennan and Homeland Security Chief Janet Napolitano brief, they both said they were surprised that Al Qaida in Yemen was operational." Cheney's comments ignore the fact, noted by IPS, that assistance to Yemen in Obama's first year rose from 8.4 million dollars to 40.3 million dollars, nearly a five-fold increase. As the President's chief homeland security and terrorism advisor John Brennan said on Fox News last weekend, "We've worked with the Yemeni government closely since the first day of this administration." [Liz Cheney, 1/10/10 . IPS, 1/06/10 . John Brennan, 1/03/10]
>
> Rep. Peter Hoekstra: On CBS's Face the Nation, Rep. Peter Hoekstra (R - MI) insinuated that the any release of Guantanamo detainees by the President would put the country at risk: "The second thing that came out of Yemen was that this was -- you know, that the core of Al Qaida in the Arabian peninsula are people that have been released from Gitmo. Yet in December, the president released more individuals from Gitmo." Yet, according to an administration official quoted in the story, the White House had "been presented with no information that suggests that any of the detainees transferred by this administration have returned to the fight." In addition, Greg Sargent of Who Runs Government reported that according to this same official, the Bush administration had not done the work "the work of screening detainees slated for release that the Obama administration is doing," work that includes a task force for review detainees' cases, as well as actual record-keeping efforts that did not exist under the Bush administration. [Rep. Peter Hoekstra, 1/10/10 . NY Times, 1/7/10 . Greg Sargent, 1/07/10]
>
> Rep. Peter King: When asked what concrete recommendations he would make to strengthen America's counterterrorism policy, Rep. Peter King (R - NY) said "I think one main thing would be to -- just himself to use the word terrorism more often." As the Washington Monthly's Steven Benen noted, this is "why Republicans aren't taken more seriously when it comes to the substance of public policy." [Rep. Peter King, 1/06/10 . Steve Benen, 1/06/10]
>
> Republican Massachusetts Senate Candidate Scott Brown: Echoing the fear-hyping tactics of Keep America

This version of Total Mail Converter is not registered.

> Safe, Republican Massachusetts Senate Candidate Scott Brown filmed a commercial, in which he said "Some people believe our Constitution exists to grant rights to terrorists who want to harm us. I disagree. Our laws are meant to protect this nation, not our enemies." In fact, as former Republican Congressman from Oklahoma Mickey Edwards has said, our constitution is one of our best assets for bringing terrorists to justice: "Critics "scowl and declare that our American courts will not, or can not, convict terrorists. They seem pretty damned certain of that. Which is weird since nearly 200 terrorists have been convicted in our federal courts in the last nine years (that's 65 times as many as have been convicted by military commissions)." [Scott Brown, via Politico, 1/10/10 .Former Congressman Mickey Edwards, 1/05/10]

National security experts agree -- hysteria plays into the hands of Al Qaeda. As foreign policy commentator Fareed Zakaria reminds us, "The purpose of terrorism is to provoke an overreaction. Its real aim is not to kill the hundreds of people directly targeted but to sow fear in the rest of the population. Terrorism is an unusual military tactic in that it depends on the response of the onlookers. If we are not terrorized, then the attack didn't work. Alas, this one worked very well....His mission failed entirely, killing not a single person. The suicide bomber was not even able to commit suicide. But al-Qaeda succeeded in its real aim, which was to throw the American system into turmoil. That's why the terror group proudly boasted about the success of its mission." Hunkering down and adopting a siege mentality plays directing into the hands of Al Qaeda. Marc Lynch, senior fellow at CNAS and professor at George Washington University, explains, "In fact, this risks becoming a classic case of massive overreaction playing right into the hands of a terrorist group."

Osama bin Laden himself explains in a 2004 video "We [Al Qaeda] are continuing this policy in bleeding America to the point of bankruptcy. Allah willing, and nothing is too great for Allah." In the video bin Laden, referring to the fight against the Soviet Union, said, "using guerrilla warfare and the war of attrition to fight tyrannical superpowers. We, alongside the mujahedeen, bled Russia for 10 years until it went bankrupt and was forced to withdraw in defeat." He also said Al Qaeda has found it "easy for us to provoke and bait" the Bush administration. Dana Milbank points out that "the dismay of the past two weeks misses a larger point: that the nature of the attack shows just how lame al-Qaeda really is...In part, we overestimated (or, in the case of the Bush administration, perhaps exaggerated) the threat from al-Qaeda. In part, the post-Sept. 11 efforts to strengthen the borders and disrupt terrorist operations have worked. Whatever the cause, al-Qaeda is now less an organization than a bunch of loosely affiliated cells." By overreacting and crediting Al Qaeda with a victory, we are only adding fuel to the fire and convincing these organizations that their efforts are succeeding. [Fareed Zakaria, 1/11/10 . Marc Lynch, 1/2/10 . Al Qaeda video via CNN, 11/1/2004 . Washington Post, 1/10/10]

The administration and Congress have acted wisely and appropriately to fix problems, support men and women on the front lines of homeland security, and deny Al Qaeda the propaganda victory it seeks. After ordering several reviews, President Obama also told the nation, "the buck stops with me" and took a number of pragmatic steps:

> First, I'm directing that our intelligence community immediately begin assigning specific responsibility for investigating all leads on high-priority threats so that these leads are pursued and acted upon aggressively -- not just most of the time, but all of the time.
>
> Second, I'm directing that intelligence reports, especially those involving potential threats to the United States, be distributed more rapidly and more widely.
>
> Third, I'm directing that we strengthen the analytical process, how our analysis -- how our analysts process and integrate the intelligence that they receive.
>
> And finally, I'm ordering an immediate effort to strengthen the criteria used to add individuals to our terrorist watchlists, especially the "no fly" list.

The practical steps taken by the Obama administration will facilitate a stronger, more cohesive national security strategy. Congress will also be conducting reviews on a range of topics, including what happened to the detainees that were released from Guantanamo Bay by the Bush administration. Senator Dianne Feinstein, chairman of the Senate Intelligence Committee, explained on Face the Nation that "the Senate is now engaged in a huge study on the interrogation and detention of the some thirty three high-value detainees. What happen to them? How were they treated? What success did the interrogation have? Were the laws followed? That kind of thing. And we should have the report completed within the next three months or so."

Fareed Zakaria explained the benefits of a more staid, meticulous approach: "the public would know that any attack, successful or not, would trigger an automatic, serious process to analyze the problem and fix it. Politicians might find it harder to use every such event for political advantage. The people on the front lines of homeland security would not get demoralized as they watched politicians and the media bash them and grandstand with little knowledge." [President Obama, 1/7/10 . Sen. Dianne Feinstein, Face the Nation, 1/10/10 . Fareed Zakaria, 1/11/10]

This version of Total Mail Converter is not registered.

###

Adam Blickstein
Communications Director
National Security Network
202-289-7113 (office)
617-335-0859 (mobile)
ablickstein@nsnetwork.org

This version of Total Mail Converter is not registered.

From:	"Nick Merrill" <nmerrill@hrcoffice.com>
To:	"Nick Merrill" <nmerrill@hrcoffice.com>
Date:	2/7/2015 8:11:20 AM
Subject:	HRC Clips | 2.7.15
Attachments:	20150207 HRC Clips.docx

HRC Clips
February 7, 2015

HRC

Official or not, Clinton 2016 is well underway (WAPO)
Behind Hillary Clinton's 2016 campaign launch window (MSNBC)
Unchartered Territory: Why Hillary Isn't Your Typical Frontrunner (NBC News)
Mandy Grunwald, Once and Future Clinton Consultant, Is A Pop Culture Archetype (Bloomberg)
EXCLUSIVE: Hillary Clinton searching for 100,000 square feet of city office space for huge presidential campaign headquarters (NY Daily News)
Hillary Clinton: Grandmother in Chief (The Atlantic)
New Hampshire, and the case for Hillary Clinton not quite being 'inevitable' (WAPO)
Why Hillary Clinton needs Taraji P. Henson (WAPO)
Clinton, Bush strongest contenders; Ohio a key state for 2016 presidential election (Dayton Daily News)
Hillary Clinton is in much better shape with a key demographic than she ever was in 2008 (Fusion)
Elizabeth Warren's top media consultant isn't ready for Warren (Vox)
Working Families Party considering backing Sen. Elizabeth Warren instead of Hillary Clinton (NY Daily News)
Biden to make Iowa trip next week (Des Moines Register)
We need to start the presidential campaign earlier? (Des Moines Register)
US Benghazi panel to query top officials (AP)
Hillary Clinton Questioning Sought by House Benghazi Panel (Bloomberg)
Benghazi panel chief wants to hear from Clinton ASAP (The Hill)
Former HP CEO: Run for prez likely (Boston Herald)
Mike Huckabee says Hillary Clinton more like Barack Obama than husband Bill (Dallas Morning News)
What isn't being said about 2016 election (Star Democrat)
Hillary Flew Private for Peanuts, and You Can Too (Vanity Fair)
Report: Pakistan aid plans hit snag after political promise by Hillary Clinton (Washington Examiner)
After a decade building trust, one wrong move (NYT)
Trust the dissidents, not the diplomats (WAPO)

National

Booming jobs market, falling gas prices make this the best economy in 15 years (WAPO)
Security plan reiterates alliances, values (WAPO)
Economy spoiling GOP's political strategy (WAPO)
New Yorkers Clamor for IDs, Swamping Mayor's Key Project (NYT)
Job Count Finds Best 3 Months Since Late 1990s (NYT)
As Jindal's G.O.P. Profile Grows, So Do Louisiana's Budget Woes (NYT)
Citing Overseas Travel Plans, Biden Won't Attend Netanyahu's Speech to Congress (NYT)
Gun Debate Is Revived in Colorado, Two Years After Theater Shooting (NYT)
How Teacher Biases Can Sway Girls From Math and Science (NYT)
Pennsylvania Tackles Deficit (WSJ)
This Is Your FCC on Drugs (WSJ)
Obama's partisan approval gap is a mirror of Bush's (LAT)
Kochs' liberal causes? Critics see ruse (LAT)
Diversity won't be a big winner at the Grammys (LAT)
Obama foundation chief: Chicago 'is definitely in play' for library (Chicago Sun Times)
NBC News launches internal investigation of Williams' reporting (Newsday)

This version of Total Mail Converter is not registered.

International

U.S., Canada should bail out Haiti (Providence Journal)
Change in Management at Petrobras Does Little to Appease Its Investors (NYT)
New face waits in Cuba; Raul Castro's heir apparent keeps a low profile (LAT)
Moscow negotiations fail to produce a peace deal for conflict in Ukraine (WAPO)
Greece Could Run Out of Cash in Weeks (WSJ)
By-Election in France Shakes Up National Politics (WSJ)
Houthi rebels in Yemen shut down parliament, tightening their control (WAPO)
Netanyahu's 'Bibi-Sitter' Ad Draws Praise From U.S. Conservatives (NYT)
Netanyahu Visit to Congress Threatens to Deepen Splits (WSJ)
At Diplomatic Conference, Turkey-Israel Rift Worsens (NYT)
Militants say U.S. hostage is dead (LAT)
India subtly shifts on climate change agreements, but power gap persists (Global Times)
Prayer Breakfast Words Ruffle China and India (NYT)
In J.P. Morgan Emails, a Tale of China and Connections (WSJ)
Tony Abbott, Australian Premier, Vows to Fight Leadership Challenge (NYT)

Miscellaneous added by PIR, NSM, and Dan

Elizabeth Warren Goes to Bat for Medical Device Industry (Time)

This version of Total Mail Converter is not registered.

Official or not, Clinton 2016 is well underway (WAPO)

By Anne Gearan;Dan Balz
February 7, 2015
The Washington Post

Hillary Rodham Clinton, who won't yet say whether she is running for president, is assembling a massive campaign team-in-waiting that outstrips anything on a Republican side that remains factionalized and focused on knocking off one another.

At this point, without so much as an announcement, she has settled on — at the least — a campaign chairman, a campaign manager, a chief strategist and lead pollster, another pollster, a lead media adviser, a communication director, a deputy communications director, a focus group director and a communications strategist.

She is also closing in on a New York City campaign headquarters and a date to make all of this official.

Some senior staff are signing on without nailing down the usual conditions of a new job, such as a salary or starting date. Recruitment is being led by White House senior adviser John Podesta and manager-designate Robby Mook, with Clinton making many of the final decisions herself.

Clinton faces no competition for Democratic campaign talent and is said to prefer to wait as long as possible to begin campaigning, but she has assured senior advisers that she would put the legal framework of a campaign in place this spring.

The advanced stage of her organization is one of many signs that Clinton is the heir apparent for the Democratic nomination, a status that has scared off serious rivals and allowed her to postpone — perhaps until summer — the day she has to begin rigorous campaigning.

Her effort at this stage looks a lot like an incumbent's reelection campaign: She will be running largely in support of a sitting president and his agenda, and is busy hiring many of President Obama's former aides.

Jim Messina, who helped engineer Clinton's downfall in 2008 as a senior aide to Obama's campaign, now runs a super PAC devoted to supporting her in 2016. "It's her turn and her time," he said on MSNBC this week. "We're going to do whatever it takes to make sure she's the president of the United States."

No Republicans now moving toward active candidacies can say that they are as far along in staffing their upper ranks with the kind of experienced people whom Clinton is bringing aboard. She's also locking in wealthy donors and has a head start on other ground organizing and fundraising because of the efforts of outside groups supporting her.

But the luxury of front-runner status could easily become a liability as Clinton attempts the historically difficult feat of leading her party to a third consecutive term in the White House.

So her advisers are working hard to fashion ways to make her seem hungrier, scrappier and less like the inheritor of Obama's mantle. A small but expanding cadre of close advisers is looking at ways to keep her in fighting form through a slow and uneventful early campaign season.

Strategies to distance herself from Obama include a focus on more populist and base-friendly economic issues, as well as suggestions that — despite her tenure as his secretary of state — her foreign policy would be more self-assured than his.

Putting a toe in the water

No one knows better than Clinton that the landscape roughly a year before the first presidential primary contests can be deceiving. She thought she had a lock on the 2008 nomination — only to lose to Obama.

But Democrats supporting Clinton see no one on the horizon this time who could become an Obama, especially now that Sen. Elizabeth Warren (Mass.) has said she is not running.

That leaves Clinton considering what advisers describe as a "soft" or small-scale launch in April that would allow her to raise money and hire staff but delay traditional daily campaigning until the summer. By comparison, Clinton began campaigning for the 2008 election in January 2007.

Although some supporters worry that Clinton risks losing her edge, others said there is little or no downside to postponing the kind of daily handshaking and speechifying that Clinton often appeared to dislike last time.

Des Moines lawyer and Clinton supporter Jerry Crawford knows there is some hand-wringing among Iowa campaign regulars. At this point in 2007, candidates had established Iowa offices, hired staff and were making regular stops there.

Crawford is unconcerned.

No voters are telling him, "she's got to get out here, because campaigns aren't long enough in this state," Crawford said. "July is as good as March or April."

This version of Total Mail Converter is not registered.

Advisers fret that GOP front-runner Jeb Bush, already known as a smooth speaker, will have lots of debate chops if he emerges from the crowded GOP field to oppose her.

Clinton advisers are looking for ways she can get in a few zingers now. A Twitter message Clinton posted Monday may give a clue to her campaign approach. She weighed in after a controversy erupted over comments from potential GOP opponents New Jersey Gov. Chris Christie and Sen. Rand Paul of Kentucky that appeared to question universal childhood vaccination.

"The science is clear: The earth is round, the sky is blue, and #vaccineswork. Let's protect all our kids. #GrandmothersKnowBest," she wrote.

An 'exploratory committee' in name only

Clinton is likely to launch an exploratory committee or other placeholder entity in early April, to take advantage of most or all of the federal campaign fundraising period that begins April 1, four strategists and supporters said.

The details of what kind of entity she should launch are still under debate among close advisers, strategists said. They requested anonymity because Clinton is still considering her choices and has made it clear that she wants to keep most of the deliberations private.

An exploratory committee would function as a de-facto announcement, but Clinton could then take her time establishing muscular organizations in Iowa, New Hampshire and other key states, one Democratic strategist supporting her said.

"She wouldn't really be exploring anything," the strategist said.

A "leadership" PAC would be another way of planting her campaign flag without announcing a formal Clinton for President organization, and money that a PAC took in would not count against the federal totals for what individuals may give directly to campaigns.

But it now appears less likely that Clinton would form her own political action committee, strategists said. That is mostly because, like an incumbent, Clinton already has a ready political network and no fear of running out of money.

It is still quite possible that Clinton would skip the stutter-step approach and simply announce her full-fledged presidential campaign this spring.

The Obama connection

Much of the political machinery that helped get Obama elected twice has already swung behind a Clinton candidacy — adding to the feel of quasi-incumbency.

Podesta is advising her unofficially and is expected to become the campaign chairman. He has already announced that he will leave the White House within weeks. White House communications director Jennifer Palmieri is expected to assume the same title for the Clinton campaign in March or April.

Collectively, Clinton's team represents a break from the past. With few exceptions, none of the new team played the most senior roles in her 2008 campaign, and many worked actively against her as part of the Obama operation. More hiring is underway, filling out press, research, digital, political, field and other departments.

Clinton is revamping her communications and press strategy after a 2008 campaign marked by toxic relations between the campaign and the press. Joel Benenson, an Obama pollster now serving as a chief Clinton adviser, Palmieri and Podesta all have good relationships with reporters.

Recent discussions among the Clinton cadre have centered on ways she can communicate through the political press and in spite of it, strategists said, including ways she can exploit social-media outlets that did not exist when she ran in 2008.

Benenson is leading some of the discussions about communications strategy and other topics, two people familiar with recent meetings said. Clinton has ruled out the idea of locating her campaign headquarters in White Plains, N.Y., near her suburban home in Chappaqua; the office will be in Manhattan or Brooklyn, strategists said.

Close, but not too close

Ahead of an announcement, Clinton aides and advisers are charting the issues and policies where Clinton might break with Obama. One strategist advising Clinton said the differences will showcase some of Clinton's more populist and "base-friendly" domestic-policy ideas in the absence of strong primary opposition.

Speaking in Canada last month, Clinton said that although she credits Obama with leading the country out of a deep recession, "I would have differences, everybody would have differences, about what else could have been done."

This version of Total Mail Converter is not registered.

She has also hinted that she will cast her national-security leadership as more sure-footed than Obama's. A telling remark to the Atlantic magazine last summer about Obama's trademark caution on foreign affairs later brought an apology.

"Great nations need organizing principles, and 'Don't do stupid stuff' is not an organizing principle," she had said.

At the same time, Democratic strategists said, no one wants a repeat of the awkward 2000 campaign, when Al Gore, the sitting vice president, appeared to stiff-arm President Bill Clinton. Obama is said to be prepared to do whatever he can do to help her.

Republicans are ready to pounce on any attempt to portray her as an outsider after more than two decades in official Washington. Her advisers assume that Republican criticism will only intensify and serve a purpose similar to the primary season as a proving ground.

Clinton's circle also dislikes comparisons to incumbency, insisting that she will campaign hard and on her own terms.

"You can't be something you aren't," Clinton spokesman Nick Merrill said. "She's not an incumbent and wouldn't run as one. Make no mistake, if she runs, she will present solutions to our toughest challenges, she will take nothing for granted, and she will fight for every vote."

This version of Total Mail Converter is not registered.

Behind Hillary Clinton's 2016 campaign launch window (MSNBC)

By Alex Seitz-Wald
February 6, 2015
MSNBC

Hillary Clinton is running for president, so when does she plan to tell the world? It's one of the biggest questions in politics right now. Speculation originally focused on January, before turning to April, and now even July – but why not anytime in between those months?

"Clinton does not want a repeat of 2008 this time around."

Launching a presidential campaign is like launching a rocket – there's a ton of careful preparation and you have to wait for a window to open before conditions are right. But instead of planetary movements, a campaign launch window is determined by the cyclical nature of federal elections laws and the power of money in modern American politics.

Every four months, presidential campaigns are required to report their fundraising hauls for the previous quarter to the Federal Election Commission. Campaigns want as much time as possible to show strong results in those end-of-the-quarter reports, so an ideal launch window opens on the first day of every new quarter, and begins closing at the end of that month as it gets closer and closer to the deadline for reporting fundraising figures.

That's why, when Clinton ruled out a January (the beginning of the first quarter) campaign launch, advisers and outside speculation immediately turned to April, which is the beginning of the second quarter. And when some Clinton allies recently started urging another postponement, speculation immediately turned towards July, the beginning of the third quarter. Launching in, say, June would be malpractice, insiders say, since her campaign would have only half as much time to raise money.

This also helps explain why Clinton's potential primary opponents are almost all saying they'll make a decision on their own runs in March or "spring," in time for the April launch window.

For Republican hopefuls, who are a facing a fluid and crowded presidential primary field, other considerations might be more important than maximizing their first fundraising window.

But for Clinton, who has time on her side and can set the pace of the Democratic primary at her leisure, insiders say the reporting window is critical. She knows all too well just how important a presidential campaign's first finance report can be.

During her 2008 presidential bid, the first major sign that Clinton was in mortal trouble came from her first fundraising report to the FEC. To great fanfare, her campaign unveiled that they had raked in a whopping $36 million in the first four months since Clinton announced her candidacy in January of 2007. It turned out that only about $20 million of that was actually raised during the previous quarter for the primary campaign, though even that number was still seen as impressive.

But four days later, Obama stunned the political world with his own eye-popping number: $23.5 million. For a first-term senator who, despite all his natural talents, was not given much of a chance when it came to fundraising against the Clinton juggernaut, the number was a sign of unexpected strength that immediately put him on the same level as the far more experienced Clinton.

Voters are hardly paying attention this early in the race, and probably don't care how much a campaign raises in their first four months of operation, but early fundraising is key to the so-called "invisible primary," when candidates jockey for money and endorsements. A strong number that surpasses expectations can open new doors (and checkbooks) for an underdog candidate, while a weak number can pull the rug out from under a frontrunner.

Clinton does not want a repeat of 2008 this time around.

Fortunately for Clinton, she has a massive network of eager donors ready to open their checkbooks the moment she gets in the race. Unfortunately for her, even if none of her potential 2016 primary opponents raise anywhere near the money Obama did, the high expectations that come from her prohibitive frontrunner status mean Clinton is under pressure to report an enormous figure in her first haul.

While allies are loath to speculate about specific numbers, some worry that anything less than historic will be seen as a disappointment.

This version of Total Mail Converter is not registered.

Unchartered Territory: Why Hillary Isn't Your Typical Frontrunner (NBC News)

By Mark Murray
February 6, 2015
NBC News

As the 2016 presidential contest continues to take shape, Hillary Clinton appears to be in an extraordinary position - the former secretary of state is essentially running more as a White House incumbent (a la Barack Obama in 2012 or George W. Bush in 2004) than your traditional candidate for an open-seat race.

And her quasi-incumbent status gives her some clear advantages and disadvantages.

While Clinton still isn't officially a presidential candidate, consider these past actions:

> She's lured President Obama's campaign pollster, Joel Benenson, to do her polling;
> She's added Obama's media consultant, Jim Margolis;
> And most recently, she's bringing in the president's current communications director, Jennifer Palmieri, to handle press relations.

This isn't a presidential candidate who's starting from scratch; rather, it's someone who is surrounding herself with the current term-limited president's team.

Perhaps more significantly - and more like a presidential incumbent - she is facing little to no primary opposition.

That's in contrast to the last two clear frontrunners who tried to succeed their party's term-limited president: George H.W. Bush (who in 1988 received a challenge from Bob Dole) and Al Gore (who got one from Bill Bradley).

Yes, Clinton could very well face challenges from Democrats like former Maryland Gov. Martin O'Malley, Sen. Bernie Sanders, D-Vt., or former Sen. Jim Webb, D-Va. But as of now, it seems very unlikely that Vice President Joe Biden or Sen. Elizabeth Warren, D-Mass., will run if Clinton is in the race. Indeed, Hillary Clinton also enlisting Warren's top strategist Mandy Grunwald is the latest sign that Warren isn't running.

And then there's the polling: A recent Des Moines Register/Bloomberg poll found Clinton ahead in Iowa by 40 points from her nearest competition (Warren). And a WMUR Granite State poll had Clinton up by 44 points in New Hampshire.

Advantages and disadvantages to Clinton's position

Of course, as we've seen in the past, an incumbent president running for re-election has advantages and disadvantages.

The advantages: You get to focus solely on the general election and don't have to spend precious resources in fighting back against your own party. You get to avoid the intra-party fights and attacks, which tend to resurface in the general (the 2012 attacks on Mitt Romney's work at Bain Capital first came from primary opponent Newt Gingrich). And you get the party's organization and leaders behind you from the get-go.

The disadvantages: You don't get to make the deep personal connections with voters in Iowa and New Hampshire (both of which are general-election battlegrounds) that you do when there's a truly contested race. You're a bit rustier at debates (see Obama's experience in 2012). And your fortunes are more tied to the overall fundamentals and external events (Is the economy growing? What is the president's approval rating? Is there new instability at home or abroad?).

Unchartered territory

But what's clear is that Clinton is about to set course in unchartered territory for presidential aspirants - with the party's baton passed to her before the race truly even begins.

"History suggests that in open presidential nomination contests, front-runners rarely go from the starting line to the finish without losing a few primaries or caucuses along the way," political analyst Charlie Cook writes. "Usually the leader stumbles, or a protest vote develops somewhere in the process, or another candidate catches a bit of luck or sparks a bit of interest."

In 2016, it's likely - if not a slam dunk - that Hillary Clinton will have the Democratic field and party pretty mostly to herself during the primary season. Unless something surprising happens, there isn't going to be much of a Democratic primary race.

How Clinton fares after that is anyone's guess.

This version of Total Mail Converter is not registered.

Mandy Grunwald, Once and Future Clinton Consultant, Is A Pop Culture Archetype (Bloomberg)

By Emily Greenhouse
February 6, 2015
Bloomberg

The New York Times reported Friday that Mandy Grunwald is expected to join Hillary Clinton's still-unofficial presidential campaign, as a senior advisor for communications. Grunwald has been working for another formidable female politician, as a top strategist to Sen. Elizabeth Warren of Massachussetts. With this move, Grunwald becomes yet another link between Clinton 2016 and Clinton 1992.

When Grunwald was a girl, on the Upper East Side and Martha's Vineyard, she used to make place cards to show Barbara Walters and Mike Wallace where to sit at the dinner table. Her father, Henry Grunwald, was the editor of Time magazine, and this was the kind of company he kept. "It actually was a great childhood for what I'm doing," she said, in 1999, "because nobody intimidates you." That's a useful character trait if you're a communications consultant, especially if your job involves consulting for a Clinton—or, as Grunwald has, both.

It is an understatement to say that Grunwald is famously tough. Her sister, Lisa, a novelist, once described her as "Older. Braver. Taller. Meaner. Stronger." Grunwald's reputation among political reporters is part ingenue and part dragon lady: untouchable, ferocious, whichever the lens. Hillary must hope that'll rub off.

After graduating from college, Grunwald got a job at Sawyer Miller, a New York political consulting and strategic communications firm. Then she joined Bill Clinton's 1992 presidential campaign, as director of advertising. (Jim Margolis, who is expected to run Hillary's advertising operation, is another veteran of Bill '92.) The strategist Paul Begala described her, then, as "the only Harvard-educated, genius level IQ I know who enjoys reading People magazine. I mean, I don't care about Sally Fields' eating disorder. But Mandy reads all of it."

Grunwald used her pop predilections to help put a glamorous sheen on her Arkansas charge, pushing him to play his saxophone on Arsenio, among other campaign moments. She was a midwife of "The Man From Hope," the short biographical film that, along with the charisma candidate, headlined the 1992 Democratic National Convention. It showed a high-school aged Clinton, a delegate to Boys Nation, meeting President Kennedy in the White House Rose Garden.

That same year, Grunwald went on "Nightline" to defend Clinton, who was facing accusations from Gennifer Flowers. Ted Koppel told her, "You've done a very effective job of putting me on the defensive." Begala observed, "in her calm, low voice and her upper-class pearls, she just cut Koppel's throat." It was all offensive; another time, she helped Clinton frame an interview with Koppel by saying to him, "You know, governor, it seems to me that the only two times you've been invited on 'Nightline' was to talk about a woman you never slept with and a draft you never dodged." Her zinger was the night's lasting sound bite.

Despite her loyalty, after the failure of health care reform, and after the Republicans took over Congress, Bill Clinton pushed her out. But Hillary kept her close. She threw Grunwald a baby shower, at the White House. And then a couple of years later, Grunwald advised Hillary on her 2000 Senate campaign. Hillary won.

Grunwald is said to be the inspiration for the character Dr. Madeline "Mandy" Hampton in The West Wing, a savvy, shrewd media and politics consultant who loves fast cars and clashes with White House Deputy Chief of Staff Josh Lyman, a former flame. The actress who played her, Moira Kelly, described Mandy (the character): "She's a fighter in a difficult business and has a lot of strength." But Mandy Hampton got cut after the "West Wing"'s maiden season.

A character in Primary Colors, the political roman à clef published by an anonymous author in January 1996, also reminded many of Grunwald: Daisy Green, the campaign media advisor. Primary Colors had alarming insight, not to mention access, into the Clinton sphere, and a good many suspected that Lisa Grunwald may have written it, with input from her older sister. But Donald Foster, a Vassar professor high off proving that a little-known funeral elegy "must have been written by Shakespeare," thought it "not very likely" that the book was written by a woman. Writing for New York magazine that February, he said there were only "two kinds of females" in the book: "bitches and bimbos." This didn't totally square with the fact that perhaps the most sympathetic character in the book is a woman: Daisy.

In a sidebar to Foster's article, Jacob Weisberg wrote that Grunwald "is not, shall we say, universally beloved. Most people found it so strange to read a flattering portrayal of her—in a vicious satire, no less" that they figured her sister Lisa was the story-crafter. But, Weisberg writes, ascribing authorship to the reporter Joe Klein, as well as the male-author tendencies, "resolves this problem. He and Grunwald are close friends."

That July, Klein finally admitted that he was Anonymous. He wrote a new afterword to the book, and noted that Daisy Green "had the same job Mandy Grunwald filled in the Clinton campaign but who wasn't Mandy at all." But Klein came to explain the book as the product, in part, of conversations with Grunwald: the two "often talked about the lameness" of political fiction. No one, he wrote, "had ever captured the intensity, velocity, and insanity of political campaigns in the television age, and so I decided to give it a try."

In the film version, Maura Tierney played Daisy, that protector of Southern Governor Jack Stanton, Clinton à la John Travolta. Tierney's Daisy is a sassy, no-nonsense, ever-present figure, wearing overalls on the campaign couch. She yells, crumples, and claps at the TV, or she stands nonchalant when Stanton emerges, tie untied, shirt unbuttoned, from a hotel room with Allison Janney (another West Wing star). Daisy knows when to look away. But she's got a feminist edge to her, too: When a fellow staffer asks her to fetch this or that thing, she replies, tartly, "only if you pinch my cheeks and call me sugar."

In one scene, Daisy sits with other campaign strategists on a bed, worried about how to avoid—and control—spin. One guy seems ready to give up. But Daisy says: “Well, all right then, let’s just quit. If everyone’s gonna take a bite out of him and we’re not gonna say anything, let’s just go work for someone we’re not too chickenshit to protect.”

This version of Total Mail Converter is not registered.

In Klein’s afterword he writes that, before he came out as the author, Grunwald asked him if he had “read this book that people are saying you wrote.” Rather than reply directly, Klein pinged the question right back at her. He wrote that he and Grunwald were so close that she “assumed I would have told her if I’d actually written it.” She does seem like a woman who’s usually in the know.

This version of Total Mail Converter is not registered.

EXCLUSIVE: Hillary Clinton searching for 100,000 square feet of city office space for huge presidential campaign headquarters (NY Daily News)

By Annie Karni
February 6, 2015
New York Daily News

Hillary Clinton is searching for over 100,000 square feet of office space in New York City to house her presidential campaign headquarters, the Daily News has learned — a huge office equivalent in size to at least three full floors at 1 World Trade Center.

Clinton's camp is working with brokers at the CBRE real estate firm, sources said, and searching in Brooklyn and Queens.

The team is eyeing space in downtown Brooklyn, specifically the MetroTech complex near Borough Hall and 1 Pierrepont Plaza in Brooklyn Heights.

The Clinton team is also considering Long Island City, Queens.

Leases for 100,000 square feet or over in New York City are sometimes referred to by brokers as "mega deals."

"For Brooklyn or Queens it's a very large lease," said Mark Weiss, vice chairman at Newmark Grubb Knight Frank.

But it could prove difficult to find the right building.

"It's going to be hard for a landlord to get their arms around it — the credit quality of any political campaign is generally not very strong," Weiss said. "It doesn't lend anything to the cache of a building to have a political headquarters. There's no permanence to the tenancy. It doesn't elevate the patina of a building in any way."

It may just depend on finding the right landlord, who is "ready for Hillary."

"Is it cool for a landlord to say Hillary Clinton is my tenant? Yeah, that's cool," Weiss said. "Especially if she becomes the next President."

This version of Total Mail Converter is not registered.

Hillary Clinton: Grandmother in Chief (The Atlantic)

By Peter Beinart

February 6, 2015

The Atlantic

On Monday, when Hillary Clinton issued a pro-vaccination tweet with the hashtag #GrandmothersKnowBest," journalists quickly spotted a potential theme for her presidential run. For Hillary's sake, I hope they're right. Because in 2016, grandmotherhood may help her convey the quality that she so disastrously failed to convey for much of 2007 and 2008: authenticity.

It's easy to mock Hillary's constant talk about the obligations of grandmotherhood, but it comes with an intriguing backstory: She had lousy grandmothers herself. In her memoir Living History, Hillary's descriptions of her own grandmothers are harsh. On page two, she says that her maternal grandmother, Della Murray, "essentially abandoned my mother [Dorothy Howell Rodham] when she was only three or four, leaving her alone all day for days on end." At age eight, Della sent Dorothy to live with relatives. They reunited ten years later, but when Dorothy realized that Della "wanted her only as a housekeeper and that she would get no financial help for college," they parted ways again.

Hillary's own memories of Della are also strikingly negative. She remembers her maternal grandmother "as a weak and self-indulgent woman, wrapped up in television soap operas and disengaged from reality." When Hillary was ten, and Della was babysitting, "I was hit in the eye by a chain-link gate…I ran home three blocks, crying and holding my head as blood streamed down my face. When Della saw me, she fainted." Then "when Della revived, she complained that I had scared her and that she could have gotten hurt when she fell over."

Hillary is critical of her paternal grandmother too. She calls Hannah Jones Rodham—father of Hillary's father, Hugh Rodham Sr.—"a determined woman whose energies and intelligence had little outlet, which led to her meddling in everyone else's business." And she remarks that, "I believe my father knew that he had to make a break from Hannah if he was ever to live his own life."

It's clear from Hillary's memoir that she feels sadness, even anger, about the absence of more caring, competent grandmothers from her own life. Her current paeans to their importance, therefore, may be a bit like Barack Obama's lectures on the necessity of fathers. Behind the political positioning lies a conviction born of personal pain.

Emphasizing grandmotherhood may be authentic for Hillary in another way too. In the popular imagination, grandmothers are both caring and conservative. They dote on their grandchildren while also tut-tutting about a culture gone awry. They are pro-family in both the liberal and conservative senses of the world.

That's a good persona for Hillary because it reflects what she actually believes. Even Hillary's critics acknowledge that her devotion to the welfare of children runs very deep. At Yale Law School, she made children's rights the focus of her studies, and in her first job in Washington, working for what would become the Children's Defense Fund, Hillary investigated the appalling conditions endured by the children of migrant workers. In Carl Bernstein's biography, A Woman in Charge, Hillary's friend Nancy Bekavic says, "I remember being struck by this aggressive, ambitious, bright woman who studied child development and cared about children. It was unusual in some ways. Every young woman was running away from, you know, childhood and family issues. Jesus Christ, the last thing you wanted to do was family law … It was very unusual."

When Hillary burst onto the national scene in the 1990s, her work on children gained national attention. But because of the blowback she provoked as the first non-homemaker First Lady, the nature of that work was frequently distorted. The right portrayed her as a cultural radical who wanted children to be able to sue their parents.

In 2016, however, Hillary may be more effective in conveying her real attitudes toward children and families, which are anything but radical. In part, that's because high-profile working women are somewhat less threatening than they were twenty years ago. But it's also because running as a grandmother may help voters see the cultural conservatism that has been part of Hillary's worldview all along.

This version of Total Mail Converter is not registered.

In his biography, Bernstein quotes a former Clinton administration aide calling Hillary "a very judgmental Methodist from the Midwest." And it's true. Hillary's most important mentor growing up was a local youth minister. Despite attending college and law school in the late 1960s, she never touched drugs. And while working on George McGovern's 1972 presidential campaign, according to Bernstein, she carried a heavily marked-up Bible around everywhere.

In 1994, according to Sally Bedell Smith's book, For Love of Politics, Hillary said she was "not comfortable" with distributing condoms in schools. Hillary promoted abstinence from pre-marital sex in her 1996 book, It Takes a Village, and surprised many reporters by declaring in a 2005 speech to family planning activists that, "Research shows that the primary reason that teenage girls abstain is because of their religious and moral values. We should embrace this—and support programs that reinforce the idea that abstinence at a young age is not just the smart thing to do, it is the right thing to do." In It Takes a Village, Hillary is also critical of adults for being too quick to divorce, declaring that, "Children without fathers, or whose parents float in and out of their lives after divorce, are precarious little boats in the most turbulent seas."

Part of Hillary's challenge in 2016 is mobilizing progressives excited by the prospect of a woman president without mobilizing conservatives who see her as a threat to traditional morality, as she did in the 1990s. Changing times make that easier: Ambitious women are a little less scary now. But so does her new role as grandmother. For decades now, Hillary has been insisting that she's a trailblazer and a traditionalist all at the same time. Now, by running as a grandmother, she may finally make Americans believe her.

This version of Total Mail Converter is not registered.

New Hampshire, and the case for Hillary Clinton not quite being 'inevitable' (WAPO)

By Scott Clement
February 6, 2015
The Washington Post

New Hampshire has been very good to the Clintons, making Bill Clinton the "comeback kid" in its 1992 primary and helping Hillary Clinton to a badly needed victory after Barack Obama won Iowa in 2008. And Hillary Clinton is a strong favorite there again this year -- as she is nearly everywhere.

But as we enter the 2016 campaign, it's worth remembering that New Hampshire likes to surprise us. And there are plenty of reasons to keep an eye on the Granite State when it comes to Clinton's supposed "inevitability" as the Democratic nominee.

Despite vast coverage of Clinton's dominance in lining up for a presidential run, three in four likely New Hampshire Democratic primary voters in a new WMUR Granite State Poll say they're "still trying to decide" who they'll vote for in the state's 2016 primary. Just 7 percent say they've "definitely decided."

The widespread lack of commitment in the poll, conducted by the University of New Hampshire, is unsurprising roughly one year before voting. But it is a reminder there's ample room for volatility in a Democratic race which thus far has looked like a looming Clinton rout. People are at least open-minded.

Between the courting of top strategists and Democratic donors, polls asking how Democrats would vote "if the election were held today" have found Clinton dominating other hopefuls. Indeed, 58 percent in the same sample of Democrats said they would support Clinton today, with Sen. Elizabeth Warren (D-Mass.) in a distant second at 14 percent and Vice President Biden at 8 percent. This does not imply much hemming and hawing, but the "still trying to decide" number assures she hasn't put the Democratic nomination on ice just yet (nor should we expect her to have done so).

The lack of final decision is not itself worrisome for Clinton; voters simply don't decide this early. At this point in 2011, the Republican field was in a very similar situation, with 78 percent of Republican likely voters in February 2011 survey still trying to decide who to support -- even as Mitt Romney held a 30-point lead over other potential contenders in a state he wound up dominating in 2012. Romney won by 16 points over Ron Paul, smaller than his initial edge but still a no-doubted from the beginning.

But the survey offers other clues as to Clinton's vulnerabilities among primary voters and makes clear Democratic voters are not thrilled about their options so far. Fewer than one in five Democrats say they're "very satisfied" with the choice of candidates for the Democratic nomination (18 percent); 63 percent take poll choice equivalent of "meh," saying they are "somewhat satisfied." And despite nearly six in 10 preferring her to other Democrats, just 32 percent say she is the most likable and 31 percent say she's the most believable. No other candidate, though, beats her on these attributes.

The rest of the poll is gravy for Clinton's prospects, and bodes particularly poorly for Joe Biden, one of her strongest potential rivals. More than eight in 10 have a favorable impression of her (83 percent) and just 9 percent are unfavorable -- by far the best favorable-unfavorable margin (+74). Others like Warren and Sanders are similarly well-liked by those who know them, but aren't as well-known.

Biden's image is weaker according to the poll. His favorability margin is a modest +23 (53 percent favorable/30 percent unfavorable), which far weaker than Warren or Clinton and worse than surveys by the same pollster in October and July (+32 and +47 favorability margins, respectively.) Biden is less popular in New Hampshire than Iowa, where a Des Moines Register/ Bloomberg Politics poll found a 78/20 percent favorable/unfavorable split on general impressions.

The poll underscores how much Clinton's candidacy banks on other Democrats failing to make strong impression ahead of primaries this fall, and the importance of maintaining her own positive image. When New Hampshire voters do begin to decide, she'll want voters' opinions to look a lot they do right now.

The WMUR Granite State poll was conducted on landline and cellular phones Jan. 22 to Feb. 3 among a random sample of 297 likely voters in the 2016 New Hampshire Democratic primary. The margin of sampling error is 5.7 percentage points.

This version of Total Mail Converter is not registered.

Why Hillary Clinton needs Taraji P. Henson (WAPO)

By Nia-Malika Henderson
February 6, 2015
The Washington Post

This week, a long list of artists declared that they were on Team Warren for 2016. To a certain set, this was evidence of the very kind of buzz Warren would need (if she weren't pretty clearly not running for president): Galvanize artists and Hollywood/ liberal types, add social media, and voila.

Team Obama mastered that strategy, with a chorus of very prominent pop-culture figures serving as kind of sixth men for both of his runs. Warren's artist's list is far less prominent, of course (sorry Mark Ruffalo), but you get the idea.

The Warren list comes as Hillary Clinton is busy assembling her 2016 campaign team, a move that has not come without scrutiny. Full of Obama retreads and not exactly diverse, a 2008 supporter described it as "tired and predictable."

Ready for Hillary, meanwhile, has been busy reaching out to black pastors, according to BuzzFeed. Networking with "black leaders" is part of Clinton's and her husband's strategy as well. Bill Clinton is constantly in touch with black elected officials, and they have sought to repair whatever fallout from 2008 might still exist by courting black pastors.

Anybody else have deja vu? It isn't that these efforts can't be useful; it is rather that they amount to the kind of dated box-checking that doomed Clinton's candidacy in 2008. She might have had prominent Harlem pastor Calvin Butts in her corner back then, but Obama had Harlem in his. It was a cultural endorsement, underscored by Jay-Z and Kerry Washington and Scarlett Johansson, that helped give him an edge and a buzz that Clinton never had.

Which brings us to the hit Fox show "Empire" and Taraji P. Henson. (Bear with us.) This show has buzz and ratings in spades. It is terrific and over the top and addictive. And it's largely because of Henson, who plays ex-con/music mogul "Cookie" with a fierce assurance that makes her the emotional center of the show. She should be in every scene of every show on television.

Now, viewers (11 million and counting) know that President Obama has had a bit part in the show. Lucious Lyon, the head of Empire Records who is played by Terrence Howard, has the president on speed dial. They are on such familiar terms that Lyon seems to0 busy to be bothered with an invitation to a state dinner.

"Tell Barack that, yes, but this is the last one for the next few months," Lyon says one of the early scenes of the first show.

Obama "appears," yet again, when Lyon's young rapper son calls the president a sell-out in a social media ploy:

This storyline sparked an unexpected backlash.

Henson's response? "It's art, baby!" So Cookie.

Imagining that Clinton will become a plot line on "Empire" is not beyond the realm of possibility, given the Obama angle. Granted, it's a bigger stretch; Clinton isn't exactly the hip-hop secretary of state. But cultivating a circle of cultural ambassadors in the mold of Henson -- if not Henson, specifically -- would be very smart for Team Clinton.

Obama had Beyonce. Clinton should call Cookie.

This version of Total Mail Converter is not registered.

Clinton, Bush strongest contenders; Ohio a key state for 2016 presidential election (Dayton Daily News)

By Laura A. Bischoff
February 6, 2015
Dayton Daily News

COLUMBUS -- A Clinton-Bush matchup for the 2016 presidential race seems to be shaping up, according to a new poll released Wednesday by Quinnipiac University.

Former Secretary of State Hillary Clinton, if she decides to run for president, is the choice for more than half of Democratic voters in key swing states of Ohio, Florida and Pennsylvania, according to the poll.

If Clinton opts out, Vice President Joe Biden leads the pack with tallies ranging from 28 percent to 39 percent.

"Hillary Clinton has an overwhelming lead and currently no serious challengers," said assistant poll director Peter Brown in a written statement. "Should she decide not to run, the field could grow like a weed. If she stays in, the numbers indicate she has nothing to worry about when it comes to the Democratic nomination."

On the Republican side, former Florida Gov. Jeb Bush is the front runner in a potential presidential primaries in Florida, the poll found. Since 1960, no candidate has won the White House without taking at least two of these three states.

With 2012 GOP presidential nominee Mitt Romney out of the 2016 Republican primary race, Bush would win 32 percent in Florida, 10 percent in Ohio and 12 percent in Pennsylvania.

"Taken as a whole, there is no clear leader for the Republican presidential nomination in these three critical swing states. Former Gov. Jeb Bush is way ahead in Florida with almost a third of the vote, but no candidate is in comparable situation in Ohio or Pennsylvania," Brown added. "In fact, four candidates are in low double-digits in Ohio and just three in Pennsylvania. Bush is the only one in double digits in all three states, but barely so."

In Ohio, Gov. John Kasich would win 14 percent of Republican voters while Wisconsin Gov. Scott Walker would earn 11 percent. Bush and U.S. Sen. Rand Paul of Kentucky would each garner 10 percent.

In Ohio, Clinton has support from 51 percent of Democrats, Massachusetts Sen. Elizabeth Warren has 14 percent and Biden has 7 percent. If Clinton doesn't run, Biden's support in Ohio climbs to 28 percent and Warren's goes up to 24 percent.

"The big question in Ohio is whether Gov. John Kasich runs. If so, the data indicates that he would be a formidable competitor in his home state. This Swing State Poll, however, indicates that he has a long, long way to go in Florida and Pennsylvania," Brown said.

This version of Total Mail Converter is not registered.

Hillary Clinton is in much better shape with a key demographic than she ever was in 2008 (Fusion)

By Brett LoGiurato
February 6, 2015
Fusion

One of the potential hiccups with an all-but-certain Hillary Clinton campaign for president in 2016 is a perceived problem with young voters.

There's good precedent for this perception: In 2008, the last time she ran for president, Clinton was walloped by President Barack Obama among youth voters in the Democratic primary. He tripled her share of the youth vote in Iowa, prompting a top Clinton adviser to famously say, "Our people look like caucus-goers and his people look like they are 18."

But a new poll released Friday finds that, so far, Clinton is avoiding that trip heading into 2016. The poll, from the University of New Hampshire and WMUR, shows Clinton with not only a commanding lead among young voters in the state. It also shows young voters as her biggest supporters.

The 18-34 age group is the one that appears most firm about voting for Clinton in a 2016 Democratic primary. Three-quarters of that group says they would vote for her if the Democratic primary were held today. Just 9 percent choose Sen. Elizabeth Warren (D-Massachusetts), a liberal firebrand who has repeatedly said she won't run for president. And 4 percent would vote for Vice President Joe Biden.

The results align with those from Fusion's Massive Millennial Poll, which surveyed 1000 people aged 18-34 about everything from politics to dating to race issues. The poll found 38 percent of the millennials surveyed — including 57 percent of millennial Democrats surveyed in the poll.

Clinton has bigger problems — if they can be called problems — with the 50-and-over crowd of the possible Democratic primary voters in New Hampshire, who carried her to a surprise victory there in 2008. That year, more than two-thirds of Democratic primary voters were over the age of 40. She beat Obama by at least 9 points among the age 40-49, 50-64, and 65-and-over age groups.

This time, according to the UNH/WBUR poll, her lead is smaller than with young voters. But she still leads Warren by at least 30 points in each age group.

Some liberal groups have continued their efforts to push Warren into the race, even as she has become more firm in saying she will not challenge Clinton. This week, the "Run Warren Run" campaign — which is being led by the groups Democracy for America and MoveOn.org Political Action — announced the opening of a field office in New Hampshire.

The group, which already has offices in the early-caucus state of Iowa, said it plans to open more offices in New Hampshire. It also hired a New Hampshire state director for its campaign. It's being led mostly by younger activists who want Clinton to face a primary challenge.

This version of Total Mail Converter is not registered.

Elizabeth Warren's top media consultant isn't ready for Warren (Vox)

By Matthew Yglesia

February 6, 2015

Vox

An awful lot of people in progressive politics would like to see Elizabeth Warren run for president, but the latest sign that it's not going to happen is a big one — Mandy Grunwald is joining Hillary Clinton's team.

That's not a shocking move. Grunwald worked on Bill Clinton's 1992 campaign and Hillary Clinton's 2000 Senate campaign. So she's a natural fit for Clinton.

But she was also the top paid media consultant for Warren's 2012 Senate campaign. To take the leap from the Senate to the White House, you need to build on and expand your political team — not watch it shrink as key personnel drift off to other campaigns.

To be clear, this isn't so much bad news for Warren — who has genuinely never given any indication that she's wanted to challenge Clinton — as it is for the circle of people who've latched on Warren as the hypothetical Clinton-slayer of their dreams.

It shows that Warren is not laying the groundwork for a campaign, and that Clinton really and truly does have the Democratic Party's top operatives lined up behind her.

This version of Total Mail Converter is not registered.

Working Families Party considering backing Sen. Elizabeth Warren instead of Hillary Clinton (NY Daily News)

By Annie Karni
February 6, 2015
NY Daily News

In a sign of the growing pressure Hillary Clinton faces from the left, the Working Families Party is considering backing the movement to draft Sen. Elizabeth Warren to run for President, the Daily News has learned.

One person said the effort was not so much a bid to get the Massachusetts senator to run but to "Warrenize Hillary" by pushing her to adopt more liberal policies.

At a meeting of the WFP's advisory council last week, executive committee members wanted to bring the idea to a vote, sources said.

Those pushing to publicly back Warren — who has said she will not run for President — included Communications Workers of America, a union that represents 70,000 local members; the labor-backed New York Communities for Change; and the community group Make the Road New York.

"It was clear that CWA, Make the Road and NYCC wanted to leave the meeting saying, 'We want to support Warren,'" a source said.

In a sign of the growing pressure Hillary Clinton faces from the left, the Working Families Party is considering backing the movement to draft Sen. Elizabeth Warren to run for President, the Daily News has learned.

One person said the effort was not so much a bid to get the Massachusetts senator to run but to "Warrenize Hillary" by pushing her to adopt more liberal policies.

At a meeting of the WFP's advisory council last week, executive committee members wanted to bring the idea to a vote, sources said.

Those pushing to publicly back Warren — who has said she will not run for President — included Communications Workers of America, a union that represents 70,000 local members; the labor-backed New York Communities for Change; and the community group Make the Road New York.

"It was clear that CWA, Make the Road and NYCC wanted to leave the meeting saying, 'We want to support Warren,'" a source said.

That pressure comes even from Clinton supporters who want to help elect the most progressive version of the centrist Democrat possible.

Another source at the meeting stressed: "Not a single bad word was uttered about Hillary."

Clinton has yet to announce her assumed presidential run.

MoveOn.org and the PAC Democracy for America in December launched the "Run Warren Run" campaign.

The campaign "is 100% focused on getting Elizabeth Warren into the race," said Democracy for America spokesman Neil Sroka. "As an added benefit, it also shows whoever ends up being the nominee that there's a strong grassroots movement that wants a candidate focused on income inequality issues from Day One."

The group has reached out to unions and elected leaders about joining the movement.

"I was happy to hear the WFP is evening considering this issue," Sroka said. "You can be fans of Clinton and also want to see Warren in this race. A battle of ideas only makes the Democratic party stronger."

This version of Total Mail Converter is not registered.

Biden to make Iowa trip next week (Des Moines Register)

By Jennifer Jacobs
February 6, 2015
Des Moines Register

Joe Biden, the vice president and an underdog for the race for the Democratic presidential nomination, is scheduled to be back in Iowa next week.

Biden will speak in Des Moines on Thursday, sources familiar with preparations for his trip told The Des Moines Register. His office later confirmed that he will deliver remarks at Drake University and do a roundtable at Des Moines Area Community College on college affordability.

The news comes in the wake of the release this past weekend of a new Iowa Poll that shows Biden trails both Hillary Clinton and Elizabeth Warren in the horse race for most popular presidential pick among likely Democratic caucusgoers.

Biden's timing suggests he wants to keep his name in circulation as presidential material - any time top-shelf politicians make a trip here it reinforces the notion that they harbor aspirations for the top job. He is currently in Belgium, meeting with European leaders in part to talk about sanctions against Russia and security and aid to Ukraine. He'll also attend a security summit in Germany.

Democrats generally think the 2016 Democratic nomination is Clinton's if she wants it, although she has yet to announce an official candidacy. In September, Biden made headlines for chasing Clinton here just three days after she made her Iowa comeback after a seven-year absence; she spoke before an audience of 10,000 and a horde of media at the Harkin Steak Fry.

Biden's event Thursday, like the one in September, will be an official White House trip to talk about the Obama administration's economic policies. Biden remarks in September, with the Iowa Capitol in the background, had the air of a campaign stump speech, as he called for raising the minimum wage and making life better for the middle class.

Biden, 72, was here more recently, in late October, to campaign in Davenport for two Iowa Democrats who were running for federal office, Dave Loebsack, who was re-elected to Congress, and Bruce Braley, who lost his bid for U.S. Senate.

This will be Biden's fourth post-2012 trip here. He spoke at the 2013 Harkin Steak Fry, and he did a private event with invited guests at Des Moines' ballpark, Principal Park, beforehand.

Biden has a network of connections in Iowa after running for president here in both 1987 and 2007, then campaigning extensively with President Barack Obama in 2008 and 2012.

Known as a champion for the middle class and an expert on foreign policy, Biden has been described by Iowa Democrats as forceful, engaging and direct, but also has a reputation for long-windedness and verbal gaffes collectively known as Bidenisms. An Iowa Poll in September 2012 found that 47 percent of Iowans considered Biden a drag on the ticket.

Among Democratic activists, opinions of him are high, the new Iowa Poll shows. He's viewed favorably by 78 percent of likely 2016 Democratic caucusgoers, the Jan. 26-29 poll found. Just 20 percent have a negative view of him.

That means his popularity among those core Democratic voters is almost as high as Clinton's (84 percent favorable). But he's the first choice of just 9 percent of likely caucusgoers, while Clinton is the top choice for 56 percent. Warren, a U.S. senator from Massachusetts, is the first choice for 16 percent.

This version of Total Mail Converter is not registered.

We need to start the presidential campaign earlier? (Des Moines Register)

By Lanny Davis
February 6, 2015
The Des Moines Register

Many political pundits and Republicans are hyper-ventilating about the news that former Secretary of State Hillary Clinton may actually wait a while longer before making up her mind whether to run for president of the United States.

How could she delay? How dare she? If you Google the words, "Hillary Clinton ... waiting too long" you will get over 2 million hits (whatever that means).

For the media, this is a crisis of major proportions. If Secretary Clinton waits months and months to decide, just imagine all the loss of expense-account paid campaign trips, front-page column inches, breathless "just breaking" cable news 24/7 reports, "gotcha" moments. Imagine media's impatience to write the stories with headlines already written, waiting to be published when and if Hillary announces: "Hillary's Rusty," "More Hillary Gaffes," "Boring Hillary Front-Runner Campaign" and — the one we know is coming, must be coming, not whether but when: "Hillary Clinton Wins By Less Than Expected; Campaign in Disarray."

Many writers say she shouldn't delay or else Massachusetts Sen. Elisabeth Warren will run. Put aside that Sen. Warren has repeatedly stated that she isn't going to run — perhaps because she and Hillary Clinton agree on virtually every major progressive issue. Yet Washington Post's Chris Cillizza and Aaron Blake insist: "[A] big reason she should at least consider announcing sooner rather than later... is Elizabeth Warren....[who] is the beating heart of the Democratic base."

Oh, really? Beating heart?

In the Jan. 22-25 Public Policy Polling (PPP) survey, Clinton leads over Warren among all voters 60 percent to 10 percent (Biden is in second place at 15 percent).

Among Democrats who describe themselves as "very liberal" (what one could accurately call the "beating heart of the Democratic base"), Clinton is the choice of 65 percent — compared with 16 percent for Warren. Clinton is rated as "favorable" by 88 percent of those who identify themselves as "very liberal" — that is, nine out of 10 — compared to 61 percent favorable for Warren.

In January 2012, the Pew Research Center found that 57 percent of the national sample found the presidential campaign was "too long." Surprise!

Is this campaign fatigue a recent phenomenon? When I Googled the words, "presidential campaigns too long," I received 10,500,000 hits. The first hit was a Time magazine article with the headline, "Is the Presidential Campaign Too Long? Both Allies & Candidates Think So."

The article states: "The long campaign is debilitating, tedious, and expensive." One presidential candidate is quoted as saying: "Obviously a year of perambulating, incessant exposure is exhausting. You grow weary, frustrated and bored. Any man who has listened to himself several times daily since February is not likely to inspire his countrymen in October."

The date of the Time article: June 27, 1960. The quoted candidate was the two-time former Democratic nominee, Adlai Stevenson, who lost the nomination to John F. Kennedy.

So the point is, nothing has really changed.

Is there any political danger, as some suggest, that if Hillary Clinton delays her announcement, she will coast to the Democratic nomination and run in the general election as if she has already won? Politico recently reported that some Iowans fear Clinton will take them for granted and not make an effort to win the caucuses.

Fear not, Iowans. Not a chance.

Full disclosure: I am a long-time friend and loyal supporter. I don't know whether, or when, Clinton will announce for president. I really don't.

But this much I do know: When and if she runs, she will work very hard. She will not act as if she is entitled to a single vote. She will work to earn every vote.

Hard work, issues, facts, respect for her opponents, respect for those who disagree, respect for those on both sides of the aisle: This is Hillary Clinton. This is who she always has been. And, no doubt: This is the kind of campaign she will run — if she runs.

Of that I am certain.

This version of Total Mail Converter is not registered.

US Benghazi panel to query top officials (AP)

By Matthew Daly
February 6, 2015
Associated Press

WASHINGTON (AP) — A special U.S. House committee looking into the deadly Benghazi, Libya, attacks in 2012 will interview a host of current and former high-ranking Obama administration officials as it speeds the pace of the investigation.

The panel's Republican chairman Rep. Trey Gowdy has previously said he will ask Hillary Rodham Clinton, secretary of state at the time of the attacks, to testify at a public hearing before the 12-member committee. He said Friday that appearance should occur "as soon as possible." Clinton is widely expected to run for president in 2016.

Other high-ranking officials he said he intends to interview include former Defense Secretary Leon Panetta and former CIA director David Petraeus, as well as White House chief of staff Denis McDonough and national security adviser Susan Rice.

Gowdy also said he wants to interview Cheryl Mills, a longtime Clinton aide who was her chief of staff when the attacks occurred at the U.S. diplomatic outpost in Benghazi, killing Ambassador Chris Stephens and three other Americans.

The lawmaker said last week he was frustrated at the slow pace of the investigation and was going to "ratchet it up." Dem,ocrats maintain the investigation is politically motivated and aimed at damaging Clinton's presidential prospects.

Gowdy said Friday that the interviews with the high-ranking officials will begin as soon as April, after the panel interviews 22 potential witnesses who work for the State Department or have knowledge of the attacks.

He called the timeline for new interviews "ambitious" but said he intends to "stay with this schedule and will issue subpoenas if necessary."

Clinton spokesman Nick Merrill said Friday that a reporter "should check in with" Democrats on the Benghazi panel for a response to Gowdy's letter

Gowdy also plans to interview former UN Ambassador Thomas Pickering and Adm. Mike Mullen, who chaired an independent panel that reviewed the September 2012 attacks.Pickering was President George H.W. Bush's U.N. envoy, and Mullen was the top U.S. general under Presidents George W. Bush and Barack Obama.

Their report harshly criticized the State Department for its security posture in the months before militants stormed the Benghazi facility. But House Republican members said their review was incomplete and lacked independence.

Rep. Elijah Cummings, the top Democrat on the Benghazi panel, said it was not clear what additional questions Gowdy and committee Republicans want to answer.

A majority of the 20 people named as likely witnesses "have already provided information to Congress through prior interviews and testimony - in some cases multiple times - during seven previous congressional investigations," Cummings said.

Committee Democrats sent a letter to the House Administration Committee this week expressing concern over what they called a secretive, unlimited budget for the select committee.

The panel spent nearly $1.8 million last year and is on pace to spend more than $3 million this year, Democrats said. That total is more than several House committees with legislative and oversight jurisdictions and is larger than the amount House Republicans allocated to investigate Hurricane Katrina in 2005, Democrats said.

This version of Total Mail Converter is not registered.

Hillary Clinton Questioning Sought by House Benghazi Panel (Bloomberg)

By Billy House
February 6, 2015
Bloomberg

The U.S. congressional panel investigating the 2012 terrorist attack in Benghazi, Libya, said it wants to interview former Secretary of State Hillary Clinton and other Obama administration officials.

Among 20 current or former officials the committee wants to question are White House Chief of Staff Denis McDonough, National Security Adviser Susan Rice, former White House press secretary Jay Carney, Joint Chiefs of Staff Chairman Martin Dempsey, former CIA Director David Petraeus, and former Defense Secretary Leon Panetta.

The committee's chairman, Republican Representative Trey Gowdy of South Carolina, disclosed the plans in a letter Friday to the panel's top Democrat, Representative Elijah Cummings of Maryland.

Interviews of State Department personnel will begin next week and run through April, Gowdy wrote. Those will be followed by interviews with executive branch and other administration officials, the chairman said.

The panel also would like to interview former United Nations Ambassador Thomas Pickering and Admiral Mike Mullen, who led an earlier independent board that reviewed the attack.

Gowdy said his committee wants to schedule an interview "as soon as possible" with Clinton, who led the State Department at the time of the attack that killed four Americans including Ambassador Christopher Stevens. Clinton is a potential 2016 presidential candidate.

State Department

His committee is also seeking documents from the State Department, including e-mails and other materials that Gowdy said is needed to prepare for questioning of Clinton.

Clinton testified about the Sept. 11, 2012, Benghazi attacks before the Senate Foreign Relations Committee in January 2013. She is prepared to testify again before Congress, Cummings said last month, according to the Hill newspaper.

White House spokesman Eric Schultz told reporters Friday he had no comment on who would appear before the committee. He referred to some of the claims about the Benghazi attack as "conspiracy theories" and said several other investigations had given the administration a "clean bill of health" on the issue.

Cummings and the four other Democrats on the 12-member panel have complained that they have been excluded from some witness interviews.

In a statement Friday, Cummings reiterated Democratic complaints about Republican secrecy regarding the committee's focus, spending limits and timetable for finishing its work.

"The committee has not adopted an investigative plan, rules, or a budget, and it remains unclear what additional questions it seeks to answer," Cummings said.

"A majority of these witnesses have already provided information to Congress through prior interviews and testimony - - in some cases multiple times -- during seven previous congressional investigations," he said.

This version of Total Mail Converter is not registered.

Benghazi panel chief wants to hear from Clinton ASAP (The Hill)

By Martin Matishak

February 6, 2015

The Hill

The Republican chairman of the House Select Committee on Benghazi said panel members want to speak to former Secretary of State Hillary Clinton "as soon as possible."

The comments come at the end of a list of desired witnesses Rep. Trey Gowdy (S.C.) sent Thursday to Rep. Elijah Cummings (Md.), the committee's top Democrat.

However, he does not give a timeframe for speaking with Clinton.

The 20 person list "does not purport to or begin to identify the full universe of individuals the committee expects to interview or who might have knowledge about the policies, decisions and activities related" to the Sept. 11, 2012, attacks, Gowdy said in his letter.

The interviews — set to begin Tuesday and conclude in April — show Gowdy is making good on a promise he made last week during a rancorous committee hearing, that the panel would "ratchet up" the pace.

The witness roster includes a number of high-profile Obama administration officials, including: National Security Adviser Susan Rice and her deputy, Ben Rhodes, White House Chief of Staff Denis McDonough and Joint Chief of Staff Chairman Gen. Martin Dempsey.

The list also includes former officials who were part of the administration at the time of the attacks, such as then-White House press secretary Jay Carney, CIA Director David Petraeus and Defense Secretary Leon Panetta.

Cummings derided Gowdy's witness list.

"The committee has not adopted an investigative plan, rules, or a budget, and it remains unclear what additional questions it seeks to answer," he said in a statement. "In this case, a majority of these witnesses have already provided information to Congress through prior interviews and testimony — in some cases multiple times — during seven previous congressional investigations."

In terms of Clinton, Gowdy wrote that he reissued a subpoena to the State Department seeking documents related to the agency's 2013 Accountability Review Board examination into the attacks.

He also gave the department a Feb. 13 deadline for all "emails, documents and other materials … which would be needed to constructively ask questions of Secretary Clinton."

Benghazi is a political land mine for Clinton, the front-runner for the Democratic presidential nomination in 2016. Republicans have skewered her handling of the attacks and argue the security failure at the U.S. complex in Libya should bar her from the White House.

This version of Total Mail Converter is not registered.

An appearance before the select committee would be Clinton's third Capitol Hill appearance on the attacks that left four Americans dead, and it could provide fresh ammunition for Republicans just as the race for the White House begins.

This version of Total Mail Converter is not registered.

Former HP CEO: Run for prez likely (Boston Herald)

By Owen Boss
February 6, 2015
Boston Herald

Former Hewlett-Packard CEO Carly Fiorina said yesterday it "is looking more likely" that she will enter the 2016 GOP presidential primary and vowed to offer voters far more than just a female opponent for potential Democratic nominee Hillary Rodham Clinton.

"I'm not running because I'm a woman but the fact is I am a woman ... and I think it is an important part of who I am," Fiorina said during an appearance on Boston Herald Radio's "Morning Meeting." "I certainly believe that all of us, men and women, are judged on our character and our accomplishments and our track records and our lives — and I look forward to those things being examined about me."

Fiorina told hosts Jaclyn Cashman and Hillary Chabot she is mulling a run at the White House because she feels the country has reached "a turning point" and that she can offer "a different and relevant experience set to the job of the president."

"Ultimately I don't think this is about gender," Fiorina said when asked how she felt about being labeled the GOP's "weapon against Hillary Clinton" in a recent Fortune magazine article. "I think it is more about my experience and my perspective and my voice."

And with Clinton and former Florida Gov. Jeb Bush already raking in millions of dollars in campaign contributions, Fiorina said her primary focus will be on reaching out to voters personally.

"Of course people don't know me and they need to get to know me," Fiorina said. "Do we need to raise money? Yes. Do we need to raise as much money as Jeb Bush? No. ... Money is important, but money is not everything, and I actually think good, old-fashioned, on-the-ground, reach-out politics counts for a lot."

This version of Total Mail Converter is not registered.

Mike Huckabee says Hillary Clinton more like Barack Obama than husband Bill (Dallas Morning News)

By Gromer Jeffers Jr.
February 5, 2015
Dallas Morning News

Republican Mike Huckabee says Democratic rival Hillary Rodham Clinton is more like President Barack Obama than her husband, former President Bill Clinton.

"Nobody, at least on the Republican side, knows the Clintons better than me," said Huckabee, a 2016 GOP presidential contender. "Hillary Clinton would govern much more like Barack Obama than she would Bill Clinton."

Huckabee, the former Arkansas governor, said Hillary Clinton was "much less a pragmatist" than her husband.

He didn't mean his words as a compliment to Hillary Clinton, the overwhelming favorite to become the 2016 Democratic nominee for president.

Huckabee spent much of his speech this week to the National Center for Policy Analysis and the Dallas Rotary Club blasting President Obama for failures in domestic issues and foreign policy, including his contention that the president cannot defeat international terrorism organizations like ISIS because he refuses to acknowledge that the groups are part of an Islamic jihad.

Clinton is Obama's former Secretary of State. She also served as a U.S. senator from New York after the leaving the White House as a popular, but polarizing first lady.

Huckabee, who became Arkansas governor four years after Bill Clinton left the post, had tacit praise for the former president.

"Bill Clinton wasn't that bad of a president," Huckabee said, pointing out that he wasn't referring to the former president's personal indiscretions.

This version of Total Mail Converter is not registered.

What isn't being said about 2016 election (Star Democrat)

By David Shribman
February 6, 2015
The Star Democrat

There's a lot being spoken about the 2016 presidential election. What isn't being said is far more interesting.

Indeed, there are two principal unspokens in the run-up to the next presidential campaign. The first is the quiet Republican hope that maverick Sen. Elizabeth Warren will challenge former Secretary of State Hillary Clinton from the left in the Democratic primaries. The second is the anguish Republican candidates are having in trying to figure out how to address economic issues.

At the heart of both of these unspokens is the increasingly apparent wealth gap. You don't have to read Thomas Piketty's "Capital in the 21st Century" - many more people have quoted or bought the groundbreaking book than have actually read it - to acknowledge that the wealth gap is the economic issue of the decade. A report issued last Sunday by Emmanuel Saez, the University of California, Berkeley, economist, affirmed that the top 1 percent of Americans captured 91 percent of the growth in incomes in the first three years of the recovery, a figure ameliorated in 2012 and 2013 by higher top tax rates.

This wealth gap undermines the animating mythology of American life (captured in one name: Horatio Alger). It questions the principal shorthand of the national ethos (captured in one alluring phrase: the American Dream). It challenges both the usual totems of the George W. Bush Republicans (the magic of free markets) and the usual prescriptions of the Barack Obama Democrats (the conviction that an activist government can soften the harsh edges of capitalism).

The Republicans want a Warren challenge to Clinton in part for the sport of it. They so dislike the onetime New York senator that they relish anything that exposes her vulnerabilities, or discovers new ones, especially if the effort pins on her the talisman ("toady of Wall Street") they have been trying to lose themselves since they nominated Wendell Willkie for president in 1940. In truth, Clinton and her husband, the 42nd president, cozied up to Wall Street for reasons Willie Sutton wasn't alone in understanding. That's where the money is.

